I understood that it didn't matter whether Sharra killed her mother, father, or even her little brother Gerard, Joanna would not break, she would not go against what she believed to be right.

There was no gray in Joanna's life, only right and wrong, and she considered what Sharra asked of her to be wrong.

In that moment I fell in love with her all the more.

Her convictions were as much a part of her as her lovely red hair.

"Will you drink your true love's blood now or will you watch as I kill your mother first followed by your brother and finally your father?"

Joanna looked down, her eyes on the dirty ground. "Wicked creature, as I've already explained, I will not. If my family dies, they will go to our Heavenly Father and there find peace."

She lifted her head. Her eyes burned with determination. "While you will suffer everlasting pain and damnation for shedding innocent blood."

"I see." Sharra stuck a finger in the cup and put it to Joanna's lips. "Drink."

Joanna's eyes changed as the blood entered her mouth.

Sharra squealed with delight. "Don't you see? Can't you feel the power you'll possess?"

"Oh, yes. I feel it." Joanna licked her lips, taking the blood in her mouth. For the briefest moment the color returned to her face.

I took a deep breath, unsure whether I was relieved or disappointed.

But then she spat it out and my heart lurched with adoration. She would not give in. Not in the slightest. "But I do not want it, nor do I need it."

"Foolish girl!" Sharra chugged from the goblet all of my blood. When she finished, she threw the cup at the wall next to Joanna's head leaving a ringing in my ears. "Kill them. Kill them all. I'm finished with the lot," she said and left.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

PROFESSOR POPS PART THREE

BUT KENMEI DID NOT KILL us. I would later learn the Hunter didn't support Sharra the way some of the other vampires did.

Once the vampire queen was gone, he went to Joanna. "Let me get you out of these." With very little effort he yanked the chains from the wall. Joanna fell to her knees. "There. There, little bird." He lifted her and placed her on a throne made of rock. Then he bit into his wrist.

Blood immediately came to the surface. "I know you don't want to drink from Adam, but you're a revenant now, not quite human and not quite vampire. Blood is all that will keep you alive." He put his wrist to her mouth.

She resisted, but only for a moment.

"That's it."

I worried she would spit it out again, but she didn't. She drank.

Slowly at first, but then her hands came up and she took hold of his wrist. "Good girl, little bird. Take your fill."

Joanna's mother began to wail. In between cries she shouted, "Demon."

"Be still woman!" I fought against the chains wishing I could be free.

Finally, Joanna stopped drinking.

Glanced over at me. "Adam." She looked embarrassed as she wiped at the blood dribbling from her lips.

Her face was flushed and absolutely gorgeous.

"Red." I tried to sit up, but my bounds wouldn't allow it. "It's okay. I love you."

Kenmei came over, but Joanna stopped him and stepped in front of me. "Mi amour." She leaned down and pressed her lips to mine. "All is well." She freed me by crushing the chains between her hands.

I sat up, surprised by her candid affection and her superhuman strength.

"Your true love will need you by her side, but she can never drink from you. If she does, she will lose herself to the vampire queen. Understand?" Kenmei spoke the words quietly but with fervor.

"Non." I didn't understand in the least, but I was relieved Joanna would be all right.

Kenmei took my wrist. "Joanna will remain a revenant as she is because she didn't drink from you when you were human. But she does need to feed and sometimes humans are too easily killed," he said glancing at Joanna.

"You needed worry about Joanna," I said, knowing Joanna would sooner die than take the life of an innocent.

"To be safe and to keep Joanna alive, I must make you as I am," Kenmei said.

This world we were thrown into made no sense, but I would do whatever it took. "Do what you must."

He bit me and drank. When he finished, I felt woozy. "Now you must drink from Joanna."

"I will not." He couldn't make me hurt her.

"Then you will die. Drinking from her is the only way to complete the process."

Joanna helped me sit and tilted her neck. "Take some, Adam." I could hear her blood pumping through her veins.

"I - non. I cannot." My legs wobbled and I fell to the ground.

Joanna climbed on my lap. "You must. I insist, my love."

Her mother was sobbing. "Devil child. You are no longer my daughter." She wore a cross around her neck and pulled it from beneath her dress, crossed herself and kissed it.

Joanna's teeth extended. She touched them timidly. "Am I the devil?"

"No, definitely not. You are anything but evil." I ran a hand down her face.

"Then neither are you." She kissed my forehead. "Take what you must, my love."

I could smell her blood. It was sweet, like the honeysuckle scent of her hair. I tilted her head. Fangs extended and I bit into her neck.

Immediately I felt the power of her blood in my body.

It was sensual. More so than kissing had been.

I groaned and drank deeper.

Joanna grabbed my shoulders and pressed her neck into my mouth. "Adam."

"You must stop, or you'll kill her. She is still too weak." Kenmei grabbed my shoulder.

I didn't want to stop, and I sensed Joanna didn't want me to either.

But I suddenly knew that if I kept going, she would die. I would drain her dry. I quickly released her. "I'm sorry. Are you alright?"

Joanna took a deep breath.

Her eyes burned with a hungry passion I hadn't seen before.

"Good." She stood and helped me to my feet, lifted me like I was nothing more than a paper sack.

"Will Sharra come after us?" I asked Kenmei as we stepped into the sunlight.

It burned, but I was grateful to be alive, to be out of the dungeon.

Finally free. I realized I hadn't thought we'd escape. At least not in this life.

Packed horses waited for us.

The world was different now. Everything blazed brighter.

Sounds I couldn't yet comprehend filled my ears. It was as though I could taste the very air.

"No, she won't come after either of you. There's no point now that you've been turned, Adam. You are Joanna's only true love. Without your blood Joanna can never become the next vessel for the vampire queen." Kenmei gave a serious smile. "Remember you must drink from Joanna at least once a day, otherwise you'll die." It looked like he wanted to say more, but he didn't.

"Why? That makes no sense." I was beyond exasperated with the whole situation.

"A Hunter must feed from the vampire queen or one of her chosen. Joanna is - a chosen. Feed from her." He clapped me on the back. "Now go." Kenmei glanced at Joanna. "Take your mother home."

"Non," Joanna said. "I will continue to Chinon. I now understand the changes that have been made to my physical body were part of God's plan. I can be the strength of France, until I'm no longer needed."

Joanna's mother crossed herself and ran away from them.

"Mon dieu," I said, watching her go.

"She will not escape here for we are in the land of Sharra, a realm outside the one you've known."

"Oh?" I took in my surroundings and realized the land did look different.

"But I will see her home," Kenmei continued.

Joanna hugged Kenmei. "Thank you for all of your help, Hunter."

He smiled at her. "I wish I could've done more." He clasped my arm. "You are a vampire now and can no longer be killed. As well, you are a Hunter since some of the vampire queen's magic resides in you. You can walk in the daylight, but be careful. You will begin to see others - possible chosen for the queen. Stay away. Learn your powers. I will seek you out when the time is right."

"Thank you, Kenmei." I patted him on the back.

He nodded. "I believe we will meet again, Adam Henry."

"Oui," I said in response, though I hoped I never saw Kenmei again.

"Good-bye." He snapped his fingers and the countryside changed. Snow fell from the sky and covered the ground.

"We are back in our land, at the place where we stopped the night we were taken," Joanna said turning in a circle.

After getting my bearings, I saw she was right. "Are you cold?" I held out my hand and let snowflakes fall onto my palm.

I could feel the snow touch my skin. It was cool but didn't bother me.

"I am filled with desire to accomplish the thing which God has commanded me to do." Her expression was serious. "Let's be off."

WE ARRIVED AT VAUCOULEURS, a city outside Chinon in record time. There we met a Robert de Baudricourt.

"Do not waste my time," he said when Joanna requested an audience with the king.

She was not to be deterred. "Your troops will perform a military reversal near Orleans. The strategy will win them the battle they fight."

He snorted. "Get out of my sight, child."

"I will take my leave, but when you learn the truthfulness of my words, come and find me. We will remain in Vaucouleurs until you come."

"Don't hold your breath." He laughed harshly and threw us out.

Joanna sighed. "He will not live much longer." She climbed on her horse.

"How do you know?" I asked, wondering if she intended to drink from him.

"Could you not smell the disease in his body?"

I had smelled a putrid stench, like rotting meat. "I hadn't realized it was his body I smelled."

We rode out of town to the place we were staying. It'd been more than twenty-four hours since either she or I fed.

I needed more of her blood, but didn't want to partake until she fed.

"I'm hungry." Her eyes darted around the landscape. "Let's get ourselves some food. This way."

I followed Joanna, steering my horse toward the forest.

As we neared, her horse reared up and whinnied. She patted the horse and climbed off.

"Come on."

I swung off mine and tethered both mounts to a tree two hundred feet from the forest edge. Then I went after Joanna.

"What do you smell, Red?" It amazed me that she could already utilize her newly enhanced senses.

I was still trying to discern which was what.

She glanced back and gave me a dazzling smile. "Wolves. A whole pack of them."

My first instinct was to react the way the horses had, but then I remembered what we were and returned her grin. "Let's feast."

She took my hand and we ran together.

Ten feet into the forest the wolves surrounded us. They weren't like those we ran into a few weeks ago, but ordinary. They circled us their jaws snapping and dripping saliva. Joanna and I were back to back.

"I'll take the leader. You take the one next to him," I said.

"I want the leader." Joanna lowered her center of gravity just as the wolf came in.

Fear for her safety buzzed through me. But it was unfounded. The animals couldn't harm her.

Within minutes all seven wolves were dead. Joanna crawled over to the large one, pulled it into her arms and sank her fangs into its neck, her glorious green eyes on me.

I grabbed the one nearest to me and drank. The blood of the animal was warm and tasted tolerable, but it was nothing like drinking from Joanna.

When we finished all seven off, she came over to me and crawled into my lap. I stood and carried her to a nearby stream. We walked into the water clothes and all.

For the next several minutes we scrubbed the grime off our clothes and ourselves. Joanna smiled and then dove under the water.

I waited for her to reappear, but she didn't.

"Joanna! Joanna!"

She popped out of the water directly in front of me, splashing the cool water in my face.

"I'm here," she said and giggled.

My serious Joanna.

It was an unexpected emotion and I studied her face. Her eyes sparkled with happiness.

My body responded to her. I craved her, desired her. Before I realized what I did, I grabbed her and pulled her against my chest.

"Oh," she said and sighed, her lids hooded.

I tilted her head and kissed her. Hard. Allowing her to feel all the need I had for her. She wrapped her arms around my neck and her legs around my hips. We stayed like that for a long time. We couldn't get enough of each other.

Someone cleared their throat.

I reluctantly pulled my lips from Joanna's, keeping her close to me so the man could see nothing. It was one of Robert de Baudricourt soldiers.

"Sorry to bother you, sir, but the commander wishes to speak with Joan of Arc."

"It's Joanna," I corrected. "We'll be there straight away. Get!"

"Sorry, sir. Very good." He turned and ran.

"Soldier?"

He stopped and I heard his knees trembling "Yes?"

I released Joanna and stepped out of the water. A feeling of command overtook me and I knew I could make him do what I wanted. "Please be discreet when speaking of what you've seen here. Understand?"

He bowed. "Of course, sir." He jumped on his horse and rode away.

"HOW DID YOU KNOW," Robert de Baudricourt asked when we entered his military post. He stood behind a desk, studying maps of France.

Joanna was dry and clean and exceedingly beautiful.

Clearing her throat, she spoke, "I received a vision from God. He told me of the strategy."

Robert clasped his hands behind his back. "And what would God have you do when you meet the king? Make you his wife? Take you into his bed?"

A growl escaped my lips and my fangs pressed against my mouth.

Joanna touched my hand briefly before stepping forward. "Nothing of the sort. I am to serve the king. Assist him in winning the battle against the English. France will be free if I am beside the king."

He studied her a moment. "Very well. I will take you to the king. We leave on the morrow."

"Mais oui." She bowed and I followed her outside.

THAT NIGHT I sensed a change in her. The giggling girl from the river was gone.

As we lay under the stars, she rolled onto her side toward me. Her creamy skin shone in the moonlight. "You must promise me two things, Adam Henry."

"Whatever you want is yours," I answered, playing with the ends of her hair.

"I've seen my destiny and after I go into battle and we win, I will be captured and killed."

I sat up. "No. I will not let that happen. Besides you heard Kenmei, we cannot be killed easily."

She took my hands. "It doesn't matter. If it is God's will, then I will die. Please, I beg of you, do not interfere. You must let me go." She kissed the tips of my fingers. "When the battle is won, I want to go to my God. My journey on Earth will be finished." Her eyes begged me to understand.

But I didn't want to. "I - " I stood, frustration rolling off me in waves.

I'd promised but I didn't think I could agree to that. "What's the second thing?" I asked, my chest heaving.

She rose and wrapped her arms around my waist.

She was a breathtaking vision. "You must find a way to return to Sharra. Find love or multiple loves. Live a long life."

My heart shredded. "You cannot comprehend what you are asking of me. Do not make me live without you." I cupped her face in my hands, pleading with my eyes and my heart.

"I do understand my love because I know I could not live without you. But you are much stronger than I ever will be. Please, Adam. Please. Live. Love. Promise me." Her eyes searched mine for reassurance.

I looked for a sign she didn't mean what she was saying. Finally, I exhaled, doubting it would be possible but wanting to appease her. "Very well."

"Bon." She lay back down and I lay next to her. "Now hold me like you will never let me go," she commanded.

"With pleasure." I kissed her hungrily, needing her near me. Knowing the depth of my love was unrequited, but not caring.

Because I loved her.

We stayed in each other's arms until the dark sky changed into hues of pink and blue and orange. When it was time to go, we stood, and she hugged me. "I do love you, Adam Henry. Forever and always."

"Je t'aime, ma Coeur."

OceanofPDF.com

47 DAYS UNTIL TOTAL DARKNESS

I, Jasmine was suddenly aware I was no longer inside Joanna's head, but back at my home. Without opening my eyes, I knew I was in my room in Salem, laying on the bed and covered in blankets. Laeddin was in his room, sleeping. I heard his even breathing and the rise and fall of his chest.

The trip back in time was enlightening. I now understood more about Pops and my heart broke for his loss even though it was hundreds of years ago. How that must've hurt. I also understood Laeddin's love for me a little better.

It didn't matter whether I loved him back or not. His love was strong and real and the driving force behind all he'd done and did for me. My heart softened toward him and I wished I could love him back the way he loved me. It would be so easy. But I wasn't sure whether it was because he was a genie and treated me like I was his master or what, but there was something keeping me from letting myself fall for him.

With Christopher, it was purely physical. He believed we belonged together - that I was his betrothed. After spending time with Joanna and Pops, I thought I understood why. A Hunter needed the blood of a chosen to live. Sharra had chosen me just as she chose my mom.

And that brought me to Sharra. Her whole existence she wanted what she couldn't have. A human body. Wings. In a lot of ways, she and I were alike. The time with Pops and Joanna showed me that. I would use my newfound knowledge to my advantage.

Blinking my eyes open, I glanced at the window. The curtains were open. It was raining. Droplets struck the pane and clung to it, beading down. "Laeddin," I whispered, though the words barely left my mouth.

I listened for changes in his breathing, but it continued rhythmically. Taking a deep breath, I tried to relax.

Troy came to mind. My feelings for him were beyond strong, but I was still wary because of his words on the boat.

Patience. The word swirled through my mind and I swallowed, allowing the rain to lull me.

When I was a young girl, I had no patience. I wanted to get where I was going fast. I ate as quickly as possible and did my chores like I was in a race against time. There was no in between. I flew from one adventure to the next without bothering with anything else. Now we were literally in a race against time, and I felt motionless. Frozen like a snowflake on frosted glass. Back in Sharra I'd had my magic and my wings. I'd had everything even though I'd been too senseless to realize it. Now, because of a reckless wish I had neither, and my enemy had both. For a time, I lost my vampire abilities too and became exactly what I'd wished - a normal human.

And I'd hated every second of it.

Even though it had been a hard lesson to learn, I understood I didn't really want normality, but instead wanted to be me, whatever that meant. Thanks to Christopher and his blood, I regained my vampire abilities, including my lust for blood. But I still didn't have my wings or my magic. Maybe I never would. Sharra had them and she was using them to destroy the world. She also had my mom and dad, I hoped. Laeddin believed she wouldn't kill them while she might still use them against me. I longed to imagine he was right even as I tried not to think about what she might be doing with them or worse, to them.

It was a harsh reality, living with the consequences of my childish choices. Knowing that all that was wrong with the realms - the Akuma, the darkness, the deaths of so many innocent lives, and the taking of my parents - was my fault. It was a pain living in my chest like a bitter weed. It festered, producing jagged thorns and overripe fruit. I hadn't killed Abby, Camden, or my grandmother with my own hand, but I might as well have. I was to blame. Attending Ariel's funeral had been one of the most difficult moments in my life, but at least I still had them. Moments. Those who'd died didn't have that luxury and the ache of that knowledge rested heavily in my bones.

"Jasmine, are you ready?" Laeddin was at my door, his voice soft.

"Yes." I said and threw back the covers. "I'll get dressed and be right down."

Dressing in jeans, sweatshirt, and my boots, I then threw my hair up and brushed my teeth. Downstairs, I watched as Laeddin ate. He would look over at me once in a while and I tried to smile.

"Look, I didn't take us back in time so you would feel sorry for me." He threw his finished apple in the trash. "I needed you to understand Sharra. She's doing the same thing now, only she's added revenge to her list."

"I understand." I took his hand. "Thank you, Laeddin." I hugged him tight, hoping he could feel how much I cared.

"You're welcome," he returned then released me. "While we were gone, much has happened. The chayot have mostly gotten rid of the pestilence or Sharra changed her plan." He gritted his teeth. "That is probably more likely."

"How long were we gone?" I asked. The only way I could possibly make amends to all I hurt was to destroy her. And that meant collecting all five pieces of an elven crown created thousands of years ago. As a whole, the crown was believed to have untold power. But five assassins had split the crown and hidden the pieces. Laeddin believed that if I restored it, I could destroy Sharra, return light to the world, and reverse the effects of the pestilence, as well as get my wings and magic back. That was my hope too and I clung to it with every fiber of my being.

"Too long," he said, wrapping his arms around my waist. "Ready for the gargoyle realm?"

I bit my bottom lip and raised my eyes to him. "Ready as I'll ever be."

When we arrived, I moved out of his arms, taking in my surroundings. The countryside was stark with little to offer in terms of color, but was instead a kaleidoscope of various shades of somber. Even the clouds were overcast in gloominess. The sky gave no indication whether there was a sun or a moon.

No vegetation grew. Underfoot, there was nothing but gray rock reminiscent of gravel. My shoulders sagged as I understood the darkness had touched this realm too. It was strange but I almost felt it, like the weight of a thousand mists, soaking into my skin, determined to claim me as one of its own.

"Are we close to the crown piece?" I took a deep breath hoping I could smell the crown. Instead came a mustiness as well as the aroma of the sea. Similar in a lot of ways to Salem.

OceanofPDF.com

GARGOYLE REALM

"I HAVE AN IDEA WHERE IT IS." Laeddin hiked a short distance to the edge of the ridge.

"Where's that?" I hiked over to him. We stood on the top of a vast mountain. The crisp air whipped thin around us, nearly empty of oxygen. Had I still been human I would've had difficulty breathing at such a high altitude.

"Down there, probably within or below the palace," he said, pointing.

I followed his finger as I stroked the bear bracelet encircling my wrist. Christopher had given it to me. The little bear charm brought me comfort.

My eyes drifted down into an expansive city surrounded on three sides by mountains while the fourth opened to the sea.

Homes made of rock and sand lined the streets, standing in rows like soldiers waiting for battle. Two thirds of the way toward the castle was a large wall with a gate.

Two gargoyle sentries with matching brown wings stood guard on either side of it. The second rung of houses was similar to the first, though they were much bigger, and many had colorful flags sticking out from their roofs.

Some houses even had roofs made of different colors.

Another, much smaller rock wall with a gate guarded by two gargoyles with matching maroon wings separated those houses from the inner courtyard and the castle.

I found it strange that creatures born with the ability to fly would have need of walls, but I guessed they were there merely as a reminder of the separation between classes. It seemed no matter which realm I came to there would always be the wealthy and the poor, the aristocrats and the commoners.

Even Sharra had an ordering system, though my mother was much more democratic.

My eyes slid past the wall and fell on the castle.

It stood like a peacock in a pen full of chickens and it was startlingly beautiful.

Tower after tower thrust up in the air, each one seemingly reaching higher than the next. It took up the whole width and breadth of the mountainside.

There were so many spires I lost count, but that wasn't even the most significant detail. Each spire was a different color, glistening brilliantly in emerald, ruby, daffodil, saffron, and periwinkle.

The castle's main walls weren't gray either but had been stained or whitewashed so that the stone was smooth and white as a newborn dove.

At least a hundred stairs cobbled in emerald led up to the entrance of the castle, which had two sentries standing guard, their wings white like the castle's walls.

Other than the guards, the city appeared deserted. Only the few fishing boats docked in the marina made any sort of movement.

"Why didn't you pop us inside the palace, then? Or at least down into the city?" It would be a long walk and that meant more wasted time.

"I would have, Jasmine, but it's protected by some very strong magic. I thought it best we check out our surroundings before diving into a situation that might get out of control." Laeddin squatted and picked up a handful of small rocks, rubbing them against each other in his hand.

"Why not? We aren't here to harm anyone. They might even be willing to help us, especially if we explain the reasons we are here."

"Why can't you believe in me? Have faith in me?" He turned his face up to meet mine.

"I do," I said, working to keep calm. Thoughts of my grandmother filled my mind, but I pushed them away. He did what he thought was best for me. Out of love. I needed to remember that.

He sighed resignedly. "All I've studied about gargoyles tells me they are a solitary group. They have no need for any but their own kind and aren't generally compassionate to outsiders. It would be preferable to keep our presence a secret."

"If you say so." I wanted to rush in there and demand their assistance, but it was a bad idea. I knew that. So I kept my thoughts to myself. "Where is everyone? The city looks deserted." I hoped the Akuma pestilence hadn't reached this realm. If the gargoyles became infected the situation would become extremely difficult.

"Gargoyles are nocturnal. I'm guessing they're still sleeping."

"Hmmm, that could be." The genie was probably right, but I was antsy and wanted to kill the assassin, get the crown piece and move the freak on.

"I'll make camp and once it's fully light we can check things out, see what we're dealing with." He dropped the gravel and stood. Lifted his arms and began to speak some sort of enchantment.

Before he could get a full sentence out, a puff of smoke burst from the castle. Laeddin stopped. I came to stand beside him once again. The smoke wasn't like any I'd seen before. It didn't linger like smoke should. Instead it separated and branched out. "What is that?"

"Gargoyles," Laeddin said, an edge in his voice.

As he spoke, the "smoke" opened its wings. It was as though the sky lit up. Their bodies were grim and ashy like the rest of the landscape, but their wings were magnificent, like the spires on the castle. Each set was a different color, including gold, stark white, sunset orange, and blood red. They dipped and spun languidly in the sky.

"They're amazing," I said, longing to be up there flying with them.

Laeddin mumbled something under his breath.

"What?" I asked, but he didn't respond. I kept my gaze on the gargoyles. Within moments it became clear they were heading our way. "Should we try to hide? Or fight?"

Laeddin snorted. "Where do you propose we go? I intended to provide us with invisible tents, but I don't have the time now." His tone was accusatory, like I'd done something to call the gargoyles toward us.

"Well then I guess we stand our ground and confront them." I straightened up, taking on the posture of a princess, the way I'd been taught.

"Be ready." Laeddin took a protective stance in front of me. "Like I said before, they don't take kindly to those who aren't like them."

"You be ready," I growled, pushing him out of the way.

He exhaled sharply. "As you say, Princess."

The gargoyles landed and encircled us, making incomprehensible noises. I guessed they were communicating. This group was intimidating, the tallest at least seven feet. His golden wings seemed to shimmer in the fading light.

All of the gargoyles had black eyes and black hair and skin the color of granite. I wondered if it felt like rock too. There were two males and two females. The males were shirtless, their smooth chests bare, and wearing black pants made out of a shiny fabric.

The females wore the same pants but were also wearing something similar to a bikini top. None of them wore shoes.

"What are they saying?" I asked Laeddin, frustrated.

He took my hand. I felt a surge of magic rush up my arm, and the gargoyles' garbled nonsense became clear. I squeezed his hand in gratitude.

"Looks tasty," the female with red wings said.

That was a terrifying prospect. "Hello." I raised a hand in salutation, hoping they would realize we weren't enemies. Or food. "My name is Jasmine, Princess of Sharra. My mother is Snow White, the Vampire Queen. Maybe you've heard of her?" Pretty much everyone knew my mother. "This is my friend, Laeddin." I pointed at the genie. "We are here to ask for your help."

The female who'd spoken poked my cheek. "I think it's trying to communicate."

I shoved her hand away and she growled, pushing me down.

"It's feisty," she said.

OceanofPDF.com

IT ISN'T AFRAID

"IT HAS to be to keep up with you, Rave," the largest gargoyle, the one I guessed was the leader, said.

Rave grunted and walked over to Laeddin, sniffing him. I couldn't help but wonder if his blood smelled as good to her as it did to me. "It stinks, Edge. I think we should kill them." Guess that answered my question.

"Or eat it," the male with sunset orange wings added.

The one the female called Edge shook his head. "We won't kill them or eat them. We will take them to the emperor and let him decide their fate." He made a point of looking at each of them, starting with the orange-winged male. "Scotch?"

"Yes, Liege."

"Skye?" Hers were the wings that reminded me of a cotton ball. They were brilliant white.

"Of course." She bowed, keeping her eyes on the ground.

"Rave?"

She shook her wings, seemingly irritated. "Whatever you say, boss." She spoke like she had a bad taste in her mouth. As though to prove my point, she spat. I watched it land on the ground and disappear into the gravel.

"That's what I like to hear." Edge said. "Rave, you and Scotch continue your duties. See if there are more about. The darkness is consuming the land too quickly, and we must find out why. Neither Graves nor Jagg seem to know, but perhaps these things," he pointed at Laeddin and me, "can give us some answers."

They left without a word, flying away from the city, heading off in the direction of taller mountains in the distance.

Edge's wings spread open and he lifted slightly off the ground. Flying over to me, he took hold of my shoulders. I tried to fight him off, but his grip was too strong. "Hold still or I might accidentally drop you." He smirked, looking at me like I was mitochondria under a microscope. "Skye, take the other and follow me." Edge swept into the air. We fell momentarily until his wings caught hold.

I tried speaking to him again. "Excuse me, but I would appre - "

"That one seems extra chatty," Skye said, coming up beside Edge. She had Laeddin in her arms. He faced outward like I did, his focus on the city below.

"Sounds like gibberish to me," Edge replied.

"Why can't they understand me?" I shouted at Laeddin over the rushing wind.

"The magic I gave you allows us to understand them, but they can't understand us. I thought it might be prudent for now, given we have no idea what's happening. We can speak to each other without worrying about being overheard." Laeddin shouted.

"Okay," I responded, thinking it would've been nice for the gargoyles to understand us as well. Frustrated, I faced forward, turning my attention to the city. A few more gargoyles had appeared. I focused on one in particular. She was holding a smaller gargoyle with indigo wings that matched her own in her arms. Two other children, one with lavender wings and another with periwinkle, walked quickly beside her, working to keep up. They wove through the streets, heading toward the water.

She must've noticed I was watching her because she looked up. I waved, giving her a bright smile. She looked away, pulling her children closer about her as she picked up speed.

I sighed, closing my eyes. And that's when I felt it, the wind in my hair and against my cheeks. My shirt was flapping around like a flag. In that moment, everything else was forgotten. I was flying! It didn't matter that I ought to be frightened about facing the gargoyles inside the castle made of jewels and collecting the second piece of the crown. All I could do was raise my arms and revel.

"Look, it isn't even afraid," Skye said. "In fact I would go so far as to say it's enjoying itself."

Edge just grunted a response while my smile grew even bigger.

THE CASTLE LOOMED CLOSER and I realized just how enormous it actually was. It seemed to swallow us up with his expanse.

Ten feet below the tallest spire was a landing pad.

Two guards stood watch as Edge and Skye landed.

"What have we here?" one of the guards asked.

"We aren't sure, but we're taking them to the emperor," Edge said.

Something passed between the guards.

"What is it?" Skye asked.

"The emperor is busy at the moment." One of the guards winked. "He could be a while."

Skye growled. "Who is it this time? It better not be my sister again."

Edge placed a hand on her shoulder. "I'm sure it isn't. Let's take these down to the dungeon."

Skye seemed to relax, and I wondered if they were mates. "Yes, Liege." She followed him past the landing strip into the castle. There wasn't a door, just a large, gaping hole, like the dark mouth of a toothless monster. I realized then that I hadn't seen a single bird, nor had I heard any of their calls.

I pondered the reasons behind the birds' absence, whether it had to do with the darkness; or maybe there just were no birds - because really, what would they eat? I hadn't seen any bugs either, nor grass, trees, or a single flower. That led me to wonder what sort of creatures swam in the sea, whether there were fish and krill, lobster and octopus, sharks and dolphins, whales and sea lions.

I turned, hoping I could see something of the water, but we were already within the castle. The inside wasn't as fine as the exterior.

At least not up here. The grey color of the walls reminded me of Gatsby, my mother's cat. They were rough to the touch and smelled slightly damp, like water on stone.

As we moved further down, I saw that the stairs broke off into corridors filled with scurrying maids carrying linens, or dirty dishes and empty bottles.

At first, I found it weird that a race of creatures with the ability to fly would have so many stairs, but quickly realized it was due to the close quarters. There wasn't enough room to spread their wings. Flying was completely out of the question in the corridors.

When we finally reached what I believed to be the main floor, the gargoyles walked us past a large banquet room.

Inside was more of the same.

The room was made up of nothing but grey rock, with the exception of the light fixtures. Enormous white rocks hung from the ceiling like a contemporary chandelier, giving off an almost heavenly glow.

I better studied my surroundings and saw that all along the walls and corridors were smaller versions of those same white, glowing rocks.

Probably fifty gargoyles crowded into the room.

No one noticed us, focused as they were on the buffet style food, which gave off a slightly sulfuric smell.

They were all speaking, like the buzzing of giant bees going about their work. One gargoyle walked past with a plate filled with gray slop.

What were they eating? I shuddered, hoping the gargoyles didn't really intend to eat Laeddin and me.

"Why does the emperor always send us out on missions during mealtimes? I swear he wants us to starve," Skye said.

Edge grunted in response.

OceanofPDF.com

I MUST BE DREAMING

HE'S OBVIOUSLY a man of many words, I thought sarcastically.

We passed another room filled with dozens of carved statutes.

All were of gargoyles in various shapes and sizes - except one. She was female and appeared to be human, aside from the large black wings on her back.

They were different than gargoyles' wings, more bird-like.

That surprised me because the statue was placed high above the others and in a prominent location.

I wanted to ask who she was, but knew the gargoyles couldn't understand me, and so held my tongue.

We'd moved on anyway, into another stairwell, which led us down further into the depths of the castle. It became obvious very quickly that those with certain colored wings held different positions. If a gargoyle had bright wings in colors like those on the castle spires, they were the aristocrats while those with duller-colored wings were the servants.

Further down and I noticed the servants were no longer carrying linens, but some held weapons while others carried tools and baskets filled with more of the strange-looking food.

When we walked by, they stared.

More than once I smiled but doing so seemed to scare them because anyone who saw me dashed away quickly, using their wings to hurry themselves along.

As we continued to descend, the number of gargoyles dwindled. The air grew warmer too. When we reached the final landing on the staircase, Edge pulled open a thick door, causing a gust of putrid air to rush out.

I forced myself not to gag as we walked past door after door. Finally, we reached the end of the hall, a door carved into the dead end.

It had bars like a jail cell along the top and was thick, solid rock underneath.

Skye pulled on its hinges, and it screeched open, making my ears want to bleed. "In you go." She shoved Laeddin inside.

Edge paused, peeking into the dungeon before pushing me inside too. I stumbled to my knees, scraping them on the stone floor.

The door closed with another screech. One of the strange orbs of light glowed dimly above us and while I could see in the dark, I was thankful for the little light.

"Great," I said, rolling onto my butt.

A sound rustled behind me and I jumped to my feet, facing the noise in a defensive position. It was then that I noticed something huddled against the far wall. It appeared to be a person. Or more precisely, two persons.

"Hello?" I spoke softly so as not to startle them. If they were gargoyles, I didn't want to give them cause to try to crush me, though since they'd been imprisoned, anything was possible.

At the sound of my voice, one of them lifted its head. "You speak English?"

The voice was male, though garbled. I guessed from disuse.

"Yes." I crouched in front of him, able to see that he had black hair and eyes gray as an overcast sky. His skin was dark, his body covered in muscles, like a statue. "My name is Jasmine. And you are?"

He gasped, throwing his head back so that it hit the wall. "I must be dreaming. Oh no, no, no. Not again." He banged his head several more times, sending rubble and rock dust into the air. The tips of his hair began to change from black to white.

The person sitting beside him lifted its head then. A girl. "Hey, it's okay. You're okay. Calm down," she cooed, running her hand down his arm like she was stroking a frightened fowl.

He stopped and opened his eyes.

Laeddin knelt beside me. "You aren't dreaming, young one. This is real." He stuck out his hand. "My name is Laeddin."

At the sound of the genie's voice, the boy glanced at the girl. She nodded encouragingly. "They're real. I see them too."

He tentatively reached out and touched my arm. Flinched. Poked me again. "You are real and you're kind of squishy. I can't believe it."

I decided there was no point taking offense. Compared to the gargoyles I was squishy. "It's true. I swear." I thought of smiling but doing so hadn't got me very far with the others, though he didn't look exactly like a gargoyle. Neither did the girl. As far as I could tell, neither of them had wings.

He ran his hands over his hair, brushing away some of the dust. "I thought I was dreaming. It's probably because I've seen you before. But not here."

"You have?" What a weird thing to say. The guy sounded delusional.

"Yes," he chuckled mirthlessly. "My father has a picture of you hanging in a room in his house." He took a deep, ragged breath and his eyes filled with tears.

"I see, and how long have you been down here?" Somehow, I knew I wasn't going to like the answer.

He rested his head against the wall, closing his eyes. "I don't know. It feels like forever."

"What's your name?" Laeddin asked. He moved his hand back when the male hadn't taken it, placing it in his lap.

"I'm Jesse." Jesse took the girl's hand. "And this is Rayne."

"Hello, Ray - " I stopped as the guy's name sank in. "You're Jesse?" I shouted. "As in Troy's brother Jesse?"

Jesse's eyes grew large with surprise. "You know Troy?" He sat up straight. "My father, brother, and I were - helping some friends when I was sucked into a vortex. It sent me here, to this realm. The gargoyles tried to talk to me, but since I couldn't understand them, they gave up and put me down here. After a week or so, maybe longer," he paused, grabbing hold of his hair. "I haven't been able to keep track of time."

"It's okay, Jesse." Rayne squeezed his arm.

He nodded and continued, "The guards threw Rayne down here with me. Rather quickly, we figured out we can understand each other. She can speak to and understand both the gargoyles and me, so I explained to her what happened. She, in turn, tried to tell the guards, but they wouldn't listen." He sighed heavily, frustrated. "I'm sure my dad and brother are freaking out."

"They are," I said, feeling his hope and allowing it to fuel my own. Troy told me what happened. Jesse's disappearance weighed heavily on Troy and Pops too. Both of them had been trying to find Jesse for months.

Jesse's eyes squinted shrewdly. "How do you know my dad and brother?"

"He's sort of my grandfather." I rested my hand on his knee.

"That's why a picture of you hangs in his house." He grinned, flashing his teeth.

"Yep. And I met Troy several weeks ago." I forced myself not to blush. "They've been looking for you. Troy's been having a really hard time. He misses you terribly."

Jesse's brows furrowed and he leaned forward. He gave me a half smile. "They're looking for me?"

"Of course. They haven't stopped since you vanished."

Jesse smiled bigger. "If only the gargoyles would let me explain. They might have a way of getting me home. Us home." He took another ragged breath and it sounded like rock grating against rock.

I wanted to reach out and hug him. It would be great if we could get him back to Troy, but first we needed to find the second piece of the fairy crown. "Why are you in here?" I asked Rayne.

OceanofPDF.com

RAUNCHY THING

INSTEAD OF ANSWERING, Rayne turned away, her back against Jesse's arm. That wasn't peculiar at all.

"She wouldn't tell me either," Jesse said, giving me a sorrowful look.

"Are you from this realm?" I tried again, leaning over and trying to get a glimpse of her face.

"I am," she whispered.

"But you don't look like the others."

"That's because I'm a mutt - only half gargoyle, like Jesse." She pulled her knees up to her chest and rested her head on them.

"Is that why you're down here then? Because you're a mutt?" I guessed there was more to the story than that, but thought it was a good jumping off point.

"Don't talk to me." She turned again so that her back faced me.

Jesse shrugged apologetically. "Can you give her some space?"

"Sure." I went over to the door, frustrated, and shook it. "Let's us out! Right now."

"Hey, it's okay," I heard Jesse whisper to Rayne in between my wasted shouts. "You don't have to talk. Not yet. It's okay."

"Maybe we should get some rest." Laeddin came over and put a hand on my arm.

"You could get us out of here, you know." I gave Laeddin a questioning look.

"True, if you wish it."

"Ugh, I don't wish it," I yelled, throwing up my hands. "Why can't you just do it so that we can find the piece of the crown?"

He went over and fell against the same wall Jesse and Rayne leaned against, without responding, which frustrated me even more. And the raunchy thing was we were stuck in the small cell. We would be stuck in this place for the foreseeable future.

"I swear it's like looking in a wonky mirror," Jesse said. He'd come over, his hands tucked into his front pockets.

"Why's that?" I asked, wrapping my fingers around the bars and sticking my face through the space between. Well, as much of my face as would fit, which wasn't a lot.

"I did the exact same thing for probably two days' straight." He shook his head, chuckling without mirth.

"What?" I asked.

"Exactly what you're doing." He laugh harder, but grabbed hold of the wall, stumbling backward. "Oh, man."

"What's wrong?"

He closed his eyes and planted his feet, trying to steady himself. "Nothing really, just hungry."

"Don't they feed you down here?"

"Not in a long while," he admitted.

"It's been weeks," Rayne chimed in, jumping up and coming to assist Jesse.

How were they not dead?

"Let me help." Laeddin waved his hand. It seemed Laeddin would use his magic on anyone but me. "Hang on." He tried again, waving his hand in a small swirling motion. I'd seen him do that same movement many times before in order to activate his magic, but this time nothing happened. He snapped his fingers, trying for a third time. The tattoos around his wrists sparked, but it was as though his magic had short-circuited.

"What's the matter with you?" I took his hands. They felt warm and my fingers tingled with the remnants of the magic he had been trying to cast.

"My magic isn't working," Laeddin said. "It's like it wants to, but something is tamping it down. Peculiar." He spoke like a scientist methodically discovering different possible hypotheses. He gave me a wry look before glancing over at Rayne. "Any idea why, young one?"

"How should I know?" She looked away again, avoiding his gaze.

I watched their exchange, curious about why Laeddin had asked her. My fingers found the wooden bear charm and stroked it, absently. What did the genie know that I didn't? It occurred to me, not for the first time, that Laeddin knew so much more about our situation than he would ever reveal. With that realization came clarity. As much as I cared for Laeddin, even loved him, it wasn't the kind of love one built a relationship on. I believed he would keep me safe, but I couldn't entirely trust him. I took a deep breath, searching for the particular scent of his blood. It still smelled amazing, but no longer breathtaking, like when I'd first met him. Laeddin had been an infatuation, my first crush.

"Damn, I feel woozy. I'd better sit back down. Sorry." We helped Jesse back to his corner and into sitting position.

I felt terrible that I couldn't do anything to help him. "No need to apologize, Jesse. I promise you that when we leave this place, we're taking you with us." I glanced at Rayne. "Both of you."

"Thank you," Rayne mouthed, but didn't meet my gaze. I wasn't sure if her reluctance to speak to us came from the imprisonment or was part of her personality. She was either very shy or hiding something.

Jesse rested his head against his knees. Rayne rested beside him, rubbing his back in soothing circles, making it evident the two of them had grown fond of each other. Rayne had brown skin and stark white hair that hung long, like a curtain. Her eyes were the same color gray as Jesse's, but she was smaller, more petite in size. Jesse wore tattered dark jeans while Rayne wore clothing like that of the other gargoyles we'd seen. I couldn't help but wonder what she must've done to end up in prison. That was sure to be a story.

"I'm going to get some rest," I said, and moved to curl up in the corner on the far side of the cell.

IT FELT like several hours later when I heard a commotion on the stairs, followed by shouting and more yelling.

Two of the voices sounded familiar and I ran over to the door, curious who it could be. Several gargoyles were holding two people captive.

Smoke swirled in front of them, looking like it came from one of the prisoners' noses. On top of that, his skin seemed to ripple like -

"Troy? Is that you?"

Both prisoners stopped fighting and looked in my direction.

"Pops?" I blinked several times and pinched myself to make sure I wasn't dreaming.

"Pops! Jesse was suddenly next to me. "Troy!"

"Jasmine." Troy was more surprised than me, his eyes big as saucers. "Who's that with you?"

A smile spread across my face like wildfire. "It's Jesse."

Pops and Troy looked at each other.

"Jesse," they said together. I'd never seen two people so happy.

My insides swelled with joy. They found each other. Finally.

A myriad of emotions swirled through me.

The initial reaction was happiness.

But there was still a wound.

He didn't want more like me around.

Still, I had time to recognize it probably could be a bad thing to have more original vampires. The way he spoke to me on the yacht still hurt though.

He apologized. More than once.

And kissed me the way everyone should be kissed. My knees turned to jelly at just the thought.

Pops and Troy no longer fought against the guards and allowed the gargoyles to toss them into the cell with us.

"Good riddance," one of them said.

"By the goddess, I hope we never have to lay eyes on them again," the other responded.

I gasped. Would they really leave us down here to die?

OceanofPDF.com

BEFORE THE DOOR SLAMMED SHUT, Pops hugged me. "Are you okay?"

"I'm fine. Go see your son."

Troy smiled at me quickly before he and Pops were hugging Jesse, clapping him on the back, and talking to each other all at once. I watched them with tears in my eyes, grateful the three of them had been reunited, even if it was in jail.

Rayne seemed unsure about what to do. I went and stood beside her and Laeddin, occasionally wiping my eyes with the back of my hand. Seeing men cry with joy was a sight I would never forget. The sheer happiness in that cell seemed to increase the light in the room.

Once the initial hugging and expressions of delight were over, they lowered their voices and talked, their words rushed as they tried to catch each other up on all that had happened. I didn't interrupt. Nor did I use my abilities to listen in. They deserved some private time together.

After a while, I sat down, pulling Laeddin with me. Rayne had already returned to her corner and appeared to be sleeping. She must've realized Jesse needed time with his family too. "Can you sense the crown?" I whispered, even though Laeddin had told me yesterday that he couldn't.

"No. My powers still don't work down here." He seemed impatient with me.

"Okay," I said with a sigh.

He turned his eyes on me. "I know your feelings for the boy are strong. Even without magic it's obvious, but I don't believe the two of you belong together." He pursed his lips like he wanted to say more.

Understanding over what he was feeling softened my words. "I appreciate that, but our relationship status isn't your concern."

"You're right, Princess." He crossed his arms and turned away from me.

I closed my eyes, resting my head against the wall, trying to empty my mind. There was so much that needed to be done, and without a way out of this cell, it didn't seem likely we'd accomplish anything.

"Jazz," Troy shouted.

Startled, I opened my eyes just as Troy picked me up and swung me around, before encircling me with his arms. "Jazz," he said again, this time softer. He had a dazzling smile on his face. His lips found mine, kissing me soundly. I wrapped my arms around his neck, kissing him back, happy to see him, even if it was under these circumstances.

"I've missed you," he said after several minutes, letting me down, kissing my forehead when my feet touched the ground.

"Missed you too, Dragon Boy," I said shyly. Now that we were no longer kissing and my body was in control, I remembered the others in the room and looked around.

Thankfully Laeddin seemed to be asleep. At least faking it.

"He's a dragon?" Rayne asked, her dark eyes glinting with tired excitement.

"Half dragon," Troy corrected with his trademark smirk. I wanted to kiss it off his face. I allowed the bubbling excitement to tamp down the lingering feelings of hurt. He stuck out his hand and Rayne took it. Troy lifted her off the ground. "I'm Troy."

"Rayne," she said.

Pops came over. "I'm Adam Henry."

I couldn't help thinking about what he lost before he became a vampire. How many years had he suffered over the loss of his loved one? Or was Joanna really dead? Sure, she was burned at the stake, but last I checked, a vampire could survive that. A revenant though? I wasn't sure.

Pops took out his reading glasses and proceeded to clean them, probably in an effort to ignore Troy and me kissing. He put them back in his pocket without using them when we finished. He wore his usual attire: slacks, a sweater over a button-down shirt and loafers. His leathered face was handsome. The few wrinkles at the corners of his eyes made him appear grandfatherly, which made sense since he was my grandfather. Not by blood, but still. As a vampire who was turned more than five hundred years ago, he still looked exceedingly young.

"Rayne," Rayne said again, taking his outstretched hand.

As we made introductions and small talk, I thought about Laeddin, who didn't look a day over eighteen with his thick black hair and wrinkleless skin.

Jesse crossed his arms, his expression surly as he glanced between Troy and me. "You two are a thing?"

Troy and I peeked and each other uncomfortably, making it obvious we weren't sure what to say. Finally, I blurted, "We're friends."

"Right," Troy added. "Friends." His smirk turned into a half scowl, but it wasn't like he'd asked me to be his girlfriend. He pretty much made it clear I was too terrifying to exist, so "friends" was a good place to start. Didn't change the fact that he was as handsome as ever in his standard jeans and a dark green tee shirt, the short sleeves tight against his biceps.

Rayne pressed her teeth together. "Sure, if that's what you want to call it."

Jesse smacked Troy on the back. "You sure you aren't half dog instead of half dragon, you sly dog?"

Troy made a face, while Pops laughed. "All right, that's enough of that kind of talk." He playfully shoved Troy out of the way with little effort.

I hugged Pops again, enjoying the familiar smell of old books and peppermint that he was known for. "Grandfather." I squeezed him tightly. After a good long time, I pulled back. He looked at me fondly.

"I know why Troy and I are here. We came to rescue Jesse, of course. But what brings you and the genie here?" He indicated Laeddin with a nod.

We briefly explained our situation and asked if they'd be willing to help, if we ever got out of here.

They agreed whole-heartedly. We all sat again, this time in a circle so we could face each other. Jesse had Rayne's hand. And I noticed Pops kept glancing at her. He seemed curious to know more about her, which didn't surprise me since he was a professor by trade and also Jesse's surrogate father.

"I still can't believe you guys found me," Jesse said for probably the twentieth time. His expression was full of surprise and wonder, as though he half believed he might be dreaming.

"We never would've stopped looking," Professor Pops returned.

"Agreed," Troy added, smacking him on the knee.

Watching the three of them together made me long for my mom and dad. I shuddered, worried about them. Laeddin peered at me with a question in his gaze, but I shook my head. I didn't want to talk about it.

"How'd you do it?" Jesse asked. "Find me," he added to clarify.

Pops chuckled lightly, taking his handkerchief from his pocket and wiping his eyes. "You know me, I researched in a lot of books, went to speak with a lot of peculiar people and creatures." He looked at Troy. "I even tried to find your father and ask him if he knew of a way to locate Jesse with a spell, since the dragon pretty much knows everything, but I couldn't find him."

Troy raised an eyebrow but didn't look surprised.

Professor Pops continued, "Finally I went to Polonias and spoke with Cindy who recommended I talk to Gabe." His eyes filled with tears once again and it occurred to me how difficult it must be to live an immortal life, especially if you chose to care so deeply for those around you, as Professor Pops did. Gabe had given up his leadership role in the chayot for a more simple life with Cindy and their children.

Pops cleared his throat. "Anyway, Gabe told me of a spell I could use that would allow me to find you, so here we are." Professor Pops hugged Jesse again.

"Yeah, man. You gave us quite the scare," Troy added.

Jesse smiled, but I noticed his dark face get ashy.

"What's wrong, son?" Professor Pops asked. He took hold of Jesse, helping him remain sitting.

"Nothing. Just a little hungry," he admitted, rubbing the back of his neck.

"I got you, man." Troy opened his backpack. "It's jerky. That ought to help."

Jesse took the bag. "Thank you," he said between bites.

We watched him devour the dried meat in silence.

After several minutes, Jesse looked up, then at Rayne. "Hey, I'm so sorry. Here." Jesse handed her a piece."

She took it timidly, giving Jesse a small smile, refusing to meet anyone else's gaze.

Troy patted Rayne on the back. "So, what's your story? Why are you in this cell and how the hell do we get out?"

Rayne's smile vanished. "My story?" She growled. "My father promised me that if I would spend time in the cell with Jesse and get information from him, then he would tell me about my mother. Who she is and where she is."

Jesse had been about to put another piece of jerky in his mouth, but he stopped, shocked. "You're down here to spy for them?" He pointed in the direction of the door, but we all knew he meant the gargoyles. "You - " He let go of her hand. "I'm just a job to you?"

Pops seemed to already know that was the case. "Not to worry, son. I believe we can work this out. Right, Rayne?"

She seemed surprised. "You aren't angry?" she asked Pops.

"Anger won't solve anything." His eyes were full of sympathy as he spoke.

She gave him a small smile in response. "Thank you."

Troy looked angry.

Jesse had a wounded animal look on his face and I immediately felt sorry for him. His feelings for Rayne went deep. That much was obvious.

I wasn't surprised either. "Laeddin?" It appeared he'd already known she was up to something too.

"What? It was obvious," he said.

"Not to me," Jesse bellowed. The ends of his hair turned white and dark lines appeared on his face.

"Easy, son." Pops patted him on the shoulder.

But Jesse wasn't having it and stood, going over to the door and pounding on it. "I want out of here." He stopped, leaning against the wall.

"Rayne, why don't you tell us exactly what your errand is so we can help you accomplish it? Then we might be able to get out of here." Pops gave her a look that said he wasn't angry, but he wasn't to be trifled with either.

Rayne started to cry. "That's the thing. I've done what I was supposed to. I collected the information from Jesse, and I told the guards. That's all my father asked me to do." She sniffled. "I'm not sure whether the guards told my father or not, but he hasn't come down to see me or get me out."

"Your dad sounds like a real father of the year." Troy stood and went over to Jesse.

Professor Pops went on. "You are part gargoyle and part something else? Human?"

Rayne wiped her nose on her arm. "How'd you know?" She cleared her throat. "My father has refused to tell me who my mother is." She rested her head on her knees. "I don't belong in this realm and I hoped that by finding out who my mother was, then maybe I could feel more like myself."

Professor Pops gave her a gentle look. "It's difficult not knowing where you come from. I can understand your need to find out." He glanced at Jesse and Troy, who were talking quietly in front of the door. "We all need connections. Without them we aren't really living."

She shrugged. "I guess. All I know is that the whole time I've lived here, I've felt like a misfit."

"Well, perhaps we can assist you in your endeavors as well as Jasmine and Laeddin." He pulled a book from his satchel and took his reading glasses from his pocket, putting them on.

"Do you even need those things?" I touched the frames and moved closer so that I could see the pages too.

He gave me a one-armed hug. "It's just these eyes. I need the glasses for the close up stuff."

I laughed, eyeing Troy. "Part of the old man syndrome, huh?"

"Right." Pops flipped the pages until he reached what he was looking for. The top of the left page read: A Spell to Break Spells.

"Your magic won't work down here," Laeddin said. "I've already tried."

Pops looked at Laeddin over the top of his glasses. "You sure?"

Laeddin snapped his fingers in answer. I hoped it would work for the briefest second, but that hope was dashed. Laeddin's tattoos tried to light up, but they only flickered.

"Ah, I see. Well, then that changes things." He gave Rayne a kindly look. "Rayne, we are really going to need your help. Are you with us?"

"Sure." She looked over at Jesse and continued, "I came down with the intention of getting information from you, Jesse, but after getting to know you, I've come to truly care about you." She stopped, sucking in a breath.

"It's understandable, dear. And I applaud your honesty." Pops said, putting away his book and his glasses. "Don't you agree, Jesse? I mean, I can see quite clearly that the girl has feelings for you. I can feel them too. Can't you?" He turned on his seat as he spoke so that he was facing Jesse.

Troy had his arm around Jesse's shoulders and they were still talking, though it looked like Troy was doing most of it.

Jesse looked up. The edges of his hair were still white. Whatever Troy was saying, it hadn't helped calm him down. "I guess." He glared at Rayne and it was obvious he was still angry.

"If she helps us, then all is forgiven, right bro?" Troy flashed his trademark smirk.

"We'll see." Jesse inhaled sharply before blowing it out. His shoulders relaxed and his hair changed back to black.

OceanofPDF.com

SUCKED TO BE ME

OVER THE NEXT TWO DAYS, we discussed numerous ways for all of us to get out of the cage. The plan was simple.

Pops and Troy would escape and take Jesse and Rayne home with them. After seeing the guards' reactions when bringing them in, we figured it would be best for Professor Pops and Troy to escape the castle immediately and come back for Jesse and Rayne when an opportunity presented itself.

Since Laeddin and I couldn't leave without the piece of crown, we didn't get involved beyond planning to escape itself. Truth be told, once we were out and away from whatever magic blocked Laeddin's power, Laeddin could just pop us home. Easy as that. But, of course nothing was ever as simple as it sounded.

Pops and Laeddin seemed to be fine without any basic human necessities, so what little food Pops and Troy had brought with them was divided between Troy, Jesse, and Rayne, and they finished everything within the first day.

They seemed okay, especially Jesse and Rayne. In fact, they looked great. Refreshed.

I was ravenous and getting hungrier by the second.

It didn't help that Laeddin and Troy both had blood that called to me.

If I were human it would have been as though I'd been starved for a month and someone brought in a roast with seasoned potatoes, creamed corn, rolls with butter and honey, and a chocolate cake, and then placed them down in front of me, but told me I wasn't allowed to eat any of it.

Not even a taste.

My fangs were in a continuous war with my better judgment. It sucked to be me.

In an effort to calm my hunger, I tried to focus on something else. Anything else. Jesse and Rayne had made up by the morning of the second day. She apologized profusely and they were back to talking secretly and holding hands.

Troy and I didn't have a lot of opportunities to talk after our kiss. Pops seemed to keep either one or the other of us engaged when we weren't sleeping. Finally, on the fourth day, we had a moment along. "How's it going?" My words were meant to be a whisper, but it was obvious everyone heard.

He ground his teeth and turned away.

Confused, I put an arm on his shoulder and spun him. He shoved me, his skin rippling as though he were fighting to contain the dragon within. He bared his teeth for the briefest moment before clamping them closed. They'd changed from those of a human to the sharp and pointy teeth of a dragon. And I finally got it. Troy was starving just like me. He was half dragon. From what I learned at the Seven Magics Academy, shifters of any kind needed to eat a lot and often in order to sustain themselves. "I'm sorry," I whispered, turning away.

We needed out of this cage, fast. All of us were predatory in nature, and supernatural as well. Sooner or later, if we remained stuck in this small and claustrophobic cell, we were going to start to look like food.

Rayne had already tried on multiple occasions to speak with the guards, but they ignored her pleas, calling her mutt and other words that didn't translate to English. I figured I should be grateful for that.

Jesse and Rayne were the most talkative now, probably because they'd grown more accustomed to their surroundings. During one of their conversations, Jesse began talking about his uncle Dorian and he blurted out, "Your mother is Snow White, the Vampire Queen, right?"

I appreciated his efforts to include me. When left on my own, I kept remembering the moment Laeddin's spell had come over me, making me the weapon dedicated to destroying the assassins guarding the crown. My eyes had changed colors, flashing from one to the next. What affected me most were the gauzy wings I'd seen on my back right after the spell completed. They'd appeared just long enough to make me miss them even more when they vanished. "Yes." I gritted my teeth, fighting the hunger and depression eating away at my insides.

Jesse's eyes lit up and for the first time he really looked at me. "I thought so. I can see the resemblance." He ran his hands through his hair, leaning his head against the wall. "Troy and I have talked more than once about who could win in a one-on-one fight between him and the Vampire Queen."

Troy responded to that, giving Jesse a tiny smile. "At the moment, she'd kick my ass." He pressed his hands against his stomach.

"You're really hurting, aren't you, son?" Pops looked worriedly at Troy.

"I'm hungry enough to eat three entire cows," he grumbled. Somehow, I didn't think he was exaggerating.

Pops brushed a piece of hair off his forehead. "I'm sorry, son. Hang in there. You're stronger than your stomach."

Troy growled again and this time smoke came out of his nose. "I don't know about that."

"You are." Professor Pops wrapped an arm around Troy's shoulders. "Why don't you tell Jasmine about the huge crush you have on her mother?"

At that, Troy blushed a bright red. "I don't have a crush. I just think she's awesome."

I was mortified and couldn't help wondering if that was why he liked me, because I reminded him of my mom.

"Jasmine, I swear I don't like, like your mom. Okay?" He barely looked at me when he spoke.

"Whatever," I said, not convinced and too hungry to be kind.

"Ugh, but I am starving." He roared this time and the whole room shook, sending pieces of debris down on us.

"This is ridiculous. We have a genie, a half dragon, two half gargoyles, and an ex Hunter down here. Surely we can get out of this stinking cage." I yanked on the handle using all of my might. "Troy, come and help me."

He pushed himself off the floor and came over. As soon as his shoulder brushed mine, I realized my mistake. The scent of his blood sent my head spinning and my body began to sag. I literally felt faint.

"Hey," Troy caught me. "You're hungry too, aren't you?"

I tried to push out of his grasp, but he held me fast. I flashed my fangs, and he released me. "Does that answer your question?"

Rayne had been watching the exchange and gasped. "She's a vampire."

Jesse laughed. "Yep. She might kick your ass too, Troy."

Troy bent his head, rubbing his scruffy face. "That's why I've been staying away."

I nodded, still furious with hunger, and went over to the door, this time banging on the bars. "Hey! Hey! Let us out of here. You can't hold us. Do you hear me? We need to talk to you. We need to find - "

A large gargoyle with fawn brown wings and a patch over one eye rounded the corner and came down the hall like an angry bull. He looked ready to ram the door. But just as he reached me, he stopped. "Stop making that racket or I'll crush you under my foot, you filthy, stinking bug."

His words threw me off balance. "Don't be rude." I placed my hands on my hips.

"You can understand what he's saying?" Jesse's eyes were wide with surprise. Troy and Pops seemed surprised too.

"Sadly, yes."

Rayne perked up at that knowledge. "Can they understand you too?"

"No."

The gargoyle noticed my stance and chuckled. "You've got fire. Well that's something." He studied me more closely with his one eye. "It would be a shame, but I will still crush you if you don't stop your squawking." He glanced at Rayne. "Why don't you explain the way we work around here, mutt?" He laughed heartily.

I crossed my arms. "Rayne, talk to him."

"Vyne, these are good people. They mean us no harm. Tell my father and - "

The gargoyle roared with laughter. "Your father told us to leave you down here. He doesn't care about you, mutt, and neither do I. Now shut it." His eye roamed my body and I shuddered.

Rayne heaved a deep breath.

I'd had enough. "Let us out, you monster!"

The gargoyle licked his lips. Then he walked down the hall, turned the corner and was gone.

I stomped my foot in frustration. "Stubborn ox." Laeddin had a perplexed look on his face and I wondered what had him thinking. I turned my back on the door and leaned against it, then slid to the floor. Every second we sat in the cell was another wasted. Troy seemed eager to comfort me, but I knew why he resisted. He didn't want to eat me. "Ugh, thanks for trying, Rayne."

She shrugged. "Sure."

Moments later, I heard the gargoyle's heavy footsteps coming down the hall. He stopped at the door. I didn't look at him, determined not to lose my temper again. "Little bug, I've brought you some food."

Surprised, I looked up just as he dumped some rancid scraps of food on my head along with something that rolled toward Troy. I screamed like the gargoyle had killed me, furious at his trick.

Springing to my feet, I looked him in his one good eye and pushed the door with all of my might. Surprisingly, it began to shudder and buckle. Even with disgusting food dripping into my eyes, I could see the rock crumble beneath my fingers. That gave me the incentive I needed to push harder. "Try and stop me," I shouted, still staring at the gargoyle.

The smirk on his face turned to surprise. "You're stronger than you look."

"You're damn right, you stupid rock!" My hands had gone through several layers of stone. Bits of powder filled the air like smoke. I ignored it, concentrating on my anger. "Laeddin, why the hell did you make it so I can comprehend what they're saying, but they can't understand me? It's so freaking infuriating!" I pushed harder. If I had to guess, I'd say I was halfway through the thick, rock door.

"Stop that, bug," the gargoyle growled warningly.

"Vyne, what the goddess is going on?" Another gargoyle appeared at the end of the hall, a female with ochre wings.

"Nothing, Amber," he said turning his head in her direction. Then in a quieter voice, he said to me, "Don't make me come in there, little bug, because if I do, you won't like it. I promise you that." He licked his lips again.

The tone of his words terrified me. Worse was the way his eye roamed over my body. I stopped.

"Good." He turned away. "See, it's nothing," he said, speaking to the one called Amber.

I punched the wall beside the door, exasperated. Rock rained down, adding more smoke to the air. With the bottom of my shirt, I started to wipe off the mess, but Troy took my hands, stopping me. He pushed me into the corner, trapping me with his arms. I studied his face, trying to figure out what he intended to do.

"Troy," Pops said in warning.

"I'm fine," he growled, smoke wafting from his nose. "Hold still," he whispered, leaning closer to me.

I held my breath as his face came nearer. But rather than kiss me, he began picking the food scraps out of my hair. Then instead of throwing the disgusting items out the cell door, he handed them to Jesse, who immediately began tossing them in his mouth. I was even more baffled when Troy leaned toward me . . . and licked my lips. Then I realized, he wanted the food on my face, even though I knew it had to be repulsive, especially now that it was also covered in rock dust and who knew what else. I closed my eyes against his nearness while tingles raced inside and outside of my body. The experience shouldn't have elicited such a lustful response, but by the time he finished, I was torn between pulling his lips to mine and kissing the daylights out of him and burying my fangs in his neck and drinking from him until my stomach burst. But I held still, forcing my lips and my fangs to stay put.

At last I opened my eyes. Troy seemed better and even had his usual smirk on his face.

"Your turn." He pressed his body against mine and tilted his neck. I wanted to drink from him desperately, but not in front of everyone, especially not Laeddin and Pops.

"Not now," I said, my throat scratchy.

Troy's expression became wounded until Laeddin shouted, "Leave her be. She obviously doesn't want you."

Troy growled. "Her body begs to differ. She's just polite enough not to want me in front of you." He stalked over to Laeddin, his skin rippling lightly as he got right in the genie's face. Laeddin held his ground.

They reminded me of two bulls stomping their feet and snorting at each other. It was ridiculous. "Knock it off, both of you." I stepped between them, putting up my hands, trying to push them apart.

"Troy," Pops said again.

They backed down at the same time, Laeddin going over to sit by himself.

I turned to Troy. "You're disgusting," I said, but smiled to soften the blow.

"You taste like honey," he responded, causing crimson heat to burn through my body.

"You know what - " I began but was interrupted by a group of four gargoyles coming noisily down the hall toward us. I looked to see if they had another captive, but they didn't.

"Get the prisoners. The emperor will see them now."

Vyne came to the door along with Amber and another male I hadn't seen before. "I'm unlocking the door, little bug. Don't try anything funny."

I was feeling a bit snarky and wanted to crack a joke. Instead I moved out of the way and worked to control the need to high-five someone. We were finally getting out of this hellhole.

While Vyne held the door open, Amber and the other male came in. His wings were the color of tawny with striations of black throughout. Gargoyles entered one at a time, ducking their heads to fit beneath the opening. Amber took hold of Laeddin and me while the other grabbed Troy and Pops. "What about those two?" Amber pointed at Jesse and Rayne.

"Leave them. Graves wants his daughter to stay down here a while longer and the emperor isn't interested in seeing the other one yet."

That got my attention. What was her dad's problem? I wanted to ask Rayne but didn't get a chance."

"What are they saying?" Jesse asked.

"They're talking about you," I said, grinding my teeth in anger.

Troy and Professor Pops started fighting against their gargoyle. "No," Troy yelled.

"We aren't leaving without them," Professor Pops said, grinding his teeth.

"You must take us. Graves needs to hear what I have to say." Rayne pushed between two different gargoyles, trying to get to the door. Jesse helped, but not even the two of them together were a match for the brutish gargoyle prison guards.

Vyne lifted one eyebrow. "What more do you have to say, little mutt?"

"I don't have to tell you. I'll tell him." It was the most defiant I'd seen her.

"Fine. Let's go." He roughly grabbed Rayne and Jesse by their necks as he pushed them through the opening and past the rest of us, down the hall where we took a left and then started up the endless stairs.

Professor Pops and Troy relaxed. I nodded at them, glad they realized what was happening.

We were finally going to meet the emperor.

OceanofPDF.com

GARGOYLES

SEVERAL flIGHTS of dull stairs later, we reached the main floor.

Wide open with an enormous circular light in the center of the common area, it reminded me of the grand body of an octopus with its dimly lit tentacles going in every direction.

Male and female gargoyles, mostly with some shade of brown or dark red wings, bustled around, busy with their jobs. Troy looked at Professor Pops. He winked.

They intended to go through with the plan.

In an instant, Troy shuddered into his dragon form.

The gargoyle holding him jumped back in fear as Troy's body suddenly became very big and scaly. The gargoyles scrambled, looking to Vyne for instructions.

"Get after them," he shouted, taking hold of Laeddin and me before we could escape. Jesse and Rayne fought against the gargoyle holding them, but they couldn't break free.

Faster than I believed possible, Pops climbed on Troy's back and with one giant swoop of his wings, Troy launched himself toward the ceiling. It was probably a hundred feet up, but he continued to beat his wings, knocking into rocks and scraping his clawed feet on walls until he reached the top.

"Yes," I cheered, as Troy broke through the glass ceiling, sending fragments reigning down on all of us. Several pieces cut my cheek, but I felt the wounds heal almost immediately.

I watched as a guard took off in a desperate attempt to chase Troy, but it was apparent the gargoyle wasn't used to flying indoors - bouncing into walls and spinning nearly out of control before recovering and continuing until he was out in the open air.

Once he was gone, Vyne shouted, "Get this mess cleaned up."

Several servants immediately dropped what they had in their hands and got to work.

The gargoyle called Edge burst through opening to the statue room. "What the goddess is going on?"

Vyne growled. "Two of the prisoners escaped. I've sent Bayne after them." Vyne spoke with authority, but I sensed his nervousness.

Edge snorted. "He's useless." Edge looked around in astonishment. "How did they escape?"

Vyne pointed up sheepishly.

"Impossible. I thought you said they weren't gargoyles and none of them had wings."

"They aren't gargoyles. One of them," Vyne paused, looking down at his feet. "It seems one of the prisoners is at least part dragon."

Edge sputtered. "A dragon? How? What?" He leaned in. "All of the dragons are dead. Our emperor, Jagg the Dragon Slayer killed all of the dragons personally." He yanked Laeddin and me from Vyne's grasp. "Go after him. Kill them both. Jagg must never know. Understand?"

"Yes, Liege." Vyne spread his wings and jumped into the air. He flew with a lot more grace than the first gargoyle and was out through the ceiling in no time.

"Great. Just great," Edge mumbled, leading us into the room of statues. Upon entering, my forehead began to burn like someone had placed a lit match against it. I reached up to touch the area, feeling for the diamond residing there.

Laeddin noticed and gave me a questioning look but didn't speak.

I blinked against the pain. "Are you getting any vibes, because my head is throbbing?"

"I think so," he said softly, but didn't elaborate. The others glanced over at us, curious about why we dared to speak.

Against the far wall sat a large emerald throne flanked on either side by a pair of emerald dragons. It was the most color I'd seen in a room since I arrived, and it staggered me. Skye stood to the right of the throne; her arms clasped tightly behind her.

"Anything wrong, Edge?" the imposing gargoyle on the throne asked. His brooding features were the same as the others, but he appeared even bigger. His wings were green, the same color as the throne and the dragons. Atop his head lay an emerald crown. He was shirtless, just like the other males, but his pants were green instead of black. He had a ring on each of his fingers, all emerald as well. I got the feeling it might be the emperor's favorite color.

"Nothing of note, Sire."

"Very good." Dark eyes studied us a moment and suddenly I felt like a rat in a maze. "Bring the mutts closer," he bellowed.

The guard pushed Rayne and Jesse forward. Edge held us steady but shifted his feet uncomfortably. I kept my gaze on the emperor. "Is your magic working now?" I asked Laeddin barely above a whisper.

He didn't speak but snapped his fingers and abruptly my face didn't feel grimy any longer. He smiled and nodded.

I wriggled my nose gratefully. "Thank you," I mouthed.

Edge shook us. "Quiet," he hissed.

But I wasn't finished speaking to Laeddin. "Can you send Jesse some magic so he can understand the gargoyles?"

Edge bent my arm back at the elbow until I thought he would pop my shoulder out of joint.

I fought against the pain, knowing it would heal soon anyway. Laeddin nodded slightly and snapped his fingers again.

"Tell me what you've learned, Rayne, half-breed daughter of Graves," the emperor growled.

I hadn't seen Laeddin's wrists light up, but I had a feeling the magic worked because Jesse's head suddenly shot up like he was listening more intently.

Rayne rolled her shoulders back and stood up straight. "As I've explained to the guards many times, Jesse was sent here by mistake. He knows nothing about our realm. The only parents he remembers are the ones he had as a child. When he was older, he was adopted by a man named Adam Henry." She paused a moment. "He isn't a spy from the other kingdoms nor is he here to claim the crown." She bowed. "I have answered all of your questions as my father commanded." She stayed bowed and waited.

It seemed that the emperor's face grew more lines. "I see." He studied her for a long moment. "Can you tell me anything of the others?"

"Only that they came seeking Jesse. I don't believe they have a desire to harm you or our realm." She continued to hold her position, her gray eyes staring at the floor. It shimmered with dozens of different colored gems.

"You have done well."

She lifted her head. "Thank you, Liege."

"Amber, take her to the wizard's chamber. Let her wait there for Graves. I believe he has some items he'd like to discuss with her."

The gargoyle bowed. Jesse, who'd been quiet until that point, began to fight. "No, wait!"

The emperor raised an eyebrow. "You can speak our language?" He gave Rayne a diminutive look, one that said she'd be in trouble for failing to mention that fact. But she looked as surprised as everyone else.

"Yes, Liege." Jesse tried to bow, though it was awkward as Amber held his arms in a vice-like grip. The emperor seemed unimpressed by the gesture.

Jesse straightened. "I need to make sure Rayne is safe."

The emperor laughed heartily, clapping his hands together.

"Rayne, I believe the boy's in love with you. It seems Graves underestimated your talents."

Rayne shifted uncomfortably.

The emperor's gaze suddenly turned hard. "Explain yourself!" As he spoke, his voice grew louder, until it shook the circular lights hanging from the ceiling.

Rayne's face paled. "I-I didn't teach him."

Jagg leaned back, staring at her. "Is that so? And how do you think he learned?" His voice was dangerously low now.

She cleared her throat, visibly shaking under the scrutiny. "I believe that one possesses magic." She gestured timidly toward Laeddin.

"I see." Jagg sat up at that and studied Laeddin. Then returned his focus to Jesse. "I can appreciate your desire to keep your woman safe, but I'm afraid that won't be possible. Graves has requested to speak to her, and it's unwise to anger our wizard without cause."

The emperor stood, waving them away. Jesse was still protesting loudly as Amber escorted a silent Rayne from the throne room. Eventually another guard was able to wrestle Jesse to the ground, threatening to rip out his throat if he didn't shut up.

In the commotion, Laeddin touched my finger with one of his and I knew he'd done more magic.

"Now that's settled, let's talk." Jagg paused in front of Laeddin and me before returning to his throne. He was the tallest gargoyle I'd seen, a giant. I shuddered to think what his wingspan would be. We'd never be able to escape if he came after us.

The emperor returned to his seat and went back to brooding. "Bring them closer." He waved his hands. "Who are you and why are you here?" His question was directed at Laeddin.

The genie cleared his throat. "We have come to your realm with the hope of locating a lost piece of a crown created thousands of years ago by the elves."

The emperor seemed truly surprised he could understand Laeddin. He stood, crossing his arms. "Is it magic that allows you to understand and speak my language?"

Laeddin didn't meet the emperor's gaze. "As a humble genie, I have the ability to speak any language."

It occurred to me he could've talked to the gargoyles at any time. He'd regained the use of his magic as soon as we entered the throne room but hadn't used it.

The more time I spent in Laeddin's presence the more I became aware of his blatant unwillingness to use his powers unless he decided it was necessary.

Or I wished it. He said my wishes had consequences. Perhaps using his magic in any way had consequences as well.

OceanofPDF.com

MY PROPERTY

"A GENIE?" The emperor climbed down the steps, too excited to stay seated. "Fascinating! I've heard of your kind but believed you all dead. You must grant me three wishes."

Laeddin cleared his throat again. "Indeed, I am the last of my kind. My brothers have all gone." My irritation at Laeddin momentarily fled at the mention of his brothers.

"And the wishes?" The emperor towered over Laeddin now, but Laeddin didn't balk.

"I am Laeddin, genie of the lamp, and I can only serve one master at a time."

"So, someone else controls you." Disappointment softened the gargoyle's features. Well," he returned to his seat. "I am Jagg, high ruler of Garoth." He lifted his arms in the air as he spoke. "And I demand you accommodate me."

Unfazed as ever, Laeddin bowed deeply.

"Well, genie of the lamp, tell me who your master is," Jagg said, resting his elbows on the armrests.

I shuddered at the tone in his words. If Jagg knew I was Laeddin's master, he would have me killed. There was no doubt about it.

"No, Sire." Laeddin bowed again in an attempt to show respect. "That is not why I'm here."

Jagg roared ferociously. In that moment, he was truly terrifying. "My warriors have captured you, which makes you my property. You will do as I command!"

Laeddin seemed to carefully choose his next words. "Before you detained us, I already had a master and I've not yet granted them all three wishes. You are not my master and you never will be."

"We shall see about that. Any creature dumb enough to let you out of its sight doesn't deserve you."

I thought now was the time to step up and see if Laeddin had, in fact, given me the power to speak the gargoyle language. "Emperor Jagg." I paused, my fingers stroking the bear charm at my wrist, even as I recognized my words sounded different inside my mouth. "My name is Jasmine. I am the princess of Sharra, home to many creatures of the seven magics. As the genie said, we are in desperate need of your help." I bowed.

The emperor leaned back, focusing on me for the first time. "Desperate need." He studied me intently for a moment. "I see. And how do you know the genie? Are you his master?"

The question was calculated. I could see the gleam in his eyes, hoping for enough evidence to justify my murder.

Laeddin interrupted before I could respond. "Liege, I would propose a bargain. I will perform a task for you, similar to a wish, and in return you will help us locate the item we're looking for."

Jagg's eyes sparked with greed. "Interesting. I might consider it if you agree to three tasks instead of one."

Laeddin's wrists lit up. "We have an agreement." He bowed. "What would you have me do?"

Jagg rubbed his hands together. "Getting right to it. Very good." He tapped a finger against his chin. "First, you must give me untold riches."

"As you wish."

Laeddin wrists glowed bright as he turned his palms up. All along the edges of the room, piles and piles of gold pieces appeared. They tinkled as they slipped and fell from their stacks. Interspersed between the gold pieces were rubies, emeralds, pearl necklaces, other jewelry, and so much more. "Untold riches." Laeddin bowed slightly.

Surprised, Edge released Laeddin and me.

"What's the matter," I asked Laeddin under my breath.

"Nothing. Wait and stay quiet," he answered out of the corner of his mouth, trying not to draw attention to our conversation.

Jagg jumped up and flew over to the nearest mound, picking up handfuls of gems and letting them rain through his hands. "This is incredible! Stupendous! Astounding!" He laughed heartily.

"Now, make me the most powerful gargoyle in all of Garoth." He removed his emerald crown and replaced it with one made purely of diamonds.

Laeddin snapped his fingers. "Done."

"This is too easy." Jagg laughed. "Now I want - ," but Laeddin interrupted.

"No more. Not until you help Jasmine and me."

Jagg growled. "How dare you?" He landed, causing the stone floor to rumble, and stomped over, grabbing Laeddin by his shirt collar. "You will do what I say!"

I started toward them, but Laeddin held out a hand, telling me to stop. "What makes you think you are in any position to tell me what to do?" Laeddin's eyes began to glow as did the tattoos on his wrists. I'd never seen him do that before. In the past, he always allowed me to rescue him. "I've just given you untold riches, made you the most powerful gargoyle in the realm with barely the wave of my hand." He pulled from the gargoyle's grasp and lifted off the ground so that they were at eye level. "If I wanted, I could turn you and all of your people to powder and then simply take what I'm after." To prove his point, Laeddin seized the emperor around the neck and lifted him off the ground.

"Take him," Jagg choked out, flapping his wings and working to kick at Laeddin.

Laeddin flung Jagg against the wall above the throne and pinned him there. The emperor still made choking noises. His diamond crown fell from his head and hit the floor with a loud clang. Skye and Amber rushed at Laeddin as did the others, but the genie swept out his other hand, restraining all the gargoyles against the same wall as their emperor. Each grabbed at their necks. I couldn't decide whether to cheer or back away slowly. I'd known Laeddin had untold power but had never seen him use it on such a grand and aggressive scale.

"Wait! Stop," Jagg choked. "You can't kill me."

"I don't want to kill you. I don't want to kill anyone. But I do require some help." Laeddin's voice was level, completely free of strain despite the fact that he was choking a dozen gargoyles simultaneously.

"Fine," Jagg choked, pulling at the invisible hands around his neck.

Laeddin shifted slightly and all the gargoyles began to breathe easier, though they still remained stuck high against the wall. "You'll help us?"

Jagg coughed. "Of course."

The gargoyle emperor said the words, but every fiber in my being told me not to trust him. It was apparent Laeddin didn't believe him either.

"Let me down and we'll discuss everything." Jagg continued.

"Give me your word as emperor, that you will help us."

"You have it," he said closing his eyes for the briefest moment.

Alarm shot through me. Laeddin had just made of fool of Jagg in front of his subjects. If someone had done that to my mother, she would be livid. Somehow, I doubted Jagg would be satisfied with anything short of murdering the pair of us as pay-back for the insult.

Laeddin released the gargoyles. He appeared to be thinking the same thoughts I had. "And as an apology for my incredible rudeness, I will still grant you a final favor."

Jagg picked up his diamond crown and went back over to his throne. "Excellent." He pondered a moment, his eyes closed, and his face tilted upward like he was asking the heavens to give him answers. Finally, he opened his eyes. "While you were choking me in my castle I had a moment of clarity. And I've decided I want you to make me the most powerful being in the universe."

Laeddin sighed. "Very well."

"No!" I shouted seizing Laeddin's arm in an effort to prevent him from granting Jagg's request. Laeddin's expression was completely blank as he looked at me.

"I cannot go back on my promise, Jasmine." He gave me a look, begging me to trust him.

I swallowed and stepped back.

Laeddin's tattoos sparked to life.

Jagg leaned forward, laughing eagerly.

I didn't know what to do. It was already bad enough we had Sharra to contend with. Her power had become so strong that my only hope of stopping her was the fairy crown. If Laeddin fulfilled his promise, Jagg would become more powerful than Sharra. Then what would we do? I couldn't let it happen.

Without thought, I ran at the emperor, desperate to tear him to shreds. Surprised, Jagg stepped forward and backhanded me across the face. I sailed through the air and smashed into one of the statues. My neck broke, along with several dozen other bones in my body. I fell into a heap, unable to move until my body healed. "Anyone else?" As he spoke his voice grew deeper and he grew larger. His now-golden wings sparkled as the room shook, causing large chunks of the ceiling to fall.

One nearly landed on me, but Jesse appeared and pulled me out of the way at the last minute. "Stay in here." He'd found an opening at the base of one of the statues and tucked me inside. When he was gone, I had a full view of the roof disappearing. The other gargoyles had shifted to the entranceway, watching the scene in careful awe. A large crowd gathered outside.

"What's happening?" I heard one of them ask.

"Nothing good," another responded.

I had to agree. Why had Laeddin made such a stupid mistake? I didn't have time to ponder further because a small child dashed into the room and using his small but powerful bronze wings, he lifted off the ground in an effort to fly.

"Daddy! Daddy!" the child yelled. That startled me. I hadn't known the emperor had a son.

"Hex!" A female I guessed to be his mother screamed, starting after the child, but Edge grabbed her and held her back. I hadn't met the emperor's wife and had a feeling the reason was because the gargoyle wasn't monogamous.

I wanted to help, tried, but my body was still healing. Usually my injuries healed immediately because of my vampire origins, but Jagg's hit had really done a number on me. An instant later, Jesse came out of nowhere, grabbed the child by the arm, and pulled him out of the way just as a boulder crashed to the ground in the exact spot the child had been. Both Jesse and the child disappeared from my view.

The wind picked up and became a gale. It was so strong that it lifted anything not bolted down off the ground. Thankfully the statue I rested under remained miraculously intact and in place.

Laeddin stood in the midst of all the chaos, looking so small, yet obviously unharmed.

As suddenly as the wind picked up, it stopped. Jagg towered over all of us. His dark eyes glowed. "Such power," he yelled, clenching his fists together in victory. The noise caused an avalanche of debris to rain down, blocking the gargoyles in the entryway from view. Jagg watched it happen and laughed. "My eyes have been opened and oh, the wonders I see!" He bent down, picking up Laeddin between his thumb and first finger, the way one would pick up a bug. "How does it feel to no longer be the most powerful creature in the world?"

Jagg's question made me see that Laeddin really had the power to defeat Sharra, but each time he'd chosen not to. And I had to use a wish to save him! Why? Why, when he had so much power, had he been forcing me to find the fracking elven crown? Consequences be damned. He could've used his own power to save all of us. Addy! My grandmother! Everyone!

"Remember, Jagg, now that you possess all the power, you must be prepared for the consequences." Laeddin's voice rang clear, but his words confused me.

"What sort of consequences?" He laughed and it shook the entire room.

Immediately, two large wisps of darkness appeared, swirling around Laeddin like phantoms.

"He knows us," I heard one say.

"You knew we'd come," the other said.

Laeddin nodded. "Yes, Great Ones." His voice held the same respect as when he'd first addressed the emperor on his emerald throne.

"What is this?" Jagg laughed, trying to shoo them away with his other hand. But the wisps moved out of reach, zigging and zagging, making it impossible for him to touch them. One circled his left wrist. The other circled his right. They repeated the movement several times before a bright light burst from his wrists, nearly blinding me. I had to close my eyes a moment before reopening them. Twin dark dots blocked my vision.

I heard Jagg scream out in pain.

The feeling was returning to my body and I rubbed my eyes, forcing the spots away in time to see Jagg drop Laeddin from his fingers. Laeddin landed on his feet and turned sideways so that he could watch what was happening to Jagg, and also search for me.

I waved awkwardly, my body still not working quite right. "Laeddin," I whispered.

As soon as he saw me, he sighed with relief and jogged over. "You're okay?"

"Getting there," I said roughly. "But what's happening to Jagg? What are those things?"

"They are identified by many different names, but my family called them the Great Ones. They aren't of this realm but are the creators of it - of all of the realms of Earth." He studied Jagg grimly as the gargoyle continued to wrestle with his penalties correlated with his wish. "Jagg has too much unchecked power now. I knew they wouldn't allow it." He paused and we both watched as a tattoo appeared on each of the emperor's wrists. On the floor at the tip of Jagg's biggest toe, a small gold lamp appeared.

I covered my mouth with my hands as understanding filled me.

Laeddin smiled. "All that power, but only a teeny tiny place to use it in."

While he spoke, the lamp seemed to suck Jagg in. He swirled like a leaking balloon, around and around the room, going faster and faster. "Noooooo!" he screamed, until he vanished with a pop.

"He's inside the lamp?" I asked, shocked by what happened.

"Yes.

"And you knew this would be his reward?"

"I hoped," Laeddin said.

"I'm so sorry I doubted you." I was trying not to do that, but it was hard. Except now I saw the significance of using so much power. It was terrifying.

"It's okay. I've done plenty to fill you with doubt lately."

I had to agree but didn't voice the thought. What he'd just done more than made up for it.

The Great Ones came down and swirled around the lamp until I could no longer see it. Moments later, the lamp and the Great Ones were gone.

I pushed myself into a sitting position just as a shower of rubble erupted from the blocked entryway. Edge appeared, his black hair, golden wings, and body covered in gray powder. "What happened? Where's Jagg?"

"He's gone," Laeddin said, matter of fact.

The gargoyle seemed visibly relieved. "For how long?" His jaw flexed.

"For good." Laeddin walked over to him. "All of these riches are yours if you would be so kind as to help us find what we are looking for."

I watched the interchange with confusion. Surely the new emperor would protest Laeddin giving the fortune away to a mere guard.

Edge seemed visibly taken aback by Laeddin's generosity. "You have my word, but how did you know?"

"I'm a genie. It's my business to know. Also, you hold yourself with the same confidence as your father." He bowed slightly. "Your highness."

"Oh," I said, but that confused me even more. Why would the emperor make Edge a guard if he was his son? Shouldn't Jagg have been grooming him to rule in his stead? It was one of those questions I might not ever know. Well, unless I asked Laeddin. He probably knew.

Laeddin returned to me.

"Edge is Jagg's son?" I asked bluntly, still too dumbfounded to be polite.

"That's right." Laeddin helped me up. "And he's just become ruler over all the realm of the gargoyles."

OceanofPDF.com

SKYE APPEARED FOLLOWED by Scotch and Rave.

"Edge," Skye said, coming up behind him. "We have two mortally wounded. A dozen more have been taken to Avak. Where is the emperor?"

Edge turned to face them. "Jagg is no more."

"He's dead?" Rave pressed, searching the wreckage that'd once been the throne room. Most of the statues were only missing a chunk of rock here and there, but the statue of the woman with the bird-like wings was miraculously unscathed. She stared down at me kindly and I wondered if her statue was made of a stronger stone than the rest of the castle, or if it was protected by magic.

"He's gone," Edge clarified.

"So he isn't dead?" Her expression alternated between confusion and worry.

Edge shook his head. "No more questions, Skye. Not now." He spoke with finality.

Skye bowed her head. "Yes, Liege."

Amber burst through the rubble and immediately began organizing clean-up crews. Within minutes, dozens of gargoyles began clearing away the rocks and debris. At that pace, they could have the room rebuilt within hours. They'd have the place cleaned up in no time.

While they worked, Edge and Skye spoke quietly with Rave and Scotch at the foot of the throne.

Laeddin took hold of my arms, pulling me close as he whispered, "I believe the piece of the crown is in this room. The sensation is definitely strongest here. While everyone is distracted, we should look for it. Just remember, if you locate the box it's contained in, don't open it until you're really ready."

He was right. Opening it would unleash the assassin. And when it materialized, twin blades would appear in my hands so I could do battle with it. "Sounds like a plan." Now was the perfect time to look, but I was worried about Jesse too. "Have you seen Jesse?"

"I'm sure he's fine. Get looking." As Laeddin took off toward the farthest statue, I decided I'd look for the crown piece and Jesse at the same time. The last I saw him he rescued the child and rushed out of sight. I went in that direction, weaving between the statues. The stone gargoyles were huge and after a few minutes I got the feeling they were watching me. I looked up, searching the rock faces around me. Empty eyes stared back, making me feel foolish for worrying.

Jesse appeared suddenly, his hair and skin the color of granite and his stormy eyes big as twin moons. It scared the hell out of me.

"Jesse?" I was so relieved to see him in one piece; I could hardly speak. "Where's the child you saved?" I looked around but couldn't spot him.

"The boy is with his mother," he said, as his hair and eyes changed back to their normal color. He brushed a piece of rubble out of my hair. "What are you doing?"

Before I could answer, someone shouted, "All hail Emperor Edge," over and over again.

Jesse and I turned to the throne where Skye pumped her fist in the air. Laeddin appeared in front of them and bowed slightly. I stiffened, wondering whether he found the piece already. It appeared that he hadn't, so why wasn't he still looking?

All of the gargoyles stopped what they were doing and approached the throne.

Questions and accusations began to fly.

"Where's Jagg?"

"Where is the emperor?"

"Edge has killed our ruler!"

"Death to the traitor!"

The group grew until more than a hundred gargoyles were crammed into the throne room. Several gargoyles stood in front of us and I couldn't see Laeddin any longer. More shoved us around like rag dolls, working to get a closer view of their new emperor. If the crowd continued clamoring, Jesse and I would be crushed.

"This doesn't look good," I said, trying to find the quickest way out of the room.

"You're right." Jesse and I somehow managed to end up with our backs to the far wall as we continued to search for an exit.

In the center of the room, gargoyles began shouting and shoving each other. It became apparent there were those for and against the new emperor. One group sided with Edge while the others believed Graves should be crowned. Rather quickly the shoving turned to full out fighting and within seconds the entire throne room became a chaotic mishmash of swinging arms and legs. It sounded like a thunderstorm had erupted as rock smashed against rock. The tang of dust hung in the air, leaving an acrid smell, almost like burning trees. I kept my mouth closed, desperate to keep it out of my mouth, but it was impossible. Like smoke, it even invaded my pores.

I caught a glimpse of Skye, Rave, and Scotch standing in front of Edge, acting as bodyguards as the situation intensified. I still couldn't see Laeddin.

Where had he gone?

"Why aren't they doing anything?" I asked, elbowing aside a gargoyle who had been pushed my way and pointing to the bodyguards. "Why aren't they helping Edge's other supporters beat out the opposition?" I asked the questions out loud, but with all the shouting, no one could hear me. At least I hadn't thought so until Jesse responded.

"Maybe this is their custom?" A gargoyle stepped on his foot and Jesse snarled, shoving the culprit out of the way. "Give a guy some space, would ya?"

The gargoyle didn't even turn around.

"You okay?" I asked, though I could tell he wasn't because his hair had turned mostly white.

He looked down and I followed his gaze curious whether all of his toes would still be intact. His foot appeared to be fine. "Great," he said through gritted teeth. "Never better."

"Does it hurt?" I continued, wondering if there was internal damage.

"Not really." He crossed his arms, fighting to gain control of his emotions.

"Good." I turned in every direction. "I need to find Laeddin," I said, giving up on the idea of locating the crown piece for now. It was frustrating, but there was no way I could keep searching through all the chaos surrounding us. More and more gargoyles piled in and took sides. The fighting continued to escalate until a gargoyle wearing deep emerald robes held together by a gold and emerald clasp flew in through the gaping hole in the roof. His wings were the inkiest black I'd ever seen. Like a dark cloud, he circled the room several times. Something like dust fell from his hands and onto the gargoyles, before he landed next to Edge.

"Settle down, everyone!" The gargoyle's voice was soft but piercing. He wasn't quite as tall or as wide as Edge, but still made a menacing figure. It seemed his presence and whatever he'd sprinkled on the crowd settled the gargoyles, but something about him made my skin crawl.

Someone shouted, "It's Graves. He's back!"

"Why should we care about him?"

Many of the gargoyles were pointing. Some were staring. Others whispered curses under their breath.

"He looks like a jackass." I had to agree with that one. He really did.

Someone else scoffed, "What's up with the fancy robes?"

"It's been fifteen years since we've seen our wizard," another said.

That got my attention. If Graves knew how to use magic, he could be very useful. Or dangerous.

Within minutes everyone stopped fighting and turned their gazes toward him, almost like puppets on a string.

From what I could see, most of the gargoyles appeared unwounded. Since they were made of rock, some had been chipped and cracked, but not much else, except for one poor soul who'd had one of his violet wings torn. It dangled haphazardly from the middle of his back. Thick black goo oozed from the damaged area. At the sight, phantom pain ran down and across my back and I flinched, remembering how it felt when Sharra tore my wings from me.

"A wizard?" Jesse took me by the elbow and ducked me around a corner and into the crowd.

OceanofPDF.com

"YEAH, GREAT, MORE MAGIC," I said. Jesse laughed, but there was no humor in it. "Why are you taking me into this horrible mess?"

"Because you said you wanted to find Laeddin. I saw him. Come on." He took my hand, leading me after him.

Together, we maneuvered through the crowd while Graves spoke with Edge. Then the green-clad man addressed the crowd. "I have I had a vision!"

The room grew quieter still until only the occasional child could be heard.

"In my vision, I watched Edge ascend the throne. He is meant to be the next high ruler of our realm."

The group began talking at once.

"Can it be?"

"The wizard cannot lie."

Graves weaved his fingers together while he spoke. "Our people will be unified once again. All hail Edge the Courageous!"

Just then I saw the genie climb the steps and take his place to the right of the throne. "Laeddin." I waved, trying to get his attention. He inclined his head, letting me know he saw me.

Gargoyles who'd been fighting only moments before raised their fists in the air and cheered.

"All hail Edge the Courageous!"

"Now, my children," Graves continued. "Please, go to your homes. Tell your friends and family to prepare for the inauguration ceremony. It will begin at tomorrow's evening meal. Go!"

The gargoyles continued to cheer and clap each other on the back as they went away. Everyone spoke with excitement now, as if their anger had never existed.

It was freaking surreal.

ONCE NEARLY EVERYONE CLEARED OUT, Graves, Edge, Laeddin, and the others began talking. Using my vampire hearing I caught pieces of the conversation and heard Graves mention Rayne but couldn't hear exactly what was said.

Finally, Edge turned his attention to us. "Come," he said, taking his seat on the throne. "We need to discuss your future within the gargoyle realm."

That seemed to surprise Jesse, and everyone else. Who was Jesse to Edge?

Skye climbed the steps and stood on Edge's right while Scotch and Rave stood on the left. Graves stayed where he was, just to the left and below.

"Be cautious. The wizard is radiating large quantities of great magic," Laeddin whispered, coming to stand beside me. "That's why I've been staying close to him. I'm trying to figure out what he's playing at.

"Will do," I said.

Edge clasped his hands together and met Laeddin's gaze. "What you did to Jagg, it was genius."

Laeddin bowed. "Thank you, Sire."

"You gave him exactly what he wanted, but still used the moment to trap him in a place where he won't be able to hurt anyone. Brilliant." He chuckled lightly. "And what were those things that took the lamp away?"

"They are the Great Ones," Laeddin said. "Or sometimes called the Unknowns."

That snapped me to attention. My mom told me about them. They were Sharra and Silindra's parents.

"The Great Ones? Seems ominous." At first glance Edge appeared comfortable and completely at ease with his new position as emperor, but I noticed that his fingers were tapping on the armrest. And it looked like he might be sweating. I realized he was putting on a show. It was understandable. He'd just been thrust into a very prominent position without any time to prepare.

"They are the creators."

Graves faced Edge. "I believe they are the beings we call the Overcasts."

"Ah, that makes sense." Edge leaned back. "And will these Overcasts keep Jagg safe? Or more appropriately, will they keep the rest of us safe from him? He isn't going to be happy if they ever let him out of that lamp."

"If time has taught us anything, it's that we will see Jagg again," Graves said as he came toward me. "I sense you have some of the Overcasts in you, my child." He touched my cheek and I felt a cold chill run the length of my body.

"Do I?" I fought the urge to take a large step away from him. Something about this gargoyle really creeped me out.

"Would you mind sharing your story?" He rotated, giving me some room.

I forced myself not to shudder at his nearness. He wasn't someone I would ever share my secrets with. "There isn't much to tell. I was created by the ones you call Overcasts, but it took my parents' blood and their love to bring me to life."

"Interesting. I wonder - " He paused, studying me intently. Then he seemed to change his mind. "Whatever your fate, it must be very important."

I wanted to shrug and explain I had no idea why I'd been created.

Laeddin saved me. "It's her fate to save us all from a wicked sorceress called Sharra, the one who created the darkness and sent the pestilence across all the realms." Laeddin paused, glancing at Edge.

"I'm not sure if you've noticed, some of your people could be changing."

"Actually, we have," Edge said. "That's why we were out on patrol when we found you." He sat forward.

Graves stepped in before Laeddin could continue. "That is the other reason I've returned, Liege. I've seen a vision of the darkness consuming our land. Your reign will be a short one if we do not stop it. It's my opinion that this girl should be given every ounce of help we can spare so she can find what she's looking for."

"Very well." Edge crossed his arms. "And I would like to apologize to both of you for your treatment when you first arrived. Jagg commanded it. I think he hoped that if he left you down there long enough, we would forget about you and your demise would end any discussion."

Graves nodded his agreement, but I got the feeling he knew more of the story than he let on.

"It's okay," I said, finally stepping away from Graves.

"Thank you." Edge brought my hand to his lips and brushed his lips against it.

"Rave. Scotch. Settle the genie and the princess into a guest room so they can clean up and rest in preparation for the inauguration."

"Yes, Liege." Rave gave me a sardonic smile. She didn't seem thrilled about the change in my social standing.

I returned her glare with one of my own.

Edge continued, "The people need the inauguration to go forward as quickly as possible so there's no question I'm the one in charge. Once the ceremony is over, I will help you in any way that I can." This time when he spoke, he spoke directly to me.

"Thank you. I appreciate that." If only we could just search the blasted room now. Instead of waiting for the inauguration. It was a waste of time.

"Very good. Well then, if you will excuse me, I have a castle that needs to be repaired and a kingdom that needs to be codified." He waved a hand and I knew we were being dismissed.

"This way," Rave said.

Laeddin and I followed her until we reached the doorway. Then I remembered Jesse. He still stood like a statue on the sidelines, his feet spread apart like he couldn't decide what to do.

"Jesse?" I called.

He looked at me.

Edge noticed him and his face softened. He and Graves exchanged a look. "Jesse, if you wouldn't mind, I'd appreciate it if you could stay here a few minutes longer. There is something you and I need to discuss."

Jesse's fists clenched together tightly. "Okay." He shuffled his feet, looking like a nervous teenager about to be scolded.

"You'll be fine, Jesse," I called out.

His hair began turning white, and the expression on his face told a different story.

OceanofPDF.com

BLOOD BOND

"THIS IS RIDICULOUS," I said throwing myself into a chair.

I was completely stressed out.

So many emotions skittered through me, I didn't know which direction to turn. "We don't have time to be hanging out and attending celebrations. It's already been four days. We need to find that piece of the crown and get out of here."

The world would become completely dark in a little over a month and we still needed four more pieces of the crown.

On top of that, I needed to find out what happened once we had all of the pieces together.

My worst fear was that I'd get the crown and it wouldn't do any good.

I'd go against Sharra and she'd finally succeed in taking over my body.

If I failed, the world would go dark and everyone I loved would be destroyed.

The thought terrified me.

I took a deep breath.

The first piece of the crown had entered my body after I destroyed the assassin.

Now, the only reminder that the crown existed came in the form of a single small diamond in the center of my forehead, just above my eyebrows.

"Agreed. I don't believe we need their help to find it. It's in the throne room, probably at the base of one of the statues." Laeddin sat beside me. "I believe you sensed it too." He touched the diamond on my forehead.

It didn't burn as much now as it had when we first entered the throne room, which made me suspect Laeddin's guess was correct. "I did."

"So all we need to do is find a time when the room is empty and get in there. What concerns me is that the gargoyles may have somehow combined the crown with the rock of one of the statues. I need to return to my realm and see if I can find any research on where exactly the piece might be." He seemed distracted by the books he would be researching, like he was already within his library in his realm of Debania.

"No!" I shouted. "Laeddin, you can't leave me again." I didn't want to remain in this realm. I didn't like it. Not one bit.

"It won't be for long." He brushed some of my hair off my face before he continued. "It's strange though. This piece feels stronger than the first. Almost as though it's bigger or more powerful."

"Oh?" That I hadn't noticed.

"I need to find out why. I want to be prepared in case it means the assassin will be stronger as well. I don't want you vulnerable." His hand cupped my face. "I could never forgive myself if something happened to you."

"Fine. Go." I tried to smile, but it wouldn't come. "Hurry back, though."

"I will." He disappeared immediately, and I felt a strong pang of emptiness. I took a deep breath then another. Then I got a whiff of myself. I really needed to clean up, and now seemed like the best time for it.

The bathroom held a makeshift shower that consisted of a hose and a large tub filled with water. At least it was warm.

I took a cloth and a bar of something I hoped was soap and quickly scrubbed myself clean. The clothing wasn't much better.

Shiny pants and a selection of bikini tops in three different colors, including turquoise blue, which is the one I put on.

Dressed, I braided my long hair down my back.

There weren't any shoes, so I resigned myself to bare feet.

I tried to remember if any of the gargoyles I'd seen had been wearing shoes. I didn't think so.

When I came out of the bathroom, two plates of steaming hot food were sitting on a table. More out of habit than anything, I went over to check it out. I was hungry, but not for food. I needed blood.

Christopher appeared around the corner, as casually as if he'd been there all along.

Caught completely off guard, I jumped about three feet in the air.

"Frack, Christopher. What are you doing here?"

The Hunter chuckled.

I tried to convince my pulse to settle down before I had a heart attack.

"Our blood bond and this bear," he touched the little wooden bear charm on the bracelet still encircling my wrist, "allow me to find you anywhere, especially when you're hungry." He came closer, and I felt my pulse pick right back up again. Seriously, this guy was going to be the death of me.

He took hold of the end of my wet braid and tugged. "And you are hungry?"

I nearly fell onto his neck at his invitation. "Starved."

He held his arms open and tilted his head. I pounced, nearly knocking the both of us to the floor as I crashed into him. My fangs lengthened and pierced his skin. His blood hit the back of my throat an instant later and I immediately felt better, more like myself. The one I was meant to be.

Christopher held me while I drank my fill.

"Thank you," I said, pulling away at last, filled with euphoria. I wiped the edges of my mouth.

He walked over to the table and sat in a chair, studying me intently. "I know I'm not the person you want in your life. I've done things, hurt people, including your mother. If I could take those things back, I would."

I sat across from him, pushing the food out of the way. Maybe Jesse would come by later and finish it off. "Some things can't be repaired, Christopher." With all I'd done, I wanted to be wrong.

"I know." He ran his hands through his hair. "But I can still help you. And you need me, my blood. With it you're a stronger, better version of yourself."

I grabbed his hands, which startled him. "You're right and I really appreciate you coming to help me." I shook his hands playfully. "Thank you, Hunter."

"You're welcome." He scooted closer to me. "I'm here for you, whatever you need."

I quickly stood. "Look, I know you think we're meant to be together or whatever, but I don't feel that way about you." I knelt in front of him. "I don't want to hurt you, but please." I grabbed his knees, begging with my eyes for him to understand. "Tell me you understand and will continue to support me, even if things don't work out between us the way you want them to. Please." Memories of Pops and Joanna came to mind.

Christopher stood and moved toward the door. I thought he would leave without another word, but he stopped. "I'm here for you, Jasmine. In whatever way you need me." He was gone before I had a chance to stand.

I went over to the bed and fell on it, rolling onto my back. It still felt weird, lying on my back without my wings to get in the way. "I'm an idiot."

"Why do you say that? It isn't your fault you're a bloodsucker." Jesse knocked on the door as he came in.

I sat up. "I never said it was," I snapped and then immediately regretted it. "Sorry."

"Hey, don't be. It's been a crazy few days. Weeks. Months." He shook his head and sat beside me. "So, who was that guy?" he asked, pointing at the empty doorway. "I thought about punching the smug grin off his face, but didn't want to hurt your feelings or something, so I held back. But I thought you and Troy are a thing?"

I laughed. "He's a - " I shook my head. "A friend."

"Oh?" He didn't look convinced. "Not the same as you and Troy are friends though, right?"

"Definitely not the same. Not even close."

His shoulders relaxed. "Good."

I faced him. "You look better," I said, hoping he'd let me change the subject. "Not quite so hungry."

"Yeah, you look better too, not quite so stinky." He waved a hand in front of his nose. Then he grinned. "Love the outfit. You're totally hot."

I playfully punched his chest. "Your outfit isn't any better than mine. At least I have a shirt. Sort of."

He glanced down at his bare chest. "They don't have much need for clothing in Garoth, do they?"

"Apparently not." I adjusted my top, grateful that at least the essentials were covered.

Jesse laughed.

I rolled my eyes and flopped back on the bed. "Thanks for saying I'm hot." I felt my cheeks heat up.

"You're welcome." He lay beside me. "Where's the genie?"

"Gone." I rolled onto my side, facing him. "Have you seen Pops and Troy?"

"No, but I hope they're all right." He cleared his throat. "I need to see them again."

I realized just how lonely he must've been without them. Edge had mentioned that Jagg killed off all of the dragons in this realm. I didn't say anything, but I hoped Troy wasn't being hunted. "You will," I said, knowing I would make it happen, no matter what.

He nodded, placing his hands behind his head. "I wondered if you'd do me a favor."

"Sure. What?" I rose up on my elbow.

"I need you to help me find Rayne." He swallowed and I sensed his worry.

"You still haven't seen her? Did you ask Graves where the wizard's chamber is located?"

"Edge told me Graves sent two warriors to check on her after the commotion, but when they got there, Rayne had already gone."

I sat up, grateful for the opportunity to be doing something other than lying around, waiting. "Well then, let's get a move on. We need to find out where the wizard's Chamber is located."

OceanofPDF.com

WIZARD'S CHAMBER

THE CASTLE BUZZED with gargoyles moving about, getting ready for Edge's inauguration ceremony.

"Excuse me," I stopped one of the gargoyles rushing by.

"Yes?" She was a small female, and she looked frightened by me.

"Can you tell me where the wizard's chamber is?" I tried to keep my voice gentle so I wouldn't scare her any more than I already had.

Her eyes grew large. She pulled out of my grasp and pointed up. "Top floor."

"Thank you." Jesse and I headed for the staircase she indicated and began to climb. On our way up, I asked, "So what's the story? Why did Edge want to talk to you?" We came to a landing and paused.

Jesse went past me and continued up. As the silence lengthened, it became obvious he was having a tough time talking about whatever it was.

I made a face before running after him. When we reached the top of the second landing, I tried again. "So?"

"What?" He feigned ignorance.

"The new emperor. Edge. What did he tell you?"

Jesse went over to a nearby window, hopping up on the ledge before sitting and letting his feet dangle over the edge. The space was large enough for even the biggest gargoyles to fly out. At the top, directly in the center, a dragonhead had been carved into the rock. I reached out to touch it and was surprised by how warm and smooth the stone felt against my fingertips. Nervous, because I knew how high up we were, I carefully climbed onto the ledge beside him.

"It's strange," he said, looking out over the vast gray landscape. It didn't seem to be any lighter or darker than the last time I'd seen the outside. It was as though the sky remained constant, never changing. And it was still cloudy. I couldn't tell where the sun was or if there even was one.

"What's strange?" I prompted when he hesitated.

"Edge claimed to be my father." The news didn't surprise me. Jesse was half gargoyle. What better place to discover the truth about his parentage than in the gargoyle realm?

Jesse closed his eyes and I studied his dark features. As a vampire I had smooth skin, but his appeared even smoother.

"Do you believe him," I whispered, trying to gauge how he was taking the revelation.

He shrugged, not opening his eyes. "I don't see why he'd lie." As he spoke, he stood, reaching out a hand to steady himself on the top of the window frame. I followed, swallowing anxiously. "My whole life I've felt different." He laughed bitterly and continued, his eyes flashing when he opened them. "Hell, I am different, and it turns out no matter where I am, in the human realm or here, I will never fully belong."

"That's not true." I tried to comfort him.

He turned and jumped back into the stairway.

"Hard like a rock so I'm unable to be with a human and here?" He glanced at his back. "No wings." He laughed harshly. "I'm half gargoyle and half human. Neither place will ever fully fit me." He started up the stairs.

I followed, thinking about what he said. I could relate. If anyone didn't belong somewhere, it was me. My parents had brought me to life, but I didn't come from them. I came from the Unknowns. There wasn't another being in all the universe like me. I was truly alone, but perhaps I needed to look at it another way. Instead of focusing on my differences, I needed to understand my similarities. There was a reason I needed blood from each of the seven magics. I was a part of all of them. The realization lifted a heavy burden from my shoulders, one I hadn't realized I carried until that moment. I wasn't alone.

Different, yes. But weren't we all? "Or, maybe because of your heritage, you can fit more fully into both."

Jesse paused on the steps, and I continued. "You are human and gargoyle. That doesn't make you less like each side of yourself, but more. You are more human and more gargoyle than the others because you possess both of their qualities."

He smiled, flashing his white teeth. "I suppose that's one way to look at it."

I punched him in the arm. "It is. Now let's go find your friend."

When we reached the top floor, I was surprised by how open it all was. There was a roof, but it was thin and only covered the middle section. At least a dozen windows lined each wall and they were twice the size of those on the lower levels. The windows came to a point, folding inward. Even the rock on this level was different. Where the rest of the interior of the castle was dull and gray, the rock here was white and smooth. It reminded me of the outer walls of the castle but wasn't exactly the same.

"Wow, I feel like we're no longer in Kansas, Toto."

Jesse laughed quietly. "Agreed, but in a good way. It's beautiful up here. I love the breeze." He lifted his face slightly and I frowned. Jesse was meant to fly just as I was. It made me wonder why he didn't have wings.

I remembered Rayne didn't have wings either.

"Me too," I said, my eyes roaming the vast expanse of landscape. There was water on one side and mountains on the other. Then I gave myself a little shake. There would be time enough to admire the view after we found Rayne.

Our bare feet made little sound against the smooth floor. It looked like marble and was so shiny I could see my reflection in it. More statues lined the hallway, but these were different than the ones downstairs. Some of them had wings, some didn't. A few had some gargoyle traits, but one had floppy dog ears. Another had the head of a dragon with the body of a gargoyle. Still another had the face of a gargoyle and the body of a large cat.

"What do you think Pops and Troy are doing?" Jesse said out of the blue.

His voice startled me, and I missed a step, falling forward in surprise. Catching myself, I shrugged. "Knowing them, something smart. They'll figure out a way to get back to you."

He nodded. "Have you drunk from Troy?"

"Like sucked his blood?" Color flooded my cheeks at the question. Jesse burst out laughing and I snickered. "Well, I am a vampire."

"Yeah, I noticed." He clasped his hands behind his back.

I debated whether to tell him the truth. Finally, I said, "No."

That surprised him. "What about me? Would you drink my blood?"

I wrinkled my nose.

"I guess dragon blood smells better than gargoyle blood." I couldn't tell if the thought bothered him.

"It's more that your skin is like a rock. I might break my teeth if I tried to bite you."

He raised his eyebrows. "Makes sense." He shook his head. "When we get back home, we need to go a few rounds in a fight."

"Why fight?" Now I was totally confused. I'd believed we were getting along well together.

"Not really fight, more like sparring. Troy and I always talk about who would win in a battle between a half gargoyle and a vampire, or a half dragon and a vampire. We've all sparred with Pops, of course, but it's not the same when you're fighting against your mentor."

It was my turn to shake my head. "Okay." Sometimes guys were weird.

"Sorry." He shrugged his shoulders, trying to release some tension. "But wouldn't you love to find out who would win? A while ago I fought a Vaktare, and she nearly kicked my ass."

"Really." Vaktare were like werecats and Locanis were werewolves. We studied them at the Seven Magics Academy. "It might be fun," I hedged.

He laughed. "It's a thing Troy and I do. But, never mind, you're obviously distracted."

"Yeah, sorry." I hadn't really been distracted, but I decided it was best not to argue. Then I gave him my best smile. "Still, I'll fight you anytime. I might win, especially if I get my wings and my magic back." It was wishful thinking, but a girl could hope.

He stopped. "You have wings?"

I looked down a moment, forcing back the tears. "Had them. Sharra took them from me."

Jesse crossed his arms. "Wow, I've really been out of it. What's going on in the human realm?"

"It's happening everywhere, including here. Maybe even especially here." I walked over to a window that looked out over the water. When Jesse joined me, I explained about Sharra, the Akuma, and the reason I was in the gargoyle realm.

"And the genie?" Jesse raised his eyebrows in expectation.

"It's complicated," was all I said.

Jesse barked out a laugh. "Another friend?"

I looked out over the ledge, trying to see the ground below. "Something like that. Now - " I shrugged.

"You have a lot of friends, don't you?" He smirked, reminding me of Troy.

"I'm not so sure." The scent of brine wafted through the window on the breeze, blowing at the edges of my hair. I closed my eyes and took a deep, cleansing breath.

"I get that."

"You do?" Somehow that surprised me. Jesse didn't strike me as the type of guy who dated a lot.

He hopped up onto the sill. "I thought I'd fallen for someone too, but she didn't reciprocate. It hurt and I was confused for a while, but then I met Rayne." He got a faraway look in his eyes. "She's amazing."

"She might be." I wasn't sure about her yet.

"What? I can tell you have something to say." He sat, crossing his legs.

"I don't know her well enough yet. I'm withholding judgement." I clasped my hands together and leaned against the window pane.

"It doesn't matter. I know Rayne cares for me." He climbed off the ledge. "That's why I need to find her." He waited while I came over to him. "And if it was all an act? Well, then at least I'll know and have closure."

I was still worried. Rayne seemed to really care for Jesse. That was a fact I knew. But I also knew what it was like to want something so much you'd do anything to get it. I'd seen the look on her face when she talked about her mother, before, in my own reflection, when I was desperate to have the normal life I thought I craved. "Right. That makes sense."

Jesse hurried down the hall until we reached a set of bronze double doors. A stocky male gargoyle with apricot wings stood guard to one side. Jesse straightened to his full height, his bearing as regal as any I'd ever seen.

"My name is Jesse. I'm here to see Rayne."

The gargoyle growled. "No one gets into the wizard's chambers without permission."

"I am the new emperor's son. I have permission."

"Oh, I'm sorry, Sire." The guard was instantly contrite, obviously expecting Jesse to lash out at any second. "It's still so new." He stepped aside and pushed open half the door. "She isn't inside though. She left a few hours ago."

"Any idea where she was going?"

"Well," the guard paused, looking uncomfortable. "She mentioned Avalon's Cave."

"Where's that?" Jesse asked.

The gargoyle walked over to the nearest window on the water side. We followed. "See those caves to the left of the docks?" He pointed.

"Yes." Jesse was obviously trying to hold back his impatience.

"During low tide, many of the guards and warriors go in there to burn off steam. I doubt anybody's there right now because high tide is coming in maybe forty minutes."

Without another word Jesse turned and rushed back the way we'd come.

I hurried after him. "You aren't seriously going to go in those caves right now?"

"I am." He was practically running now.

"But you heard the guard. We only have forty minutes."

"Then I guess we'd better hurry."

OceanofPDF.com

FREAKING DAMSEL

JESSE and I stood at the base of a gaping cave.

I sent out a silent plea to Troy and Pops.

If they were here, those two could talk some sense into him.

The entryway looked to be a mile wide and half as tall. The water had already risen to just under my knees.

"I don't think this is a good idea," I said. "The tide is coming in fast."

"We'll just take a quick look around, and if we can't see anything, we'll come right back out."

I took a calming breath. "I don't know about you, but I have incredibly powerful vision, Jesse. I can see to the back of the cave. All that's inside is rock, rock, and more rock. Rayne isn't in there. Nothing living is."

"I want to believe you." He gave me a pained look before continuing, "But I have to see for myself. I hope you can understand."

Sadly, I did. Turned out Jesse was as stubborn as I was.

"Fine, how fast are you?" I asked, trying to contain my worry.

He shrugged. "Pretty fast."

"Awesome, let's race."

It was apparent by the look on his face that he didn't like the idea, but he nodded. I didn't give him a chance to argue.

"On your mark, get set, go." Aiming for dry ground I dashed forward, running through the water with the full extent of my vampire abilities.

My skin was tougher than human skin, but it wasn't impenetrable.

I was reminded of that fact when the sharp edge of a rock sliced into the underside of my bare foot.

"Crap," I cursed, going down hard to my knees.

"Jasmine." Jesse's voice was full of concern, but I knew my wound would be healed by the time he arrived.

"Stupid rocks," I muttered, letting the blood rinse away in the water.

While I waited for the wound to heal, I took the opportunity to check out my surroundings. I was soaked.

The cavern floor was covered with sharp sea glass. Each time one caught the light, it sparkled within the water.

That explained the gash in my foot.

The glass probably didn't bother the gargoyles, but I didn't think I'd be able to get very far barefoot.

As Jesse moved in, I held up my hands.

"There's sea glass. It's very sharp. I'm nearly healed, but my skin is too soft. As soon as I try to take another step, I'll get cut again." I cursed my lack of wings once again.

"Okay." Jesse took a tentative step onto the glass and then another. "My skin is tough enough the glass doesn't bother me." He came over. "Mind if I pick you up?"

I felt like a freaking damsel in distress. "Please." Tamping down my discomfiture, I let him lift me into his arms and I wrapped my arms around his neck. "I get the feeling you don't like to be rescued."

I rolled my eyes. "Nope, not a big fan."

"Well, I'm just glad I can help. You rescued me from the dungeon. This is the least I can do." He finally reached the stairs within the cave and he let me down.

"You know I didn't rescue you, but thanks." I smiled, adjusting my little tube top.

"You did take a plate full of food in the face for me though. Or did you really do it for Troy, and I was just a fortunate beneficiary?"

I really wished he'd let that go and I tried not to blush. "Both," I admitted, starting up the stairs. "Let's hurry." I glanced back at the water. "The idea of becoming trapped inside this cave is creeping me out."

"Yeah, me too." Jesse shuddered and I wondered if he could swim. Rock wasn't really the most buoyant material out there.

The stairs went up with no end in sight. Up was good. The farther from the high tide mark, the better.

At last we came to a door.

"Should we check it out?" I pushed the door open without waiting for an answer.

"Definitely." He followed me in. The room was quiet, except for the sound of steady breathing. All around odd instruments hung like ornaments on a Christmas tree. They swayed slightly, some clanging against each other. Everything smelled like astringent and saltwater. In the center of the room was a table and atop it lay Rayne.

Jesse rushed forward, calling her name. I thought about stopping him, but he was already next to her, trying to shake her awake.

"Is she alive?" I put two fingers to her neck, hoping to feel a pulse. Her skin was similar to Jesse's, smooth and cool to the touch. "I'm not feeling anything," I said, suddenly sad. Jesse had obviously cared deeply for the girl.

"That doesn't mean anything, especially since she's half gargoyle, like me."

"Oh?" I raised an eyebrow at him in surprise.

Despite the seriousness of the situation, he grinned briefly. "Seriously. Try to find mine."

I placed my fingers on his neck. Nothing. No pulse.

"See," he said, when I pulled my fingers away.

"Then what's wrong with her? Why isn't she waking up?" I shook her lightly. At that, Rayne's blue-gray eyes opened, and she gasped.

I jumped back, surprised by her sudden movements. "You're alive?"

"What are you doing here?" She sat up, pushing her feet over the side of the table. "You shouldn't be here." Her eyes flashed, angry. "Where's my father?" She quickly scanned the room.

"He's with the new emperor, Edge," I said.

"Are you okay?" Jesse seemed as taken aback as I was by her hostility.

Rayne was surprised by the question. "I was part of a spell. By waking me you've ruined it." She climbed off the table and went to the entryway. "Graves?" she called.

"We just came from there and we were alone." The water had already reached the bottom of the stairs. "Will the water reach this far up?"

"I don't know. No, I don't think so." She still seemed frazzled, incoherent. I wasn't sure I believed her about the water.

"Why don't we all go back to the castle and we can discuss it? We can regroup and look for Graves there." I'd never felt claustrophobic before in my life, even when we were all crammed in that dungeon cell. But the thought of being trapped by all that water was starting to make me feel like the walls were closing in. It didn't matter that I could swim or that I wouldn't die if I were underwater. It was just something about water that had be shaking.

Maybe it was because of Mizu? That was a possibility.

Suddenly Rayne folded in on her herself, hugging her arms tightly around her belly, and I quit thinking about myself.

"No. It's too late." She started to cry as she wrung her hands, pacing around the rock table. "I'm sorry I yelled at you. Really sorry."

"Rayne." Jesse spoke her name softly and I watched Rayne's features ease slightly.

"Jesse. Oh, Jesse. I don't know what to do." She fell into his arms. "Graves promised me answers."

"What kind of answers?" I moved so that I could see her more clearly. "About your mom?" I remember her mentioning that when we were all locked in the cell together.

She closed her eyes, burying her face in Jesse's neck.

"Whatever kind of trouble you're in, I'll help you get through it." Pulling her close, Jesse's expression was tender as he stroked her hair.

"Well, whatever we're going to do, we need to do it fast. The water is still coming." A quick glance at the stairs and I saw that the water was more than halfway up. "As it is, we're going to have to swim out of here."

Jesse gave me a harsh look. Apparently, he didn't seem to think I was helping the situation.

OceanofPDF.com

GOBLIN SHARK

RAYNE RAISED her head and peered down the steps. "If you try to swim out of here, you'll be dashed against the rocks. The waves are relentless, not to mention there are huge goblin sharks that haunt the cave during high tide."

"I'm sure I'll be fine." I had no desire to stay here even one second longer than necessary.

Rayne looked at me like I was crazy. "You're saying your skin is tougher than rock?"

It wasn't. The issue with the sea glass proved that.

"Well, you might live through a goblin shark attack, but you'll be in pieces," Rayne continued, starting to sound more like her usual self.

I forced myself not to shudder at the images she conjured. "Fine. When will it be low tide again?"

She went past the table and pushed back a fabric curtain. "Not for hours. So why don't you chill out and wait for the water to recede."

I walked past her and yanked the fabric from her hands. "Why don't you stop patronizing me and tell us what the hell is going on?" Ha! Now it was her turn to be taken aback. Score one for the vampire.

Using the opportunity to clarify something that'd been bothering me about her, I asked, "How do you know English?" I hopped up onto the table and crossed my legs. Jesse sat on the floor beside Rayne, who'd crumpled into a heap there.

She took a deep breath, then spoke. "Graves made me live in the human realm from the time I was seven until I turned fourteen. I learned it there." She stared at her hands.

"That's a long time," Jesse said, gently pushing some of her hair off her face.

"Then you must've met your mother." It seemed logical to me. There was no way she could've survived on her own during that time. She was too young.

"The woman I lived with was a relation of Graves', but she wasn't my mom. In all those years, that woman taught me human ways, but never told me anything about herself, Graves, or my family. I didn't even know her real name, just called her Aunt, and I'm not even sure she was one, you know? But," she laughed sardonically, "if you want me to set a table for the Queen of England, or explain which fork to eat your salad with, then I'm your girl."

My insides lurched in sympathy. I felt bad for her. At least I knew my parents loved me. I never had to question that.

"I wonder why Graves kept your mom a secret," Jesse mused as he took Rayne's hand.

"I've always believed it was because he loved her and felt rejected by her, but I honestly don't know." Rayne patted his hand and brought it to her chest, holding it tightly.

Jesse seemed dazed by her story. Then I remembered, growing up, he didn't know who his parents were, either. For the first time I really got what Jesse and Rayne saw in each other. They had a lot in common.

Rayne squeezed her eyes shut. "I've found clues over the years. She loved the ocean. I once found a whole bag of seashells stuffed way back in a closet we never used. The bag had her name on it, and the shells were the most beautiful and strange I'd ever seen." Tears filled her eyes again and she wailed, "What I don't know is who she is."

"Wh - " I'd been about to ask the name on the bag when a light appeared directly above Rayne's head. It grew bigger and brighter, wrapping Rayne within its rays, like a warm blanket. "Hello, Rayne."

Rayne jumped up, right into the light. It adjusted to the change in her position, continuing to hover a few inches above her hair.

Jesse moved to stand next to me. Within the light a woman appeared.

"Sweet, Rayne." Rayne raised her hands as though she were reaching out to touch the woman. "My name is Ariel and I am your mother."

"Holy frack," I whispered, leaning closer to the hologram. The woman had long fiery red hair, deep blue eyes, and spoke like a leader.

It was my grandmother!

I sat up straight, confused by what was happening. Was this some kind of joke? Had Sharra found a new way to torture me?

"Mom?" Rayne extended her arms some more. "Mom. I'm here." She laughed and sobbed at the same time.

"You know her?" Jesse whispered, looking at me.

"I think so." My stomach roiled at seeing Ariel this way. It had to be her ghost. There was no other explanation.

"Know that I love you. From the moment I felt you growing inside me, I loved you so much." Tears glistened on Ariel's cheeks. "And when you were born, I held you in my arms and knew, without a doubt, that you were so special." She wiped her eyes, anger cutting through her beautiful features. "Graves took you from me, promising I could see you on your eighteenth birthday, but only if I swore never to search for you. He threatened to kill you if I didn't cooperate." A sob escaped her throat and she looked away. "It wasn't all his fault though. I never was a very good mother. I could lead a city, deal with the day-to-day troubles of my people, but I struggled with everything else." Ariel shook her head. "I'm sorry."

"Mom," Rayne tried to step into the light, but it remained just out of her reach.

"And now you're eighteen." Ariel smiled. "My beautiful, incredible, amazing girl. How beautiful you are."

It felt like I was going to be sick and my insides ached like they were being torn to shreds. How was this happening? Ariel was dead. Sharra murdered her. But if it were true, then Rayne was my mom's half-sister and my aunt.

"I'm sorry I missed watching you become the young woman you've grown into." She blew Rayne a kiss. "I love you, Rayne, my precious daughter." The light dimmed and disappeared.

"No, wait! Don't go. Mom!" Rayne fell to her knees, her head hitting the ground. Her cries echoed around the cave, making it sound as though even the walls mourned. "What happened to her? Why did she leave? I'm eighteen now. Today is my birthday." Hope flashed through her eyes as she stood. "Maybe she's coming in person? That was the spell working. It had to be. Graves said it was a calling forth spell." Rayne stood and went to the hole in the rock that looked like a window. "I'll see her again."

I wanted to tell her the truth, but she looked so happy. I couldn't make myself break her heart.

Jesse moved beside her. "I'm sure you're right," he said, stroking her hair.

Rayne seemed to suddenly remember he was there. "Jesse." She pulled him into a hug. "Thank you for being here with me. Thank you for caring for me." Her eyes shone with fresh tears. "You're the best thing that's happened to me and I don't know what I'd do without you." She rested her head against his chest.

"Of course," Jesse said, caressing her back.

Feeling like a voyeur, I went over to one of the shelves on the far side of the room, checking out the empty potion bottles made of what appeared to be paper-thin rock. There were bowls, spoons, beakers, pots and pans, all made of rock. I studied each with interest, trying to give Jesse and Rayne some privacy.

I forced myself to be happy for them, especially Jesse, even though I felt sick with the knowledge that at some point I would have to tell them both the truth. Eventually I curled up on a chair in the corner and tried to sleep for a while, but my thoughts and guilt kept nagging at me.

The water reached almost to the top floor of the tower and lapped at the edge. Rayne had been right about the goblin sharks. Several came nearly to the top of the stairs as though waiting for something. Scraps of food? I wasn't sure but kept my distance.

Finally, the tide receded, and we climbed down the stairs. Jesse carried me through the cave, much to my irritation and Rayne's, and then we made our way back to the castle.

I kept looking toward the sky, hoping to spot Troy or Pops. I knew the gargoyles still searched for them, but I really missed them.

Especially Troy.

I really could have used some of his courage right about now.

OceanofPDF.com

DRAGON STATUES

I fiNISHED ANOTHER SHOWER, dried off, and donned a sea foam green pair of pants and matching bandeau top. I spent a little more time on my hair since it was for the coronation, pulling it high on top of my head before braiding it, then wrapping it in a bun. In between dressing and doing my hair, I went to the window in search of a dragon. Each time I left disappointed.

After returning from the cave Jesse and Rayne had gone to his room, promising to meet me at the coronation. I went past his door and listened. It was quiet so I headed downstairs. Throngs of gargoyles talked excitedly as they walked in the same direction. I guessed they were headed to the coronation, so I followed.

At the large opening to the throne room, a warrior stopped me. The space had been decorated with a myriad of golden strands, like streamers hanging from the ceiling between the peculiar round lights.

The gargoyle turned slightly and bowed. "Welcome, Jasmine of Sharra." His voice boomed through the corridor.

Hundreds of gargoyles stopped talking long enough to look my way. Some pointed and glared. Others smiled and whispered behind their hands before returning to whatever they'd been doing before I arrived.

For the event, the gargoyles had dressed up, using their wings as an accessory and to hold accessories.

They'd chosen clothing that matched or complimented their wings and then placed rings, jewels, and ribbons on them.

One female with cherry red wings even used hers as a cape, allowing them to drape over her shoulders. The effect was different, but beautiful just the same.

The hall sprawled before me, decked out in green and gold tablecloths and banners. All along the outskirts stood dozens of dragon statues.

"Emperor Edge wishes you to sit at his table." The guard indicated the long stone slab where Edge was seated next to Skye. Each of her white wings had been adorned with a delicate golden ribbon, a bow tied on the outside.

To Edge's right was Graves.

I didn't like that gargoyle, but apparently my grandmother saw something romantic in him. "Very good. Thank you." I strode over, dodging gargoyles until I reached the table. "Hello, Emperor Edge," I said, bowing slightly.

"Jasmine. Thank you for coming. Please have a seat." He indicated I sit next to Graves. My heart sank, but I managed not to let it show on my face.

"Thank you for having me." I crossed my arms, covering my stomach.

"Jasmine," Graves said as I sat. His oily voice seemed to coat the air and I instinctively moved back. He extended a hand toward me.

"Hello." I remembered the manners my mom had taught me and placed my palm in his, even as I studied him. He'd changed from a green to a golden cape with a black and gold broach clasped at his throat. The effect was magnificent. I wondered if he was purposely trying to appear more powerful that Edge.

"Are you looking forward to witnessing your first gargoyle coronation?" Graves still held my hand.

I pulled it away slowly, fighting the urge to wipe it off. "Sure."

"I think you'll enjoy it. As you can see, we are roasting a goblin shark and there will be fish cakes, shellfish salad, and horseradish stew." His gaze bored into me.

I wondered what the horrible smell was when I first came in.

"Sounds great," I lied, trying to appear excited.

"Oh, wait." He chuckled. "You are an original vampire. You probably don't even eat regular food, do you?"

I questioned his use of the word regular when paired with the description of the food that would be served for the banquet but resisted the urge to comment. "I prefer blood," was all I said.

"And how often do you need it? Once a day? A week? A year?" Curiosity danced across his hardened features.

The man was fishing for information. That was obvious. I gave him the vaguest answer I could think of. "It depends." I searched the entryways, hoping to see Jesse or Rayne or even Laeddin. I was sadly disappointed.

"If it's once a day, you must be starving. Too bad gargoyles don't have blood. At least not like the kind you're used to."

"It's fine. I'm not hungry." I continued to avoid looking at him as I spoke.

"Tell me about your wings. I know you're supposed to have them, so, where are they? Do they just pop out when you need them?"

Frack, the gargoyle had a lot of questions. I didn't want to go into detail about the choices I'd made that led me to be wingless. "Well, I -" I began, but Jesse and Rayne finally appeared. "Oh look, there's Rayne. Isn't she your daughter?"

A shadow fell across his face. "She is," he said, his eyes narrowing into slits.

"She saw her mother earlier," I said, watching for his reaction. But he kept his cool.

"Did she? How wonderful. It seems my spell worked." Now it was his turn to avoid looking at me.

"Yeah, quite a birthday present," I continued, knowing I might be pushing too hard, but not caring overly much.

Graves faced me. "Yes, it is." He took a sip from whatever was in the gold-filigreed goblet above his plate.

I wanted to keep poking. If Rayne truly was my mom's half-sister, then that made her royalty of the highest order. Before I could prod him, Edge stood and the room quieted.

He clinked on his glass with one of his rings. "Attention everyone." His deep voice boomed across the room.

The room went silent. Jesse and Rayne quickly moved into the seats to the right of me. When they were situated, Edge smiled. "Welcome friends, family, neighbors, and allies. Thank you for coming. Tonight we will dance and sing and eat."

Everyone cheered. I noticed no one seemed sad that Jagg was gone.

"But first the business of my coronation. I promise it'll be quick and painless." Several guffaws erupted from the crowd. Edge looked over at Graves. "You're up."

The wizard stood, tossing one side of his cape over his shoulder. "As we all know Edge is a gargoyle of integrity. Of course some thought I should rule, but Edge will be a leader we can be proud of. He will keep the dirty outliers from destroying what we've built and make sure there is continued peace." He paused, allowing the crowd to cheer. They pounded their cups against the tabletops and flapped their wings in joy. "Even now, Edge is working to rid our realm of the Akuma and the darkness overtaking us. With him as our leader, we will be victorious!"

More cheers. Banging on tables and clapping. Jesse and Rayne held hands. They didn't join in with the cheering but looked like they were enjoying themselves. As I studied the girl who looked less like a gargoyle than I did, I debated how to tell her about Ariel. I wasn't sure how to bring up the fact that we were related and that, even though we were around the same age, she was my aunt.

Graves continued, "Our families and loved ones will be safer with him at our helm." He held out his hand and a golden crown, the same color as Edge's wings, appeared on his palm. Made of gold ivy leaves, it shone in the light. "This crown should be worn with pride. As ruler of our people, may you lead us with resolution and valor."

Edge bent his head and allowed Graves to place it on his head.

When Edge straightened, Graves went on, "You will be known as Edge the Courageous." The wizard waved his hands and all the banners and tablecloths changed to different but complimentary shades of gold. Then he clapped his hands together once and the dragon statues all became golden lions.

Impressive. Even the gargoyles thought so. They oohed and aahed.

"Thank you, Graves." Edge picked up his glass. "In the name of Aria, our goddess, I do solemnly swear to rule our people with courage and valor." He lifted his glass. All the gargoyles followed.

"All hail Emperor Edge," Graves shouted.

The others repeated the phrase three times.

When they finished, Edge shouted, "Let's eat!"

Once the food was served, I pushed mine around long enough that if anyone bothered to check they would think I'd eaten.

"Tell me about this place," Jesse said. I overheard him speaking with Rayne and I listened. At that moment I felt like a party pariah. After the initial conversation with Graves, no one spoke to me.

Rayne pointed out three gargoyles whose names I forgot as soon as she said them. I did catch that they were the chieftains of the other three quarters of the realm and had come to support their new emperor. Rayne talked of the riches they'd brought and where they lived in conjunction to Edge's castle. I only half listened to the history lesson until she mentioned the Kaleidoscope Gardens.

"What are they?" Jesse asked.

She lowered her voice, but thankfully my vampire hearing allowed me to hear everything. "Everyone knows they exist, but there are only a handful of gargoyles who have seen them."

"Have you?"

I smiled to myself. Jesse was asking the right questions.

Rayne's voice dropped an octave. "Yes, but no one knows. I followed Graves once a few months ago."

Jesse sat up. "What's inside?"

"It's the most beautiful place I've ever seen. Surrounded by waterfalls, the ground is covered with lots of different colored plants and flowers. Some are incredibly tall while others are tiny. And there's something in the center. I'm not sure what it was, but that's where Graves went. He knelt there for a long time before retreating back to his rooms."

"Sounds like a cool place. What's it for?" Jesse asked as he took another bite and chewed.

"Legend says that it's the place that keeps the realm alive. It's also believed the place holds the secret to a gargoyle's colorful wings, but honestly, I don't know." Rayne shook her head at the idea.

"Wanna go see it? We could take a walk." Jesse leaned forward, grinning. "Maybe it will give both of us our wings."

"It's like you can read my mind." Rayne kissed him, taking both of his hands. Together they stood and took their leave.

I was sad and lonely and bored, which prompted me with the idea to follow them. Plus, I really wanted to see the Kaleidoscope Gardens. This was the first indication anything could actually grow here. Up until now, I hadn't seen so much as a single plant. I scanned the room and realized I wouldn't be missed. When they reached the exit, I stood.

"Where you off to?" Graves asked.

"Headache. I'm going to go lie down." It was almost true. Having him around was practically headache-inducing all by itself.

He narrowed his eyes at me. "You need blood, don't you?"

"You might be right. But I'll be fine." I gave him my most confident smile.

"Tomorrow, I'll have someone help you look for that crown piece."

"That would be great, thank you." My voice rang with sincerity. The sooner we found that piece, the sooner we could get out of here and find the rest.

"By the way, where is the genie?" His voice was casual, but his eyes were flinty as he spoke.

I'd wondered how long it would take for someone to ask. "He went to his realm to do some research," I said, then felt as if I'd given too much away so I added, "but he'll be back."

"Of that I have no doubt. He wouldn't leave you." The look on his face indicated he believed Laeddin and I were in a relationship. I decided not to correct him.

"No, he wouldn't. Good night." I didn't know whether it was night or not, but it felt like the right thing to say.

"Sleep well, Jasmine of Sharra." For some reason, hearing those words sent a shiver racing down my spine. I shook it off and headed out the door.

It was time to get a look at the Kaleidoscope Gardens with my own eyes.

OceanofPDF.com

STOP TO MAKE OUT

GRAVES HAD KEPT me longer than expected.

By the time I reached the exit, Rayne and Jesse were no longer in sight. So I closed my eyes and listened. At first I didn't hear anything except the fun going on at the party. But I pushed farther and farther, focusing until I heard Rayne's soft laugh. "Got you." I opened my eyes and started forward.

A lone gargoyle blocked my path. He wore a creepy smile as he studied me. "Talking to myself," I said, moving in the direction of the stairs.

"Don't go, little princess." He wrapped his arms around me from behind, holding me fast.

I immediately went limp, allowing him to bear all my weight.

His grip slipped just enough that I was able to ram the back of my foot into his knees and roll forward out of his arms.

The gargoyle cried out, and I was free before he even realized what had happened. Using my vampire speed, I dashed over to the stairs and raced down them before he had a chance to recover.

When I'd gone down two flights, I paused and listened for my attacker. No sounds of pursuit from him, but I did faintly hear something or someone else on the stairs above.

After waiting another minute and hearing nothing, I turned my attention to Jesse and Rayne. They weren't too far ahead, taking their time and enjoying each other's company.

I hurried, moving quietly until I was only one floor behind them.

They seemed to really care for each other. It was hard to listen to them.

When they stopped to make out, I rolled my eyes and crossed my arms, leaning against the gray wall.

Memories of Troy and me kissing after the dance filled my mind and my heart.

I missed him. I closed my eyes, trying to imagine his arms around me, and the smell of him, and the way I felt in his arms.

"Hey." The voice came from above, not too far from my head.

My heart jumped. It sounded suspiciously like Troy.

I opened my eyes and blinked several times to make sure I wasn't dreaming.

"Troy, what are you doing here?" I whispered.

Emotions flooded me at seeing him and I could barely keep my voice down. "What if someone sees you?"

"I've been stalking you and Jesse." He rested his hands on my arms even as he looked me up and down, ignoring my last question. "You look damn hot." His smirk was positively sinful.

He was wearing a pair of black gargoyle pants and no shirt. I wondered where he'd gotten them. "So do you," I grinned back and hugged him tight, my bare skin tingling where it touched his. The air changed between us, filling with electricity.

"Jazz." He tilted my head up and lowered his mouth over mine.

Our kiss started out tender, but quickly they became hungry.

He pressed my mouth open, exploring. He tasted minty fresh and I wondered how that was possible. He pulled me closer, his hands caressing my nearly bare back.

They went lower until they were at the waist of my pants.

I let out a moan.

He lifted me into his arms, and I circled my legs around his hips.

"Troy," I whispered against his mouth.

He groaned, releasing me. "They're moving again."

I knew he was talking about Jesse and Rayne. "What? No," I complained, pressing myself against him.

Troy gave me a quick kiss. "Come on." He grabbed my hand and tugged me along. "Let's think of it as a game. If they stop to make out, then we can too." He winked.

I adjusted my top, surprised at how easily I let myself get sucked into all the feelings I had for him. "Okay." I allowed him to lead me down the stairs, my hand in his, still in a daze. By the time we reached the next landing, Jesse and Rayne were kissing again. Troy, true to his word, pulled me around the corner and into his arms. My lips crashed into his. We tasted each other, hungry and happy. With each kiss, my worries about him dissipated.

Rayne and Jesse eventually stopped kissing again and it was time to move on.

"Damn," I whispered, trying to continue to kiss Troy as we moved. He chuckled and picked me up so that I could stay close, and I listened to his heartbeat against my ear as he moved. Four more times they stopped and kissed and four more times we did the same. By the time we reached the courtyard, I couldn't care less about the Kaleidoscope Gardens. I wanted nothing more than to find a quiet corner and learn all there was to know about Troy - physically and otherwise.

But Troy seemed determined to find them. "Let's go."

I chased after him, my fingers tracing my swollen lips. "Hey, where's Pops?" It suddenly occurred to me that he wasn't around.

He glanced back at me and shrugged. "After we escaped, we ended up in another of the gargoyle kingdoms. They seemed excited to see us and asked Pops for some help with an irrigation problem. He promised to stay if I promised to get Jesse out of here. We're going to meet back up and then return home together."

I stopped. "I haven't found the crown piece yet." Did he intend to take Jesse and leave me?

"We'll get it, Jazz. Don't worry." He flashed a broad smile. I'd really missed his confidence.

"Where are they?" I whispered, looking around for Jesse and Rayne.

"Not too much farther." They moved and we tracked them, peeking around the corner. It felt like we were spies from a mystery novel, and I loved that I was with Troy. Doing anything with him was fun.

Rayne and Jesse were facing a solid rock wall. She touched certain spots on it like she was typing in a code on an invisible keypad. When she finished, she stepped back and the wall rose, revealing the most beautiful garden.

She peered around and we quickly jumped back, dodging her gaze just in time. After several seconds, we looked back around and saw that they'd gone inside, and the wall was closing behind them.

"Let's go." Troy pulled me forward. "Slide," he said, taking my hand. Like two baseball players, we made it under the wall just before it closed.

"What the goddess are you two doing here?" Rayne pressed a hand against her chest, breathing heavily. "I knew someone was following us."

"Troy, man, I'm glad you're all right," Jesse said, taking Troy's forearm and helping his brother up. "Jasmine?" He helped me to my feet too.

"I'm here to rescue Jesse and Jasmine likes shiny things," Troy said, answering Rayne's question. Then he pulled me against him, kissing me below the ear.

I batted his face and blushed. "You're the dragon. You're the one who's supposed to like shiny things." I stuck out my tongue.

Troy laughed. "Dragon humor. You're good at it." He lightly pinched my side, causing me to squirm.

Jesse and Rayne looked at each other like they understood exactly what Troy and I were feeling.

"I overheard you two talking about the gardens and wanted to see them," I admitted, sheepishly.

Rayne tried to smile. "It's just that no one is supposed to be in here." She started shaking. I'd never seen her so afraid. "If Graves discovers I let a non-gargoyle in here, let alone two - I'm not even supposed to know where this place is."

"He won't find out." I patted her back, an unexpected burst of affection bubbling up within me.

She didn't seem convinced but said no more. The four of us were too captivated by our surroundings. It was truly a paradise. Waterfalls rumbled all around us making the air heavy with moisture. Colorful flowers in every shape and size bloomed in all directions, including the crevices next to the waterfall, along the top, and the floor. Pathways made of gold cut into the flowers and culminated in the center of the garden. A heady scent reminiscent of lilacs and poppies overwhelmed me. "What's in the center?" I headed down the path.

Rayne followed, pushing past me. "I don't know."

"Let's find out," Jesse said, scooting past us both.

Troy took my hand. "You're the most beautiful thing in this place, by far."

I snuggled into him, feeling tingles run throughout my body.

We arrived in the center of the garden and stopped. In front of us gaped a large, round hole.

"Whoa. What the hell?" Troy said.

I knelt beside it and peered over the edge.

"What are you?" Rayne knelt beside me and stared into the dark abyss.

I thought the question an odd one but held my tongue.

Instantly, the swirling darkness began to spin clockwise, then turned to glass. Troy sat beside me and rested his hands on my shoulders. Jesse knelt beside Rayne.

An image appeared. He had the face of a man, but the body and ears of a cat. Long fur covered most of his face and it was the color of a dark blue sky. His eyes fluttered open. Their color surprised me, though it shouldn't have. They were deep yellow with flecks of blue and black along the edges. "I am Obin, Keeper of the Shades, and who might you be?"

"I am Rayne." She patted a hand on her chest as she spoke.

"Ah, yes. Rayne. I can sense your essence. Tell me why you've come."

Rayne leaned back, unsure about how to respond. None of us had come for any reason other than curiosity. "To say hello," was all Rayne uttered.

Obin's eyes widened. "You do not come seeking knowledge?"

"No, I - " She paused and took Jesse's hand. "What can you tell me of my mother?"

My heart clenched with worry.

Obin took notice and glanced at me before returning his focus to Rayne. "She loved the sea, was beautiful, and fiercely loyal. She loved you, of that there is no doubt."

Rayne leaned forward, excited. "Where is she?"

"Oh, youngling. Your mother is dead."

Rayne gasped, falling back onto her butt. Tears fell onto her cheeks.

My insides constricted with agony as I thought of her pain and it mingled with my own.

"But that can't be true. I just saw her," Rayne sobbed.

Jesse scooted beside her, wrapping his arms around her, whispering softly. He would hate me once Obin revealed the truth. They both would. My pain turned to dread, and I wanted to run away. Troy held me fast, his hand grasping hold of my braid. But if Obin knew things, if he had knowledge about this place and others, maybe he'd know where the piece of the crown was. I couldn't afford to waste this opportunity.

Obin looked at me again. "Original vampire, why have you not told Rayne the truth about her mother? You have all the answers."

Rayne and Jesse both looked at me, accusation and curiosity mingling in their gazes. I tried to stand, nausea and fear gripping me. I lost my balance and nearly fell into the void, but Troy kept hold of me and pulled me into his arms.

Jesse finally spoke. "You know about Rayne's mom?"

"I only found out who her mom was in the cave last night." I pressed myself against Troy's chest, desperate to protect myself from the onslaught of anger that would surely come. "And I wasn't sure."

"You are sure, Jasmine, Princess of Sharra. Tell the girl the truth," Odin's voice was demanding.

"Fine." I pushed away from Troy, but he kept hold of my waist with one hand. "Your mother was Ariel, my grandmother." I blurted the words out all at once so that they tripped over each other.

"She's your grandmother?" Rayne was shocked, but a flicker of hope sparked in her eyes. "Really?"

"Yes. I didn't know her well, but she was as Odin said: beautiful and fierce and amazing."

"But you said 'was'. She's dead?" The hope in her eyes vanished and Rayne buried her face in Jesse's shoulder. It shook as sobs racked her body.

"Yes," I whispered, wishing it weren't true. "She died not that long ago."

"How did she die?" Jesse asked. I could tell he hoped it was from natural causes, and my heart broke that I was responsible for destroying his hope too.

"A sorceress named Sharra killed her," I said, looking away. "She did it to hurt me, to hurt my mom - " I paused a moment. "My mom is your half-sister and you are technically my aunt." I pulled from Troy and backed away, unable to stand the pain I was causing.

"But without your magic and your wings, she never would've been able to hurt anyone," Obin added.

I was really starting to hate that guy.

"Why would you give such an evil woman your magic and your wings?" Rayne stood as well, sniffling and looking confused.

I'd reached the wall. Nowhere left to go. Troy was instantly beside me, a source of comfort. I turned away from them, resting my head against the cool rock wall and banged my fists against it. "I had no choice," I said, knowing I would do it all again despite the consequences.

"There's always a choice." Rayne pulled my shoulder, making me face her.

Troy stood in front of me, shielding me from Rayne's accusatory glare, but I stepped aside. I was tired of being a coward. It was time to face the consequences of the choices I'd made.

"You're right." I held Rayne's gaze as I spoke. "It was either let a friend die or give Sharra my wings. I chose to keep my friend alive."

OceanofPDF.com

SELFISH JERK

"LET'S GET OUT OF HERE." Rayne said, turning away from me and toward the entrance. "I can't stay here anymore." She touched the wall and it began to rise.

I glanced sideways, hoping to get Jesse's attention, but he wouldn't look at me either.

Troy still held me fast. "It's okay," he whispered.

I didn't know if it would be. I crossed my arms and waited as the wall retreated into the ceiling. On the other side, Rave and Scotch were waiting for us. My neck prickled. Something about them looked off.

"Sharra will see you now," Scotch said. His voice was entirely void of character and his brilliant orange wings had faded to dull umber. Worse, he mentioned Sharra. Rave and Scotch had become Akuma, soulless demon creatures.

Rave took hold of Jesse, but Jesse forced himself from the gargoyle's grasp. "Let me go."

Scotch tried to grab me, but I scooted out of the way as Troy half shifted and ripped off the gargoyle's arm. He didn't even flinch.

"Jesse, take Rayne and get out of here. Now," I shouted.

"What's wrong with them?" Rayne asked. I understood her confusion. She'd never seen an Akuma and neither had Jesse. I had to warn them, these beings weren't to be trifled with.

"It's the pestilence and the darkness. The reason my grandmother was killed. They've been turned into Akuma. Sharra has taken their souls." Troy and I blocked Jesse and Rayne as the gargoyles fought us. "They're here for me. So go. Hurry. Tell Edge the castle is no longer safe."

"We can't tell him that. We're kids. He'd never believe us." Rayne stood her ground, glaring at me angrily.

"Gah, just do as I say," I yelled, clenching my hands into fists.

Troy seemed torn. He didn't want to let Jesse out of his sight. But he also didn't want to leave me behind.

"No," Rayne returned, dodging Scotch's outstretched hands.

I fought to stay out of Rave's way, all the while begging them with my eyes to go. "Tell them, Troy," I said, hoping he'd help me out.

"Jaz - " Troy began, but was interrupted.

"Hey, hey, hey. What's going on?" Graves came down the stairs cautiously, his golden robes brushing along the floor, his eyes flicking between all of us. "Is everything all right?" When he noticed Troy's bronze scaled skin, his eyes glinted. "I don't know you."

"Take the wizard," Scotch shouted, reaching for him. "Sharra wants him as well. He will be a great asset to the cause."

Rave came at Graves.

Acting quickly, the wizard said something, and his body became surrounded by lightning. When Rave tried to put her hands on him, the one-armed male burst into flames and exploded.

Chunks of flesh, hair, wings, and more flew everywhere. I ducked as the disembodied head came at me.

"Gross," Rayne said, pressing her face into Jesse's neck.

Scotch screamed, going after Graves, but he exploded as well. Once both Akuma had been destroyed, the electricity around Graves vanished. "Does someone want to tell me what the goddess is going on?"

"Ask her. She seems to know a whole lot." Rayne pointed at me, accusation covering her features.

My shoulders slumped.

"Well, do you know why Rave and Scotch attacked me?" Graves came to stand directly in front of me, stepping over dismantled body parts. Troy straightened and pulled me against him, refusing to allow the wizard to intimidate him.

I took comfort in his nearness. It was nice to have someone on my side.

"She has an idea, but why don't you hear it from me?" Sharra appeared beside Graves, my wings beating on her back.

She was striking and cunning and evil. She gave me a wicked scowl. "Hello, Jasmine. It's lovely to see you again." My wings fluttered, and I thought my insides would break. "Your wings suit me so much better than they did you, don't you think?"

Troy released me, lunging for her.

She took a step back, surprised, but recovered and using her staff, flung him back against the wall.

"Troy," I shouted, but didn't dare move or turn my back to Sharra.

"Who might you be?" Graves took a step forward, his body once again covered with electricity.

I noticed that his protections only extended to cover his person.

The selfish jerk didn't bother to protect his own daughter.

"Go. Get out of here," I mouthed to Jesse and Rayne.

Jesse shook his head and mouthed back. "I won't leave you."

Sharra and Graves sized each other up, each of their expressions reflected in the other. First one step, then another, they turned in a circle like two lions preparing for battle.

"I can sense your power is great, wizard. Why don't you join me?" Sharra's gaze turned predatory.

Graves gasped. "I would never join with you. I don't even know who you are."

"I can explain it to you. I think with a little persuasion you would come over to my way of thinking." She smirked, but there wasn't any humor in it.

"Absolutely not." Graves seemed to grow a foot as he spoke, standing tall.

"Very well. I gave you a chance." Sharra pointed her staff at Graves. Green fire shot from its end, directly into the gargoyle's chest. He writhed and screamed as the emerald flames burned away the electricity and penetrated him; like lava from a volcano, they burned through his chest.

"I've changed my mind," he said, panting and falling to one knee. "I will work with you." The green lava climbed his neck, burned the cape from his body and moved into his thighs and wings.

"It's too late, wizard. Your death is now a matter of principle. How dare you even think your wretched gargoyle powers could defeat me?" She stepped forward as the green fire grew stronger, and by the time she reached him, Graves was nothing, not even ash. He was completely gone.

"Graves," Rayne said, reaching out for him. Her voice broke, but she didn't cry. Theirs hadn't been a close relationship.

"Now, it's high time you give me what I want." She aimed her staff at me. Green light swirled around the tip as though it were charging and then flung out at me.

Before the magic found its target, Laeddin appeared, taking the full brunt of the blow.

"Meddling genie. It's time you were put in your - "

Jesse and Rayne were suddenly there and tackled her to the ground. Shrieking with fury, Sharra vanished beneath them in a cloud of eerie green-black smoke.

"She's gone," Jesse said, helping Rayne up.

I took the opportunity to wrap my arms around Laeddin and hug him tight. He'd fallen on top of me, his body heavy against mine. Alarm shot through me when he didn't respond.

"Laeddin? Laeddin, speak to me," I said, gently scooting out from under him.

A pause, then he said, "I'm fine," though it was apparent by the tone of his voice that wasn't true.

His light green shirt was already stained with a large amount of blood. I watched, horrified, as it continued to grow right before my eyes. "You aren't fine. Use some of that great cosmic power you possess to heal yourself!"

Troy came to my side and I felt horrible I hadn't gone to check on him first thing. He patted my back and I knew he understood.

Laeddin coughed. "Haven't you learned by now that all magic comes with a price?"

Fury suddenly filled all the sad places within me. Why was he always so stubborn? "I don't care about the damn consequences. You can't die. I won't let you!"

He closed his eyes. "You're so bossy, princess. But it is what it is."

I knew what I had to do, and I knew Laeddin wouldn't like it, but I didn't care. I closed my eyes, focusing on how I wanted to phrase the sentence so that I would get exactly what I wanted. When I was ready, I opened my eyes and said, "I wish you freed from your duties as a genie and command you to heal yourself."

"No," Laeddin whispered, shaking his head. But it didn't matter. I'd made my wish and the results were instantaneous. The tattoos on Laeddin's wrists lit up and then disappeared completely.

"There," I said. "You are no longer beholden to me. Now heal yourself so that you can live life as a free man."

Laeddin coughed, his eyes rolling up into his head. Blood leaked out of the side of his mouth. I held my breath, forcing myself not to smell it. "Laeddin? Talk to me." I leaned over him, placing a hand on either side of his head so that we were nose-to-nose.

Slowly, his eyes rolled open and his dim gaze found mine. Tears filled his eyes, causing them to be extra shiny. "You are an amazing person, Jasmine of Sharra. Never forget that."

"That sounds like goodbye, Laeddin, and you aren't allowed to say goodbye."

He smiled. "Actually, thanks to you, princess, I'm allowed to do anything I like." He raised up and kissed me on the mouth. It was soft, sweet, and full of tenderness. Troy stiffened next to me, but I couldn't worry about what he might be feeling. Not with Laeddin dying right in front of me.

"Isn't that sweet?" Sharra's voice cut through the kiss, freezing me in place. I watched helplessly as she used her staff to lift the genie off the ground and out from under me. "You will give me what I want one way or another." With that she was gone, taking Laeddin with her.

"Laeddin," I cried, standing.

"She took him, Jazz. He's no longer here," Troy said from behind me.

I turned and fell against his chest. "Then it was all for nothing. Everything I've done." Pain rocketed through me, filling every void and crevice, pushing out all the new love and happiness I'd felt kissing Troy. Eradicating everything good, like a virus, it swept through my body, destroying anything that wasn't darkness.

Someone spoke. I heard the voice say my name, but it was far away. I was lost within the garden of pain, unable to find my way out. Utter desolation surrounded me in every direction.

Laeddin is gone. My parents are gone.

You will fail. Give up.

There's no point continuing.

OceanofPDF.com

WHAT I DESERVE

I WALKED and walked for what felt like months.

Dark sky hung above without a moon or stars to guide me.

The sand beneath me sank with every step, burying my bare feet, scorching my skin regardless of the missing sunlight.

I climbed hill after sandy hill, trying to find my way out, but it was endless. I crested each summit, hope filling my breast, only to have it dashed when I reached the top and saw a dozen more hills stretched out in every direction.

And with each step came the relentless berating.

You'll never defeat her.

You won't succeed.

Give yourself over to Sharra.

Then you can't fail.

I fought against the voice inside my head.

Time passed, and I began to believe this was my only existence.

The sand and dark sky were real.

Everything else had been a dream.

I finally lay down, not caring that the sand burned.

In fact, I relished its stinging, welcomed it.

Closed my eyes, desperate to be done.

Hope no longer existed.

Only the burning sand and the darkness.

Only failure and depression.

Only sadness and death.

I took a long, last breath, and blew it out with a sigh of impending relief.

The voice became comforting.

That's right. Let go.

"Jasmine!" The voice was loud and sharp.

I jerked my eyes open.

An apparition stood in front of me.

I sat up, my mind trying to recall how I knew the person before me.

Not a person, a vampire, the voices said.

He will kill you, they added.

But as he came closer, I didn't feel afraid. He was life. He was –

"Christopher." I tried to speak but the words came out a croak.

My tongue and throat were covered with sand, so dry.

He knelt beside me, a gentle smile on his lips. "What have you done to yourself?"

"I - "

He lifted my head onto his lap and slashed his wrist with one of his fangs.

As soon as the scent of his blood struck my nose, my eyes opened wide.

"That's it, my girl. Drink." He stuck his wrist to my lips.

Blood flowed like honey into my mouth.

I swallowed and swallowed, growing thirstier with each drink.

I worried I might drink him dry, but I couldn't bring myself to pull away. I sensed he would let me drink until he had nothing left.

And I realized I couldn't kill him.

So I let go, falling back onto the sand.

Christopher lay down beside me. "Tell me what's wrong. What are you doing in this place?"

"It's what I deserve," I said, feeling the truth of it deep in my chest.

"Why do you say that?" He turned his head to face me, his voice compassionate. It sounded so out of place amidst the all-encompassing despair.

"Because of my wishes, everything is ruined." My voice broke and a tear leaked from the corner of my eye and rolled down the side of my face.

"That's not true." He leaned up on his side so I could see his face. "You made choices, Jasmine. That is true, but you need to climb off your high horse and quit thinking the world revolves around you."

That staggered me. "What do you mean by that? I don't think the world revolves around me."

He laughed. "You believe the Akuma are here because of you. You believe your friends died because of you. Don't you realize that yes, you played a part, but the calamities happening on Earth began way before you made your first wish?"

"No, they didn't," I said, but felt a flicker of hope and clung to it.

"You think Sharra was just sitting around waiting for you to make a wish so she could destroy the world?" He raised an eyebrow at me.

I hadn't thought about it like that.

He continued, "She's been making plans, throwing out tentacles in every possible direction, waiting, waiting, waiting. You are only one piece in the plan."

"Really?" The hope was stronger now, growing inside me.

"If you search your feelings, you'll know it's true." His steady gaze held mine, daring me to trust his words.

I did as he said. I wasn't strong enough to do anything else, anyway. Even before I shut my eyes, I knew he was right.

"I don't know how to leave this place," I said when I opened my eyes. "I don't even know how I got here."

He leaned down, kissing me on the forehead. "You've had a lot of grief in your life recently and instead of dealing with it, you've been pushing it down, ignoring it, pretending it doesn't exist. This place is called the Wasteland. And the way to leave is to make a conscious choice to do so."

I closed my eyes. Immediately, the voices taunted me. Don't do it. Ignore him. He just wants to cause you pain. He's betraying you, just like he did your mother. Stay with us. You can't fail here.

Part of me wanted to give in. If I did, I knew I would drift away. No more feeling, no more misery or sadness. But then I thought of my mom and what she would do. My eyes flew open.

Christopher smiled. "You ready?"

"Almost." I rubbed my lips together. "Where do you go when you aren't saving my life?" I asked softly, touching his face with my hand. I wanted to see if he was real or just a figment of my imagination. His face felt solid against my palm.

He chuckled. "I am in charge of the vampires, remember. They keep me busy."

"So you aren't lonely?"

His expression became serious. "Only a little."

"I'm sorry," I said, wishing I could bring him some happiness.

He lightly hugged me. "I have much to make up for. And while your mom and dad might not believe me, I intend to make it right. Helping you in any way I can does that and brings me immense joy. More than I've ever known. Remember that."

"You're sure?" I wanted to believe him, but I saw the gloom. I understood what he wanted, which was me, even though he knew I didn't feel that way about him.

"For now." He gave me a sad smile. "And I'll wait for you forever, Jasmine. Always." He started to disappear, like a sandcastle slowly blowing away in a mild wind.

"Thank you, Christopher."

He grinned and was gone.

It was time to wake up, face my fears, and stop blaming myself for everything. At least I'd try.

OceanofPDF.com

RELIEF AND WORRY

I OPENED my eyes for real this time. They went immediately to the window. It was even darker than I remembered, and I wondered how long I'd been gone."

"Jazz." Troy was abruptly at my side, sitting beside me on the bed. Relief covered his entire face like a blanket.

"Where are we?" I rubbed at my temples, trying to regain my bearings.

"We're still in the gargoyle realm," he said. His eyes shone with unshed tears. "I didn't think you were coming back to me." With infinite care, he brushed some hair off my forehead.

"How long have I been asleep?"

"Eleven days." He scooted closer. "You look better, like you've eaten."

I glanced down at my hands. "I did."

"Oh?" He was understandably alarmed by the revelation. "How?"

I touched the wooden bear on my wrist. "Christopher," I said plainly, knowing I needed to tell the truth.

"That's impossible." His voice was hard. "I've been with you the whole time and he hasn't been here."

"Well," my voice lifted along with my gaze. "He was able to reach me in the Wasteland. He fed me and helped me to return. So here I am." I glanced at him shyly, hoping he would understand.

"The Wasteland?" Troy's gaze was a baffling mixture of relief and worry. He probably thought I was going crazy. I sounded crazy, even to myself.

I gave him the small details of what I'd been going through, leaving out the part about the voices. When I finished, I said, "But I'm feeling much better." I sat up and threw my legs over the side of the bed. "Where's Pops and the others?"

"Pops is around. So are Jesse and Rayne. Laeddin is - still gone," Troy said, tenderly.

"I know, but not forever. I'll get him back, just like I'll get my mom and dad back."

Troy placed his hands on my arms. "You should lie back and rest."

I didn't want to rest. I'd been resting for eleven days. "Troy," I took his face in my hands and kissed him. Troy responded carefully at first, his fingers gently running along my arms, sending tingles over my body. I wanted him and deepened the kiss, tasting him and tugging him against me. "Don't stop," I whispered against his mouth.

My words seemed to wake him up. He jumped up like I suddenly caught fire. "I'm so sorry, Jasmine."

I was in a hungry fog. It took me a second to realign my brain cells enough to speak. "Wait." I took his hand, standing beside him.

He took in my pajama clad body. "Let me get you something to wear." He disappeared into the closet and reappeared with a deep purple pair of pants and a top. Give the boy a hand, everything matched. "Here."

I took them, and he turned around, rubbing a hand over his neck. "I swear that wasn't my plan, to wake you up and make out with you," he said, despair in his voice.

When I finished dressing, I turned him around. "Troy, my dragon boy. I love you." I touched his face, enjoying the roughness.

"You do?" His eyes came alive with surprise.

"Yes - " I began.

But he stopped me, lifting me into his arms, kissing me again. Too soon he let me back down, his gaze searching mine. "I love you too."

"You think we'll end up together?" I touched my swollen lips, feeling breathless from our kiss.

"I can't imagine myself with anyone but you, Jasmine of Sharra."

I smiled, leaning against him. We were young. Barely old enough to be thinking about who we'd end up with. But I knew I was in love with Troy. With all my heart. It didn't matter that I was only - " I froze. "What day is it?"

Troy looked confused. "July the twenty-seventh. Why?"

I slapped him lightly on the chest. "Today's my birthday. I'm officially eighteen."

He gave me a heart-stopping smile. "Happy birthday, Jazz." He kissed me again until we were lost in each other and I couldn't tell when I ended, and he began. Too soon, he lifted his head, studying me with his signature smirk. "What should we do to celebrate?" he finally asked.

My body urged me to say things, but I was in control of myself and knew there was still much to do. I took in a shuddered breath. "Tell me about Pops, Jesse, and Rayne. Are they all right?" All I wanted was for those I loved to be safe and for the world to go back to the way it was.

His face darkened, but only for a moment. "Yes. I told Pops to take Jesse and Rayne back to the human realm. Jesse wasn't going to go. He's the new emperor's son, but when Rayne said she wanted to leave, at least for a while, he agreed, and they went back together so she could meet her half-sister." He winked. "Your mother."

"But Jesse is coming back?" I ignored the statement about Rayne. I didn't know whether she'd forgive me or not, but I had no control over that.

"Yes. Edge intends to raise him as the next leader."

That surprised me. "I thought the gargoyles didn't like half-breeds. The guards called him a mutt while in we were the cell."

"I'm not sure what Edge intends to do about that, I only know what Jesse told me." He snorted, blowing smoke out of his nose. It was a complication for another time.

I took his hand in mine, enjoying the warmth his touch caused. "Will you help me get the crown piece?"

"Right now?" Troy laughed.

"Yes. I'm tired of being here. It's time to move on. Come on." I was out the door and down the hall before he moved.

"Jazz." He walked beside me.

The castle was quiet. "Is everyone gone?"

"No, they're sleeping."

"Even better." We went down the stairs and into the throne room. It was empty too, except for all of the statues.

The jewel in my forehead began to burn. "Hang on a second." I grabbed Troy's hand. "This way." We walked quietly along the outskirts of the statues in the direction of the female with the bird wings. At the foot of her statue, the gem in my forehead burned more painfully than ever before. I looked up, feeling like the statue went on for miles it was so tall. It was more than twice the size of Edge, and he was nearing seven feet. "It's here. Help me find a lever or something."

He went one way and I went the other until we met back where we'd started. "Anything?"

"No." He shook his head. "You?"

"No." I stepped back, looking up at the woman's face, taken by her familiarity.

The rock rippled as the statue of the woman came alive. I grabbed hold of Troy and he wrapped his arms around me.

The woman smiled. "Hello, Jasmine."

I swallowed, fighting the urge to hide behind one of the other statues.

"I've been waiting these long weeks to talk to you. The gargoyles know me as Aria, but I am one of the original vampires. I believe you know my sister, Sharra."

I sputtered. "You're Silindra." A quick flash of the story my mom had shared about how Sharra had Silindra killed many years ago filled my vision. For the briefest moment I questioned whether I'd really woken up, or if this was actually a very elaborate dream.

"I'm sorry for all of the trouble my sister has given you. The crown piece you're looking for is here." She opened her mouth and a box fell out. Troy half changed into a dragon, jumped up and caught it, using his wings to return to the ground.

I quickly took the box from him, smiling. "Thank you, Troy."

"Be warned," Silindra said. "My sister will not stop until the universe is exactly as she's always wanted it. The Akuma and the darkness are only two of her tools. The vampire called Arthur has begun laying plans to catch you and make you Sharra's, but if you won't comply, he will find another. And when he does, he will extract the pieces of the crown once you've gone through the trouble of finding them all, then give the crown to Sharra."

With that much power, nothing would be able to stop her.

"What can we do?" Troy asked, tucking me closer into his side.

"Find all of the pieces and keep Jasmine away from Sharra and Arthur." She smiled at Troy. "You're good for her." Silindra's body began to revert back to stone. "One more thing." Silindra removed the necklace she was wearing and dropped it. I reached out and caught it before it could hit the floor. The chain was made of silver and the gem was large and multifaceted, sparkling with all the colors of the seven magics. "This will allow you to travel between realms as you search for the remaining pieces." The final word hung on her mouth, as she once again became stone.

I shivered, trying to shake off the bizarre encounter. Then I looked at Troy. "Will you hold the necklace?"

"Sure, but why?" He took it, looking like he'd just about reached his quota of unusual happenings for one day.

I held up the glistening black box. "As soon as I open this box, an assassin will appear. I have to fight him before I can take the crown piece."

"Oh, well I'll help you." Troy rolled his shoulders, looking more eager than worried.

"Sorry, Troy. You can't. Laeddin provided me with a spell that allows only me to defeat the assassin. If anyone else tries," I gave Troy a pointed look, "he will be killed, and I don't want you dead. Understand?"

"You're serious?"

"You'll see." I set the box on the ground in front of me. "Promise me you'll stay out of the fight."

He closed his eyes a moment before meeting my gaze. "I promise."

"Good."

As before a sickly sweet scent emanated from the box, though it was a slightly different from the first. I guessed there would be flower petals inside like the first time, though possibly a different species. "Here we go," I said, opening the box and peering inside. Sure enough, the piece of the crown lay on top of a bed of violet colored petals. The emeralds embedded within the crown twinkled in the low light. I tipped the container, allowing the petals to fall to the ground as my fingers brushed against the cold metal crown. Immediately, the petals found purchase in the rock and burrowed deep within. Smoke billowed up, thickening and taking shape until an assassin stood before me.

I heard Troy gasp, but I didn't look his way.

The assassins eyes opened, the same violet color as the petals. "Who dares awaken me from my slumber?"

Like the first encounter with an assassin, I said, "It is I, Jasmine. I'm here to take the piece of crown you protect."

His violet eyes flashed with anger. "I will not allow that." He reached back and grabbed his swords from the sheaths at his back. "Prepare yourself for destruction."

"I won't die, assassin. It's my fate to kill you." Twin blades exactly like the assassin's appeared in my hands. Red lightning crackled all along their honed edges.

The assassin came forward, his weight causing the ground to tremble slightly. I held my stance as he brought his blades down, trying to end me with one blow. In answer, I crossed my blades, blocking his swords. Red and purple lightning flashed together. Metal grated against metal like chainsaw slicing through ice. He pressed down heavily, sending me to my knees. But Christopher had just fed me, and I was strong.

Out of the corner of my eye I saw Troy come forward. "No!" I yelled. "I mean it. Stay back."

Troy stopped, but didn't look happy about it.

I pushed back hard. The assassin growled, turned, and turned came at me from a different angle. I held him back with one sword as his blades clashed against mine. With the other, I stabbed him in the side. The assassin fell to one knee and I took the advantage. With my vampire abilities, I jumped high in the air so that I was above him. He stood more rapidly than I planned, but I hung in the air long enough to cross my swords and chop off his head. I reached the ground as his body fell forward. Stepping back, I moved out of the way just as the head landed on the floor in front of me. It rolled forward, empty eyes staring, his mouth hanging open. Then his body and head vanished along with the swords in my hands.

"Holy hell. That was amazing." Troy seemed nervous to touch me.

"Thank you," I said, though I hadn't taken any pleasure in it. The assassin was doing his job. I understood that it was his destiny to defend the crown piece until death.

"And for the briefest moment, it looked like a pair of wings were on your back." Troy shook his head as though he thought he was seeing things.

My insides quivered. I'd seen wings too, right after Laeddin had performed the spell on me, but not since. "I - " I wasn't sure how to respond. It was too painful. Instead, I knelt in front of the crown and picked it up. Immediately the metal edges dug into my skin. I watched in awe, not scared like the first time, but accepting.

Troy reacted differently. "What is happening?"

"It's okay," I said, trying to reassure him. "This is how the first piece ended up here." I touched my head.

"You sure?" His eyes were huge, and he looked pretty freaked out.

"Yes." When I felt it reach my eyes there was a flash of light, and it moved over next to the first piece. I could feel it, but only for a moment before it was gone.

"That's it?" He came close, pushing hair off my forehead and feeling for it. "Does it hurt?"

"No, I feel fine. Great, actually."

"You sure?" He cupped my face in his hands, his mouth inches from mine. "My awesome, lovely assassin-slaying vampire."

I laughed at the ridiculous title. It was a mouthful, to say the least. "Positive."

He kissed me softly. "Then let's get out of here."

"Hold me first," I said.

"With pleasure." He wrapped his arms around my waist. I had no idea how to work the amulet attached to the necklace Silindra gave me, but I put a hand over the gem and thought about home. A bright light flashed around us and instantly we were back in my mom's house in Salem.

Gatsby sat on the counter, licking his mouth. "Where have you been?"

OceanofPDF.com

VAMPIRES & DRAGONS

OceanofPDF.com

33 DAYS UNTIL TOTAL DARKNESS

I DIDN'T NEED light to see.

Neither did Troy.

But the rest of the world did.

And it was my job to keep it from disappearing completely, especially since the looming darkness was my fault.

After leaving the gargoyle realm, it only took us a few days to find the third piece of the crown created - and then hidden - by elves a long time ago.

According to Laeddin, only I could wield the powers contained within.

If I collected all the pieces in time, then I would possess the magic necessary to destroy Sharra and save the world.

I hoped he was right. Part of me even believed it, especially since each time I found a piece, it embedded itself in my forehead.

The rest of me wasn't sure I could stop the Darkness or the Akuma, and specifically not Sharra. The prospect terrified me.

But I had to try.

"Stand back, Troy." I glanced up at his handsomely rugged face. He had smudges of dirt on his chin and nose, which somehow made him even more gorgeous, if that were possible.

"I'm against the wall, Jazz. Sheesh." He gave me a serious look; one that said he wouldn't interfere unless he thought it was necessary.

I nodded, thinking I liked that he called me Jazz. Then shook off the thought and returned my attention to the old wooden box on the floor in front of me. Inside was what I'd been searching for. I could feel it.

And it was about time.

Troy and I were in a cave under the main palace in the troll realm. Everything here smelled like oil mixed with brine - not a pleasant scent - and a thick darkness pervaded, even worse than in the gargoyle realm. We'd been here a few days as we searched for the crown. The trolls treated us surprisingly well considering the chaos happening around us. Had they known I was to blame for the darkening skies, things might have been different. But I wasn't going to tell them.

During the day we spent time looking. At night, Troy and I tried to sleep. It'd been difficult, my dreams filled with images of my mom and dad being tortured. For that reason, I spent little time with my eyes closed. The troll who helped me get ready for bed was very kind. It turned out most trolls were tender hearted. And they were definitely all about having fun in spite of the precarious situation we were all in. They threw us a party when we first arrived. Their court musician wrote and performed songs about the love Troy and I had for each other, while the troubadour talked of our romantic destiny.

The trolls had built striking edifices out of the dark rock common in their land. Their buildings were strangely beautiful and I couldn't help but be drawn to them. During our time here I'd gained respect for most of this realms inhabitants, though not all. I still despised the troll leader. It was obvious he didn't care for me in the least. I guessed it probably had something to do with the fact that he'd been commanded by my mother to give me blood as a child.

The troll king seemed very interested in Troy though. I think he was the only reason we'd been allowed to stay in their realm.

"And don't help. I can handle this," I said as an afterthought, but felt it necessary to remind him.

"I'll keep my distance."

I could almost hear him smile. His fingers reached out and stroked my hair. My determination wavered as a trembling of love and need ripped through me. The force of my emotions for him nearly knocked me off my feet. In that moment, I thought of kissing him, of - My eyes flicked to his neck and the vein pumping strongly beneath his skin.

He noticed and chuckled. "I'm all yours once you're done here. You know I am. Always and forever." He nodded his head, indicating the box.

I swallowed. Then I stuck the sharp edge of one of my fangs into my bottom lip, drawing blood. It tasted of Christopher, but only slightly. In the past, my favorite blood had been unicorn. But everything changed once I'd given away my wings. Sometime later, Christopher had shown up and told me to drink his blood. Out of desperation I'd finally done it. And oh my! His blood did things to me that none of the others could. It not only tasted better than any blood, it also returned my vampire powers. I was grateful, because without them I'd still be a normal human.

Christopher basically brought me back to life after Sharra took my power and my wings. I missed my wings. Terribly. I longed to feel the weight of them on my back. Each absent ebony feather felt like a piece of my soul had vanished. I hoped to get them back. At this point it seemed highly unlikely. But I wouldn't stop trying.

"Jazz?" Troy gave me a quizzical look.

Blood. I craved Troy's, but I needed Christopher's. It'd been ten days since I'd had any and I could sense the difference within myself. I felt less civilized and more carnal - more monstrous. "Right." I returned my attention to the box.

It was made of strange, deep green wood. The latch created of a special metal gilded with gold filigree. I took a deep breath, preparing myself for what would come next. I pushed out thoughts of my mom and dad. Of Laeddin, and even Troy. I thought only of the fragment of crown contained within. I had to retrieve it and doing so meant slaying an elven assassin whose sole purpose was to protect the crown fragment.

"You okay? Maybe we should come back another time." Troy's frown deepened and he knelt beside me.

"No, I'm fine." I appreciated his concern. He really was one of the sweetest guys I'd ever met.

"Awesome. Then open that box and kick the assassin's ass so we can get out of here. The smell is foul," he said waving a hand in front of his nose as he moved away. "Not to mention I'm a dragon and being underground freaks me out."

"I know. Sorry."

"No need to be sorry. I'm here for you one hundred percent." He spoke with sincerity, but I saw the unease in his expression. Time to hurry this up.

"Here I go." Determined, I lifted the latch, opened the box, and stepped back. Wispy curls of darkness filled the room, before morphing into the assassin. He stood over six feet tall and clutched a pair of wicked looking swords. At once, just as before, twin blades appeared in my hands.

I stepped forward, raising my weapons as his blades came down to meet mine. Metal grated against metal, the sound reverberating through the cave. Soil and debris came down around us like dirty rain. Unlike the others, this battle lasted barely more than a minute. It was like his heart wasn't in it. He scarcely fought. Before I dispatched him, I had the assassin on his back, my knee pressing in on his chest while both my blades crossed at his neck.

"We believe in your cause, Original Vampire," the assassin said. "The wicked queen must be stopped."

For a moment, I was too shocked to respond. This had definitely never happened before. My mind ran through likely reasons. The first? He wanted to throw me off guard. Even as I thought about it, I pressed my blades deeper into his throat. I could not allow him to get the drop on me. Retrieving the crown was too important. Then I thought of the other reason. The assassin meant what he said.

Highly unlikely, but I had to consider it.

The assassin opened his mouth. "The - Next - Piece of the - Crown is - " He choked out the words. I let off some of the pressure on his throat.

"Thank you, Vampire," he said.

"Tell me. Where is the next piece?" My eyes blazed as I waited to see if he would speak again.

"It's located in the vault under the Château de Chinon, in France."

Since he was being so forthcoming, I decided to see what else he would tell me. "And the final piece? Where is it?"

Before I understood what he was doing, the assassin forced my blades down on his own throat and he vaporized in a puff of smoke. I gasped, my knees smacking against the hard, packed-earth floor. "Did you hear him, Troy?" I jumped up, ignoring the pain. Everything that had just happened felt so surreal. I needed to verify that I hadn't hallucinated the whole interchange.

"I did," he responded, wiping off my face with his shirtsleeve.

I nodded, breathing heavily. "So I wasn't dreaming?" My blades vanished as the jewel from the elven crown made its way up my body and into my forehead where it stopped next to the first two pieces.

"Nope. I heard him too." Troy caressed my skin where the jewel landed. "That's the craziest thing I've ever seen."

At his closeness, my skin tingled and my desire for him grew. "Imagine how it feels." I smirked, wrapping my arms around his neck. "Thank you for coming with me."

"I wouldn't miss it. You're amazing." He lowered his head to kiss me.

I stood on the tips of my toes to meet him. His mouth on mine sent fireworks through my stomach. Fiery hunger. Desire and need shot through me. I let my fingers tangle in his hair, desperate for us to be even closer. He growled, and his skin rippled from human to the smooth scales of his dragon form. "Troy," I whispered against his lips.

"I know, Jazzy Jazz. But not here. Let's get you home and cleaned up." He kissed my cheek.

"And you," I added, wiping at the dirt on his face, still fighting against the want fluttering over me. Over the last ten days, our making out had become more and more needy. I wanted all of him. And I wanted his blood even more, but I would be patient for a little longer.

OceanofPDF.com

CHRISTOPHER

IN THE GARGOYLE REALM, I was given a necklace by Sharra's sister, Silindra.

She wasn't actually there, and I didn't know how it worked exactly, but she gave me the necklace. All I had to do was think of where I wanted to go and it would take me there.

It was tucked under my shirt, and I pulled it out.

Wrapping my fingers around it, I thought of the house in Salem, Massachusetts where my mom grew up.

When we arrived, I sighed. It looked the same as when I left it, expect maybe a little more dust. The house was empty, not even the gray cat, Gatsby wandered the rooms. It felt vacant without him there. Troy escorted me to my bedroom door before going into the bathroom to get cleaned up.

I showered, allowing the hot water to rinse away the stress that clung to me from the troll realm. My interchange with the assassin still ran through my mind.

I didn't know whether I should believe him or not. Part of me felt like it was too easy. None of the other assassins had offered so much as a hint as to where to find the next piece, which is why it had taken me so long to find them.

The assassin said he believed in my cause, but what did that even mean?

Why would he just blurt the next location, especially when he and the others were sworn to protect the crown and had done so for thousands of years?

With time running out, and the darkness almost upon us, I couldn't afford to ignore what he said.

If the jewel wasn't where the assassin said it would be, then I'd move on.

But it would be crazy not to check.

That meant our next stop would be in France. I didn't know much about the country, but Pops would.

I'd ask him for help.

Maybe he'd go with Troy and me.

After what Laeddin showed me, I knew he was from France.

That he'd been in love with Joan of Arc.

What I'd learned of his story surprised me, but in a good way.

He'd had a life. Even then, Sharra had been around, trying to mess with the human realm. She had quite the fixation and as I finished my shower, I debated how I could use that to my advantage.

Shutting off the water, I put my hair in a towel and slid into a terrycloth bathrobe. Steam filled the bathroom and fogged up the mirror. I wiped some condensation away and stifled a scream.

"What the - " Whipping around, I glared at Christopher, but was actually happy to see him. He stood there casually as if he showed up in my bathroom every day, which he didn't.

"What are you doing in here?" I hissed, tying the robe's belt in a quick bow.

"Checking on you." He crossed his arms, his face contorted with worry.

The time I spent in the Wasteland during the death dream or whatever it was came flooding back. Without doubt, Christopher had saved me. Again. His blood and his words were exactly what I needed to hear and had pulled me out of the Wasteland and brought me back to the land of the living. He'd told me to climb off my high horse and quit thinking the world revolved around me. I smiled at the memory.

"What's going on in that pretty head of yours?"

"Just that if I wasn't wearing a towel, I would hug you." I glanced down at my bare feet as feelings of gratefulness for the Hunter fluttered around in my veins.

"For what?" He gave me a cheeky grin since he obviously knew what I meant.

"You know what," I responded, and smiled. "Thank you. I wouldn't be here if it weren't for you."

Christopher became serious. "It's my pleasure. Really." He swallowed, looking slightly uncomfortable.

"Well I appreciate it as well as all you've done for me." I touched his arm, and caught a whiff of his blood. My breathing became ragged as my teeth pressed against the inside of my mouth. It'd been too long since I fed.

He immediately understood. "Right now I know you need my blood," he said matter-of-factly, his lips twitching as he tried not to smile.

He wasn't wrong. I did need his blood. Desperately. But he shouldn't just show up in my bathroom whenever he wanted to. "Not now."

"If not now, then when? Unless you want me to go down and wait with Troy?" He waited for my answer. "He and I could chat about things." He raised an eyebrow.

"No." I leaned against the bathroom door. I hated that he was right. It made me feel dirty, like I wasn't being faithful to Troy. "It's just, sometimes you show up at the worst times." I glanced at his neck beneath the white button-down shirt. It occurred to me that he wore white a lot. I wondered why, but didn't think on it too long.

He bowed stiffly. "Sorry, princess. I can return another time."

"I'd appre - " I paused, taking a deep breath. I cared for Christopher. I wanted him to find happiness, and I did need his blood, but that didn't change the fact that Christopher needed boundaries.

"What?" He came close, a smirk lifting his lips. My mouth watered at the scent of his blood. Desperate, I threw all caution out the window and sank my fangs into his neck before I could give it a second thought. His blood burst into my mouth like the juice from a ripe strawberry. I moaned with immediate relief. The more I drank, the better I felt. Like a wilted flower receiving water, my insides come alive. "There you go. That's it, Jasmine."

I clung to his shoulders, holding him close, until it registered that he'd put his arms around my waist and buried his face in the crook of my neck. Was he going to drink from me? I didn't want that. It felt too intimate. And I knew Christopher still believed he and I were meant to be together, that it was destiny; but I didn't feel that way about him. In truth, I wouldn't let myself feel anything but friendship for the Hunter. First, because Christopher was really old, like born in the sixties, I think. The biggest reason though? I loved Troy. Only him, and no one else. Not ever.

Unfortunately, I couldn't stop drinking from Christopher. Not if I wanted to defeat Sharra. My vampire powers were too important to lose right now. Torn between need and guilt, I took several more gulps before shoving him away.

Surprised, Christopher fell against the sink, causing my hairbrush to clatter to the floor. Quick as lightning, he righted himself and smiled. "You're feeling better." He adjusted his collar and ran a hand through his hair.

Embarrassment turned my cheeks hot. "Yes. I am, thank you." I meant it. I really appreciated him and all he did for me. Without his blood, I would've been just another mortal. He allowed me to tap into my vampire magic.

"Are you all right, Jazz?" Troy asked from the other side of the door.

"Um, yes." I put a finger to my lips in an effort to keep Christopher quiet.

He smiled, and put a pretend lock on his lips before throwing away the invisible key.

I shook my head. "I'm fine. I just dropped my brush." To Christopher I mouthed, "Please leave."

Christopher bowed again. "Of course." He vanished before I could blink.

I heaved a breath; grateful he was gone, but truthfully, I was sad too. Was there a way I could help him? After everything he'd done for me, I really wanted to.

Troy spoke through the door again. "Okay. Just checking. You about finished?"

Guilt permeated through me, even though I had nothing to feel bad about. Still, I knew I needed to tell Troy about drinking Christopher's blood. I didn't know how to bring it up though. "Yeah, I'll be just a few more minutes."

"Sweet. I'll be downstairs making a sandwich. A man-dragon's gotta eat," he said, teasingly, and I heard him chuckle at his own silliness.

I laughed. It was impossible to stay gloomy when Troy was around. "True. Be down soon." I listened to his footfalls getting farther away. My bedroom door closed. I relaxed my shoulders, forcing the guilt away. My remorse wouldn't do either of us any good anyway. Not right now. We still had so much work to do.

I brushed my hair, dried it, and put it up in a ponytail. Then dressed in black skinny jeans, a light green tee shirt and my black boots. I put the necklace Silindra gave me over my head and tucked it beneath my shirt.

A quick glance out my mom's old bedroom window revealed how dark it had become outside, even at one o'clock in the afternoon. There wasn't much time left. I sat on the bed, trying hard not to feel defeated as I tied my shoes. I missed my mom and dad. I missed Laeddin. I even missed Sabrina.

She and I had been best friends since I could remember. When I left my realm, I left her behind. It hadn't been kind and I apologized, but I still wished she could be with me. Except it wasn't possible. She had work and her own life. Last I heard, she'd fallen for a handsome pixilette, and they were serious.

Like the darkness, the Akuma grew in numbers daily. Scientists and doctors were stumped about the Akuma's origination, calling it the zombie virus. They didn't even know how it was transferred, which had the whole country on edge. Doctors worked tirelessly to find the cause, but so far they hadn't been able to discover an answer or a cure. Nor would they ever. Science couldn't explain or cure a magical disease.

And it wasn't like I could tell them the disease was actually evil magic, inflicted upon them by a wicked queen. Nor would it do me any good to tell them that all the science in the world couldn't reverse the effects. The only way to treat the Akuma was to destroy Sharra and that rested on me.

It was horrifying, watching families suffer, especially once the government began shooting the Akuma on site.

Martial law became more strictly imposed the darker it got. Salem, Massachusetts was no exception. Curfews were enforced as well. Military tanks and military trucks roamed the streets night and day. Ongoing gunfire had become mundane and could be heard regularly. I didn't want to think about the reason.

It broke my heart. I knew I'd gotten the world into this mess, and I was determined to get us out. The best way to do that was to stay strong. That meant I needed Christopher's blood.

I really needed it, I told myself, wiping at a wayward tear.

Then cleared my throat, pushing down all of my feelings. Without Christopher's blood I would be nothing. I wouldn't be ashamed of doing what needed to be done. I wouldn't!

The way the Akuma moved reminded me of living marionettes, their every effort controlled by Sharra. They did her bidding, and that meant they didn't do anyone any good. I knew the Akuma only sought out those with a lot of darkness in them, but I still worried for Pops, Jesse, and the others, though they'd assured me they could take care of themselves. I forced myself to believe them since I had my own part to play. That meant finding the remaining pieces of the crown. If the assassin was telling the truth, then I needed to go to France.

Troy would go with me. There was no leaving him behind. Not that I wanted to. I needed him as well. When he was around I felt more confident. He truly inspired me to be my best self.

A horn honked and I went to the window. Gatsby sprang from the lowest tree branch and landed on the grassy ground below. His tail flicked back and forth before he glanced up. Eyes luminescent with lamplight zoned in on me. I waved. "Hey, Gatsby."

He stuck his nose in the air and proceeded to scamper away. I knew Gatsby was the dragon Abernathy, but truly in cat form a different part of his personality was most prevalent.

"Rude," I whispered, wondering why he was upset. Before I left to get the third piece of the crown, he'd been around a lot more. I had a feeling it had to do with Troy. He seemed to bounce between irritation and awe when it came to my dragon boyfriend. It was entertaining to watch them together.

I opened the door just as Troy was about to knock. His fist rapped against my forehead. "Ouch," I said with a chuckle as I grabbed his hand and pulled him down so I could kiss him. It didn't matter that he was half dragon. I was full vampire. An Original, and that made me extra, super strong.

"Sorry." He smiled when we broke apart.

My insides melted. I loved his smile. "Kiss me again," I said, standing on my tiptoes. Then I noticed he held something in his free hand.

OceanofPDF.com

BLOOD-FLAVORED CAKE

IT WAS a cake with lit candles on top. Eighteen fiery reminders that I had my birthday in the gargoyle realm. "What's this?" Had he gone out and got me a cake? It looked that way.

"A woman needs a cake for her eighteenth birthday, even if it is a little late." He pressed his lips to mine softly.

"Honestly, I'd rather have other things," I said. "Especially since I don't eat cake."

"Other things are nice." He wriggled his eyebrows, making me laugh. "But this is a special cake made with special magic from the realm of Sharra."

"What?" I went to stick a finger in the frosting, but he held it out of my way.

"Not until I sing and you blow out the candles." He walked by, sitting on my bed and placed the cake in the center.

"You're going to sing to me?" I couldn't help but remember my actual birthday. Troy and I had spent a long time kissing, and kissing some more. It'd been one of the best days of my life. I couldn't have asked for a better present and had told him as much. So, the fact that he went to Sharra and had the cooks there prepare a special blood-flavored cake (so not gross for a vampire like me) was amazing. Troy really was special. I didn't know if I deserved him.

"Yes, I am." He lifted his chin, trying to act cool, but it was sweet to see that he was a little embarrassed.

I plopped down on the other side of my cake causing the candles to dance and flicker. "This is going to be good." I rubbed my hands together.

He cleared his throat. Sat up straight. Brushed some hair off his face. Smiled. "Happy birthday to you," he sang, his voice low and smooth, but the man had perfect pitch. He paused.

"Wow," I said, trying to calm the excited butterflies dancing in my belly.

He winked, giving me a sultry look. "Right?"

"Happy birthday to you. Happy birthday, dear Ja-azz." He held out the last note before continuing. "Happy birthday to you."

My heart raced. I hadn't thought Troy could get any more amazing, but here he was singing to me, while looking and sounding like a rock star. I finally understood why women would talk about going gaga over a guy.

"Make a wish and blow out your candles." He held up the cake between us.

I closed my eyes and thought of Troy, hoping we would always be together, but I didn't make a wish. After everything that happened with the genie and my wishes, I didn't want to go there. Finally, with eyes open, I blew.

He handed the cake to me. "What did you wish for?"

"It's a secret," I said, dipping a finger into the frosting and tasting.

He watched me as though he wished I was tasting him. "I bet I can guess," he said and smirked, making his gorgeous mouth all the more kissable.

I put the cake on the bedside table and climbed onto his lap. "I won't tell you, but I can show you."

"I like the sound of that." He caressed my cheek.

I wrapped my arms around his neck, pressing my lips to each side of his mouth.

"You teasing me?" he asked, his voice growly before he took hold of my face and pressed his lips to mine.

For the next several minutes we were tangled up in each other and I forgot the dreadfulness happening around us. I needed this, needed his hope. What would I do if I ever lost him?

He took hold of my long hair and wrapped it around his hand, pulling my head back, exposing my neck. I watched his warm eyes flicker from my mouth to my eyes and land on my neck. He wouldn't bite me - at least not to drink from me. He didn't drink blood. But I loved that he focused on my neck. It was extra sensitive, especially when it was him. "What was your wish, Jazz?" He rolled us so we were sitting once again.

"No more wishes for me," I admitted, reaching over and taking another taste of the cake. It was really yummy.

He took my free hand, kissing each knuckle. "I guess that makes sense." He dragged his teeth along my neck and I shivered. "How's the cake?"

I worked to focus. "I'm surprised you remembered unicorn blood is my favorite," I said, savoring the frosting.

He kissed my neck, his warm lips lingering, obviously pleased I was happy. "So you like it?"

"Yes," I said, and swallowed. Not really thinking about the cake. But I tried. "It's delicious. Thank you." I took another taste of the frosting, feeling the healing power of its magic fill me. "Want a bite?" I asked.

He sat back, giving me a look that said he'd rather die than taste the blood. "I'm going to pass, but thanks for the offer." He wrinkled his nose.

I laughed and picked up the cake, focusing on it. "Fine." I ate the whole thing and didn't feel the least bit ashamed.

"So, when do you want to leave?" he asked as I used my finger to scoop up the last of the frosting from the plate.

With a sigh I faced him. The reality of his words struck me hard and all my happiness evaporated. I didn't want to leave. I didn't know if I could do it. My deepest fear came out. "What if I can't beat her? What if I lose?" I didn't mind letting him see my insecurity. I knew he would say the right things to help me defeat it.

As expected, he gave me a soft look. My heart surged with joy as I watched him. "You can. I know you can. You're everything she isn't. Kind. Generous. Caring. That's why you'll win. You stand for all that is good. She only cares for power and herself." I tried to interrupt, but he placed a finger tenderly over my mouth. "Sharra may have your wings, but that doesn't mean she's you. Not by a freaking long shot."

"Troy." I spoke his name gently.

"I mean it." He wrapped me in a hug.

I breathed him in, clinging to him as I enjoyed his nearness, wishing we could go off somewhere, just the two of us, and forget about all that was happening around us. But that would be selfish. I'd thought only of myself when I wished away my wings. It was my fault all of this happened - the darkness, the Akuma, all of it. The time for selfishness was over. I wasn't that person anymore. I cared about what happened to the people around me, even those I didn't know. That was a new feeling for me. And I realized something. It was important to care about the world because it was my world too.

"Did you need more blood?" he asked, his lips against my neck.

I wasn't thirsty. Thanks to Christopher and the unicorn blood cake, I would be good for a while. But I wanted Troy's blood just for the sheer pleasure. The scent was heady and I was almost delirious from his question. My fangs grew and pressed against my lips.

"My blood is yours, Jazz," he continued, kissing my skin.

My hands trailed up to his neck and twisted lightly in his hair as I relished the feeling of his warm mouth.

"You smell good," he said. "What is that? Tango Tangerine?" He brushed his nose along my collarbone.

That pushed me over the edge and I sank my fangs into the vein on his neck. His body tensed a moment when my teeth pricked his skin, but he quickly relaxed. Wrapped me in his arms and pulled me against him. Troy's blood was amazing. Filled with copper and strength, and magic, and fire, and brimstone, and love, and sweetness, and more love. Wow! The love I tasted in his blood was so strong it made my heart ache with happiness.

Tears sprang into my eyes and I pulled away. "Troy." I cupped his face and turned him to me. His kind eyes were alight with fire. "I love you so much," I said, placing a gentle kiss on his lips.

"And I love you, Jazz." He kissed me back. Then kissed each of the gems on my forehead. "I'm here for you forever, if you'll have me."

Tears spilled onto my cheeks. I didn't know why I was crying, except that I felt so happy and it seemed wrong amidst all the adversity we faced - I faced. I had so much yet to accomplish and no idea what I was doing.

Troy brushed away my tears with his thumbs. "Would it be awful if I asked you to marry me?"

I leaned back, shocked, and searched his eyes to see whether he was joking. He wasn't. "That wouldn't be awful at all." It didn't matter that we were so young or that the rest of the world would think we were nuts. Especially my mom and dad. In fact, they might kill Troy if they found out. And Pops? What would he do to Troy? I didn't want to think about it. Because what they thought didn't matter. All I wanted to do was take this amazing moment and focus on Troy.

"Well then, Jasmine, Princess of Sharra, will you make me the happiest person on Earth and become my wife?" His features were focused on my eyes, waiting to see what I would say. He placed his hands on my waist and slid me closer to him.

At his touch, my body ignited. "Yes, Troy. Yes. Of course I will." I hugged him. "Yes. Yes. Yes," I said into his hair as I trailed kisses along his cheek to his mouth. His soft lips captured mine and held me there. But that lasted only a minute until his mouth became urgent. Hungry. He traced my lips with his tongue. My mouth opened and he dove in. We tasted each other, so together I didn't know where I ended and he began.

Troy groaned, wrapping his arms around me, holding me so close it was like we were one. My hands found the ends of his shirt and I lifted it, wanting to feel his body next to mine. Beyond the delicious scent of his blood, I smelled coconut.

OceanofPDF.com

SENSE OF DREAD

"YOUNG LOVE. The two of you are sweet."

Her voice was sarcastic and instantly recognizable. Sharra.

My body vibrated with anger, outrage, and fear.

How dare she come into my room at my happiest moment?

"Get out!" I climbed off Troy. "Unless you've come to return my mom and dad, leave." I lunged forward and got in her face, completely out of control in my fury.

"Jasmine." She wore a long black dress and carried her staff with the orb on the end. Her face was calm, but her eyes sparked with interest when they fell on the gems in my forehead. "You've collected three already. Good. That's very good." Her wicked chuckle chilled me to the bone. My anger died, replaced by a growing sense of dread. "The world will be completely encompassed in darkness soon and I want that elven crown. With it, no one will ever be able to stop me."

I sucked in a large gulp of air. She obviously didn't think I was any sort of threat. That hurt, but it was also understandable. I hadn't been a formidable opponent so far.

"I will never give you the crown," I said, internally vowing to keep it from her whatever the cost. I knew I wouldn't be able to stop her. Not at this point. I was too weak, too insignificant. I stepped back, holding out my hand for Troy, grateful I wasn't alone. He stood beside me, his body a wall of strength and protection as it rippled back and forth between his human and dragon form. "When I collect all the pieces, I'll defeat you. I swear it!" I meant every word too. I had to win. Everyone was counting on me.

She hooted. "No, my dear, when you have them all, I will take them from you and use them to rule this and every realm. All creatures will be at mine to command." Her eyes glinted and her brow scrunched as she focused on me. "You can give me the first three now." As she spoke, she brought her staff forward and pointed it at me.

Troy was suddenly in front of me. "You will leave now or have me to contend with, Sharra." His skin rippled again and I thought he might transform into his dragon form right then and there.

"There's no need for such commotion," she responded.

I sensed amusement from her, not fear. In that moment I knew she was toying with us.

"Get out of this house!" Troy rushed her, taking her by the neck. He lifted her off the ground with ease. Immediately her wings - my wings - stretched out and flapped against the air. Seeing them on her back, even though I'd seen them before, knocked the wind out of me.

I wanted to tear them from her body. They were mine.

"I'll do no such thing." She tapped him with her the orb end of her staff and Troy released her. He was breathing heavily and fell to my knees.

"Troy." I ran to him.

He saw my distress and tried to smile, though he wasn't able to move his body. "I'm here."

I nodded, tears pushing against the backs of my eyes. "Leave," I said again, wishing I didn't sound so weak. "What do you want?" I added, my voice cracking.

"I told you. I want the crown, Jasmine." Her extremely beautiful face remained serene. As I studied her I noticed she looked both old and young at once, like marble. "And I think in the not too distant future you will give it to me."

"I will not," I said, holding Troy's head in my lap, wishing I could destroy Sharra and end all of this.

Sharra watched Troy and me. "Your love, though new is very strong. I can sense it all around you." Her lips curved up in a vile grin. "It's so exhilarating in the beginning, but over time that feeling will die."

"Get out - " Troy tried to speak.

"I am leaving," she said. But something about the way she said it set me on edge. "The crown is worthless unless all of the pieces are collected. I'll let you gather them and when you're done, you will come to me and we will make a trade. Your mom and dad - " She paused, considering Troy. "And Troy for the crown." As she spoke, she moved her staff. Dark blue light shot from it and went into Troy.

In an instant, he was gone.

I screamed, pressing my hands to my chest. "No!" I fought to stay upright. Pain slashed through my insides, shredding me as tears blurred my vision. A horrible sound tore my throat.

Not Troy too.

"Please!" I begged. "No. Bring him back. Please." I felt like I wanted to die, to curl up into a ball and never move again, but a part of me kept fighting. I needed to try and keep my wits about me, at least for now. When she was gone I could wallow, but not while the she stood so smugly in front of me.

"You'll give me anything if I return him. I know this. That is why it will be a fair trade." She walked over to the wall that held pictures of my mom and her friends. Touched several before scorching them with the end of her staff.

The smell of burning paper filled the air. Ignoring it, I thought about what she said. Would I do anything to have Troy back? Yes. Yes, I would. And I would do anything for my mom, dad, and Laeddin too.

Before I could say anything, Sharra went on, "Of course you will. Your love for Troy is incredibly rare. You'll want to hold on to that for as long as you can."

I did want to hold on to it. Desperately. Without him, it felt like my heart was ripped out. That she'd taken it as well.

"So, you'll do as I say. You'll collect the remaining pieces and then you'll come to me."

I shook my head, too full of despair for words. I'd made a similar trade with her to save Laeddin's life, and look where it got me. Gotten all of us. I couldn't make the same mistake again. "I won't. I can't. The world doesn't deserve what you're doing to it."

"The darkness? The Akuma? This world is begging for all of it and more. Besides, who do you think I am? A Saint. With a kind nature?" She clucked her tongue irritably. "I have returned to exact my revenge. Snow White, your mother took everything from me. For years, I suffered, waiting for my chance. As you grew, I realized the best way to hurt her was to hurt you. And Snow is hurting. Oh yes. I revel in her pain. Arthur enjoys torturing her and I enjoy letting him. Snow's pain feeds me and fuels my aim even further."

"Please," I said again, even though I knew it was pointless. I needed to stop her, but I didn't know how.

She sighed. "I'm almost sad I've taken this path instead of just destroying you years ago." She stood up straight. "If you don't collect all of the pieces, it'll be of no matter to me. The darkness will consume you as well as those you love, along with the rest of the world, and I will win anyway." An oily grin spread across her face. "I don't know if you've noticed yet, but the darkness is more than just a lack of light. I've infused it with sadness, with depression, pain, torment, and gloom. Those who come in contact with it have their personal pains and sorrows intensified until they become unbearable. By the time all realms are covered, there will be wailing and wallowing and such grief. All happiness will be gone. In their misery I'll rise up and provide them with hope. They will look to me as a goddess, as their savior."

Tears streamed down my face. Had I felt the effects of the darkness? I was sure I had. The hurt within felt like it would become a permanent friend.

"And one other piece of information you might want to know. Your genie, the great Laeddin of the Lamp?"

I looked up at the mention of him. Had she killed him?

"I tried to take him in the gargoyle realm, but he possesses all of his powers, making it impossible to hold him. He's gone. Probably back in his lamp, shut away from the world. And good riddance, I say." She moved closer as her words sank in. "From the look on your face, you haven't seen him. I guess he cared less for you than we both thought."

Another level of anguish ripped through me. If Laeddin wasn't in her clutches, then where was he? Why hadn't he returned to me? I knew the answer. He was free. No longer beholden to anyone. Why would he return? He only saw me as a willful child with little to offer.

Sharra's glee was transcendent. "Not to worry, my dear. If you ask it of me, I will kill you in the end to put you out of your misery. Until then - " She disappeared in a puff of dark blue smoke.

OceanofPDF.com

I HAD POWER

I DON'T KNOW how long I lay on the floor. At some point, I must've passed out. While unconscious, I dreamed of flying on Abernathy's back. More than once he peered back at me with his gigantic golden head. He seemed disappointed. But I didn't care. I didn't blame him either. I was disappointed in myself too. I allowed Troy to be taken. It was my fault. Again. What would Pops say? And Jesse? He was Troy's brother and his best friend. He would be devastated.

Occasionally, I heard Abernathy speaking. Though none of his words made any sense.

The dragon said into my mind: She's afraid of you. And she should be. You don't need to destroy her to get back your wings, vampire. All you need is to believe you deserve them more than she does. Because you do, Jasmine. They're yours - a part of you.

His words reminded me of something from a fairy tale or a nursery rhyme.

But they also made no sense.

Believing is something wasn't going to give me back my wings.

The dragon went on: You possess the power from all seven magics. Don't you realize how powerful you are? There's a way to find your parents, to find Troy.

When Abernathy spoke Troy's name, that finally broke through my haze of misery and I began to listen.

Abernathy said: Did you forget your father's blood contains all seven magics? And since you are an Original Vampire, you can use that power to find him. If you listen hard enough, you can hear it call you.

I struggled to believe but clung to that idea.

It wasn't a bad one.

I still needed to get the other two pieces of the crown first. It wouldn't do any good to find my dad and the others and then not be able to protect them.

The enormous golden dragon read my mind and responded in kind: The crown can only amplify whatever powers you already possess. No more. Laeddin was right, you can destroy her with its power, but only if you trust that you already possess it.

I knew I had power.

I was strong, fast, and able to see and hear better than any other creature on the planet.

I was a vampire. But there was more.

I hadn't ever experimented with that part of me, but I knew it was the reason I drank blood from each of the creatures representing the seven magics.

If what Abernathy was saying were true, then I might not have enough strength to destroy Sharra, even with the crown.

Except for the unicorn blood Troy had given me, and Troy and Christopher, I hadn't drunk from all seven magics in months.

Abernathy's voice inside my mind said: You need to dig deep, vampire. Find the confidence within you. BELIEVE THAT YOU CAN WIN. He roared, filling the sky with fire, then went on: It's the only way to defeat her.

Heat beat against my body, even as the wind whipped against my hair.

After a while, Abernathy's form dissipated and I found myself alone on an extra soft bed in a room I didn't recognize. As I came to, I knew that however Abernathy and I communicated, it wasn't a dream. I'd been taken away from my home. I fought to open my eyes, to discover where he brought me, but my mind wasn't ready. Each time I thought I might be strong enough, a picture of Sharra taking Troy entered my thoughts, and I shrank back into myself. It was as though all my courage and strength had disappeared with him. I couldn't do this without Troy. I just couldn't.

"Come on, Jasmine. The time has come for you to awaken." The voice wasn't Abernathy's, but it was familiar. It zinged through my consciousness. I didn't want to wake up because doing so meant I had to deal with my problems. The pain and sorrow hurt too much and I didn't want to witness life carrying on without him in it. "Thanks to the blasted dragon, we have a lot of work to do."

As he spoke, he came closer. I inhaled, and knew exactly who'd come. Christopher. The Hunter. Had Abernathy brought him too? It was a little strange and more than a little creepy that the Hunter always seemed to know where I was. Then I remembered the bear on the bracelet I always wore. He told me he would always be able to find me.

"Jasmine." Christopher's voice boomed with command.

"Fine," I whispered and opened my eyes.

"That a girl." He sat on the edge of the bed and leaned in close. His face was lined with worry. "You're stronger than you think, you know."

I'd heard that before. Sadly, I still didn't believe it. But I hoisted myself into the sitting position and crossed my arms. "Where am I?"

The room was dark, the single window revealing the night sky. The walls were wallpapered in light and dark blue garden roses. Heavy furniture painted cream with gold filigree accents adorned the room.

"You're in a small but luxurious room." He paused and smiled bracingly. "Luxurious for the time, anyway. But we are in a chateau." There was something odd about the way he stared at me as though he wasn't telling me everything.

"What? Is it the Château de Chinon, then?" That would be nice. To be exactly where I needed to be.

"More important than the where we are is the when." He went to the window.

"What do you mean?" I pushed the light blue comforter off my legs and stood, going to the window. "Just tell me everything, please." I shoved back the heavy drapes. More stars than I'd ever seen in my life shone brightly against the darkness. In the distance was the sound of the sea.

"We are in France, so right country," he said, his smile gone as he stood beside me.

"But," I encouraged. Outside, I noticed several small huts and that the ground wasn't paved but dirt. My pulse sped up.

"We are in the year fourteen hundred and twenty-eight." Christopher sounded more perturbed than impressed. "Thanks to Abernathy," he added with a huff.

I raised an eyebrow, but didn't respond. Abernathy had a way of garnering that reaction from most everyone. Except my mom. She liked the ancient creature, including all of his peculiar behaviors, and only had good things to say about him.

My opinion of him was still up in the air. "I've been here before," I said, but was shocked Abernathy could time travel. It was surprise enough when Laeddin took us back in time. But I had a sudden thought. If time travel was possible, why not just go back in time and kill Sharra? That seemed brutal, but doing so would solve all of the problems. I caught my breath at that line of thinking and then shook my head. If Sharra were dead then Laeddin never would've become a genie. If Sharra were dead, my mom never would've become a vampire. Which meant, if Sharra were dead, I never would've been born.

"Oh?" That surprised Christopher and he crossed his arms.

"Laeddin brought me here so I could learn about how Pops became a vampire and also to learn more about Sharra."

He watched me, his mouth open. "You're kidding?" he finally asked.

"Nope. I just didn't think anyone but Laeddin could time travel. Dragons can too then." It was a statement and I was shocked.

"Apparently so. The dragon knows so much more than we can even imagine." He shook his head. "His little claw contains more power than the rest of us have in our entire bodies." He moved away. "That's why I have a hard time liking him. He could save us all right now and this whole thing would be over, but either he's too lazy or he just doesn't care enough to help."

The Hunter's words rang true. "Why did he bring us here?" I crossed my arms trying to hold back the nervousness raging through my body. The fifteenth century wasn't a great time to be alive.

"He said it was my job to train you, feed you, and keep you safe. Not that I mind. That's what I'm here for, but I didn't know we'd go back in time." He walked over to the door, opened it, and peeked out. "Abernathy told me this chateau used to belong to a Nicolas and Lorette Vouges. They had two children, Pierre and Jessette as well as a title and prestige. They disappeared a while ago, leaving the place unused. We are supposed to be their relatives, cousins to Nicolas Vouges. We are to say we were asked to stop by and make sure the place is still accommodating. Abernathy set us up so we can stay until we've located what we need."

He was talking about the crown. I had wondered how I would get to the piece without Laeddin using his magic to pop us wherever we needed to be. "Are we close to the crown piece then?" I faced Christopher, my vampire vision having no trouble seeing. But it occurred to me there were no light bulbs in 1428.

"Not exactly. We are a week's journey from the Chateau de Chinon, in the village of Domremy." He paused and went over to a chair, sitting heavily in it. "There's more."

I sat beside him as understanding dawned on me. This was the town were Adam lived. Abernathy wanted Adam to help us. "So we are here for Pops - Adam. We are to enlist his help?"

"That's right." He studied me. "Did Adam meet you when you came back here the first time?"

I shook my head, not wanting to tell him that I was inside Joanna's mind while Laeddin was inside Adam's. "No, he didn't know I was here." I got to my feet and ran to the door, suddenly excited for the chance to speak with him before he was the vampire hunter or even my grandfather. If anyone could help get us to where we needed to go, it was Professor Pops.

Christopher was immediately beside me. "Not yet, Jasmine. It's the middle of the night. You'll scare the people. Remember, we need to blend in." He patted my arm.

"Yeah, that makes sense, I guess." I went back to my chair. "So, what should we do now?"

"Well, I don't know about you, but I could really use a drink." He glanced at my neck.

My stomach quivered. The idea of drinking more of his blood sounded good. I knew it would make me feel better, but after drinking Troy's, it was like no other blood mattered. "I'm really not that hungry," I said.

"I am though." He glanced at my neck again and I finally understood.

"You need to feed?"

"Yes." He only seemed slightly embarrassed. "I hate to impose, but it would be most helpful."

I went over to the bed and sat. "Sure." I held out my wrist.

He sat beside me. Smiled. Brushed some hair off my shoulder. "I'd like to feed from your neck. The blood is best from there."

My first instinct was to say no, but he continued, "And that way you can feed from my neck as well."

I studied him, searching for any mischievousness on his part. Thankfully I didn't see any. But we could easily feed from each other's wrists. "It's just - "

"Please," Christopher asked again.

"Sure. I guess."

He scooted closer, leaned in and sank his teeth into my neck. I relaxed into him, drinking from his neck as well. It was true. The blood did taste better from the vein at his neck. It was like all of the magics rolled into one - sweet, satisfying, amazing and beyond delicious. Still, his blood wasn't as good as Troy's. Probably because his blood was infused with his love for me, and for that reason his blood would always taste better than anything else.

I knew some would think what Christopher and I did was sensual, but my heart, body, and soul were with Troy, wherever he might be. Dragon boy was my everything, and that would never change.

But I was a vampire and I needed blood. The more I drank the stronger I would be. This was a necessary part of what I was. The sooner I accepted it, the better off I would be. It was too bad I hadn't figured out the importance of loving one's self months ago. Then the world wouldn't be covered in darkness.

OceanofPDF.com

FIFTEENTH CENTURY

THE NEXT MORNING I found some clothes. A long muslin dress in burgundy with embroidered trim around the collar and along the edge of the hem.

It had a gold belt, and white sleeves. It was a little itchy, but the underdress helped.

The shoes were plain and brown. I left my hair down, but braided a piece from each side and pinned it back. I thought I looked very fifteen-century France.

"You look lovely," Christopher said, when I came out of my room. "It's a little chilly outside though. I recommend this be added to your outfit." He held out a dark wool cape with a hood attached. "Let me help you put this on."

"Thanks." I turned and he slipped it over my shoulders.

When I faced him I noticed his clothing. He wore a cream shirt with rough material. A chocolate brown vest buttoned up tight over the top. Dark pants and brown boots on the bottom half. His belt matched his boots. He also had on a cape. His clothes brought back a memory from when I was younger. I'd seen him looking almost exactly like this. My heart filled with unexpected warmth and I wondered where the memory came from.

I also remembered I considered him a friend back then. It seemed he'd always been around for me, even when I didn't realize it or even want his presence. Though I knew he considered me more than a friend recently. He believed we were meant to be together in a different way. But I would make sure he realized that would never happen. It couldn't. My heart belonged to someone else and it always would. "You look nice, too," I said, patting him on the chest.

He grinned, touching a finger to my forehead. "How are we going to explain the jewels on your forehead?" He touched each one softly.

I hadn't thought about it. In truth, I'd forgotten about them. I went to a mirror and glanced at them. There wouldn't be any good explanation. I went to the kitchen and began opening cupboards and drawers, an idea forming.

"What are you doing?"

"Help me find some scissors or at least something I can use to give myself bangs."

"You're going to cut your hair?" He was shocked.

"Sure, why not?" I went dug through some spools of thread.

"Good idea." He came over to help me.

I found a pair at the back of the thread drawer. They were crude and didn't look very sharp, but they would do. I took a chunk of hair and brushed it in front of my eyes.

"Wait. Allow me." He took the scissors. I thought about telling him I didn't need his help, but decided to let him.

"I'm not sure it'll work," I said. In the past I cut my hair and it grew right back, but that was when I had my wings. It might be different now. It wouldn't hurt to try.

Christopher cut through my hair, letting it fall to the floor. "There."

We waited a moment to see if it would grow back, but it didn't. My hair covered the jewels. I turned back and forth, studying my reflection. "What do you think?"

"Still beautiful." He leaned down and kissed my forehead.

I smiled. "Good."

Then he took my hand. "Come on, let's go meet your grandfather."

We went to the door, but before he opened it, I stopped him. "One thing has been bothering me since you saved me in the Wasteland."

"What's that?"

"How did you find me?" I knew the wooden bear he'd carved and that I wore allowed him to track me, but it surprised me he could do it subconsciously too.

"Hmmm, that's difficult to explain and will take some time."

"A story for another day?"

"Exactly."

"Fine." I opened the door.

As soon as we stepped outside, I paused. Being back here in the flesh and not just in Joanna's mind was different. Even the scenery had me dazed. One word could describe the surroundings and that was dreary. Small houses with thatched roofs spotted the countryside. Most had simple fences around them to keep their animals, like chickens and goats contained. They also had areas tilled for gardens.

Smoke spindled into the sky from the tops of the houses. All around was very little color, mostly just shades of brown. I felt slightly overdressed wearing a burgundy gown. It seemed too colorful and decorated for such a drab place.

Beneath us was nothing but hardened dirt filled with ruts, potholes and divots. I guessed horses and the wheels on carriages and wagons had created them. The townsfolk didn't seem to notice, but moved around like they knew where every uneven portion of the road lay. Navigating the irregular footing probably became easy after months and years of living in the same place.

I lifted the edge of my hem to keep it out of the dirt. People passed us by and would look at us and then away. "I don't think they are happy we're here."

"Probably because of where we came from. We are outsiders," Christopher said, taking my hand and placing it in the crook of his arm.

"I guess you're right. But I would think they'd be eager to introduce themselves to their new neighbors."

"Do you speak any French?" Christopher eyes me worriedly.

"Mais oui, Monsieur." I winked.

"Really? How?" He looked at me, astonished. "I thought I'd have to say you were my mute sister and couldn't speak to keep them for calling you a witch." He chuckled as he spoke.

"I speak fluently," I said in a huff, though I wasn't really angry. "My nanny was French. She taught me the language."

"Well good." He was obviously pleasantly surprised. "A happy coincidence," he added.

I shrugged. "Really, Christopher. Is anything a coincidence?"

He raised his eyebrows and smirked. "Probably not." After a moment, he went on. "We need to make an effort with the townspeople. I know when my mother and I first moved to a new place, everyone steered clear of us, until one day, after we'd been there a while, they decided to introduce themselves. They were wary of us just as we were of them."

"Hmmm, I guess." My experience had been much different, probably because I was the daughter of the Vampire Queen. Creatures from all over the land came to see me. They brought me gifts, toys, blood. They made sure I was happy. I'd been spoiled and hadn't even realized it.

"Let's give it a try." Christopher stepped off our front porch and into the street, taking me along with him. As we walked, I thought about my life. Growing up in Sharra hadn't been perfect. I'd been the recipient of unkind looks and harsh words. School at the Seven Magics Academy had been both hard and easy. I was popular, but also something to be attained. That's why Abrea was my dearest friend. And that was part of the reason I wished my wings away. So I could be normal. But the truth I was slowly discovering was that normal didn't really exist. It was a lie people pretended to possess, some even fought to protect it. But we all carried our own uniqueness.

Knowing that, I held my head up as we walked. I put a smile on my face, and said hello to all we passed. Most didn't respond, though some did, openly curious about who we were.

When we reached the center of the village, the smell of rotting fruit tainted the air around us. It was cloying and sweet and stung the inside of my nose. I decided breathing was a waste of time and held my breath. Christopher looked over and nodded. I noted he was doing the same.

"Who are you and what business to you have here?" The question came from a large, surly man. Dark hair lay plastered against his ruddy face. His tan shirt had dirt stains on it and his belt was unbuckled, causing a clanging sound when he walked.

As he spoke, I noticed the villagers back away behind their carts of food and bundles.

The man tucked in his shirt and did up his belt as he waited for Christopher to answer. It was a rather disgusting display and I looked away toward a couple of children playing and giggling around their mother.

Christopher stepped in front of me. "My name is Christopher Prinfois. I am Nicolas Vouges' cousin," he said in excellent French.

"Ansel Grafton," the man said. He carried a mug of something I guessed was like beer since he struggled to stay up right. It was early morning and I wondered if he were already drinking or if he'd been to sleep yet. "The Vouges haven't been around in months. We thought them dead. I had planned to lay claim on the house. Good thing you arrived, I guess." He frowned at Christopher. I could almost see his wheels turning as thoughts on how to get rid of us entered his mind.

"Nope, not dead. Just out of the country, sir." Christopher pushed me further behind him.

I thought about reminding him that I was a vampire. It wouldn't be easy to break me, and especially not by the big lug in front of us. Ansel would get hurt before I even felt it.

But I held my tongue. It wouldn't do to say anything. So, I tried to settle down, but it didn't last. Several of the villagers had begun to gather around. They whispered behind hands, and scowled at us over their pitchforks. Some carried pails or bales of twigs. They were people who worked hard from the moment they woke until just before bed.

"Who's the little chère with you?" Ansel indicated me.

Christopher tried to stay in front, but I stepped out from behind him.

"I'm Jasmine, Princ - "

Ansel lifted an eyebrow at me.

"Prinfois. Nicholas's cousin and my sister," Christopher said, cutting me off.

Ansel moved in for a closer look. "She's quite the piece to look at."

"Yes, she is. And I'm sure if she wasn't already promised to another, she might consider your interest. As it is, sir, she mustn't even formally make your acquaintance."

Ansel blustered, scrutinizing the two of us. "You don't look anything alike." He glanced around at the crowd for agreement.

Some of the townspeople commented. Others went away, while still others studied Christopher and me like we were two-headed dragons.

"I take after my mom," I said.

"And I look like my father," Christopher replied.

I considered what would happen if my dad heard Christopher call him father. It wouldn't be a happy ending, that was for sure.

"Allow me to give you the tour of our village," Ansel said. "It's actually quite grand as far as villages go."

"Great. Thank you. Jasmine, shall we?" Christopher glanced at me, his look suggesting I remain on guard.

"I'd love to have a look around," I said, taking Christopher's arm once again.

Ansel seemed perturbed by Christopher's asking my opinion. But only said, "Very good. Let's be on our way, then."

We walked the main square. The buildings had been built in a literal square. In the center were three pillory stocks. All three had people in them. A small crowd was throwing rotten fruit and vegetables at them. That was where the stench came from.

Ansel noticed me looking at them and smiled. "We've had quite the excitement around here. These three were caught stealing from the meat shop last night." He laughed. "Caused quite a ruckus. But that's what happens to thieves and liars around these parts. Be warned." He gave Christopher another cursory glance.

The guy was a jerk and his french was brusque. I didn't like him at all. "Good thing we aren't thieves or liars then, isn't it?" My words came out clipped. I knew that probably wasn't a good idea, but I couldn't help myself.

Christopher noticed the irritation on my face and patted my hand still tucked into the crook of his arm. "Trust me, she isn't something you'd ever want to try," he said softly to Ansel, but his eyes were on me.

Ansel just laughed. "Right. Anyway, here we have the bakery. Best bread in all of France," he said.

The buildings all looked the same, their walls attached to the next one. They were all made of wood. The only distinguishing marks between buildings were the signs above the doors.

I peeked in on a bakery, admiring the amazing aromas coming from within. It smelled like warmth and comfort. Dozens of crusty bread loaves lined wooden countertops. A light dusting of flour coated every surface. Next to the bakery was the meats shop. Cured meats hung from racks in the front of the store. In back hung dead animals including an overly large wolf. Its dark eyes still open and its tongue lolling to one side. I had to look away.

Ansel commented to Christopher about my feminine sensibilities and I had to cover another irritated smile.

We passed a cheese shop, a quaint hotel that looked more like a brothel, and a blacksmith. There was also a dress shop, the constable's office, and a general store that carried sugar, flour, and other necessities.

"That's it," he said when we completed the square. "Did you want to toss some rotten fruit? It's a lot of fun." Ansel waggled his eyebrows.

"We're going to pass, but thank you for the offer, Ansel. You're a kind man and a great host. We appreciate you showing us around."

I scoffed at Christopher's obvious blustering. He shot me a glare and I immediately returned my features to neutral.

"No problem. If you need anything else, let me know."

"Actually," Christopher said. "We were hoping to speak with a man called Adam Henry. Do you know where he might be at this hour?"

The man's cordial features fell into annoyance. "Why? What business do you have with that waste of a man?"

Christopher's kind features changed, but only subtly into something that looked more like a wild animal than that of a genteel man of proper upbringing. He looked every inch a vampire and I wondered how I hadn't seen that side of him before.

Ansel backed up. "His father runs the blacksmith," he said and hastily retreated.

"Thank you." Christopher bowed.

"You know you can be scary when you want to be, right?" I asked, keeping up with him step for step.

He smiled, guiding me in the direction of the blacksmith's shop. "Of course I do."

OceanofPDF.com

MASTER BLACKSMITH

WHEN WE'D PASSED the blacksmith's earlier, no one had been visible. Now, an elderly man with white hair and leathery skin pounded on a blade. He glanced up when he heard us.

"Good day," Christopher said. "We are looking for Adam Henry."

"Why?" The smith's voice was garbled and full of growl.

"We have a proposition for him."

That stopped him. He looked up and focused on Christopher and me intently. "Did you need a sword? If that's the case, Adam is still in training. I am his father and the master blacksmith."

"We may have need of a sword or two, yes, and I will remember that you're the man for the job when the time comes. But right now, we seek Adam's assistance on another matter." As Christopher spoke, he stepped further into the shop with me in tow.

"Fine. Adam is in the back." He pointed in the direction we should go. Glared and returned to his work.

"Thank you." Christopher flicked a coin at him. Even though he wasn't looking, Mr. Henry paused his hammering long enough to reach out and catch it. I knew Adam's father wasn't a vampire, nor was he young, but he was still quicker than most. I gathered that must be where Pops got his reflexes. Sure, they'd been enhanced when he became a vampire, but it started with his father.

We came into another, smaller room. A variety of metal objects lined every inch of the walls. Some looked sinister and dangerous while others appeared almost docile in nature. Each gleamed as light from the doorway shone on them. Weapons hung on the walls too. An interesting-looking bow, a shield, and a long sword were interspersed among the tools.

The floor was covered in clean, dry straw, and nothing else, except a rack filled with swords. We went out the back door. Behind the building and across another dirt street stood a small house and beyond that was a rugged training arena. Two men, one much shorter than the other battled each other with practice swords. The shorter one wore a steel helmet and chain mail. Even with all of the protection, he seemed much smaller than the unhindered man.

As one, Christopher and I moved toward them. "Let me do the talking," Christopher said.

"We'll see." I smiled as I spoke, teasing him like the brother he claimed to be.

"That's what I'm afraid of," he said quietly. I would never love anyone like I loved Troy, but I liked Christopher. I was glad he was here with me.

When we entered, two men stopped what they were doing.

"Can I help you?" the taller one asked.

I pulled Christopher to a stop as he spoke. It was Pops. He looked almost exactly as he did in our day. There were slight differences. His hair color had changed and he bore more wrinkles in the future. In truth, he was a startlingly handsome young man. Part of me wanted to launch myself into his arms the way I did in my time, but I held back, knowing he was only a man now and I would probably hurt him if I did. Not to mention the fact that he would think me fresh and not a proper lady too.

Christopher sensed my hesitation and stopped beside me. "Bonjour. I am Christopher Prinfois. This is my sister, Jasmine. We are cousins of the Vogues family. We've come to ask you a favor."

The other man removed his helmet as Christopher spoke. Shocked, I realized it wasn't a man but a woman, with bright red hair that tumbled down her back and eyes green as fresh cut grass shone intelligently. Joanna.

"A favor. What kind of favor?" she asked.

It was as though someone struck a match and lit the young woman on fire. She wasn't much older than I, but where I was lacking, she was all confidence and determination. I was excited to talk to her.

Christopher bowed. "My Lady. We've heard Adam has expert knowledge of the lands round about this area and seek his guidance."

Pops - Adam - stepped forward. "Who told you such things? There are those who know the land better than I."

"He goes by the name Abernathy," Christopher said.

"I don't believe I know a man called Abernathy," Adam said, scrutinizing us.

"Well, he knows you. He told me that you are possessed of great integrity and a vast knowledge of France, which is good. We have need to reach the Château de Chinon."

"But isn't that where the Vouges are at the moment. Surely you've been there." He eyed us warily.

I licked my lips and my pulse quickened. Adam had a keen intellect and wasn't afraid to use it. "Yes, but we were both so young the last time we visited our cousins." I paused, hoping I wasn't making things worse. "We could really use your help, Pro - Mr. Henry." I released Christopher's arm and stepped toward him, unable to help myself. He was my grandfather. That was how I'd known him my whole life, but as he stood before me, I saw so much more than a grandfather, I saw a man filled with dreams. "Please," I added. "We need you," I paused and glanced over at Joanna. "And your friend can come too."

Adam shook his head. "Joanna has no need to do any travelling." He moved slightly so that he stood in front of her.

She didn't like that and her eyes flashed with fierce irritation. "Adam, you cannot speak for me. Not now and not ever."

Adam smiled; his eyes filled with unmistakable love. I couldn't help but glance back and forth between them, my desire to learn even more about Joanna growing by the second.

"Apologies, Miss d'Arc. Of course you may do whatever you please." Adam gave her a brilliant smile.

It was all I could do not to jump up and down and clap for joy. Or rush my grandfather in a hug. It was fun to see him like that - just a man.

"Will you come?" I asked, urgency driving me forward. I hoped I didn't sound like a spoiled child, but I couldn't help myself. I wanted both of them to journey with us.

"Miss Joanna d'Arc, it isn't necessary for you to leave the comforts of your home," Christopher said and I glared, but didn't interrupt. "We intend to travel quickly and I certainly wouldn't want to cause you any distress, especially because we will be travelling long hours on horseback and sleeping on the ground," he added.

Joanna let out a very unladylike snort. "Dear Christopher, you've just described my comfort. If Adam doesn't wish to go, I will take you." Her eyes dropped to a moment before she glanced back at us.

Christopher smiled, obviously as smitten with her as me. "Very well. If it is all right with your father, then we would be honored to have you travel with us."

"Hold on a minute. I don't think this is a good idea," Adam said, a combination of frustration and amusement coloring his features.

"But you have to," I said and then looked away. He wasn't my grandfather yet and he didn't have to do anything.

There were several moments of awkward silence and I watched a beetle scuttle around in a corner. But I waited, holding my tongue, though it was difficult.

"When do you wish to leave?" Adam finally asked.

"The sooner the better," Christopher said, obvious relief in his words.

I nodded, feeling my face light up with happiness. "It's going to be great," I agreed, clapping my hands.

"You are an interesting sort," Adam said, eying me warily.

I supposed that was his way of saying I wasn't very ladylike. Surely since he loved Joanna, he didn't care about that kind of thing.

"Shush, Adam. You made Jasmine's day," Joanna cooed, her eyes still on me. She was surprised by the way I behaved too, but in her case, she approved.

"Very well." The way Adam looked at her and the way she returned his look was wonderful. I'd seen that before. Between Troy and me. At the thought of him, my heart sank and the smile left my face. How I missed him.

"What's the matter young Jasmine? It's as though a ghost walked over your soul." Adam appraised me, concern evident in his features.

I tried to recover, but couldn't. Pain filled every inch of me.

Christopher tried to cover for me. "She's missing her betrothed."

"There. There," Joanna said. "You must be strong. I'm sure your love wouldn't want to be the cause of pain to you." She came over and took my hand.

I knew she was right. Troy would want me to fight for him, not lie down and cry. I swallowed down my sorrow and tried to smile.

"There you go." She patted my hand.

I looked up and caught Adam staring at me. "You should feel honored. My dear Joanna d'Arc isn't usually so friendly with strangers."

"Of course. Thank you," I said behind watery tears. She was the Joan of Arc, the woman who would lead the French army, and fought more bravely than most men. I looked back at Christopher who smiled broadly. "Thank you, Joanna. I appreciate your kind words."

She smiled. "We will leave first thing in the morning since it will take time to prepare. Is that acceptable?" Her eyes flitted between me and Christopher.

"For sure." A quick glance at Christopher told me he agreed as well.

"But won't you need to ask your parents?"

"We do as we please," Joanna said, lifting her head in stubbornness.

She was an enigma. I knew that from before, but this time would be different.

OceanofPDF.com

JOAN OF ARC

CHRISTOPHER and I spent the next several hours obtaining horses, gear, and food to keep up appearances.

I asked him more than once why we didn't just have someone draw us a map and use our vampire abilities to run to the chateau.

We'd be there in hardly any time and we needed to hurry. He just smiled and said Abernathy felt I needed to spend some time with Adam Henry, which was why the dragon had dropped us in his town.

We couldn't do that if we just ran.

"I guess," I said. "But he must realize how dire the world's circumstances." I still felt the urgency to get the remaining two pieces so I could save the world, rescue my mom and dad, and Troy. A lot had to happen in a short amount of time.

"It's important," he added. "Something to do with helping you grow."

"Fine." I gritted my teeth.

What was it about adults always thinking they knew better than me.

I let out a breath.

That kind of thinking is what got me in this mess in the first place.

If Abernathy said it was important, then I was going to get whatever I could out of the experience.

Christopher and I were in the stables near the house, brushing the horses we purchased.

"Can you believe we get to hang out with Joan of Arc? I'm not even sure how to talk to her."

Christopher chuckled. "No doubt it's pretty cool. But remember, right now she's just a young woman. Sure, she's committed to her goals, but decisions haven't been made yet. Her destiny hasn't been fulfilled. Recognize that and know we can affect her decisions. We don't want to change their histories too much."

"I understand." From my time here with Laeddin, I knew what happened to them in the near future. Sharra would come soon. Joanna and Adam wouldn't end up together because of her.

In some ways Joanna's life and mine felt similar. We were around the same age. Our destinies would soon be fulfilled, though she didn't know how hers would play out. I wasn't sure how mine would either, and that made me nervous. I wondered if Joanna ever got nervous?

I peeked outside the barn, hoping I could tell the time by the lightness in the sky. It was still before mid-day.

"You should probably eat again tonight. You need your strength." Christopher's eyes went to my neck.

I agreed, surprised my heart jumped at the thought of drinking more of Christopher's blood. It really was yummy.

We finished with the horses and went inside the quaint house. Christopher went to the kitchen and put on a pot of tea. I guessed it was out of habit, and watched as he busied himself.

"Do you think it would be a complete scandal if I wore pants? I don't want to ride in a dress." I sat at the kitchen table, waiting for his reply.

"We're going on an adventure with Joan of Arc, the woman destined to lead armies of men. I think she'll be fine with you wearing pants." He smirked, taking my hand and intertwining his fingers in mine. "She's going to love you."

"I don't know about that. She's everything I'm not. Confident. Assured. Without guile or restraint. I'm sure she wouldn't have wished her wings away to be normal." As I spoke, I noticed him looking at the bear bracelet he'd given me a while ago. It still dangled from my wrist.

"There's more to you than you're giving yourself credit for," he whispered softly.

"Thanks." I wanted to believe he was right, but couldn't get there. "Let's talk about something else. Tell me about you." I studied his intent face. "What you were like before you became the man who betrayed my mom. I'd like to know more about that Christopher."

He withdrew his hand, crossing his arms, and sitting beside me. "There isn't much to tell."

I'd touched a nerve and felt bad. "Somehow I don't believe that." I decided to press harder. I wanted to get to know him better. "If we're going to be friends, it'd be nice to actually know you."

Christopher stared intently. "I don't usually talk about myself. Nor do I share personal information."

Exasperated, I threw my hands in the air. "Maybe that's why you don't have any friends, Chris." I stood and put my hands on my hips. "Because that's what friends do. They talk to each other."

"You really want to know?" He seemed genuinely surprised and I settled back in my chair, trying to put myself in his shoes. It must be difficult to be him.

"Yes, for goodness sake. I want to know everything. Let's start with family." I paused and he nodded for me to continue. "Do you have any brothers and sisters?"

"No. I'm an only child, like you."

"See, was that so hard?" I leaned forward and patted his knee. "Now we know we have something in common."

Christopher chuckled. "You mean other than the fact that we're both vampires?" He raised an eyebrow.

I crossed my eyes and made a face. "Well, right," I said, laughing.

"Fine," he said. "What else?"

"Did you like your parents?"

His light-hearted expression vanished.

Crap, I hit another nerve.

"If you don't want to talk about your parents, that's fine," I said. "You can tell me how you learned to carve this bear."

"Growing up, I never knew my dad. I asked my mom about him, but she would only tell me he was a loser." He sounded like the hurt child he was.

"That must've been hard." I couldn't imagine how difficult it would've been to grow up without a father. My dad meant the world to me.

"It was all I knew," he said, clasping his hands together.

"So he wasn't the one to teach you how to carve?" I indicated the bear he gave me, dangling from my wrist.

"No, I taught myself how to do that. In the seventies, we had a TV but no other technology. And my mom watched soap operas all day. I saw a commercial for woodworking and thought it looked interesting. The next time my mom sent me to the grocery store, I found a woodworking magazine. It was fascinating, seeing a block of wood turn into something." He gave a rueful smile. "It's hard to explain why I was so interested in it. I have theories, but who knows. It doesn't matter anyway." He ran his hands through his hair. "I decided to try my hand at carving." He paused, momentarily lost in his past. I stayed quiet, hoping he would go on. After another minute, I was rewarded for my patience. "The hobby came easy for me. Over time, I got better and better, and wanted to try new things. That required different tools, which I didn't have. So I went to junkyards and secondhand stores, searching diligently until I found what I was looking for or at least something that might work. When my room became too crowded, my mom said I could use the garage as a work area, and I was grateful to her for that." His faraway look grew sad. "It was the kindest thing she ever did for me." He reached for the bear at my wrist, smoothing it between two fingers.

"Did, Snow - your mom tell you anything about the bear?"

That surprised me. "My mom? No, it never came up."

"It's an interesting story. Strange too. I think Snow came to me the same way I came to you in the Wasteland."

I sat forward, desperate to hear what he had to say. My mom hadn't given me any details about her and Christopher. Mom only said that at one time she trusted him and he betrayed her. As I watched him watching me, I got the feeling there was a whole lot about my mom I didn't know. "What is the Wasteland?" I asked, changing the subject.

"It's a place created by the Unknowns, kind of like hell for the soul."

"That's a good description of the place since that was how it felt to be there," I said, leaning back. "What do you know about the Unknowns?" Kenmei gave a lecture on them in his class at the Seven Magics Academy. Supposedly they enjoyed interfering with the creatures of Earth.

"They are the creators - of everything." His voice was quiet like he didn't want to talk about them.

"That hurts my head." I allowed my thoughts to run over my life and all I'd been through and was still going through. "If the Unknowns are the Creators, why are they allowing the darkness to happen?"

Chris sighed. "If there's one thing I've learned over the years, it's that the Unknowns don't care about us, except what we can do to entertain them." He ran his hands through his hair. "I don't know whether it's because they've been around so long or something else, but to them it's just a game, I think. We are pawns. Either they find you interesting or they don't like you." He shrugged. "Who knows?"

We talked well into the night and on until early the next morning. I came to understand that my mom had feelings for Christopher before she fell in love with my dad. I could tell he had feelings for my mom as well, but they became marred by his hunger for power and his need to serve the vampire queen. Sharra. Listening to him talk about that time in his life surprised me. He was full of regret about his choices.

That much was obvious.

"So, why is the bear special," I finally asked. We'd come full circle and I was sure that Joanna and Adam would be by soon to pick us up so we could begin our journey.

"I don't have the exact answer to that question. All I can tell you is that somehow your mom was able to enter my memories and physically take the bear and bring it forward in time. She gave it to me and by doing so she helped me to become a better person. I also know that's the reason I can sense where you are when you're wearing it."

I studied the bear with renewed interest. "But you still betrayed her," I said quietly. Deep sympathy for my mom filled me, as did sadness. I missed her. I hadn't respected or appreciated her before, but if I got her back - No, when I got her back, I would be a better daughter and I would show her more often how much I loved and appreciated her.

"Yes and it's my biggest regret." He sighed heavily. "Joanna and Adam will be here soon. Drink." He tilted his neck.

My fangs grew as I leaned forward, taking him by the shoulders. "I hear them," I said and sank my teeth into his neck. His blood! It was the equivalent of what I guessed four cups of coffee did to a human body. I was invigorated. When I finished, I thanked him and stood, stretching.

Christopher did the same.

"And thanks for sharing some of your life with me. I really appreciate it." I hugged him.

"That's what friends do, right?" His hand dropped to my waist.

"Right," I said squeezing him tightly, before stepping from his grasp and going to the door.

When Pops knocked, I immediately opened it. "Hi Pro - Adam."

"Are you ready, then?" he asked, surprised I answered so quickly.

OceanofPDF.com

DEEP RESOLVE

WE RODE MORE than half the morning. Our band included Joanna, Adam, and two other men whose names were Lance and Arthur.

It didn't escape my notice that his name was the same as that of the vampire Sharra woke, but upon closer inspection, I didn't think he looked the type. Besides Arthur didn't smell like a vampire. He and Lance followed behind Christopher and me.

Joanna and Adam rode in the lead. They spoke quietly to each other.

Had I been a mere mortal I wouldn't have been able to hear them, but I eavesdropped, using my vampire hearing.

"I had another vision," Joanna said.

Adam gave her a quick glance. "What was it about this time?"

"I was commanded to lead the French army against the English and those of our country who side with them."

Adam's back stiffened, but nearly as quickly he relaxed. "Anything else."

She playfully punched him in the arm. "I need you to continue to train me. I have no military training. I cannot read or write, but I have faith. And I believe it is my destiny."

I listened to her speak and heard the deep resolve in her voice. She was young, younger than me, yet she was filled with such conviction. It astounded me.

"Not just a dream, Red?" Adam asked.

I thought it was adorable he called her Red.

"Non." She faced forward, but then turned back to Adam. "You believe me, don't you?"

"Without a doubt," he said simply, clicking the horse to trot up beside her.

And I smiled because I understood what it meant to have someone support you one hundred percent and without question. That's the kind of person Troy was too. My breath hitched at the thought of him and I pleaded internally that he was okay.

"Thinking serious thoughts?" Christopher asked.

"More or less." I glanced down at my hands, nervously clinging to the horse.

"Is there anything I can do?" He was a lot more comfortable on a horse than I was.

I looked at him and smiled kindly. "You're doing it, helping me get the crown piece."

"I - " Christopher wasn't able to finish.

"Let's take a break," Adam said, interrupting.

We rode into a small clearing. Lance and Arthur passed us in order to speak with Adam and Joanna. "Keep a careful watch. There's been talk of wolves in this area," Arthur said to Adam.

"And you as well," Adam returned, sliding off his horse and tethering it to a nearby tree.

Christopher, me, and the others did the same. A small stream ambled along to the left of us. Joanna went over and bent to rinse her face in the water. Patches of cattails grew a little up the bank, the ground soft with moisture. The air smelled sweet. I didn't know whether the aroma came from the bright yellow wildflowers that grew sporadically amongst the tall grass or if it was something else. But I guessed the flowers. Adjusting my pants, I walked over and joined Joanna. It didn't escape my notice that she wore trousers just as Christopher said she would.

When I squatted beside her, Joanna glanced over. "I see you've chosen a man's attire, same as me." Her words were straight forward and to the point. There was no high school drama in her in any way.

It was refreshing.

"Oui," I replied, rubbing my hands together inside the cool water. It felt good against my skin and I allowed my hands to linger.

She paused, gazing intently at me or more specifically at my forehead. "What are they?" She touched one. "How are they staying flush with your forehead?"

"Oh," I said, pushing my bangs down over the jewels. "It's a special kind of glue."

"Glue?"

"It allows things to stick together," I tried to explain.

"Oh, well they are lovely."

"Merci." I shook off my hands and wiped them on my pants.

She nodded. "Have you enjoyed the ride so far? Our country is quite beautiful, non?

"It is," I said, but something of my thoughts of Troy must've remained on my face.

"But I sense your sadness, Jasmine. What troubles you?" She stood, tucking her hands into her pockets.

For the briefest moment I thought of telling her everything. I had a feeling her advice would be frank and to the point, yet well thought out and helpful. I glanced back at Christopher, who was listening while the other men talked. His eyes caught mine. When he knew that I saw him, he shook his head once. And I knew he didn't want me to say anything.

I sighed, giving him the briefest nod that I agreed. "It's just that I'm anxious to get to the Chateau de Chinon. It's urgent." That was true too so it didn't feel like a lie.

Joanna studied me, her bright green eyes seeing more than I was sharing. "Adam and I will get you there as quickly as possible. But it is important to rest and water the horses as well as ourselves. If they grow weak, the whole group will suffer." She took a piece of dried meat from the satchel at her waist. "Here. The same goes for you. Eat. Drink. Keep up your strength." Then she paused. "And no matter the urgency or the importance of your journey, it's good it have a little fun too." As she spoke, she considered Adam, who'd come to get water in the stream. "Adam Henry taught me that."

She gave him a smile and I felt Adam's heart swell and melt. He loved her beyond measure. And that made me sad. I knew what would happen and it didn't end happily. She was burned at the stake for being a witch. That knowledge caused sorrowful emotions to swirl. Adam would lose Joanna. Their story abruptly cut short. What pain my grandfather must've suffered at her loss.

"Shall we spar?" Joanna closed her bag. Then helped Adam up. I liked that she was beautiful, but not prissy or girlie in anyway. She was tough and strong and - yeah, I wanted to be her when I grew up.

"Are you up for it?" Adam spoke softly, tenderness for Joanna radiating from him.

It looked strange on him. And I realized it was because the man I knew, Pops - my grandfather had been through hundreds of years of hardship since this moment.

He'd seen more than I ever could imagine.

How many times had he loved? I wondered and then tossed the question away. I didn't want to know.

"Have you used a sword?" Joanna asked me, taking in my hands.

I quickly hid them behind my back.

Adam looked me up and down. "Probably not," he said. His words weren't filled with distain, but they certainly didn't exude the love and adoration I was used to either.

The two of them moved away from the water.

I lifted my chin, following behind. "Actually, I know a little."

"Do you?" Lance asked as I walked by him and Arthur who were seated on a fallen log near the horses.

"She does," Christopher said, backing me up. He had a knife in one hand and a piece of wood in the other.

It brought me great joy to see that. When he noticed, he smiled and I returned it.

"Bon, let's spar." Joanna went to her horse and pulled her sword from its covering. Arthur and Lance removed theirs as well.

Christopher and I hadn't packed any weapons. As vampires, we didn't have need. Except when I battled the assassins, of course. But when I fought them, the swords just appeared. Along with the swords, I was given special abilities to use them as well. Or maybe they were a part of me. At this point I didn't know where I ended and the quest for the crown pieces began.

"You brought no weapons," Adam asked, real distain coloring his features. "There are wolves in this country, not to mention thieves."

"And don't forget about the large flying thing Arthur saw in the sky last night." Lance swung his sword, biting at the air.

Adam snorted, but Lance wouldn't be deterred.

"Tell them, Arthur," Lance said. "You said it was larger than the Town Square."

"We don't have any," Christopher said, interrupting, his eyes on me.

I had a feeling the large flying thing Arthur had seen was Abernathy.

"It was a demon," Arthur said, his face troubled. "A shadow, darker than the night, with large golden eyes that shone in the darkness, and tore into my soul." As he spoke, he studied the sky.

"Are you sure?" Joanna asked, peering at the sky with him. It wasn't that she doubted him. That, I could tell. But she was worried.

"I promise you. I went out to check on my horse because I heard a ruckus. Immediately, I saw the thing swoop out of the sky like a condor, snatch one of farmer Benois cattle, and then launch back into the sky. I heard the crunch of bones on teeth as it ate. The thing, which I believe was a dragon caught me watching it and I believed I would be next."

Adam gave Joanna a look that said Arthur was crazy.

I would've laughed expect I was still in shock at my grandfather's attitude. Christopher came over and took hold of my arm. "Don't take it too personally," his whispered, seeming to understand what I was thinking. "Remember where we are. This is an age where a small cut can kill you. They have to be tough. He is a product of his upbringing and we are in the middle ages after all."

"Very true." I relaxed and focused on Arthur. "I believe you," I said, tucking the jerky Joanna had given me into my pack. I didn't want to waste it.

"You do?" Arthur didn't look convinced.

"Yes, there are many creatures that haven't yet been discovered. If you say you saw something then I don't doubt that you did." I turned to Adam and Joanna. "I'm sorry. We should've brought weapons. We weren't thinking."

"Luckily we can fight hand-to-hand," Christopher added, smirking at Lance and Arthur.

"Well, that's something," Adam said, though he didn't seem convinced. "Not that it'll do much good against the toothy snout of a wolf."

Joanna wrapped an arm around my shoulders. I was at least five inches taller than her, yet she felt like a giant with all she could do. "It's all right, Jasmine. You can use mine."

"Thank you, Joanna."

"Oui. We're here for you."

Adam Henry took his stance, preparing to practice as Joanna drew her sword. "Are you ready, Red?" He winked at her though his features still suggested he was upset with Christopher and me.

"Mais oui, ma chère." Joanna readied her sword. Stepped forward as Adam did the same. And suddenly it was as though they were dancing. One would lunge, the other parried. Joanna swung her blade above her head as she spun in a circle before bringing down her sword on Adam's with a clang.

"It's like they know what the other is thinking," Chris said, his arms crossed.

"It's beautiful." I walked around Adam and Joanna admiring how in tune they were with each other.

Every once in a while, Adam would comment. "Watch your foot." Or "Strike with more force."

I didn't even think they noticed me.

Joanna caught Adam and knocked him on his butt. He laughed. "Very good."

"Thank you." Joanna stuck out her hand to help him stand. Once he was up, she slid her sword into its hilt. "Would you mind showing me some of your hand to hand combat?" she asked me.

"Um, sure." I'd never fought a human before. I worried I would hurt her.

"Go easy," Christopher said, his hands behind his back.

"I'm going to do my best," I said and stuck out my tongue.

Joanna watched our interchange and smiled. "It's good you get along with your sibling."

"He's a doof, but yeah, we get along." I winked at him.

"Doof?" Joanna repeated.

"It means he's a little off balance in the head, but not bad," I said, trying to explain.

Joanna seemed to get it. "Doof. I like the word." She brought up her hands. "Show me what to do."

"Stand with your legs hips width apart," I said, nervous about showing her anything. Worried I would be too rough.

Joanna moved into position.

Adam put away his sword and stood opposite Christopher.

I tried not to focus on the look on his face. "Now, put your hands up," I continued.

"Like this?" She lifted them above her head.

"Well - " I moved her hands lower so that she looked like a boxer. "Better," I said.

"Have you ever fought hand to hand?" Christopher asked Adam.

"Don't insult me." He didn't even look at Christopher. Just continued to watch Joanna and me.

"Well then, let's go," Christopher said.

While I showed Joanna how to fight, Christopher and Adam fought too. Except they didn't look like they were pretending, though the Hunter was obviously holding back.

After an hour or so, Joanna and I stopped sparring and turned our attention to Christopher and Adam.

Adam fought hard, his muscles straining as thought fought. Dirt streaked his sweating face and his shirt was torn at the collar.

"Do you think he's okay?" Joanna whispered.

"He's fine. It looks like he can hold his own." Even without his vampire abilities, Pops was a natural fighter.

"I don't know. Christopher seems to be holding back."

"You noticed, huh?" The girl was very intuitive.

Joanna smirked. "I did." She paused. "So, why are you really here?" Joanna asked, keeping her eyes on the men.

I decided not to lie. "There's something I need to retrieve from under the château de chinon. It's very important I find it."

"Does it have something to do with those gems on your forehead?" She clasped her hands together in front of her.

Yet again, I was impressed with how perceptive she was. "Yes, it does."

"And why are they so important?"

"I need to save my mom and dad - and the man I love," I admitted. "And I need to stop a very bad person from hurting a lot of other people."

Her jaw clenched together. "Well, then I'm glad I'm here to help."

"I'm glad you're here too." I smiled. "It's great to see Pro - Adam so in love."

"Oh, why's that?" She didn't seem upset, just curious.

I hadn't meant to say that. As far as Joanna knew, I had only just met Adam, and he barely tolerated me. I gave her my full attention. "In the future," I paused. "Quite a ways into the future, he means a great deal to me," I finally said.

Joanna's eyes met and held mine. "I see." A small smile lifted her lips. "I knew it was his destiny to love more than just me."

I nodded. "His destiny is très important."

"Tell me more," she said, her eyes alight with interest.

"I would if I could, but it's essential that I don't." It was difficult not to tell her all of it, but Christopher said I shouldn't, and I appreciated he knew more than I did.

Joanna watched me a moment longer. "Very well," she said. Then faced Christopher and Adam. "We should be on our way."

The two of them stopped. Both looked grateful to be done. It seemed neither wanted to be the first to quit.

Stubborn arrogance, I thought, climbing on my horse. The others climbed on theirs as well. We rode on along the dirt path until nightfall. Adam found a place and we made camp.

I slept fitfully.

Dreams of my mom, dad, and Troy being tortured by Sharra swirled between my waking and sleeping.

OceanofPDF.com

STALKING US

THE NEXT MORNING WE WOKE, ate, and started out.

Nobody said much.

Arthur and Lance kept mostly to themselves.

But the rest of us weren't talkative either. Each lost in our own thoughts.

The day shone bright and beautiful.

Clear skies, not a cloud in the wide, blue sky. Birds dipped and dove through the tops of the trees. Small animals skittered along the branches and in and out from under bushes.

Our group still rode parallel with the stream. It rushed on; it's gentle music filled the air.

I felt more at peace than I had in a long time. That peace left by mid-morning when I sensed something hunted us. I used all of my vampire abilities to find out what it was, but the predators were cunning. The only thing I could tell for certain was that they were big.

"Something is stalking us," I said to Christopher, keeping my voice low enough so only he could hear.

"I hear them too. It's going to be hard to keep our secret about what we are if we have to fight for real with our bare hands."

"What do you think they are?"

"I'm not sure," he said, glancing beyond the stream and into the trees.

The trail led us into the forest, with thick trees on either side, giving those tracking us plenty of places to hide while our little group was exposed.

A large howl pierced the air followed by several howling answers.

"Wolves," I whispered.

"At least a dozen," Christopher added.

"Probably more." I tilted my head to listen.

Adam turned in his saddle. "Stay on your horses. We don't have the manpower or the advantage to contend against wolves. Our only chance is if we outrun them." Adam urged his horse forward into a gallop and the rest of us followed. Now that the wolves had made themselves known to us, they ran, keeping pace. Adam must've seen them too. He pushed his horse harder and our horses responded.

A jolt of fear flashed along my spine. It wasn't for myself or Christopher, but I was concerned for Adam and Joanna and even the others. They were good fighters. Great even. But they were human and that meant they were in danger.

All sorts of horrible thoughts crossed my mind. Like, if Adam were killed, then there would never be Professor Pops and he wouldn't adopt the seven brothers, so my mom would never meet Dorian. Or if Adam died, then he wouldn't adopt Troy either and I wouldn't ever meet him. Or, heck since I'd been created from the seven magics and the blood of my mom and dad, if they never met then I wouldn't be born. Again with those thoughts. Maybe that wouldn't be such a bad thing. I caused a lot of trouble for those I loved and cared about. I'd given Sharra my wings and with them, she caused the darkness.

From the corner of my eye, I saw one of the wolves. He was huge, his fur a deep gray color. Sharp teeth flashed. One bright yellow eye caught mine and held it. I caught my breath at the way he looked at me. It wasn't like the look of an animal, but of a cold, calculating creature ready to slaughter me. "Christopher," I said. He was a couple of paces ahead of me.

"I see him," he answered.

A moment later, three more wolves came into view. They obviously weren't afraid of us. They hunted us and that worried me. I needed to do something.

Ahead, I heard the whinny of Adam and Joanna's horses as they slid to a stop.

"Why are you stopping?" I asked, pulling the reins on my horse just after Christopher did the same. Before Adam responded, I got my answer. There were four large wolves blocking our path. Teeth bared, they stood nearly as tall as the horses. On the left and the right another eight wolves closed in. I glanced behind. Arthur and Lance had their swords drawn and were facing four more behind us. Sixteen enormous wolves!

"Have you ever seen wolves so big," Lance asked Arthur.

"No," he answered.

"Four against sixteen," Adam said, giving Christopher a furious glare.

Christopher climbed off his horse. "Don't count Jasmine and I out yet, Adam."

I started to get off my horse, but Adam rode over and pushed me back on. "What are you thinking? Stay on your horse and when there's an opening, run for it. Joanna will go with you."

"Non, I will stay and fight," Joanna said, her voice severe, her sword drawn.

"Joanna," Adam started, but returned his focus to the wolves closing in around us. "Fine, just stay close to me." He gave me a sorrowful look that said I was already dead and he was sorry but there was nothing he could do about it. He would do everything in his power to keep Joanna safe. That included sacrificing Christopher and me, if necessary. I wanted to feel bad, but all I could do was nod my understanding. He didn't know me. He didn't realize that I would do all I could to keep him and Joanna safe as well. A quick glance at Christopher told me he felt the same way.

"You know it won't take long for them to realize we aren't just regular people," I whispered, sliding off my horse.

"That is the least of our problems. We must do everything we can to keep Adam and Joanna safe. We will save them now and explain later."

"Agreed."

Lance and Arthur faced the four in our rear. One of the wolves jumped forward and nipped at Arthur. He kicked at the wolf, sending it flying. That shocked me. How did he possess such power?

Another wolf came after Lance. He didn't have the same strength as Arthur, and was yanked off his horse. Arthur slid off and went after the wolf.

I turned my focus to Joanna and Adam. They remained on their horses with their swords drawn.

"Joanna. Christopher. Focus your efforts on those four," Adam shouted. "Lance. Arthur," he continued, but stopped. The two of them were already fighting the four wolves bringing up the rear.

"Merde," Adam swore.

Christopher ran over to help them.

"Get Joanna out of here," I yelled at Adam.

Adam laughed harshly, bitterness in his eyes. He blamed Chris and I for what he believed would be our doom. "Surely you can't be serious. You believe yourself capable enough to handle the wolves by yourself?" He turned to Joanna.

"Don't question me. Do as I say," I yelled, fear for their safety at an all-time high.

Adam was taken back. He studied me as though seeing me for the first time. "Fine."

"You can handle this, right?" Joanna asked. She was curious, but also believed in me. I guessed it was probably because she understood more about the world than most.

"Yes, I can do this," I said and turned to face the four wolves coming toward me.

Joanna and Adam didn't leave, but I couldn't worry about what they might see.

I glanced at Christopher who shrugged.

We'd run out of options and he knew it too.

The remaining wolves held their ground, but didn't attack.

Padded feet in rust, black, brown, and white moved together as though they were smaller parts of a whole and hemming us in.

I got the feeling they could understand us too, which surprised me though it should've have.

OceanofPDF.com

WOLVES

"YOU SHOULD GO," I whispered to the wolf closest to me, hoping Joanna, Adam and the others wouldn't hear me. Christopher heard me though. I saw the look on his face. "I would hate to hurt you or your companions." I bowed slightly, as a sign of respect.

The wolf eyed me as though considering my words. Then, he spoke. "You're surrounded. I think we'll be fine."

Behind me, I heard Adam saying something to Joanna, but didn't pick up what he said. I had to keep my focus on the wolves. "Perhaps you underestimate us."

"You don't seem surprised that I understand your language and can speak it," the wolf said. It looked like he was smiling.

"That should tell you that I'm not like the others in this group and neither is my blond companion. We cannot die."

He shook his head and barked a signal, causing the other wolves to stop their advancement, including those fighting Arthur and Lance. "What are you then?" His voice was guttural, a cross between a growl and a howl. Oddly beautiful, I thought. And he spoke so low I doubted anyone could hear him, but me, and probably Christopher.

"I am a vampire. My friend is also. Have you heard of our kind?" I asked, keeping my center of gravity low in case they tried to attack.

He seemed surprised. "We've encountered vampires before, recently in fact. I have a feeling the leader is looking for someone special. She is evil and cares nothing for the welfare of humans." He drew in a deep breath. "You do smell similar to those creatures, which is to say you smell like wet dirt."

I decided not to be offended. "Why can you speak and understand the language of humans?" If they were the creatures I believed them to be, I would be shocked. Of course I knew all supernaturals existed, but to have so many in a pack and living in France. For some reason, it would be a great surprise.

"We aren't like regular wolves, but are called Locanis."

I knew it! I learned about Locanis at the Seven Magics Academy. There were also similar creatures called werewolves, a subspecies of the Locanis. Few knew of their existence. Professor Pops told me about the Vaktare or werecats as well. He'd helped one a while ago. "I've heard of your kind as well," I said. "In fact I go to school with - " I stopped talking. Saying anymore and I would have to explain about time travel. Now didn't seem like the time.

"Why have the wolves stopped advancing," Arthur shouted from my right.

It was obvious he didn't realize I was speaking with the animals, which was good. I turned in time to see him lift his sword as though to strike down one of the wolves.

"Arthur, wait," I shouted. I turned to Adam and Joanna. "Stay where you are. All of you," I hollered. "Do not move." Returning my gaze to the lead wolf, I continued, "My name is Jasmine. I have no desire to hurt you. My companion and I must get to the Chateau de Chinon. These with us are accompanying us on the journey. Will you allow us to pass or must we fight our way out?"

The wolf bowed. "I am Crayith. We are hungry. It's been a long while since we've eaten. Perhaps you could spare a horse or two in exchange for your freedom?"

"Is that wolf speaking?" Arthur's face had gone more pale than usual.

"Quiet," Christopher hissed.

"We cannot spare our horses," I said, trying to ignore them. "We need them to get where we're going."

"I know one of your vampire abilities is speed. My guess is that you can run faster even than the horses that carry you. Why are you wasting time?"

My sentiments exactly, I thought.

"Those who travel with us don't know we are vampires and we'd like to keep it that way," I said aloud.

"I am the leader of this pack, but I don't think I'll be able to stop them from feeding. It's of the greatest urgency and our animal instincts sometimes take over."

I looked more closely at the great wolves surrounding us and realized he was right. Many were emaciated. "Why haven't you eaten?"

"We aren't the only hunters in this land. There are people who hunt our fur for warmth and our flesh for food. Not to mention we also saw a dragon last night. We are large and fast, but we aren't invincible the way you are."

"Are you all right, Jasmine?" Joanna asked.

I didn't mean to ignore her, but I had to think of a way out of this. I thought of everything Professor Pops had told me about Beatrice and the other Adam and all they'd been through. And then it dawned on me. "What if you returned to your human form? Then we could share our food and hunt together."

Crayith chuffed and howled, lifting his head as he did.

The others responded.

"Jasmine, talk to me," Christopher yelled again.

"Give me a minute, please," I said, keeping my eyes on the leader.

After a few seconds, Crayith bowed. "We will leave and return in our human forms. But you must keep your word or there will be a fight whether you can die or not, vampire."

"I understand." I bowed again, deeper this time. "Thank you." As he turned to go, I thought of something. "How will I know who you are?"

He turned sideways and I noticed he carried something around his neck. "This amulet is a symbol of my people. I'll still be wearing it when I've transformed."

"Good. Farewell for now, then."

"Until we meet again, Jasmine." He howled and the others returned it. They turned and ran away, disappearing into the trees.

When they were gone, Adam came over to me. "What just happened?"

I shrugged. "I'm not really sure," I lied, making my way over to my horse.

"I don't believe you," Adam said, grabbing my arm.

"Well, I don't care if you believe me or not," I spat, angry at his arrogance. The man was intolerable. "They're gone and that's all that matters, right?" I pulled from his grasp, taking the reins of my horse and climbed on. The brown bay was skittish because of the wolves and I couldn't blame him. Things might've ended much differently. A twinge of doubt and fear coursed through my veins. Had I done the right thing by telling them to shift into their human forms?

Christopher came to stand beside me. "Tread carefully, Adam Henry."

Arthur and Lance rode over. Lance held one of his arms. It was soaked with blood. My canines grew at the scent. As soon as I realized what was happening, I calmed myself and covered my mouth.

"I don't know what just happened, but let's get out of here before they come back," Arthur said.

"Agreed," Lance said. "We need to fix up my arm."

Joanna patted Adam on the arm. "My love, all is as it should be. Let's be gone." She gave me a look that said she wanted me to explain later. "I believe Jasmine has a way with animals, which is good. She saved us. I'm certain of it." She gave me a slight nod.

"I didn't really do anything," I said, feeling my face get warm at her compliment.

Once Joanna and Adam took the lead again and were following the path, Christopher brought his horse even with mine. "Give me the details. I heard you speaking with them and caught most of it."

"They are Locanis, the same supernaturals Professor Pops helped, including Beatrice - "

"I'm aware," he said. "But what are they doing here?"

"They're hungry. I promised to share our food. We have plenty. They can have our portions."

Christopher nodded. "That isn't going to go over great with Mr. Grouchy up there not to mention the fact that our two portions aren't going to go nearly far enough for sixteen Locanis."

"True, but it's better than nothing. If he's Mr. Grouchy, then you're Mr. Negative." I smiled when he made a face.

"I'm just keeping it real, Jasmine," he chortled.

"It's outlandish to think that such a large group of wolves can't find something to hunt. Surely there are at least rabbits around?" Crayish's story seemed fishy to me, but then he'd mentioned Abernathy. Maybe all animals were in hiding.

"It's possible, but it could also be the fact that they have such a large group they choose not to hunt unless all can eat. But we can keep a close eye on them, make sure they don't have an ulterior motive."

That's what I worried about, their ulterior motives. But it could be as Christopher said, they only hunted what the whole group could eat or not at all.

We rode another hour before a group of sixteen men and women appeared on the forested road ahead of us. I noticed the amulet on the man in the forefront and knew immediately who they were.

Adam leaned over and told Joanna to draw her sword. Then he rode past Christopher and I, telling Arthur and Lance of the thieves blocking our way.

I needed to get a handle on the situation immediately. "Adam, these people aren't thieves. They don't want trouble. They're just hungry."

Adam gave me a look that said I'd lost it. "How do you know?"

I lifted my chin in defiance. "They need food. Look at the way their clothes are hanging."

"Well, we don't have any food for them. So that won't end well." He scowled as he rode back toward Joanna.

My stomach went sour. "They are welcome to mine and Christopher's food. We will help them."

"Of course we will," Joanna added. She raised a hand at the people. "Hello. I am Joanna d'Arc. I understand you are in need of food." She pulled her horse to a stop. Adam did the same, on her left. I stopped my horse on Joanna's other side. "We are happy to share," she continued.

"Are you sure about this? They look like a raggedy bunch," Adam said to Joanna.

That was true. They did look worse for wear. The leader, Crayith's black hair was the same color as his fur had been. It was shaggy, longer than was in fashion in this or any time. His clothes were dingy and smelled of dust and sweat.

"Yes, mi amour. We cannot let them suffer." She took his hand.

"All right. You know I stand by your decisions." As he spoke, I heard him unbuckle the covering on his sword.

Adam believed in Joanna, but he still intended to be prepared. I got that. But I didn't want him to spook them. I rode out in front of the others. "Hello, Crayith. It's nice to see you again."

"Jasmine," he said, bowing.

"Careful," Christopher called, getting off his horse and standing beside me. His arms were crossed, but he stood with his feet shoulder's width apart. He wanted the others to think he was being casual, but it was obvious he was prepared for a fight.

"Welcome," I said when Crayith came forward.

"Thank you for allowing us to join your group. We are excellent trackers," he said loud enough for the group to hear.

"So am I," Arthur said, surprising all of us when he came forward. "We don't need more mouths to feed." He glared at Crayith. "But, I'll happily share my portion with your group as well." He smiled. But it wasn't from kindness or generosity. There was something else. My blood seemed to freeze in my veins. Was this the Arthur from the tomb? Could it be him?

I studied Lance. The scarf he wore around his neck, though he was sweating profusely. The gloves he wore to his elbows.

It was true.

Arthur was a vampire - a Hunter. His companion, Lance was his walking food bank. Arthur didn't understand what these people were. He only saw them as additional blood sources. I was curious whether a Locanis could be compelled. If not, Arthur would be in for quite a surprise. From what Pops and Troy told me, the Locanis were vicious warriors and wouldn't be easy to fight.

But could he be the same vampire Sharra woke in the tomb? It was possible.

It stood to reason Arthur would know what Christopher and I were as well. Had that been the reason he agreed to come? Was his purpose on the road more than protection, but something sinister? I decided to pay special attention to the vampire and his blood servant. With new eyes, I watched Arthur dress Lance's wound. How had I not seen what he truly was before? Did Christopher know? I looked at him, indicating with my eyes that he should check out Arthur more closely.

He nodded that he knew, leaving me to feel like a childish fool.

"Thank you," Crayith said. "There are many of us, but a little food will go a long way."

Adam glanced around our group with distain followed by complete irritation. I guessed the reason. He was our leader, but he was no longer in control. That frustrated him. "Perhaps we should go back," he said to Joanna, his voice quiet. "Our services no longer required."

"Non, I wish to remain. There is much to learn on this journey, I can feel it," she said, softly.

Adam sighed, exasperated. "Let's make camp here for the night," he said in a voice loud enough for us all to hear.

OceanofPDF.com

COMING WAR

We did as Adam ordered.

Christopher and I created a makeshift tent.

Arthur and Lance had something similar.

Adam and Joanna each had their own tent.

Not to be deterred, Adam set up near Joanna.

Christopher and I offered to let the Locanis use our extra blankets to make a shelter, but they declined, saying they enjoyed sleeping out in the elements. I figured it was because of their wolf nature. One of the females, named Emery took one of my blankets. She was the smallest with long blond hair that touched the backs of her knees.

Once we were all settled and a fire was built, Arthur, Christopher, and I did as we promised and gave them our food. Joanna also shared some of hers, much to Adam's dismay.

The Locanis wolfed down the food in record time. Keeping to themselves, they huddled together away from the fire. I caught snippets of their discussion. They spoke of a coming war between the Locanis and the Vaktare. I wondered if that was the reason they were in the human realm. If I got the chance, I'd ask them.

Joanna and Adam were on the opposite side of the fire, lost in conversation. I listened in to make sure Adam wasn't treating Joanna with anything but respect. I shouldn't have worried. He was a lot of bluster to everyone except her. His feelings for Joanna hadn't changed. He adored her, loved her.

"If you say it's a good idea, then I believe you, Red," Adam said.

She laughed. "My dearest, I believe in you as well, with all of my heart. I can tell you there is so much more to you than you can even imagine right now."

"How do you know?" He didn't seem convinced. But I knew what he'd become.

She took his hand in his. "I just do." A wave of sadness passed over her features, but just as rapidly, she wiped it away.

"You aren't going to tell me more?" He kissed her cheek.

"No. It's better that I don't."

"Are you listening in on their conversation?" Christopher sat beside me, wrapping his cloak around him. "Didn't Snow White teach you any manners?" He asked only with slight sarcasm.

"She tried," I replied, pursing my lips together.

His eyes searched mine. "I'm teasing." He winked, scooting closer to me and staring up at the night sky.

"I'm not in a teasing mood," I said, removing my cloak, wadding it up and setting it on the ground beside me. I figured I'd use it as a pillow later, if I decided to lie down.

"She's fine." Christopher brushed some hair from my eyes.

The scent of his blood washed over me. "I know, but I wanted to check. He's so different. I'm not sure whether it's a good thing."

"Hey." He smiled. "He doesn't know he's your grandfather yet. He doesn't know he should love you. He's young and can only focus on his feelings for Joanna."

I guessed Christopher was right. "I know," I said, my fingers finding the bear around my wrist, playing with it.

"Are you talking about me?" Joanna stood in front of us.

"Hi," I said, standing.

"Bonjour. Can we talk a moment?" she asked.

"Sure. I patted the ground beside me.

"Actually, I would like to speak with you in private?" She glanced at a place on the other side of the fire, away from Adam, the Locanis, and Christopher.

I stood. "Of course."

Christopher squeezed my hand before releasing it.

I followed Joanna. Helped her spread out a blanket. Then sat after she did. "Is everything all right?"

"Yes." She gave me a serious look. "But I wanted to talk to you about the - "

"There," Arthur shouted, flipping his blanket off his shoulders.

I followed his finger and saw the dark shadow in the sky. "Abernathy," I said.

Joanna stood as well. "That thing has a name?" Her voice was filled with awe. Not fear, but amazement.

"It's the demon." Lance drew his sword.

"That will be of no use against the dark creature," Arthur said, his voice filled with sarcasm.

"I must still try, Sire. No matter the consequences, I will protect you."

Adam was suddenly beside Joanna. "Get the horses," he shouted. We must hide in the trees."

The Locanis were already up and nearly to the edge of the forest. They ran faster than humans. Luckily, no one except me seemed to notice. A couple of them had turned into their wolf forms too. Lance grabbed his and Arthur's horses, but Arthur was already running, and using his vampire speed had already reached the forest's edge. Without missing a beat, Lance climbed on his horse and rode while holding Arthur's horse's reins.

Christopher stood beside me. "He's so damn dramatic." He shook his head. "I wonder what he wants."

"I don't know." As I watched, Abernathy circled us several times before disappearing.

"It's gone," I shouted to those hiding. "What an odd group," I whispered to Christopher.

"Agreed. We have vampires, werewolves, and a girl whose destiny demands she conquer against malevolent forces in order to save those she loves."

I nodded. "Joanna is amazing, isn't she?"

"I wasn't talking about Joanna. I meant you." He touched my arm.

My face got hot. "My destiny is to fix all that I have broken, nothing more." I turned away, searching the sky for any sign of Abernathy.

"If you say so." He dropped his hand and followed my gaze. It was apparent he wanted to say more, but didn't believe now was the time. He sat back down. "Is the dragon trying to cause panic?"

"I don't know. Maybe he just wanted to let us know he's still around, if we need him?" I crossed my legs. "Or maybe he's hungry."

Christopher snorted. "We need him to stop flying around and just fix everything."

"That would be nice." It irritated me that Abernathy could do so much more than he was, but wouldn't. No more consequences. Everything back to normal. Or not normal, but back to the way it was before I made my stupid wish.

"You're so brave," Joanna said, hopping off her horse.

"Not really," I replied, but smiled.

"You aren't afraid," she continued, watching me.

"I didn't see a point." I pushed several loose strands of hair out of my eyes. "Did you still want to talk?"

"Oui." She patted her horse's neck, leaving him to eat some grass.

The blanket was still on the ground. I headed back over. Crayith and Emery intercepted us.

"Do you know what that is?" Crayith asked. He held Emery's hand. The small woman shook like a leaf.

"There's no need to be frightened," I said, speaking directly to Emery and ignoring Crayith's question.

"Was it a demon?" she asked.

"No, not really," I said, unsure how much I should tell them. Since they were Locanis they should know about supernatural creatures, same as me. "It was a dragon," I added.

"I thought those existed only in fairy tales." Emery sat beside me, clutching Crayith's arm like it was her life support.

I gave Joanna a look that said I was sorry, but she just smiled. Obviously the dragon was on her list of things she wanted to talk to me about too. "Tell us more, Jasmine," she said.

"They are very rare - here, but they do exist," I said, brushing some stray hair off my face. The wind had picked up, causing wispy hairs to dance around.

"You act as though you know the dragon," Arthur went on, coming over to what was fast becoming the community blanket.

"Well, I'm relatively certain I do." I immediately regretted saying that. Arthur was not to be trusted. I could tell.

"All I've heard of dragons is that they are fire-breathing-people-eating creatures who care for no one and nothing. They'd just as soon burn you to ash as look at you. Obsessed by treasure, they rarely leave their cave, except to feed, " Arthur sat in front of me. Lance sat beside him. "I can't help but question your intentions if you know such a creature. And to add to that point, what does it mean that you know it? Does it talk to you?

Adam and Christopher came over too. The rest of the Locanis remained in the trees and I was grateful. If was getting difficult to include everyone in my conversation. Instead I just focused on Christopher. He wore an expression of uncertainty, but I knew he was on my side.

"You seem to know a lot about a creature you've never met," I said, uncomfortable with the vampire and trying to put him on the defensive.

"I'm only restating the lore told by my people." Arthur glanced at Adam. "It was before I came to be in our village," he added.

Adam looked at the man as though for the first time. "Where are you from then?" One hand still rested on the hilt of his sword.

"I came from Camelot," the vampire said.

"Never heard of such a place," Adam said. "Is it in France?"

"It's a land not well known. Many haven't heard of it," Lance cut in, eager to voice his opinion.

"What brought you - " Adam began, but stopped. "Never mind." He shook his head. "What can you tell us of the dragon?" He focused on me. "Will it be a problem?"

"What do you mean?" I was fairly certain Abernathy wouldn't eat people. I didn't know about wolves and gave Crayith a concerned look.

"Will it eat us?" Joanna asked for him.

"No, it won't," I said with more confidence than I felt.

"Bon." That was her biggest concern and she appeared to trust my answer.

Adam and the others weren't so mollified.

"How do you know?" Arthur asked. His sword rested across his lap; his legs crossed underneath.

I looked to Christopher, wondering how much I should share with the group. He shrugged, leaving it to me. "I know because I've talked to the dragon before. In fact I consider him a friend."

At my words, Arthur stood. "You are friends with the monstrosity. I cannot be a part of this group any longer." He faced Adam. "Lance and I will take our leave immediately." He got to his feet.

Lance rose as well.

Adam looked as though he wanted to join Arthur, but a quick look at the resolve on Joanna's face and he sighed. "If you must, Arthur. Be well."

Arthur bowed, before heading over to his horse, Lance trailing behind him.

The hair on the back of my neck prickled. All that I knew of the wicked queen, her Hunters, and the vampire minions worried me. Had Arthur been a spy? After what I saw when I was inside Joanna's head, it could've been Arthur who told Sharra about Joanna and Adam. She would come for them. If not now, then soon. I glanced at Adam. He was in shock, though he was doing a great job hiding it. I could tell because of the slight sweat along his hairline and his heartbeat. A vein at his neck pulsed like a drum in my ears and I licked my lips, before quickly dismissing it. I needed some peppermint and a few moments alone with Christopher. His eyes went to my neck and I nodded.

"Perhaps we should turn in for the night," I said.

"If you're sure the dragon will not attack?" Adam asked. I got the feeling that whatever I said wouldn't matter. He would stay up all night to watch over his Joanna.

"I am sure," I said. "But my brother would be happy to keep watch, just to be safe."

Adam grunted. He didn't trust us. "I've got it."

Joanna rose. "Let's talk tomorrow while we ride, Jasmine. Is that acceptable?"

"I'd like that a lot, Joanna."

OceanofPDF.com

KNIGHTS IN SHINING ARMOR

"Do you think it was wise to tell them that you knew Abernathy?" Christopher settled against his rolled up blanket.

The wind whipped around us and a smattering of rain fell against the tent.

"Probably not," I said, lying down beside him, allowing my thoughts to roam.

He tilted his neck, allowing me access. I sank my teeth in. As I drank, for some reason I thought about the first time I took his blood. It felt like a lifetime ago. But while I drank, I'd seen his memories. This time was the same. They flooded my mind -

Christopher was at school, walking the halls alone.

A group of guys hollered after him. He walked faster, but they followed.

The leader shoved him, sending him to the floor and his books everywhere.

My heart broke as they took turns hitting and kicking him. It seemed everyone bullied him. The guys on the motorcycle were the reason he was shot and died.

I knew he could fight, but he chose not to. That said something about him, didn't it?

"Hey, why don't you go to class?" A dark haired girl placed herself between the bullies and Christopher.

"Why don't you mind your business?" the leader said, smirking.

"Come on, Vern. I'll let you take me out for ice cream." She smiled sweetly up at him.

"You will?"

"Of course, silly. Why do you think I came over?" She gave him a sultry look.

"Groovy." He backed away and snapped his fingers.

"But only if you and your friends leave Chris alone. I can't date a guy that likes to beat up other guys. I prefer the knights in shining armor type, not bullies." Her smile got bigger. It was obvious he liked her a lot. But he had his friends and his rep to protect.

Rubbing a hand on the back of his neck, he moved through the group of guys. "Yeah, cool. Whatever. Maybe I'll call ya." He walked away, and the other guys followed.

When they were gone, the girl went to Christopher. "Hey, let me help you to the nurse."

Christopher groaned and he got up on his hands and knees. "It's okay," he said, but his breath was knocked out of him and the words sounded funny.

"You sure?" She helped him stand.

"Yeah." Blood dripped from his lip and from a cut on his eye. He pulled his arm from her grasp. "I don't need a mamma bear type girl standing up for me." He walked away with a limp.

"Chris, don't be like that. I was trying to help." She watched him walk away, hurt.

"Why, so you and your date can laugh about it later?"

"No." She caught up with him. "I only said that to make him stop. I'm not interested in him, but someone else. And definitely not in a momma bear kind of way." The red ribbon in her hair was askew. Christopher noticed it, but didn't say anything. Just kept walking.

"Chris. Christopher," she said, but stopped walking with him.

That night he started making the bear. I realized it was for her, the girl with the red bow. He didn't show it, but his feelings for her had been incredibly strong. I gathered it was because she cared for him and was willing to show it, unlike his mom or anyone else at the time. And I knew what a powerful emotion love could be -

"And inviting the Locanis, was that wise?" Christopher asked, interrupting my thoughts. He wasn't really questioning me, just voicing the thoughts in his head.

I released his neck and wiped my mouth. "I think so. It's better they are with us instead of hunting us."

"True." He looked over and smiled. "You really have matured, Jasmine."

"I don't know about that." But I hoped he was right. Abernathy sending me to meet Joanna had been a smart move. Watching the way she carried herself, the way she handled all situations with such grace and courage truly affected me. I found myself feeling stronger and more confident with her around.

"Yes you do." Christopher crossed his arms over his chest. "My turn?" He glanced at my neck.

"Go for it." I tilted my head to the side and he sank his fangs in. But it wasn't for long before he pulled away.

"What's the matter?" Not that I minded.

He wiped his mouth. "It's Troy's blood." He shook his head. "I taste him in you and I don't like it," he growled.

I decided to change the subject. "Tell me why you made this bear." I rubbed my fingers over its smooth surface, as I thought of the memory I just saw. I wanted to hear the truth from him.

"A girl," Christopher said after a moment, lying back, his focus on the ceiling of the tent.

That perked me up. "Really?" He was actually going to tell me the story.

"Yes, really. Her name was Rebecca."

"Oh, that's a pretty name." I got comfortable beside him.

Christopher gave me a severe look. "She - " He paused, rolling onto his side so he faced me. "She was in my math and English classes in high school. I had a crush on her."

"And did you and Rebecca ever kiss?"

He snorted. "No."

"Why?" I really wanted to know. It was obvious from his memory that she liked him as much as he liked her.

He closed his eyes a moment and I guessed he was remembering. "I became a vampire not too long after I realized how she felt about me. Then it was too late. So, I went with Sharra and that life - Rebecca no longer mattered." He looked at me. "I'd forgotten about her until your mom returned the bear to me." He smiled. "In a lot of ways you remind me of Rebecca."

"I do?"

"Yep. She cared deeply for people and would've done anything to help out. One time, she brought all of her coats, including the one she was wearing to a coat drive at school for the homeless. It was adorable." He rolled onto his back.

I smiled sadly. "She sounds like a great person." That didn't feel like me.

"She was."

A wolf howled.

Christopher and I sat up at the same time.

"What now?" Christopher didn't bother with his cloak. He didn't get cold. We'd been wearing them to keep up appearances, but if there was a problem, it would be a hindrance, especially with the wind.

I exited the tent first. Christopher was close behind. Adam was standing, his back to us, searching the direction the wolf howled from.

"What is it?" I ran over to Adam.

"I don't know. I can't see anything." He sounded frustrated.

I peered into the darkness, able to see all of the Locanis. A quick count verified all were there but one. "I can't see anything either."

Crayith ran over to us. "Gilved is gone. There is no sign of what took him," he said as he came to a stop in front of us.

Adam lifted his sword to the ready. "Probably the dragon." He gave me a furious look. "Bring your group closer to the fire. It may be that the wolves have found us."

Crayith glanced at me.

"It's possible," I said. "Why don't I come with you to tell your group?" I turned to Christopher. "Why don't you and Adam build up the fire?"

The group of us had collected a large pile of wood and Christopher went over to it. "You sure you don't want me to come with you?"

"I'll be fine," I said.

Crayith and I didn't speak until we were out of earshot.

"What happened?" I whispered.

"I don't know. There are only the tracks of him being dragged to the river, nothing more. Would the dragon do that?" He didn't seem convinced.

"No, he would've just plucked him off the ground and flew away."

Crayith grunted. "I figured. Whatever it was took him away the same way it walked into our camp. That's cunning. Not only that, but there isn't much that can harm our kind. We can smell, hear, and see better than most."

I knew that already. The Seven Magics Academy really did teach me stuff. "What do you think did it?"

"My first thought was the dragon, as I said, but since it wasn't him, I don't know." He eyed me. "What about you? Any ideas?"

I did have an idea. Possible Arthur. Possibly Sharra. I hoped neither. We reached the tree line. The others huddled in smaller groups, talking anxiously. "Show me where?" I didn't know the Locanis personally, but I didn't want anyone hurt either.

Crayith led me over to the spot where their companion had been taken. Sure enough, the only evidence was of the guy being dragged. A quick look around verified the trail went cold. I smelled the air, trying to catch the scent of whatever took him, and caught hold of a scent. I recognized it. "I know what did it. Or, I should say who."

"You do?" Crayith placed his hands on his hips. He didn't look happy. "Another of your friends?"

"He isn't a friend. It was Arthur, the other vampire."

Crayith growled. "You know, I've never liked vampires. Always thought they were deceptive and mean." His eyes filled with distain. "It's obvious I wasn't wrong." Without another word, he turned on his heel, and headed back to the group.

I slowly followed debating whether there was more I should say, but Crayith didn't give me a chance.

"We'll take it from here, Jasmine. Thank you for sharing your food." He howled, shaking his head, and right before my eyes, shifted into his wolf form.

I stepped back, forcing myself to remain calm. Crayith stood nearly as tall as me in werewolf form; his black fur caught the moonlight and glistened softly. Yellow eyes glared. The rest of the group shifted as well, and I was suddenly surrounded by a pack of wolves. "Goodbye, Jasmine." Crayith launched into a run and the others followed, leaving me in a cloud of dust.

"Are you all right?" Christopher was suddenly beside me.

"Yes, I'm fine." I shook my head, frustrated. "It was Arthur who took the Locanis. What I can't figure out is why," I said in hushed tones so that only he could hear. Adam watched me; his expression disgruntled.

"Blood," Christopher said.

"What did I just witness?" Adam slid to a stop and scratched his head with the hand that held his sword. "Did I just see those people change into wolves the size of horses? Or am I dreaming?"

Joanna was beside him and she pinched him.

"Ouch," he said, rubbing his arm.

"Nope, not dreaming," she laughed, a giant smile spread across her face. It was strange seeing the serious girl come alive around so much supernatural activity.

"How are you smiling? Why aren't you terrified? I'm terrified. Everything I ever knew about this world has shifted on its head." He smiled at her and turned a furious glare at me. "And I think it's all her fault."

Joanna jogged over and hugged me. "I know. Isn't it wonderful?"

I hugged her back, watching Adam. He shook his head. And before my eyes, his love for Joanna grew deeper. I could understand why. Joanna d'Arc handled every bit of oddness she encountered with a quiet ease that astonished me.

"Have you lost your mind, Red?" He came over to study her up close.

Joanna released me and faced Adam. "Would you still love me if I were crazy, ma chère?" She took his free hand and clasped it between both of hers. "This is who I am," she continued after a moment's pause.

He kissed her lips. "Crazy or no, I'll always love you, Red. Always. But that doesn't mean I won't have questions." He looked at her grimly.

"Good." She rose up and pecked him on the lips before turning back to me. "These were the same wolves that surrounded us earlier?"

"Yes, that's right." I decided to come clean. "They were hungry and hadn't been able to find food. I didn't believe that was their only reason for tracking us, but it seems I was wrong." I shrugged.

"And how did you communicate with the beast?" Adam asked, scrutinizing me.

"I - " I looked to Christopher for help.

"She has a special talent for talking with animals," Christopher said.

"Uh-huh." Adam obviously knew there was more to it than that,

but he left it alone.

I figured it was because he didn't want to know more.

Joanna didn't look like she believed Christopher's story either. To me, she said, "I'd love to talk to you some more about your talents. Maybe tonight?"

"Oui," I agreed.

"Merci," she said.

"Can we expect any more surprises?" Adam asked.

"I hope not," I responded.

He walked away. Joanna winked before following Adam back to camp.

Once they were out of earshot, Christopher touched my arm.

"It's okay, Jasmine. You did the best you could. You didn't know Arthur would take one of their kind."

"No, I didn't, but that's no excuse." If I ever saw the vampire again, there would be hell to pay.

Christopher followed me back to our shelter. When we reached it, he rushed forward and opened the flap, allowing me to step inside.

"Thanks."

Once we settled in, Christopher looked at me.

"What?" I asked.

"I wonder what Locanis blood tastes like?"

I scrunched up my nose. "You mean you haven't tried before?"

"No."

"Could it be possible Arthur wanted to use the wolf to try and track Abernathy?" I dropped onto my knees and then to my side, rolling away from Christopher. "Let's talk more in the morning. I'm exhausted. Good night."

OceanofPDF.com

GREEN FIRE

HEAT PRESSED AGAINST ME. Even though I didn't need to breath to survive, it felt as though my lungs were being crushed.

I sat up, searching for a clue that would tell me where I was.

Directly in front of me burned a circular, green fire. Within the scorching ring hung three people by their wrists.

Heads bent, each moaned in pain. I took a step forward.

"Hello?"

The one in the middle looked up. His face was streaked in dirt mixed with blood.

"Troy!" I rushed to the edge of the fire. "Troy, I'm coming." With only the briefest pause, I ran through the flames.

They engulfed me, scorching my hair and burning up my clothes and my skin, but I didn't pay it any attention.

My eyes fixed on Troy. "Hang on."

At my words, the person on the right of Troy looked up.

"Mom!"

I knew instinctively the person on the left of Troy would be my dad. "Dad, it's going to be all right. I'll free you all."

From the outside the ring of fire had seemed thin and small, but I spent many minutes within the flames and couldn't get out.

"Jasmine, have you brought me my crown?" Sharra used my wings to fly down and land in front of Troy so that I could no longer see him.

I came up short. "No, I haven't. Not yet." Fear washed over me. "But I'm working on it."

"I see." She gave me a cruel grin. Walked over to my father, and with one of her sharp, black nails, cut into his cheek. A line of blood formed along with a mixture of colors.

I knew it was the seven magics. When he'd saved my mother, they'd infused within him. He wasn't like me, but there were similarities between us. His love had saved her and that love had combined with the seven magics, which saved him. I was created of my mom and dad's love and the seven magics.

"Isn't it amazing, Jasmine? Your father bleeds magic." She cackled heartily, moving over to Troy. When she stopped beside him, my heart clenched. "This one. He's fiery."

I tried to push my way free of the fire, but was unable to. So I backed up the way I'd come. As soon as I was out, the fire shrank to just below my knees, but it made it easier to see Mom, Dad, and Troy. "Leave them alone," I said, half-heartedly. I didn't know whether what I saw was real or not.

"Oh, it's real. I've brought your sub-conscious here so that you might see how they are faring." She touched the top of her staff against Troy's forehead. He gritted his teeth, trying to be strong, but a trail of smoke escaped his nose.

"Troy," I whispered.

His eyes bore into mine. "I love you," he mouthed.

A sob escaped my throat. I covered my mouth with my hands.

"Jasmine." It was my mom who said my name.

I looked at her. There was such strength on her face. She have me the slightest nod and I knew what it meant. She wanted me to stay strong and have courage.

Sharra noticed the silent communication between my mom and I and went over to her, placing a hand on her neck. "What do you think you're doing?" She squeezed. Black veins formed and appeared on my mom's face, neck, and arms.

"Stop. Stop it."

Sharra laughed heartily, releasing my mom and facing me. She pointed her staff at me. "Hurry. I won't keep them alive much longer." As she spoke, she waved her staff and everything got blurry.

MY EYES FLASHED OPEN. I lay on my back. Light shone through the fabric of the shelter. The clang of metal against metal rang through the air. "We need to hurry, Chris," I said. But quickly realized he wasn't there. I peeked outside the tent and found him sparring with Adam. Joanna watched a little ways off. Christopher was holding back, actually sparring with the sword in his left hand instead of his dominant right. It was weird to see my grandfather at such a disadvantage. From the moment I could remember, Adam Henry had been one of my greatest heroes, second only to my dad.

"Come on, Adam. You can do this," Joanna said, clutching her hands together in a moment of pure femininity. She was amazing as a tomboy and as a young woman in love. Both suited her and were obviously two parts of what made her great.

Adam grunted, lunging, his eyes never leaving the battle. His sword came down with a clang on Christopher's, metal scraping against metal. They were equal in height, but in that moment Adam seemed taller. And I knew Christopher was yet again letting him have the upper hand. My heart warmed for him. There was definitely still good in Christopher.

While I watched the two of them spar, it occurred to me that all heroes still had weaknesses and frailties as my grandfather did. What made them heroic wasn't their superpowers, but the way they handled their weaknesses, and more importantly, rose above them.

I moved to stand beside Joanna, each step away from the tent lessening the pain of the nightmare I just experienced.

Joanna heard me coming and smiled. "Jasmine. How was your night? Did you sleep well?"

"Sure. Yes. But I am anxious to continue our journey. The sooner we reach Chinon, the better."

Joanna's eyes took in my face and she nodded. "You have a destiny, Jasmine. I don't know what it is, but I understand what it looks like. I'm sure I wear the same look." She took my hand and patted it. "Christopher and Adam? Let us be on our way."

The two men stopped sparring, sweat creased Adam's face and along his chest.

Christopher handed his sword back to Adam. "Thank you for the lesson." He gave Adam an easygoing look. While the young Adam Henry bothered me, Christopher liked him, probably because they hadn't had years to despise each other. Christopher hadn't betrayed my mom yet nor had he been in the service of the vampire queen. He hadn't even been born. For Chris being here must've been so freeing. And he obviously respected Adam. I watched him with new eyes, happy that he and I had the opportunity to become friends.

"Right." Adam started toward the horses but stopped, glancing back at Christopher. "Great match. I even learned a few things. Your skill is unparalleled." He smiled genially, though mistrust still hung in the background. "I get the feeling you were holding back and I appreciate it." He walked over to his horse, rubbing his shoulder a moment before packing his swords.

The horses were already watered and fed and were ready to go. They'd been waiting on me.

"You should've waked me." Then I might have missed that horrible dream.

"I figured you could use it," Chris said.

Sleep wasn't a necessity, but it was nice to have a mental break once in a while. Except my sleep hadn't been mentally relaxing lately. It'd been the opposite. "Not really," I muttered.

When our shelter was packed, we all climbed on our horses and started along the trail.

"I hoped we might talk," Joanna said, riding up beside me. With Arthur and Lance gone, Christopher kept up the rear.

"What's on your mind?" I glanced at Joanna and it was like looking in the mirror. She was at the door of her calling. In the next week or two, it would knock, and I knew she would answer. I'd always wondered how she felt those moments before it all began. Now I could find out.

"You aren't like other women I've known. All they care about is marrying, having children, and keeping a home. While there isn't anything wrong with that, it isn't me. It isn't what I think about. I know my destiny is much different - that my life isn't my own, the way theirs is. But my life belongs to my people. And I've consigned myself to that." She spoke quietly, her focus on the road in front of us.

"What does that feel like?" I asked, sincerely hoping she could help me figure it out. .

She was surprised by the question. "I - " She paused. "It's like the weight of the world rests on my shoulders. It's heavy, nearly unbearable, but also exactly right."

"You aren't afraid?"

"Yes. Every second of every minute of every day since I realized what I was meant to do." While she spoke she seemed so small and so innocent, yet she was larger than life as well. "But what would I be if I gave into my fear. My country needs me and I must not let them down."

Her words went deep into my soul. The world needed me and I couldn't let them down.

"What about you?" she asked. "How is it you haven't eaten since we left, you speak to wolves, and know a dragon? Your destiny is as great as you are. It's beyond my comprehension, but I'm willing to listen."

Tears filled my eyes. I didn't know why. Maybe it was because she saw me for who I was or that she was interested if me for the sake of knowing me not because of what she could gain. Whatever the reason, I wanted to tell her everything. "Are you sure?"

"Oui. Start at the beginning and leave nothing out. I've a feeling your story will be unforgettable."

"You asked for it." I wiped at my eyes, forcing back the tears before they fell onto my cheeks. Then sniffled. "My name is Jasmine, as you know, but what you don't know is that I'm the daughter of the vam - " A shadow passed overhead sending our group into darkness. I looked and saw the golden dragon flying overhead. "Abernathy?" He dove and twirled, ascending high in the air before coming down in a spin. "What is he doing?"

"You really do know the dragon then?" Joanna wore an expression of complete interest.

"I know him, yes." Abernathy seemed to be having fun. Flying like I'd never seen him fly before. It was exciting to watch. He seemed so free and I wondered at his exuberance.

Christopher rode up on the other side of me. "Here, he doesn't have to worry about planes, helicopters, satellites, or radar. He isn't a blip in the sky to be shot down. Instead he's the greatest terror," he whispered.

My mouth fell open. Christopher was right. I hadn't thought about that before. Living in the modern age must've been such a difficulty for him. "He must be loving it here."

"What are planes - and radar?" Joanna asked, leaning over to make eye contact with Christopher.

Christopher smiled. "A plane is a large apparatus that flies in the sky. Radar is used to track it."

"That makes no sense," Joanna said, but leaned back. "I have a feeling it's better if I don't know," she said to me.

I laughed lightly. "You got that right."

The golden dragon circled above us, expelling smoke so that he created a circle in the sky.

Adam took his bow and a quiver of arrows from his pack and aimed one into the sky.

"Adam, don't," I said, though I wasn't too concerned. Abernathy could take care of himself.

"It's toying with us," Adam said.

"No, he isn't. He's just having fun," I responded.

Abernathy flew out of the circle and forward where he landed in a clearing a few hundred feet ahead of us. The ground shook when his clawed feet touched down sending a flock of birds into the sky and a group of prairie dogs into a frenzied panic. They kept popping up around him and sniffing the air before disappearing. Abernathy allowed the dust to settle before shaking his mane. One of the prairie dogs appeared right in front of Abernathy. The animal gave Abernathy a stern talking to. Abernathy smiled, exposing all of his sharp, white teeth. Then he bent his head toward the animal and blew smoke into the creatures face. The frightened animal flipped out of his hole before skittering back underground.

Christopher had been watching too and a burst of laughter sprang out of him. It was really funny, but I didn't want to worry Adam or Joanna.

"Stay here." I urged my horse forward without waiting for the others to respond. Adam, who seemed to be in shock, still had his bow cocked and aimed in the dragon's direction. "Put that away," I shouted as I zipped passed him. I didn't wait around to see if he obeyed. It was highly unlikely. The trees thinned out the closer I got to the clearing. My horse also became more skittish, slowing down, its ears flicking back and forth. He obviously smelled the dragon and didn't like it.

Ten feet from Abernathy, the horse would go no further. He whinnied and rose up on his hind legs and then bucked. I could've hung on, but thought it better if the horse kept his distance. So I used the horse's momentum to shoot me into the air. I sailed over its head and landed directly in front of my large, golden friend. "Abernathy," I said, placing my hands on my hips, trying hard not to smile. "You're freaking everyone out. What's going on? Come to take us back to our time?"

"No, Jasmine. I've come to tell you that the vampire queen is close by. I should've realized she would be around since Adam is changed soon. Perhaps we need to speed things along and get you to the crown piece. If Sharra meets you, she may try to kill you."

"Why? She won't know who I am, right?"

Smoke exhaled from his nostrils. "No, but it won't take her long to figure out the truth about what you really are, even without your wings. You were created from the seven magics. If I can smell the magic on you, she will be able to as well."

I stood beside him and patted his neck. "I guess you're right." I didn't bother to mention that was what I said from the beginning. At the sound of a snapping twig, I turned. Adam, Joanna, and Christopher were on their horses and riding toward us. "Why don't you fly Christopher and I to the Chateau de Chinon?" I asked, needing to hurry. "We can send Joanna and Adam back to their village."

He grinned and a trail of smoke filtered through his very sharp teeth. "True. Is that what you want? Have you had enough of Joanna and your grandfather?"

I blew out a frustrated breath. "Joanna is amazing. I'm so glad I actually got to meet her. Though we haven't done a lot of talking, I've seen her in action and consider her one of my heroes."

"She is an incredible young woman," Abernathy agreed, eyeing the rest of the group though they were still out of earshot.

"She is. She's so sure of herself. Even though she isn't an expert swordswoman or, according to worldly standards wouldn't be considered to be exceptional, it doesn't matter. She knows she's special and doesn't doubt what she believes to be true. She's committed and determined. I admire her very much." I pulled my braid over one shoulder, feeling anxious.

"And what have you learned?" Abernathy's golden eye studied me, waiting for my answer.

"That there is only one person who can save the world from darkness and that's me. I need to have confidence in my abilities and move forward believing in myself."

"Very good," Abernathy said, pressing his face into me, knocking me off balance. "I'm proud of you."

I hugged him. "Thanks."

OceanofPDF.com

FULL OF LOVE

STILL MORE THAN twenty feet away, Adam, Christopher, and Joanna climbed off their horses and tethered them to some nearby trees.

Adam didn't look happy. I could guess the reason. Once again, I put his love into harm's way. It was a wonder he still had hair.

"Don't go near it," Adam said to Joanna, speaking about the dragon.

She sweetly pulled herself from his grasp. "Jasmine is near him and she's fine. The dragon seems to know her and like her." She touched Adam's worried face, caressing away the worry. "I'm going over to meet the incredible creature."

Adam opened his mouth to say something, but nothing came out.

Abernathy, who watched them as I did, chuckled. "How has meeting your grandfather been?"

"Weird," I admitted, watching the three of them. Christopher stayed back, biding his time with the horses. "Adam looks like my grandfather, but doesn't act like him."

"He's changed a lot since this time, that is true, but his heart is the same, still full of love. He's just found a way to share that love with many instead of just one."

"You're right." I hadn't thought about that.

"Adam Henry, come here. I won't bite," Abernathy growled to Adam.

At the dragon's booming voice and the use of his name, Adam fell back, landing on his butt. "What madness is this?"

"No one is mad here." He shuffled to the side and took one giant step toward my grandfather. I stayed out of his way but moved toward the group with him.

Adam scuttled into a standing position, and pulled his sword. Fear etched into every crease on his face. His body was tense and his hands shook slightly.

Joanna left Adam's side.

"Joanna!" Adam followed after her, though he obviously didn't want to.

She stopped just a few inches from Abernathy's nose, a look of wonder on her face. "You are amazing." She reached out a shaky hand and touched the soft part of his nose.

"I like this one," he said. Then he added, "The feeling is mutual, Miss d'Arc."

"How do you know me? Have we met before?" No fear creased her features. She was the most courageous woman I ever met.

"We have not, brave child, but I've been to the future and seen your life play out. And what a glorious life it is." He nodded to her.

A tentative smile curled her lips. "You've seen my life? Perhaps you'll tell me how it ends?"

"Non, that would not do, chéri. If I shared, you would no longer be required to make choices and that is the best part of anyone's existence. I will not take that away." He chuckled causing smoke to escape his nose. "You understand, Joan?"

"Joan?" She tilted her head to one side as though debating. "I like it and yes, I understand." She came around and placed a hand on his neck. Abernathy breathed in. "Warm," she said, moving her hand away, but just for a moment before replacing it. "Amazing." And your scales? Mon dieu. They are lovely."

I was astounded at how calmly Joanna took the whole situation. She was impressive. If I hadn't grown up in a life filled with supernatural creatures, I don't think I would've been as calm. A quick glance at Adam told me he wasn't handling the situation nearly as well. He hadn't moved from his spot. His eyes darted from Joanna to the dragon to me and back to Joanna.

"You're like a circus freak," I said to Abernathy softly.

"That's me." He chuckled, sending deep rumbles through his body.

Joanna had both hands around one of his scales. "It's warm and light and dazzling - the most beautiful thing I've ever seen."

"She's taken with you," I whispered.

"As she should be," he joked.

I couldn't blame Joanna. The dragon really was a sight.

"Jasmine wants me to fly you to Chinon, which is probably for the best, but I think we should celebrate her birthday first."

"Your birthday?" Joanna asked. "Why didn't you say anything?" She touched my shoulder with her free hand.

"My birthday was several days ago," I said, giving Abernathy a curious look.

"It was, but I didn't get a chance to celebrate and eighteenth birthdays are important." The dragon winked.

Christopher rushed over, using his vampire speed. Adam didn't even notice. "Do you think that's a good idea?"

"If that ant, Arthur shows up, I'll put him in his place," Abernathy said.

"Of that, I have to doubt, but what about Sharra?" Christopher asked, gritting his teeth.

"That could be an issue, except I'm here. She won't make a move to harm anyone while I'm around." Abernathy flopped to the ground. "I need a nap. Wake me when it's time to eat."

At his words, Adam came forward. "What do you intend to eat? Not the horses." He still held his sword.

"No, not the horses. I saw some wolves hunting deer to the west of here. Three or four of them should tide me over."

"The deer or the wolves?" Adam asked. His sword dipped a little.

"Either." Abernathy chuckled.

I figured he was joking, but knew I needed to make it clear. "The wolves are off limits. They are Locanis," I said and quickly glanced at Joanna and Adam. They heard me and I knew Joanna, at least would have more questions.

"I know they are Locanis," Abernathy replied, smacking his lips together. "Werewolf meat is delicious."

Joanna gasped, stepping back from him.

Adam ran to Joanna and put an arm around her, his sword out in front of them.

"I'm kidding," he said, resting his head on his front paws.

"Did you say there were deer to the west?" Christopher asked, changing the subject.

"That's right."

"I'm going hunting. Adam? Joanna? Jasmine? Want to join me?"

"Thanks, but I think I'll stay here with Abernathy," I said.

Joanna nodded. "If you men think you can handle the hunt without us, I'll start a fire." She smiled to let Adam know she was okay.

"Are you sure? I don't think it's a good idea for you to stay here." Adam eyed the dragon.

"She'll be fine." Abernathy closed his eyes. "I'm going to sleep." To prove his point, he was snoring in seconds.

Christopher came over to me. "You going to be all right?"

"Definitely. Thanks for asking." I rolled my eyes and punched him in the arm playfully.

He kissed my cheek. "If Abernathy hadn't brought up your birthday, I would have. I even brought you a gift."

"No, you didn't." That was a nice surprise.

"Yes, I did. I'll give it to you later. Happy birthday, Jasmine."

"Thanks." I hugged him, grateful for the recent changes in our relationship. He seemed to really be trying. It felt nice. With my mom, dad, and Troy taken, and Laeddin no longer required to be around me, I needed a friend, and I was grateful for him.

Once Adam and Christopher rode away, Joanna came over. "Want to collect rocks while I gather firewood?"

I knew she meant rocks for the fire so that it wouldn't spread into the dry field. "Sure. But, I'll catch up. I need to get my horse."

"Bon." She went over to her horse and the two of them headed into the trees.

I went the other direction. My horse was on the far side of the clearing eating grass. I glanced back, making sure no one was watching, before using my vampire speed to get to the horse quickly. "Easy," I said, when my horse reared. "Calm down. You're okay. The big dragon might look scary, but it won't eat you. You have my word."

"And I know how well you keep your word."

The voice surprised me. He sounded familiar, but that was impossible. Still, my vampire abilities went into full supernatural mode as I tried to find who was speaking. "Who's there?" I couldn't see anyone. "Come out," I demanded.

OceanofPDF.com

A LITTLE AWKWARD

"STILL BOSSY, I SEE."

Instantly, I knew who it was. "Laeddin."

He appeared in front of me like a breath a fresh air. My horse whinnied and tried to pull away, but I held his reins keeping him steady. My heart raced. "What are you doing here? How did you find me?" I was happy to see him though.

Laeddin wore a muslin shirt with the sleeved rolled up, blue jeans and brown shoes. His cuff tattoos were gone and I knew that was because he was free. No longer a genie tethered to a bottle or a cave, but able to roam wherever he wished.

"It wasn't too hard."

"I'm glad you're here." I hugged him. It felt only a little awkward. "It's so good to see you."

"And you," he said, stepping out of my arms. "I'm grateful for what you did." He shoved his hands in his front pockets. "At first I was upset, but it means a lot to know you cared so much for me."

"Of course," I said, tugging on the reins of my horse. "I do care about you." That was true. And I always would. "Did you want to meet Joanna?" Confusion rushed through my heart. I believed he and I were friends. But he'd been gone quite some time. Not because he had to be, but because he didn't want to be around. That hurt my feelings.

"No, thank you for the offer. But I just came to bring you something."

"Oh, okay." I gritted my teeth. "So you're just popping in and then poof, disappearing again." I walked away, frustrated and upset.

"Hey." He came up beside me. "I can't help with this for the same reason Abernathy can't. It isn't our destiny. It's yours. All I can do is give you my support and assist you if you need it."

"Well, that's stupid," I said, my irritation growing. "The world is in chaos. I'm barely eighteen. Don't you think it would be better if you or Abernathy took care of Sharra?"

He shook his head. "No. I don't. You may not understand now, but you will." He stopped. "Let me show you."

"No, you know what? Don't bother." I picked up speed, looking for rocks as I went. I nearly tripped over one. Stopped and picked it up, placing it in the horses satchel.

"Jasmine, I'm sorry," he said softly. He stopped walking.

I sighed, glancing back at him, and let out a heavy breath of unease. "Me too, Laeddin." I went over and hugged him again. "And I wish you the best. Always."

"I know," he said, squeezing me tight, as though his life depended on me. "But thankfully I'm not in the business of granting wishes any longer." He winked and I laughed.

I hadn't meant to say wish, but it'd come out anyway. "Okay, what do you want to show me?"

"Your future." He let me go.

For some reason seeing my future terrified me. "You can do that?"

"Of course." Then he shrugged. "The future is always changing depending on a person's choices, but as of this moment, I can show it to you. I think you'll like what you see."

That lifted my spirits. "Really?"

"Yep. Here, give me your hand." He held out his hand for me to take.

I hesitated, unsure whether I really wanted to see it, but decided I did and put my hand in his. Immediately, I was swept away.

I saw myself as though from above. In the vision or whatever, I stood in front of Sharra. All of the jewels were on my head. So that was good. I collected them all. Sharra spoke, but I couldn't hear what she said. Then we fought and she was defeated, her body lay on the ground, crumpled and bloodied.

"I defeat her," I whispered, in awe. Seeing the blood turned my stomach. I didn't want to kill anyone.

"That's right, Jasmine. You win."

While I watched, Sharra's body dissipated. In an instant my wings returned to my back. Joy filled my heart. "I get my wings back."

"Of course."

The vision changed and I saw my mom and dad. They were safe as is Troy. I hugged my parents. Kissed Troy. We were all crying, but happy tears.

The vision shifted again and I was in my grandfather's back yard. There were hundreds of creatures of all kinds there, sitting is white chairs facing a white gazebo decorated with thousands of pixilettes. "It's a wedding," I said, wondering whose it could be.

Then I saw my dad walking me down the aisle. "What? It's mine."

I glanced back at the gazebo again and saw Troy there in a white tuxedo with black trousers and a matching black bow tie. He looked so handsome it made my heart hurt and it felt like my heart would break all over again.

"Did you want to see more?"

"Yes," I whispered, a hand covering my mouth.

The vision shifted once more. Three children played in the yard of the family castle in Sharra. Two boys and a girl. The boys looked like Troy while the girl looked like me. As they played, the boys would randomly transform into dragons while the girl made her wings appear and disappear at will as they flew through the air and ran in the grass. The scene was so beautiful it made my heart ache. Tears ran down my face. "Is this real?"

"It can be," Laeddin said. "You just need to believe it." His voice turned determined. "I know you can do anything, Jasmine. I've never doubted and neither should you."

"Thank you," I said and the vision was gone.

"You're welcome." Laeddin hugged me again. "If you ever need me, all you have to do is say my name. I'll be there."

I wiped the tears from my face. "Thank you for sharing that with me, Laeddin," I said, but he was already gone. A harsh laugh escaped my throat as I tugged the horse forward. I still needed to find rocks for the fire.

"Jasmine," Joanna called.

I turned. She was looking at a formed rock circle for a fire.

"How did you get the rock circle done so fast?" she asked. In her arms, she carried a handful of sticks and dropped them in the center of the large rock ring.

"I didn't - " I paused. "Laeddin." It had to be. He'd done it for me. "I'll help you collect more firewood."

"Thanks, but why are you smiling?" Joanna had a curious look on her face.

"Oh, I didn't realize." I giggled, surprising myself, and put both hands over my mouth and nose.

Abernathy opened his eyes. "Jasmine, what are you up to?"

"Nothing. I just discovered something about myself."

"Is that so?" the dragon asked.

I didn't respond, but checked on our little group.

Abernathy seemed content to let me go without answering his question.

It was dark and the sky shone clear. Millions of bright stars twinkled above.

We set up our shelters and started a fire. Adam, who hadn't said much since the dragon landed, still kept to himself.

He sat beside Joanna, staring at the flames licking the wood like a hungry animal.

I had no way to guess his thoughts, but couldn't help thinking of the man I knew.

It occurred to me that time and choices really could change a person. Adam was proof of that.

Joanna seemed content, at peace even. I admired the way she handled all of life's challenges. Nothing seemed to bother her.

I wondered if her lack of fear was because of righteous purpose or that she was coocoo for coco puffs.

OceanofPDF.com

A RAINBOW

CHRISTOPHER SAT NEXT TO ME, our backs facing Abernathy, who had gone back to sleeping.

They hadn't been able to kill a deer, or even find one, though Adam mentioned wolf and deer tracks.

Adam and Joanna ate food from their packs.

Chris and I didn't have any, and that was okay. It wasn't necessary.

Abernathy had mentioned celebrating my birthday, but he snored softly as though he didn't remember that we had plans.

I'd heard plenty of stories from my mom about him over the years. For the dragon, sleeping wasn't out of character.

Celebrating with Adam, Joanna, Abernathy, and Chris would be nice, but I wouldn't mind if we didn't celebrate at all.

Nothing could compare to what Troy did for me.

Making the unicorn blood cake and proposing marriage.

My heart sank for a moment at the thought of him. How I missed him. But then I remembered the vision Laeddin showed me. He let me see my future. And what a future it would be. Everything was going to be okay. I would beat Sharra. I would marry Troy and we would have children.

My future seemed so bright in comparison to the present. But the only way to get there was by doing what had to be done here and now, and that meant getting the last two pieces of the crown.

A surge of urgency lifted me off my feet. "We should go," I said startling the others, including Abernathy who lifted his head mid snore.

"It's late," Adam said. "We don't want to travel in the dark, especially with the wolves so close." He picked up a stick and stuck it in the fire, watching the end burn.

"Right, I get that, but Christopher and I can fly there on Abernathy." I glanced at the dragon to see what he thought of the idea.

"I think we should wait until morning," Abernathy said, smacking his lips.

"Fine. Then I think I'll go to sleep." I patted Christopher's shoulder as I passed him.

"Hang on," Abernathy said, readjusting. "I still need to give you your birthday present."

Adam stood, pulling Joanna up with him as though he were threatened.

"What's wrong, mi amour?" Joanna gave Adam a concerned look.

"Nothing. Just making sure that thing doesn't squash you or burn you to a crisp."

Abernathy barked a laugh. "I won't squish anyone, Adam Henry." He smacked his lips. "Jasmine, princess of Sharra, do you trust me?"

"Of course."

His throat vibrated, almost like a purr.

I took that to mean he was happy and that made me smile.

"Good," he said. "I'm going to put out the fire for a moment, so I need everyone to move to the side of me out of the way."

Adam and Joanna moved, as did Christopher and me.

Abernathy faced the fire and blew with a force like a gale wind until the flames went out, leaving us in darkness, except for the stars. "Jasmine, please come over here."

"It's difficult to see," Adam said.

"Not for long," Abernathy replied.

I could see just fine and went over to stand directly in front of the dragon.

"Now hold still," he said.

"Okay." A shudder of nervousness ran through me. I had no idea what was about to happen.

Abernathy took another deep breath and sent a blast of fire at me.

I gasped in fear, thinking I would be charred crispy. The dragon's fire hit me, but it didn't hurt. "What is this?" Abernathy's flames danced along my skin, burning away my clothes. There was heat, of course, but it wasn't unbearable.

"What are you doing to her?" Adam asked, taking a step forward, but unable to move further. It was an instinct to protect, even if he didn't like me. It was nice to see that his kindness and courage went deeper than just protecting Joanna, though she came first.

"Watch," Abernathy said when he stopped sending fire at me.

The flames continued to lick all over me until my body was engulfed. My terror subsided and as I watched, the flames changed from red's, orange's, and yellow's to the colors representing the seven magics. It was beautiful.

"What does this mean?" I asked, my eyes wide with interest.

"That the magic and strength you were born with is still there. You have the power within you - all that you need and more."

"But my wings - " I began.

"Were an extension of you, yes, but you can see the seven magics still reside inside of you," he went on.

Tears filled my eyes. The colorful flames were proof. "Thank you, Abernathy," I said.

"You're welcome. I thought it important for you to physically see all that you possess on the inside is still there."

I nodded, wiping away my tears.

Acknowledging Christopher, he added. "You'd better be ready to cover her up once the flames goes out."

"Oh, absolutely." He ran over to our shelter and came back with my cloak.

"Happy birthday, Jasmine." Abernathy turned away, resting his head on his paws, going back to sleep.

I shook my head, deciding I agreed with my mom. I liked Abernathy, in spite of his quirkiness.

"What am I looking at?" Adam asked softly, his shock evident in his voice.

"Isn't she beautiful?" Joanna smiled wistfully.

I smiled back, unable to speak.

"Sure, but how? Why?" Adam shook his head. "I feel like nothing makes sense anymore."

"For me, it's as if life finally does makes sense." She snuggled against Adam's chest. "That probably is confusing to you, but in comparison to the visions I receive, this is extraordinary, and I feel somewhat normal." She kissed him gently on the lips.

Adam hugged her. "My Red, I don't understand your visions, but I respect them because they are part of you, and I love you."

"I love you, too."

The flames surrounding me died and I turned away from Joanna and Adam. Christopher had my cloak and wrapped it around my shoulders. "Thanks," I whispered. Turning back to Joanna and Adam, I said, "I'm turning in. "Night."

"Night," Adam said.

Joanna ran over and hugged me. "Good night, my friend." She kissed my cheek. "Happy birthday."

"Thanks," I said, and watched as she went back over to Adam.

With his arm around her, they walked over to her shelter and went inside.

"Night, Abernathy."

The dragon grunted a response and then began snoring.

I went to the tent. Christopher held the tent flap open and I went inside.

"Let me know when you're decent," he said.

"Will do." I quickly put on my other pants and a white shirt. I didn't have another pair of boots, which was unfortunate, but I'd worry about that in the morning. "You can come in," I said, going over to my blankets and laying on top.

Christopher came in. "You've had a busy day," he said, falling into a sitting position beside me.

I laid back. "Yeah."

"Who knew you had a rainbow inside of you?" He smirked.

I couldn't hold back a smile. Hope burned within for the first time in a long while. "Not me," I said.

"You still have the seven magics in you," Christopher said. "The power is still there," he added reiterating.

"I guess so."

"You are more powerful than you believed." Christopher studied me like I was an odd bird.

"I think you're right." I stared up at the ceiling, thinking about how far he and I had come since I first met him all those years ago. "What do you do for the vampires?"

"That's a weird question," he said.

"I mean I know your job description. You're in charge of the vampires, but what do you normally do when you aren't going on weird quests with me?"

"I help vampires in whatever capacity they need. I also make sure they stay out of trouble." He lay down beside me.

"Oh? You must have some stories," I said, closing my eyes.

He chuckled easily. "Oh yeah. The other day, I had to deal with a vamp in love with a chayot."

"Yikes. How did that end?" My mom had stories about Gabe and the chayot. They were all about the humans and most despised supernaturals, especially vampires.

"The angels wanted to kill the female vampire as well as the love-sick chayot, but I convinced them that it was possible for them to love each other, keep their secrets, and obey the rules."

"It was that easy, huh?" I couldn't believe it, surprised he didn't have to share a horror story.

"Well, no it wasn't that easy. I nearly had to tell your mother we would be going to war with the chayot. It almost became a real life Romeo and Juliet, but I helped their leader to see that it would all be fine, and he grudgingly agreed to let the couple alone."

"Sounds intense."

"It was, but I enjoy helping the vampires out."

My heart softened. "What about you? Any vampires who've caught your eye?"

He laughed again. "Let's not talk about me." He sat up and pulled something from his pocket. "Here."

"What is it?" I took what he held. It was wrapped in fabric and tied with twine.

When I undid the bow, the fabric fell open to reveal a dragon carved out of wood. I gasped. "Christopher." I held it up, studying the perfectly carved scales and the wings that reminded me of Troy. "You made this?" It was a question, but I knew this was what he'd been carving earlier.

"Yes. Do you like it?" He gave me a soft smile.

"I love it." I hugged him as tears threatened. "So much." I sat back on my bedding and looked at him. "This is the best gift," I said, wiping at my eyes.

He lay back down. "If you're happy with dragon boy, then I'm happy for you," he said. He was sincere but sad and again I thought about how much I wanted him to have his own happily ever after.

"I am happy with dragon boy," I said and laughed. "He asked me to marry him." It felt good to tell someone.

"And you said yes?" He closed his eyes, but I heard the pain.

"I did."

He rolled onto his side, away from me. "Then I guess we better get him back in one piece."

"And my parents too," I added, laying down, clutching the dragon against my chest.

"Happy birthday, Jasmine."

"Thanks, Chris."

OceanofPDF.com

HER VISIONS

IN THE MORNING, Abernathy offered to give us a ride to the chateau. I wanted to say yes. Adam wanted us to say yes as well. He was so done with Chris and me. But Joanna wanted to stay with us. She wanted to see it through to the end. And whatever Joanna wanted, Adam made happen. I wanted Joanna to stay with me as well. So I thanked Abernathy, but told him we would ride.

"Very good, vampire. But remember what I said."

I knew he meant Arthur and especially Sharra. "I will."

The dragon flew away, his large golden wings sparkling in the sunlight, like an apparition in the clouds. I watched him go feeling only a little sadness. Mostly I was ready to complete my mission. Get all of the crown pieces and go after Sharra.

Joanna urged Adam to pick up the pace. I went along happily, in an effort to get us to the chateau sooner rather than later. That day and the next went by without any incidence.

Chris and I mostly kept to ourselves, even during breaks.

I could tell Joanna had more questions, but she didn't seek me out. I knew it had to do with Adam. They spoke often, mostly about me and Christopher, and all they had witnessed the last few days. They both agreed the dragon was incredible.

The biggest strain between them was that Joanna wanted to see our journey through to the end, and Adam did not.

During our afternoon break the following day, I heard Joanna tell Adam about her latest vision. She'd had it the night before. An angel came to her and told her the time would soon come that she would need to lead France.

"What do you think of her visions?" Christopher asked. He'd obviously been listening in on their private conversation, same as me.

"I believe her and I believe in her. Joanna is eccentric, but she isn't crazy. I feel we could've been sisters had we been born in the same time - and to the same parents. It's like she's me without the vampire abilities, the wings, or the magic. If she can do what she does now and will do in the future without all I have, then surely I can do what I need to do. It's possible." I paused, leaned over and smacked him on the arm. "Especially since I have you to help me out." Memories of what Laeddin showed me yesterday came back, sending a jolt of happiness into my heart. I could do this.

"Thanks, Jasmine. I appreciate the vote of confidence." He smiled. "I'm determined not to let you down."

"I know you won't."

Adam turned around in his saddle. "We will be at the chateau by tomorrow afternoon." He trotted his horse off the trail and over to some random shade trees. Three of them stood in the center of an open field. The stream still ambled by not to far from the trees. "Let's take a break," he said and climbed off his horse.

I wanted to continue on and brought my horse to a stop.

Adam noticed and sighed. "The horses need to rest, Jasmine."

"Fine." I nodded, urging my horse over to the trees. Once they were tethered and happily snacking on wild grass, Joanna and I went to the stream and filled some containers for the horses as well as ourselves.

"Are you nervous now that we are close to Chinon?" Joanna sipped some water from her hands.

"A little," I admitted.

She smiled. "Did you ever think when you first started this quest that you'd wind up here? She stood., rubbing her hands along her arms.

"Not in my wildest dreams," I admitted.

"But it's okay, right? That you're here with me?" For the first time, I saw a look of concern cross her face.

"It's better than okay." I set down my water and wiped my hands on my pants. "I'm especially grateful I had the chance to meet you."

"I feel the same way." She hugged me.

It surprised me how physical she was. When I was younger, I studied Joan of Arc. From what I read, I believed her to be more guy than girl, but she was totally girly and she loved to fight, wear pants, and do all the things a man could do. "You remind me a lot of myself," she said, meeting my eyes.

"I'll take that as a compliment."

"We should be going." Adam came over. He glanced at Joanna and then at me. "You two really do make a pair." I saw a glimmer of a smile pull on his lips before he cleared his throat. "We have a lot of ground to cover before nightfall."

I patted Joanna's arm, picked up the water and carried it over to the horses. When they had their fill and Joanna and Adam ate a snack, Christopher climbed on his horse and patted the horse's neck. It whinnied in response. "Who's a good boy? Huh. Who's a good boy?" Christopher asked in a soft voice.

I shook my head and got on my horse. "Who's a good boy?" I patted my horse the way Christopher had.

"Um, yeah." He cleared his throat and laughed. "Your horse is a girl," he said.

"Really?" I peeked at the horse's undercarriage. "How can you tell?"

"Surely you know how to tell a difference between a boy and a girl?" He chuckled again.

"Oh, right. Fine." I looked away, embarrassed. "Yes, I know."

"You sure?"

"Stop it." I giggled.

"Let's go, then," Adam said.

Adam and Joanna and their horses got back on to the trail.

Christopher and I went after them.

"We'll be there soon," Christopher began. "Are you ready for what you have to do when we get there."

"Yes. Of course. I'll have to find what I'm looking for. That could take another week." I hadn't meant to sound so frustrated, but I hadn't realized I was upset until the words came out.

"There must be a way to speed up the process?" Christopher's voice was quiet.

"Well, in the past I've been able to sense it when I'm close, but I have to get close." I shook my head. "What if there are miles and miles of tunnels under the chateau? That's what I'm worried about."

He reached over and patted my hand. "It'll all work out."

"I gu - "

Three Locanis appeared to the right of us, their enormous bodies rushing to cut us off from Joanna and Adam. "Hang on," I said to Christopher as I rode over to Crayith. "What's wrong?"

"It's Gilved. We found him last night. He was dead. Drained of all blood." As he spoke, he growled, baring his teeth.

"Oh, no. Crayith I'm so sorry." There was no point asking what happened. If he was drained of blood, then it had to be a vampire. "I hope you don't think Christopher or I had anything to do with that."

"That's exactly what we think." He bent his head, ready to attack.

"We didn't," I said as my terrified horse reared and backed up.

Christopher was suddenly beside me. Before I had a second to think, using his super speed, he slid in front of me, and uppercut Crayith in the mouth, sending the wolf flying backward.

I snapped out of it just as Emery came at me, her teeth bared and the hair on her neck raised. "Stop," I shouted as I put Emery in a chokehold. "I can promise you; we did not do what you're suggesting." A quick glance revealed Adam and Joanna were far enough ahead they didn't know what was going on with us and I was glad. I didn't want them getting hurt.

"It doesn't matter which of you blood suckers did it," she said as she snapped her teeth, trying to get away. "All of you deserve to be destroyed."

Crayith righted himself and circled me and Emery. "Let her go, Jasmine or I'll shred you."

"I told you we cannot die," I said.

Christopher sent the other Locanis into a heap and ran over to me. Crayith turned and snapped at him. "Well now that's not entirely true, is it?"

I loosened my grip on Emery, releasing her. She trotted over to Crayith. The Locanis leader faced Christopher while Emery kept her focus on me.

"It's rarely accomplished," Christopher began. "So I would suggest you stop now, or I'll have to stop holding back and destroy you."

"Keep talking, leech," Crayith said. "She told us how to kill you."

"She?" That confused me.

Crayith went over and nudged the other Locanis up. Emery joined him and the three of them stalked toward us.

Just then, Joanna looked back and saw what we were dealing with. She shouted to Adam before turning her horse and coming back for us.

"Don't hurt the humans, please," I said to Crayith.

"We won't." He shook his head in obvious frustration. "If it wasn't you, then it was the vampire, Arthur. Gilved is dead and was tossed aside like he meant nothing. We cannot stand for that. He needs to pay. You all do. The sooner the world is rid of vampires, the better."

"I believe that is why we were sent to this realm," Emery said, grinning manically. "To destroy all of the bloodsuckers."

If they only knew.

"Joanna, stay back. Don't go near them," Adam yelled as he urged his horse to move faster.

"What if we help you find Arthur and bring him to justice?" Joanna asked from behind.

Her sword was drawn and her long read hair had fallen from its braid so that it fell around her face like a bright, red fire. She looked fierce, as though she could take on the world. In that moment I believed she could right any wrong. Conquer any injustice. More than anything, I wanted to follow her.

Crayith noticed too. He straightened, and a hushed reverence came of him and the other two wolves. "What do you have in mind, warrior?" he asked her.

"We will find Arthur, have him arrested, and make sure he never sees the outside of a jail cell for the rest of his days." She bowed. "You have my word."

Crayith nodded. "I believe that is your intention, but you must understand something about your companions. They aren't what you believe them to be."

Joanna stood up straight, relaxing her sword. "What do you mean?"

Adam came up beside her. He held the reins of his horse as it strained to get away. Adam didn't seem to notice, just fought harder to keep the horse in check. "You shouldn't make promises you cannot keep, Red," he said.

She gave him an intense look that said it all. "I will keep my promise to them or die trying."

Adam allowed his shoulders to slouch a moment. "Very well, Joanna." He straightened, then faced the wolves. "I am with Joanna. We will find Arthur and bring him to justice." He stuck his sword in the ground in front of him and knelt on one knee. "You have my word."

"Yes," I agreed. "We will do what it takes. Christopher is a Hunter. Between all of us, we can find and defeat Arthur."

"But first we need to find him," Christopher said, the voice of reason.

"We can help with that," Emery howled.

Crayith joined in. "Follow us."

OceanofPDF.com

KING ARTHUR

WE LET the wolves track Arthur until we came to a thick forest just outside the city of Vaucouleurs. It was nearly midnight. Millions of stars shone in the night sky. When we reached the forest edge, Crayith and the other wolves stopped.

"He's in the village," Crayith said. "I can smell him."

Christopher leaned forward. "I can hear him. Jasmine, we need to get in there." He stepped from the trees.

"Agreed." I turned to Joanna. "Stay here. We'll be back." I paused. "Please. It isn't safe for you to come with us."

She wanted to resist. I could see it on her face. Finally she nodded. "Are you sure? Adam and I can be of great help."

Adam looked uncomfortable. "I feel partly responsible for bringing him out with us."

"Don't worry about it. We'll handle the situation. Stay with Crayith." I looked at the lead wolf. "You'll make sure no harm comes to them?"

"You have my word." The wolf bowed.

"Thank you." I followed after Christopher. He reached the edge of the village and was trying to act casual, although he wasn't doing a very good job. There was only one other person outside and he was retching behind a water barrel. Also, Christopher was tall and lean and looked like an Adonis. Like the town Adam and Joanna came from, this village was small. It smelled of burning wood and animal droppings. "Where is he?" I asked when I came up alongside him.

"There." He pointed up on the roof of the building. Music poured from the ground floor entry. "It's a tavern." He stopped and faced me. "Why don't you let me handle this alone?"

I hadn't shared my beliefs about who Arthur was, but in that moment, I got the feeling he already knew. "What are you going to do?" I knew Joanna wanted to bring Arthur to justice, but the only way to do that without killing a vampire was to place it in a tomb and starve it.

I'd seen the inside of the mountain called Athwana Meyana. It was an elfish term meaning Dark Soul's Sleep.

Within, the mountain was filled with vampires and other supernatural creatures who had done a great wrong. The tomb was their justice.

The creatures weren't dead, but they weren't alive either.

My mom said it was an endless torment.

I shuddered as I thought about what that must be like. I hoped I would never find out.

My mom took me to the mountain and showed me inside once.

Sharra had done the same.

It seemed like the right time to voice my concerns about Arthur. "I believe Arthur is the same vampire Sharra wakened from the tomb."

"You think?"

I told him what I'd remembered. He listened intently. "All the more reason I should go after Arthur alone."

"No. Chris, I'm not going to let you do that."

"Jasmine, I know you want to help and I appreciate that, but you're eighteen years old. I've been dealing with vampires for nearly fifty years."

I placed a hand on my hip and was about to say more, but there was a scream.

"Please, stay here." He ran into the building where the scream came from.

I waited several minutes, feeling uncomfortable. Using my vampire hearing, I tried to find Christopher's voice among the patrons in the building he'd gone into.

It was difficult, but I finally heard him. It sounded like he was on the roof.

Then I saw him. He was standing near the edge.

"Come on, Arthur. Let the human go," Christopher said.

There was a cracking sound and I knew Arthur broke the human's neck. Anger boiled through my veins. This guy needed to be put away.

"I thought you were using Lance to feed. What happened to him?" I heard Christopher ask.

"The Locanis killed him." Arthur tossed the dead human off the roof.

I ran and caught him before he hit the ground. His eyes were open and stared at nothing. "I'm sorry," I whispered, closing them.

"Didn't you kill one of theirs?" Christopher returned.

"I did, but it wasn't my intention," Arthur growled.

"And what was your intention? Keep him as a pet?"

"Perhaps. I'll guess you'll never know." Arthur laughed but it wasn't one of mirth. It chilled my veins. "Now I suggest you let me go or I might have to go after your little vampire girlfriend. And you don't want to see what I'll do to her."

"I don't think you understand who you're dealing with, Arthur. Do as I say and this doesn't have to be painful." Christopher's voice sounded lethal.

Their conversation wasn't going to end well.

I knew Christopher could handle himself, but I didn't want to leave anything to chance. I refused to lose another that I cared about.

And over the past few days I truly had come to care about Christopher. After setting the dead man down carefully, I used my vampire speed and ran away from the building.

Turned and gauged how high I would need to jump to land on the roof. I could do it. At least I used to be able to.

Arthur was laughing again.

He and Chris circled each other.

I watched as Arthur went after Chris, but the Hunter moved out of the way at the last minute and got Arthur by the neck.

"Good, but not good enough." Arthur slipped from Christopher's grasp. "Surely you must know who I am. Have you never heard of King Arthur of the round table?"

"Your history means nothing to me." Christopher went after Arthur but the vampire dashed out of the way, jumping off the roof and onto the ground with a thud. He studied me, his eyes narrowing with malice. "Vampire girl."

"Arthur you've broken the law and must be put down," I said, trying to sound like the princess I was.

"Surely you don't think I care about whatever law you're talking about. I work for the Vampire Queen, Sharra, and she has no such law. In fact, she believes we should be ruling this realm as well as our own land. And that means if I need a feed on a frail human or a werewolf, then so be it."

For a moment, I forgot I was back in time. He was right, of course. During this century, Sharra had ruled, not my mom. From what I learned, Sharra cared only for vampires.

"Why don't you join me? Together we can have a great time roaming the world, taking what we want." His eyes narrowed further. "Strange, though." His head tilted to the side. "Sharra would've had to change you, yet I smell no lingering humanity. Makes me wonder how old you are." He crossed his arms, waiting for me to respond.

While he was talking Christopher jumped off the roof and worked to get behind Arthur.

I decided to keep the vampire talking. "As a human, you believed in equality and cared deeply for all men and women as long as they were honest, forthright and courageous. Why have you changed so much?" I kept my hands at my sides, trying to seem relaxed.

He snorted. "I know what you're doing. I know Christopher is behind me and that you're trying to stall, but it doesn't matter. I will answer your question." He gave me an odd smile. "The reason is simple. Lance. He came to Camelot, stole the trust of my men, and the heart of my dearest Guinevere." He closed his eyes a moment. "As you might imagine, I was devastated that one man could cause so much of an upheaval in a land and a kingdom, especially since I believed their hearts and minds to be true." He shook his head. "But Sharra showed me it's impossible for such a thing to exist. Every human has evil within them, including me, and given the proper motivation, that evil will take over."

I thought about his words. "You may be right, but that doesn't give you the right to destroy humanity before they have the opportunity to change, to become who they were meant to be."

"It gives me every right." His face contorted in a ferocious sneer. "Now I'm done talking." He whirled on Christopher, grabbed him by the neck, and sank his teeth into one of Christopher's shoulders.

A look of surprise came over the Hunter, but he quickly squashed that and began to fight, kicking and punching, but Arthur hung on.

He was stronger than Christopher.

As I stood there frozen, the fight slowly went out of Christopher. If I didn't do something, Christopher would be drained of blood and while he wouldn't be dead, he wouldn't be alive either.

At the thought, the frustration I felt turned to fury. He would not harm Christopher. I ran forward and with power I didn't know I possessed, pushed Arthur away from Chris. "Stop," I shouted.

Arthur wiped his mouth, eyeing me shrewdly. "Fine. I'll take your blood instead." He came at me. His speed had increased and I guessed it was from Chris's blood. Arthur grabbed my shoulders. I shoved against his chest, but he was strong and pulled me to him. I watched his fangs grow and knew he would sink his teeth into my neck in moments. I glanced at Christopher. He was greatly weakened by the blood loss and was still on his knees.

The tips of Arthur's fangs pierced my skin. Revulsion came over me. Could I stop him? All of the confidence I felt since meeting Joanna waned slightly.

"Jasmine, are you well?" I recognized Joanna's voice. I couldn't let Arthur hurt her or Adam. If I didn't do something now, they would both be killed. Arthur wouldn't spare them.

My fury built into a white-hot wrath.

Abernathy's words came to mind: I have the power within.

At that thought, the seven magics rushed to the surface and I knew what I needed to do.

"You will not harm another creature," I said quietly, and sank my fangs into his bare flesh where his neck met his shoulder.

He let out a surprised gasp, his fangs momentarily leaving me. In that moment, I grabbed hold of him, yanking him to me, and drank as though I'd been starved for centuries. I would drink him dry.

His head came up and he fought against me. "Let go of me," he cried, using all of his force, but I had the power of the seven magics at my full disposal. That meant I was stronger, faster, and more well equipped to handle Arthur or anyone. In that moment I thought I might even be able to defeat Sharra. A mangled growl escaped my throat and I sucked harder.

His blood tasted like Christopher's, but I also tasted new blood. I guessed it must've been from the human and the Locanis. The shifter's magic was in there too. Different. And while I wouldn't say it was gross, it reminded me a lot of the taste of troll blood.

Arthur's body weakened. His hands went slack. I nearly had him drained. It wouldn't be too much longer. I opened my eyes and saw Christopher watching me. His eyes shone with profound curiosity and I wondered why, until I saw that my body emanated the same glow as what Abernathy had done to me a few nights ago. The seven magics were pouring out of me.

I was surprised and my confidence grew as I sucked the rest of the blood from Arthur's body. When I finished, I withdrew my fangs, holding Arthur's body away from me. His eyes were closed, and his body was ashen. He looked empty, like a husk.

Revulsion overwhelmed me and I thought I might throw up.

Christopher noticed and came up behind him. "Let me take him." He grabbed Arthur under the arms and I let go.

"Where are you taking him?" I stepped back, feeling lightheaded. I'd never drained a vampire before.

"To Sharra." He glanced beyond me.

I turned to see Joanna, Adam, Crayith, Emery, and the other Locanis watching me. Looks of horror, disgust, surprise, and fear sat on their faces. Even Joanna was scared and unsure.

"I won't be gone long. I'll be back by morning." He looked like he wanted to say more, but with the audience, decided against it. Instead, he turned, and holding Arthur took off.

I knew as a Hunter, he had a way to get into the realm of Sharra without the necklace Silindra gave me, so I let him go.

The others stayed in place, like they were waiting for me to make the first move. I didn't know what to think. By the looks of them, they didn't want to be around me. Making a split decision, I ran into the woods, passing them as I went, and didn't stop until I came to a clearing on the other side.

"Abernathy," I called. "I need you." He said he could hear me. I leaned against one of the trees and waited.

My mind ran over all that I had done as I dropped down in the dirt and closed my eyes.

OceanofPDF.com

I'M A MONSTER

FROM WITHIN MY MIND, I witnessed Sharra torturing Troy.

Troy screamed. His body kept shifting from human to dragon form.

"Now tell me you don't love Jasmine. Tell me you wish to see her dead and I'll let you live," Sharra said.

"No," he said through clenched teeth.

Sharra touched the orb on the tip of her staff to Troy's abdomen. He screamed again, writhing in pain. His arms were in shackles and a large chain hung them up above his head. She went to him and cut a line along his neck with one of her nails.

"Stop it," I shouted, reaching out for him, though I didn't know where they were and I probably wasn't even in the same realm.

Sharra turned like she heard me.

She wore all black, her collar lace, and it came to just under her chin.

"Jasmine. It's so good of you to come. Look at Troy. You can't want him to suffer so much. Hurry, dear, or he'll be dead before you can bring the gems to me."

"You promised that we could trade," I said, though I was hesitant. "The crown for Troy and my parents. You promised." Wetness from my eyes fell on my cheeks.

She gave me a cruel smile. "I think even if I killed Troy, you'd still come and trade your parents for the crown. The half dragon dying won't change that." She cut him across the forehead. Blood dripped into his eyes.

"I'm coming Troy," I said, hoping he could see me. "I'm coming and I will save you." As I spoke, I felt my body fill with the seven magics and radiate from me.

Sharra turned from Troy, and she fully focused on me. "What's this?"

MY EYES OPENED IN A FLASH. It was still dark outside.

If possible, it felt even darker than before. I sat up. It immediately became clear the reason why. Abernathy had arrived and lay beside me.

His giant body giving off immense warmth and blocking out any light.

"Abernathy," I said, standing, rubbing the sleep from my eyes.

"Jasmine. You called for me?"

"Yes." I sighed in relief. "Thank you for coming."

"Where's the Hunter? Why has he left you alone?"

I quickly explained all that happened since he left. "I think even Joanna is disgusted with me after what I did," I said when I finished.

He nudged me with the tip of his great nose. "Perhaps, but you did what needed to be done."

I nodded. "I know, but she must think I'm a monster and it hurts to think she doesn't like me anymore."

A laugh rumbled deep in his throat and a wisp of smoke escaped his nose. "I understand, but does it matter? You've learned all I hoped you would learn from her and you saved them too. Shall I fly you to the chateau?"

I didn't respond right away, but fell against him, allowing my body and cheek to enjoy the warmth of his scales. Memories of the looks of Adam, Joanna, and the others' faces crossed my mind. The look of abhorrence and fear on Joanna's face was the hardest to take. She'd been able to handle werewolves and dragons, but seeing a vampire drain the life out of another vampire had done her in. I sighed, saddened. "Yes. Thank you, Abernathy," I said, sad I wouldn't get to say goodbye. I climbed up and situated myself at his neck, above his wings.

"Ready?"

"Yes." Despair over the way things ended with Joanna weighed on me, but I couldn't help the jolt of excitement at the idea of flying again. It'd been too long.

Abernathy must've sensed my eagerness. "You realize all you need to do is believe you deserve your wings more than she does and they'll return to you, right?" He walked to the middle of the clearing. His wings flapped once before we were lifted off the ground.

"So you've said." But I didn't believe him. Or maybe I didn't think I deserved them.

"If only you believed in yourself as much as I do. Then you would be flying on your own right now."

The vision of the future Laeddin showed me appeared in my mind. I had my wings then so I would get them back.

Just believe, I told myself. But nothing happened.

"Very well. Hang on." Abernathy sounded disappointed.

As we flew I looked down at the valley below, searching for Joanna, Adam, and the Locanis. I found Adam, Joanna, and the horses in the middle of the woods. They'd set up camp, but weren't asleep. They sat by each other. Both held their swords as though prepared for a battle. I guessed it was because of me. What I'd done pushed them both over the edge.

"I think you're misreading the situation," Abernathy said.

I didn't answer. It was obvious I wasn't and the dragon was trying to alleviate my melancholy.

In the distance, I saw the city of Chinon. It was much larger than the villages. Dozens and dozens of houses had been erected all around the chateau de chinon, which stood enormous and sprawling in the city's center. Flags danced in the breeze, snapping and cracking lightly.

"Where will you land?" I asked, searching for a good spot.

"There is a garden on the west of the chateau. I can land there though I'll destroy many of the flowers. But you'll be on your own until Christopher returns. I won't be able to stay."

I had a thought. "Why don't you just get close and I'll drop down? Then you won't have to land."

"A very good idea."

Since he'd known about the garden off the chateau, I wondered if he knew more. "Any idea how to get under the chateau?"

"Well, since you asked, yes, I do."

"You're kidding." I hadn't expected him to know the answer.

He chuckled, causing his whole body to rumble. "Where the garden meets the castle there are hundreds of climbing vines crawling up that wall. At the base, near the back corner is a rock, which protrudes just slightly out from the rest. Find it, press it, and a hidden door will be revealed. Get in that way." By the sound of his voice, he was fairly proud of himself.

"And how do you know that? You're too big to have figured it out on your own."

"Well, I'm sure if you think about it, you'll figure it out, not that it matters." I could hear the smile in his voice.

With a burst of affection, I leaned over and hugged him. "Thanks, Abernathy."

"You're welcome."

We came to the garden, which sprawled over nearly the whole quarter of the town. He got low. "Jump, vampire."

"Thanks again. See you soon."

He grunted. I brought my left leg over and slid down off his body. For the briefest moment I fell through the air and had a sensation where I believed I could catch the wind and fly, but I landed on the ground with a thud.

I looked up and waved.

Abernathy came around so that his large head was near mine. "Be quick about it. You aren't the only one in the castle."

I hadn't thought about that. "I will."

The dragon flew away. I ran over to the wall. It was as Abernathy said. Climbing vines covered nearly the entire expanse. I went to the side near the back wall as he said. The greenery was so dense, the foliage made it hard to see the rock that stuck out further than the rest. I searched until sunlight started to shine in the sky.

Any minute, gardeners and others who worked in the castle would be getting up to start their day. I needed to hurry.

"What are you doing?"

I froze a moment, worried I'd been caught, but glanced back and saw that it was Christopher. Relief washed over me. I was happy to see him. "Hi." My body sagged with relief. "Did you handle Arthur?" I asked, going back to running my hand along the wall, hoping to feel the rock Abernathy mentioned.

"I did. He's sealed away and won't be a bother to anyone for a very long time. If we're lucky, forever."

"You know that's not true," I said. In our present Sharra awakened Arthur. He would be back to causing trouble or he already was.

"I know." He crouched down beside me. "So what are you doing?"

"Abernathy told me there was a lever along this wall to open a hidden door that leads under the castle."

"What's it look like?" he asked, searching too.

I shrugged. "He said it sticks out further than the others, but it's difficult to tell with all of these vines."

"Hmmm." He thought a minute and then started at the edge and began running his hand along the base, where the grass met the wall. "Aha," he said, pressing in.

"You found it?"

To answer my question, a door groaned open. It wasn't very tall, but it was wide enough and high enough that we could enter if we bent over.

I gently pushed aside the vines that hid it and stepped inside. There was a stairway that went down deep. "Let's go." I ran down the steps, moving rapidly.

"Don't go too fast. That might effect your special sense or whatever you need to locate the crown."

But I shouldn't have worried. The crown pieces already embedded in my flesh began to burn. I reached the bottom of the stairs and had to choose whether to go left or right. I went right. Immediately, the burning subsided. "This way." I went left.

"How do you know?" Chris followed right behind me.

"The gems. They stopped scorching my skin when I went right. This way they're searing something fierce."

"Got it. Well, then lead the way homing pigeon."

"Nice." I looked back and gave him a dirty look.

The tunnels under the chateau were the same as the other places I'd been to collect the pieces of the crown. It was also a labyrinth. The pungent scent of rotting dirt radiated the strongest along with other putrid smells I didn't want to think about. It was pitch black. The sounds of beetles, spiders and other creepy crawling things skittered all around us.

I reached the end of a tunnel and had to make another choice. Going right, the gems burned more strongly.

"Someone is coming," Christopher said. He still walked behind me because the corridor was too slight for the two of us to walk side-by-side.

"Let's hurry up then." I sped up. Halfway down was a door. The jewels burned so hot my eyes watered. "Goodness. Ouch." It felt like knives stabbed into my head. "The crown piece is in here."

OceanofPDF.com

PAIN IN MY HEAD

I PUSHED OPEN the door and went inside. "Wow, these really hurt. It's never done this before."

Christopher took my arm. "Maybe because you're nearly finished collecting them all?"

"I don't know." I fell to my knees.

"Whoever is down here with us will be upon us soon. I'm going to go slow them down. Hurry." He went to the door and ran into Adam. "What are you doing here?"

Joanna pushed past him and came over to me. "Hey, Jasmine." She looked devastated.

"Joanna?" I held onto my head with one hand. "I thought you - "

"I was. Afraid of you, if that's what you were going to say. And I thought you a monster." She shook her head. "I'm guessing some of your kind are, but not you. Just as Ansel Grafton is a human monster, Arthur was a bloodsucking monster, but not you." She knelt beside me. "I'm sorry, Jasmine."

"No." The pain in my head was so strong I thought I might die. "I'm sorry you had to see me like that."

"Never you mind. Just tell me how I can help."

Adam and Christopher were still talking in the doorway, but because of the pain I couldn't hear what they said.

"Jasmine?" Joanna asked.

"I need to dig up a box," I said.

"Okay." She looked around the room. "Where should I start?"

"I'm guessing right where I'm kneeling." I tried to stand. Joanna helped. She moved me out of the way. With the sharp edge of her sword, she stabbed into the dirt.

"Joanna, what are you doing?" Adam asked.

"I know, Adam. Treating my sword like this is blasphemy, but it has to be done. You can sharpen the sword when we return home." She didn't look at him, but kept digging while she spoke.

In what seemed like record time, Joanna had the box. "Don't open it," I said when she went for the latch. "Please," I added, sorry I spooked her.

"Okay." She handed it to me.

"Thank you for your help, but I need to do the rest." I looked at Christopher for help. I didn't think the assassin would go after anyone except me, but I didn't want to take any chances.

"Let's go. Jasmine needs some privacy." Christopher tried to round Adam and Joanna up. Joanna moved to stand next to Adam, but they wouldn't leave.

Christopher shrugged. "Do your thing, Jasmine."

Black spots danced in front of my eyes. If I didn't hurry I thought I might pass out. "Just stay back and no matter what happens don't interfere. I've done this before and it'll be fine."

Joanna looked worried. "Okay," she said.

Adam nodded, but looked like he'd rather be anywhere but here. Soon enough, he would realize the supernatural was more than just an irritation. He would become one of us. As would Joanna.

I opened the latch. As expected, the assassin appeared.

Blades formed in my hands with along with the lightning.

"Welcome Jasmine. I've been expecting you," the assassin said.

"Will you tell me where the final piece of the crown is buried?" I hoped so. I didn't know if I could win a battle. The throbbing pain pierced so strong; my limbs shook. I tried to stand, but my legs wouldn't support me.

"I was created to protect the elven crown at all costs. Though code demands I do my best to slay you, I will tell you where it lies." He came forward and whispered the location in my ear.

"Why am I in so much pain?" The words slurred as they came out.

"It is because the crown is nearing completion. After you retrieve this piece, there is only one more. Soon you will possess all the power and your body must be prepared. The pain will subside in a few days' time."

That was good to know.

"But now we must fight. And you must destroy me. Lift your swords." He stood back and raised his.

I followed, but it was difficult. His blades came down on mine. The assassin knocked me to the ground. This wasn't good. The only way my future could come to pass was if I was there to be part of it. Digging deep, I drove away the pain and pushed back with my swords.

"That's it." He whipped around, sending one booted foot against my cheek. My head snapped and I fell to the ground.

Christopher came over. "Jasmine."

"Do not help me," I said through gritted teeth. "I must be the one to defeat the assassin."

Christopher helped me stand. "I get that, but it's my job to keep you safe. If I feel like there's even a chance you can't defeat him, I'll step in."

"No," I said. "Stay back, damn you." I glared, hoping that would convince him. "I mean it." Bucking my courage, I turned back to the assassin. "Let's finish this."

"Agreed, vampire." He dropped his swords to his sides. "I have fought enough."

At the opening, I ran forward, stabbing both swords into the place where the assassin's heart should be. He fell to his knees. I withdrew my blades from his chest, and then sliced off his head without any hesitation. He fell back, turning to dust. When he vanished, so did my swords.

Without a second thought, I opened the box and picked up the gem. As soon as it touched my skin, it dug in, making its way up my body and to my forehead. The power was palpable. Pain blazed against my skin with such force I could hardly see.

With heavy lids, I turned and studied Joanna. Her features weren't full of fear like they had been before. This time she looked at me with awe. "I hope to be like you someday, Jasmine," she said, stepping forward, and taking my hand.

I tried to smile. "Thank you for seeing our pursuit through to the end. You're the most courageous person I know." My knees buckled and I fell to the ground, dragging Joanna with me. Adam grabbed onto her, keeping her upright. She released my hand, touching Adam's.

"You were very brave," Adam said, a look of puzzled wonder shaping his face.

"Thank you, Professor Pops."

He gave me a strange look, but I couldn't be bothered to understand why.

Christopher raised me with one arm, then walked me to the wall where he left me.

"What are you doing?" Curious I watched as he went over to Joanna and Adam and say something to them before returning to me and lifting me into his arms.

"Take me home, Chris."

"Right away."

I closed my eyes, no longer able to keep them open. "Good-bye," I whispered, then relaxed my face against Christopher's chest. His skin felt cool against the burning heat and I sighed.

One more to go, I thought.

At some point I realized Chris and I were riding Abernathy. He and the Hunter spoke quietly about things long forgotten. Their talk wasn't of our mission or my destiny, but about things that didn't matter. It almost felt like they were making up and I was glad.

Christopher had betrayed my mom and dad, but he hadn't betrayed me. He'd saved me, helped me, and given me back my vampire abilities. Plus, now we were friends. I would be forever indebted to him.

OceanofPDF.com

25 DAYS UNTIL TOTAL DARKNESS

I WAS BACK IN SALEM. I knew by the way the bed felt beneath me. I also knew I wasn't conscious.

Dreaming maybe.

Of Laeddin.

While my body continued to heal.

Laeddin was still in the past and hiding behind a tree in the forest, watching me as I spoke with Joanna.

Two dark entities appeared and swirled around Laeddin.

"Look, he truly cares for the girl."

"Yes. Isn't it sweet?"

"What's going on? Who are you?" Laeddin asked, spinning in a circle, trying to keep his gaze on both of them at once.

"We are called the Unknowns," one said. They continued to churn and Laeddin spun in a circle, working to keep up.

"Yes, but we are known. You've heard of us, right?"

"I suppose."

"Why did you show the girl her future?" one of them asked. The only thing that made sense about the forms was that they each had two eyes and they blinked languidly.

"Especially when what you showed her isn't true," the other said.

"At least not entirely," responded the first.

"You're making me dizzy. Stop." Laeddin closed his eyes to get his bearings.

"Tell us," they said together.

"I told her what she needed to hear so that she could become the person she needs to be."

"The genie lied."

"How quaint."

"Should we punish him? He's given her an edge. It doesn't seem fair."

"What could we do? Force him into servitude again."

"No," Laeddin shouted.

"He wouldn't like that."

"Apparently not."

"Hmmm, then what should we do?"

"Only time will tell."

"Yes, and we have an eternity."

They laughed in sync as their forms dissipated and the vision shifted.

THE UNKNOWNS WERE in a cave with Laeddin. The genie used a pick-axe to dig into the earth. All around them was the scent of rich soil. Laeddin's breathing was ragged and his heart beat fast.

"Look at him, the poor dear. Should we force him to keep this up? He seems so forlorn without his magic," she said.

"If not this, then what? We need to keep him busy so he doesn't try to escape," he replied.

"Why don't we simply erase his memories and give him a new purpose?" She grinned as she spoke.

He joined in. "Have I told you how much I love the way you think?"

"I believe so," she said, floating away from the genie and toward the other end of the cavern. "But what of the vampire child?" she asked in a whisper.

"She's going to fail. I feel it. All of that power and she won't use it." He shook his head dejectedly.

"Shall we wager?"

"On whether she defeats Sharra or not? Yes. I'm game, but what is the prize for winning?"

"My love. You won't win. I believe she will find the power within when the time is right. If anything, it's all too easy. I believe we should throw another pebble in her pond."

"Interesting. What are you thinking?" He came close, their eyes meeting as their wispy forms became corporeal.

"What about the League of Huntsmen? There are a few of the bloodlines left. We could encourage them to take up arms against the girl."

"You are so bad."

"Then you're in?" she asked breathlessly, excitement permeating from her.

He winked. "Winner gets to decide what we do with the genie."

"Deal."

WHEN I CAME out of it, I sat and looked around. Everything seemed normal. I knew the Unknowns were real, but what I experienced had to be a dream. Laeddin had to be okay.

My body was no longer in pain and I got out of bed. After a quick shower, I dressed in jeans and a tee shirt. A quick glance in the mirror revealed the new gem in my forehead. It shone brightly. I braided my hair and twisted it up in a bun. Went to the closet and grabbed my favorite boots and socks. While I put them on, I noticed Gatsby. The gray cat was curled into a ball on my pillow.

"Hey, kitty kitty." I scratched his head.

He opened one eye. "You're feeling better then?"

"Much." I sat beside him.

He stood and rubbed against my arm. "Glad to hear it." He jumped off the bed and went to the window. It was open and he hopped onto the ledge. "You know where the last piece of the crown is, right?"

"That's right."

"Gonna tell me where it is?"

"I will, but first I need a little time." I knew it was urgent, but while the pain was gone, I still felt exhausted.

"Fine." He walked along the ledge to the edge of my house and jumped onto a nearby tree branch. "I'm glad you're okay, Jasmine. I was worried."

"Thanks." I closed the window and ran down the stairs.

Christopher was sitting on the couch and stood. "You're awake?" He smiled, holding out his arms.

I hugged him. "Yes, and I want to go see my grandfather." I moved around him and opened the front door. "Let's go."

There was a tank with soldiers parked at the end of my driveway.

"Are we allowed to walk around outside?" It looked like the sun would be setting anytime, but it was three in the afternoon.

"Yes." He took my hand, shut the door, and we went down the stairs, heading in the direction of Adam Henry's house.

At the door, I knocked, suddenly feeling nervous. Professor Pops answered. He gave me a giant smile and I jumped into his arms.

There he is, I thought.

My grandfather.

The man I knew and loved.

"You were there, weren't you?" he asked, and I immediately knew he was talking about my visit to France.

"Yes," I said, my eyes watering. "I've missed you," I said when he released me. The smell of cigars clung to him.

"And I missed you." He seemed as anxious as I was to discuss what happened.

"We should talk. I have questions about you, Joanna, and how you became a vampire." I stepped into the foyer and waited.

He chuckled. "Good, because I have answers." He paused. "I think."

"Adam Henry, it's good to see you again." Christopher came in and stood beside me.

Usually Pops would have a dismissive look on his face for Christopher, but this time he gave him a warm smile. "It's good to see you too. Thank you for taking such great care of my granddaughter all those years ago."

"You do remember," I said. Even though I'd been in France yesterday, for Pops, it'd been hundreds of years.

"If we're talking about France, then the answer is yes. Of course I do." Professor Pops shut the door and headed for the kitchen.

Christopher and I followed. I felt a beat of happiness. Everything was going to be all right. Laeddin had shown me my future. I had Professor Pops and Christopher to help me. With them, I could do anything.

Then I remembered the vision or dream. The Unknowns said Laeddin lied. That he showed me only what I needed to see. They made a wager and one of them hoped I would lose. But that couldn't be. Because if it was, then that meant Laeddin was their prisoner and I had to hope that wasn't true.

"Jasmine?" Pops asked, a look of concern on his face.

I shook off the dream. "You know, I thought Joanna was incredible," I said as we made our way into the living room."

"Oh, well she felt the same way about you."

"I want to hear all about it."

OceanofPDF.com

DESPERATE ANXIETY

As I sat in the living room and waited while grandfather took a call, I couldn't help but lose myself in my thoughts and all that happened to get me to this point.

A moment.

That was all it took to define my life and affect the whole world.

When I made the wish all those days ago, I'd been a selfish, spoiled, arrogant child. I wanted to believe I changed since then.

Grown up.

And that all of the moments since then proved I was different, but none of that mattered if darkness consumed the world and Sharra got her way and was able to rule all realms.

Exhaling, I contemplated the space around me, even though I'd been here dozens of time before. The task took my mind off the stress weighing heavily on my shoulders.

Pops' living room was something else.

Large and filled with eclectic furniture.

A wall covered in windows was at our back, the thick red drapes closed.

Christopher and I occupied the extra-large leather sofa while Pops sat in a wingback chair to the right of me.

An ornate grandfather clock stood in one corner telling me I would have to go soon.

Normally, a painting that looked like it came from the crusades hung on the wall in front of me. At the moment though, the painting had divided in two to reveal a television.

On it various news channels were broadcasting the chaos happening around us.

Countries no longer feuded with each other.

They were too busy trying to control their own residents as well as the akuma and rogue supernaturals. Military forces all over the world had their hands full trying to keep peace. The chayot helped too, but even they seemed outnumbered.

The human realm was a mess.

People were looting. Battles had broken out over land and food. It was the same in other realms too, I was sure.

Darkness was coming and no one knew why. People didn't know what to do or where to go.

Before my grandfather got a phone call, we'd been discussing all that was happening in the realms and what we could do.

But we hadn't had a chance to discuss France. Pops hung up and tucked his phone in his pocket, studying me intently.

His glasses balanced on the end of his nose.

I still wondered if he wore the glasses out of habit or if he really needed them to see. As a vampire, he aged very, very slowly.

The man had been alive since the fourteenth century.

"What are you thinking about?" Pops asked after a moment.

"Nothing. Troy." He was constantly on my mind. I couldn't stop fretting about him. I'd worn a scar in my cheek from the constant chewing. My fingers fiddled with the dragon charm carved for my birthday.

"What's that you've got there?" Pops asked.

I showed it to him. "It's a dragon," I said, smiling. "Christopher made it for me."

"You're very talented," he said, speaking to Christopher.

"Thank you, sir." Christopher cleared his throat.

Pops nodded before giving me a look that was filled with both compassion and understanding. "We will find him and save him.

Besides, he's half dragon. He's tough."

Professor Pops picked up his glass filled with amber liquid and took a drink, his eyes flicking from the jewels on my forehead to the way my cheek moved as I gnawed on it. "Are you hurting?"

I snorted internally.

That was a loaded question.

Physically I was fine.

But my insides swirled with desperate anxiety.

Laeddin had shown me an image of my future and it had been wonderful, but according to Pops, Laeddin's magic couldn't be fully trusted since it came from Sharra. Again I thought of the dream. And again I dismissed it. "I'm fine." I crossed my arms, hugging them tight against my torso.

"You sure?" Christopher touched my arm.

I glanced at him, hoping the grimace on my face resembled a smile. "Sure. I'm just ready to get this over with, you know? I want to find the last piece of the crown, defeat Sharra, and rescue my parents and Troy. I want things back the way they were."

"Is that all?" Christopher oozed playful sarcasm, but his eyes remained worried.

I chuckled. "Yes, and more," I admitted.

"Like getting those back?" He glanced at my back and I knew he was talking about my stolen wings.

"Yes." I shuddered at how much I missed them. "Especially those."

He patted my arm. "Good to hear."

My grimace became a genuine smile and I covered his large hand with mine.

"It'll happen. You'll see," he said, every ounce of his face covered with confidence in me.

I nodded, scooting closer to him. Christopher was a friend I treasured and loved. Not romantically. That part of my soul was reserved for Troy. But Christopher had become like family.

"What do you think of all of this?" Pops indicated the TV as he removed his glasses, setting them on the end table next to his chair. He pinched the bridge of his nose.

On the screen, a newscaster was detailing a story about a man who'd been caught kidnapping children and locking them in cages like animals in an underground bunker. He claimed that if the world ended, he would have a way to continue the human race. There'd been two of all kinds of beasts down there as well. He called his bunker Steven's Ark. "Like Noah's Ark from the Bible," the man said, his hair standing on end like he'd been electrocuted multiple times.

The story made me sick, especially because I knew I was to blame for the craziness happening around us. All because I wanted to be normal and had made a stupid wish. Now the whole world suffered the consequences. "It's awful." I took a deep breath, held it a moment before letting it out. "But I'm going to fix it."

"You will," Pops said softly. "And we're going to help." He indicated Christopher as he spoke. "Aren't we?"

"Without a doubt," Christopher said.

"I know and I'm beyond grateful." I leaned over and took Pops' outstretched hand.

A blaring horn sounded outside, signaling curfew would begin soon. I stood. "We should go."

"I'll do some research on spells to keep the darkness from fully taking over, should we have a need for that. I'm going to reach out to Cindy. She knows more than I do. When it comes to spells, she is the authority."

Happiness shot through me. I missed my aunt Cindy. We weren't related by blood, but she was my mom's best friend. They'd been through a lot together. Now that I thought about it, it surprised me that I hadn't heard from Cindy yet. Her land of Polonias was most likely suffering the same fate as our world. "Have you heard from

Aunt Cindy?"

Pops stood, picking up his glasses and putting them in his pocket. "Yes, it's been a few weeks though, not since the chaos began. She and Gabe were doing okay, just dealing with the darkness creeping in on the kingdom, same as us. She intended to find answers and let me know. It's time I talk to her again. See what she's come up with."

"Thanks, Pops." I stood, hugging him tightly, enjoying the sweet tobacco scent from his pipe. Worry for Cindy added to the weight on my shoulders. I'd been so busy dealing with other things, I forgot about her.

After a few moments, he looked down at me. "I'm sorry I wasn't kinder to you in the fifteenth century. I didn't know you yet, and back then my every waking thought was centered on protecting Joanna." His face fell at the thought of her. Things hadn't ended well for them. The Joan of Arc had gone on to lead her nation's army and had eventually been executed; meanwhile, the Adam Henry she'd known and loved had become a vampire, enslaved to the Vampire Queen. It had taken him a long, long time to break free of her grasp and by the time he managed it, his Joanna was long dead.

I hugged him again. "No need to apologize. I completely understand and I'm glad to have known you then, too. It's helped me see you as more than just my grandfather."

He tapped me on the tip of my nose. "Time for you to get home. Text me when you're inside so I know you're safe, and be sure to lock the doors."

I gave him a look that said I could take care of myself, but he wouldn't have any of that. "I mean it."

"Fine. I will."

Christopher stepped forward and shook Pops' hand. "See you tomorrow, sir."

"Yes, you will." Then he glanced at me. "And you'll tell me where the final piece of the crown is?"

I didn't answer as I made my way to the door.

"She hasn't even told me, though I believe I might know." Christopher crossed his arms, pretending to look hurt.

"Don't worry, we will discuss it in the morning." Outside, I glanced up. The sky was so dark, it was as though an artist had doused it in black paint.

Troy's voice was clear as a bell in my head: I thought you'd never get out of there. I'm glad Pops is okay.

His words in my mind startled me so badly I tripped and nearly fell down the front steps.

Thankfully, Christopher caught me.

"Watch yourself," he said, surprised. As a vampire, clumsiness wasn't part of my nature.

I shrugged, unsure what had just happened. "Sorry. I'm just preoccupied, I guess."

I called in my head: Troy. But there was no answer.

Disappointment washed through me.

Maybe I was just so worried about him that I had begun inventing voices in my head?

I so badly needed to know he was okay.

There hadn't been a moment since he'd been taken that I hadn't thought about him and worried about him.

Christopher chuckled lightly. "It's fine. I understand. Makes me feel like I'm walking next to your mother before she became a vampire."

I gave myself a mental shake, giving him a smile.

There was nothing I could do for Troy until we found the final piece of the crown. But once I had it, nothing would stop me from rescuing him and my parents.

"I don't know what's wrong. But I'm glad you're here to keep me upright." I pushed Christopher playfully.

"It's my pleasure, Jasmine." He paused. "Have you ever heard the jokes they used to tell about your mom?"

"They used to make jokes about her?" That didn't sound pleasant. "Tread carefully, Hunter. Remember, she's my mom."

"They were silly and I never told jokes about her. Quite the contrary, I stood up for her."

Most of the time. Until it really mattered, and then you chose power over her, I thought.

But I didn't say that out loud.

Christopher had made mistakes, but without a doubt I knew he wouldn't betray me.

He had dozens of opportunities to do so but all he'd ever done was help me, and sometimes at great personal cost. "Okay, then let's hear one."

"What's the difference between Snow White and a tree?" He winked, trying not to smile, but his eyes twinkled in the streetlights.

"What?" I asked.

"A tree sways and Snow falls." He covered his mouth as a chuckle escaped his throat.

"That's bad," I said, unable to stop the smile pulling at the corners of my mouth.

"Yes, but you're smiling."

"Only because it was so ridiculous." We reached my house and I unlocked my door before going in. Christopher followed me, closing and locking the door behind him.

"Yeah, that's true." He paused, glancing sheepishly around the room. It was a quaint house, so unlike Professor Pops' in every way. "Do you want me to leave?"

"No." I didn't want to be alone.

"I can sleep on the couch."

I started up the steps to the second floor. "Why? That'll be so uncomfortable. You can sleep in Lae - " I stopped. It wasn't Laeddin's bedroom any longer. It wasn't anyone's. Sadness swept over me and I couldn't help but think of the first time I'd come to this house. It'd been with him. We'd been like a family for a short time and I was so attracted to him. Between the scent of his blood and his physical attributes, I had acted like a lovesick teenager. But that hadn't lasted long. For one thing, he was old. Really old. I thought we'd been friends, but as he'd said more than once he couldn't truly be friends with his master? Then I met Troy. Things changed rather quickly after getting to know Dragon Boy. I'd eventually freed Laeddin, and Laeddin left. Even though he could've stayed with me if he'd wanted to. Remembering that hurt, but it was what it was. And I certainly wasn't infatuated with the genie any longer. Every part of me belonged to Troy.

My heart squeezed.

"Jasmine?" Christopher came toward me.

"You can sleep in the spare bedroom," I said, shaking away my thoughts as I made my way up the stairs.

"If you're sure, I just might do that. Thanks." He placed his hand on the stair rail and came up a few steps.

"Anytime." I turned and hugged him, forcing myself not to register the incredible scent of his blood pulsing at the vein in his neck. "Good night, Christopher."

"Night." He followed after me. "And don't forget to text your grandfather. The old man might blame me and I'm not in the mood to deal with his wrath."

OceanofPDF.com

DRAGON DREAM

I CLOSED the door to my bedroom, leaning against it. There was so much to do. I still needed to get the final piece of the crown. It was in Sharra - my home. I'd never admit it to Pops or Christopher, but I was nervous to return home again. What would everyone there think of me? It would probably be along the lines of what I thought of myself. That I was a coward. That I sucked as a daughter, a friend. That I was an arrogant, spoiled princess with no clue how to run a kingdom. But I couldn't let my fears stand in the way of what I had to do. I needed to defeat Sharra, which would stop the darkness. Once her spell was broken, the Akuma would vanish, and the world would go back to the way it had once been. I also needed to rescue Troy and my mom and dad. I would do whatever it took to save the people I loved.

Troy's voice entered my mind, accusatory and sad: He's sleeping over?

I jumped, my insides nearly zinging out of my chest as Troy's voice came into my head again, loud and clear. "Troy?" I frantically scanned the room even though I heard his voice in my mind.

Is that really you, or am I finally going crazy? I spoke the words into my mind.

Hearing his voice made me almost not care if I were.

I missed him so damn much.

Troy's voice was there again: It's me, Jazzy Jazz. You're not going crazy.

Tears filled my eyes and a sob cracked against my chest as a tidal wave of relief washed through me.

How are you able to do this? I asked into my mind. Sagged onto my bed and fumbled with my shoes before lying down and closing my eyes.

I clamped a hand around the dragon carving as Troy's face floated up from my memory - his longer hair, glorious hazel eyes and the shape of his lips.

They were one of my favorite parts of him.

When he kissed me, I felt it everywhere.

Troy answered: It was Sharra who started it. She'd been trying to hurt me, saying all sorts of things, like you and Christopher were together-together -

We aren't. I promise you. Christopher is well aware of my feelings for you. I'm yours and always will be, I said into my mind, interrupting him.

Troy went on as though he hadn't heard me: And that you're drinking his blood and letting him drink from you. She said you loved it and that you love him.

He sighed and that single action nearly broke me.

I remembered the vision I'd seen of Sharra torturing Troy.

The way his body had writhed and the things she said. Commanding him to admit he didn't love me.

I wanted so badly to save him and had felt the seven magics fill me to overflowing. It was like nothing I experienced while awake.

A thought or feeling nagged at the back of my mind, telling me the power was there.

All I had to do was call it forth. If only I knew how.

I'm so sorry, Troy. I said the words into my mind.

Should I tell him? I debated, but only for a moment. He deserved the truth and I wouldn't lie to him.

I went on: But Troy, pieces of her story are true. I do drink from Christopher and he does drink from me.

I cringed as the words filtered into my mind.

Troy's comeback was quick, jilted: You love him.

I sensed his hurt as well as felt it and hurried to correct his misassumption before he could break our mental connection. I responded: Yes, but not in the way you think. I consider him family. He saved me after Sharra took you. I think I might've died if not for him. He rescued me. More than once, actually. But that doesn't mean I feel anything romantic for him. Not even a little bit. I love you so much I ache with wanting you and I always will.

When I finished speaking, I held my breath, watching the clock while I waited for him to respond.

I told him you asked me to marry you, too, I added.

Two full minutes passed before he spoke: I know, he finally said, his voice gravelly.

You do? I asked, releasing a big breath, relieved he didn't seem mad or upset about me drinking from Christopher.

Part of me was surprised as well. How could he know?

Troy continued: Abernathy told me everything.

Wait, your father? Did he rescue you? I asked in my mind.

Troy didn't respond immediately and I thought I mind lose my mind until he finally said: No, he said he can't, but I believe he is just too lazy to do anything hard. Instead, Abernathy appeared in a nightmare. Let me back up. He calls what he did a dragon dream. After I got over the initial distress of seeing his face in my mind, he told me it was time I learned all there is to know about dragon powers.

That had to be scary, I responded.

Sorrow and anger welled up inside me.

If Abernathy could save Troy, why hadn't he? Why not save my mom and dad too? It frustrated me to no end that he had all this power but refused to use it.

Troy went on: Yeah, like I said, it was damn traumatic. But, he shared a lot of cool things with me and one of them was my ability to telepathically speak with someone I'm connected to.

Like me, I said into my mind and smiled.

Troy answered right away: Yep. I asked him if it would work with you. He said he didn't think so because we aren't related, but that I could try. So, I did, and here we are.

That's the most awesome piece of news I've had in a long time, I responded into my mind. Rolled on my side, facing the window and allowing the full meaning of his words to sink in.

The curtains were open, but it was so dark outside I couldn't see anything, even with my vampire vision.

Sharra and I were connected as well, but I pushed down anything that might allow me to see her. Had that been a mistake?

Perhaps I needed to try harder to connect with her, then I might be able to learn more of her plans.

Troy drew in a ragged breath and said: Right. Because even though I'm trapped in this horrible, smelly hole, I can still talk to you.

Are you all right? I asked.

It was a ridiculous question and I metaphorically kicked myself for asking. Obviously, he was alive and coherent, but definitely not okay.

I tried again: Sorry, dumb question. What did Abernathy say about Christopher and me?

I worked to keep calm, but I was an emotional wreck.

Troy said: It's okay. He told me all about your trip back in time and about why you have to drink his blood. In some of the visions, Abernathy showed you to me. It was wild, like I was seeing through his eyes.

I sat up as my mind raced: Wow. That-that's impressive, I said.

What if I could see my mom and dad in a dragon vision? I didn't dare to hope.

I asked Troy: Do you have dragon vision too? Can I see my parents through your eyes?

The possibility was more than I could hope for.

Troy answered: I don't know. Not right this second. Sharra took them a while ago and she hasn't brought them back.

What is she doing to them? I asked in my mind, though I was scared to find out.

My guess was that she was torturing them.

Or worse.

Could she kill them?

My dad possessed powers none of us understood. And my mom had believed she killed Sharra eighteen years ago, but she hadn't.

Troy responded with deep sadness in his voice: I honestly don't know, Jazz. But they're tough and they have each other. They will get through this.

I stood and went over to the window. Up close, the trees in Troy's yard became discernable, as well as grass, bushes, and the fence lining the back yard.

Gatsby was walking along the top of the fence, his yellow eyes gazing at me. I raised my hand in greeting, but he didn't react. Instead he jumped off the fence into the yard behind mine.

"Ornery cat. Sheesh," I said out loud, flinching at the sound of my own voice.

You saw Gatsby? Troy asked.

I did. He's so hot and cold. One minute he's friendly and seems to care. The next moment he won't even acknowledge my presence, I answered Troy.

Then went over to the mirror attached to the dresser and studied my reflection.

There'd been a streak of teal in my hair when I first came here with Laeddin, but it was gone now. Had been for a while. I missed that too.

"Holy crap." I glanced around the room.

When Sharra had taken Troy, she also destroyed my room in the process.

Yet there it stood, just the same as always, like nothing had happened. Part of me wished there was something to show for the most painful experience of my life.

Troy sounded concerned: What's wrong?

I responded: My room. It's as though Sharra never destroyed it.

I opened my closet. Even my shoes were organized like they had been before.

Nothing was out of place. I glanced back at the bed and couldn't help but remember Troy and me kissing.

My birthday cake and the way he proposed.

Troy went on: If I had to guess, I would bet it was Abernathy who cleaned it up for you.

Or Laeddin. Fixing up a room would be easy for him. If he was okay.

Hang on, someone's - He broke off abruptly.

My heart stopped. Troy? Troy! What's wrong? I called into my mind.

He didn't respond and I feared the worst.

Had Sharra realized we were communicating and shut Troy up? She already said that she would do as she wished with him and we both knew I couldn't stop her.

Sharra knew I would come to her whether Troy died or not because she had my parents too.

Troy, I called again.

Lying back down on my bed, I took several deep breaths, trying to decide whether I'd been talking to myself the whole time.

Troy was back: I'm here. Sorry. Your parents were just dragged in by some foul looking demons and -

He didn't finish.

All sorts of horrible images filled my mind.

What had she done to them?

Are they in bad shape? The words were barely coherent as I asked them in my mind.

Troy sounded preoccupied: They've been roughed up. I'm going to try to help them. Talk later?

Please don't go, I cried.

Troy said: It's okay, Jasmine. I'll be around, but I need to help them.

Tears streaked down my cheeks, but I tried to keep my mental voice steady so he wouldn't worry about me. Okay. Tell them I love them, will you please? I said.

Troy quickly responded: I will. And Jazz?

Yes?

Troy's voice became soft and full of warmth: I love you forever and always.

The strain and the stress and the anxiety and the relief and the love all came crashing over me at once.

I held back a sob. I love you too. Forever and always, I returned.

When he was gone, I could sense it, like a fog lifting from my mind. His absence caused my body to shake. Reaching down, I covered myself with a blanket, but refused to sleep in case Troy tried to talk to me again. Tears soaked my pillow as I thought about all that had transpired and all that still needed to happen. Around three in the morning, I closed my eyes as the weight of my mental exhaustion took hold.

Moments later, I was whisked away and I sensed my wings and Sharra nearby.

OceanofPDF.com

PROPHECY

THE ROOM WAS enormous and bright.

Thousands of lights twinkled above, like pretend stars.

Sharra sat on a throne at the other end of the long black and white checkered floor.

"There's a prophecy you should hear, dear Jasmine. Let me tell it to you," Sharra said. Her voice was soft and steeling at once.

It penetrated my mind, though her lips moved as well.

"I don't want to hear any of your lies."

"Is that so?" She pounded her staff on the floor once and my body stiffened before it abruptly went lax.

Words I wanted to say couldn't be uttered as she took control. Like a puppet on a string, Sharra forced my legs forward until I stood in front of her. An eerie greenish glow spewed from the orb on her staff.

She leaned forward and flexed my wings. They beat against her back. Splendid and glorious. I ached at the sight of them.

"I'm not going anywhere." Her eyes glistened, like the shining feathers of a raven, dark orbs dancing with excitement.

"The prophecy goes like this: One shall rise, her wings more splendid than blackened midnight. Power beyond all comprehension shall be her veil, magic, her skin and sinews. With a heart like onyx and no soul, she will destroy those known as man. Their bones will be her stepping-stones. And woe be unto all if she takes the blood of her true love, for none shall stop her and all will wish themselves as dust before her." When she finished speaking, she pursed her lips, smug.

I stood there open-mouthed. What did she expect me to say to that?

"Are you ready to be my stepping-stone, Jasmine?"

"Never. I'm going to destroy you and take back what you stole from me." I fought against her magic, regaining power over my body as I pushed toward her, my feet crunching on rocky ground. Upon closer inspection, I saw the rocks weren't actually rocks, but bones. "What is this?" I recoiled, forcing myself not to move.

"Isn't it obvious? These are the bones of those I've already destroyed. Those you love will be added to the pile soon enough and you will happily allow me to take your body." She paused, as though debating what to say next. "Besides, the spell to bring forth a new child is nearly complete. I only need a few more ingredients and then all will be ready." She gave me an evil grin.

"You think too highly of yourself." I gritted my teeth, determined not to let her see how afraid I was.

She cackled. "You have such spirit. I feel it flowing into me from these wings you've given me." As she spoke, she stroked some of the feathers.

I wanted to scream. I wanted to destroy her. I wanted to exterminate her from off the planet. As I thought about it, the power I felt when I nearly drained Arthur pumped through me and flashed along my fingers, like dancing lightning.

Sharra stopped laughing and glared. "What are you playing at, child?"

Was that fear in her eyes?

My fingers returned to normal as I stared at them. "You tell me," I said, trying to act confident.

She waved her hand in front of her, the long, bell sleeves of her midnight swaying. Seconds later, I was back in my bed. I opened my eyes and glanced at the clock. Only fifteen minutes had passed.

Christopher knocked on my door. "Can I come in?"

I rubbed my eyes, sitting up. "Sure."

He came in, wearing only a pair of pajama bottoms, his upper body bare. The scent of him filled the air and hunger seared my parched throat. "What's the matter?" He sat on the edge of the bed, resting a hand on my arm.

I swallowed hard. "It's Sharra. I saw her tonight. She took me somewhere."

"She what?" He searched the room, his body tense and ready to fight if necessary.

"Relax, she isn't here." I told him about the prophecy.

His eyes narrowed. "I've heard of it," he said when I finished reciting. "For a long while, I believed the foretelling was about you." He wiped a hand over his face. "You knew of the prophecy as well."

That was news to me. "I did?" I pulled the covers up tighter around me.

He nodded. "Do you remember meeting me eight years ago? It was outside the castle in Sharra. I was about to be pummeled by a troll. You called him Roland. Anyway, you told him to go get some Jasmine berries for a party. He left and you tilted your head, giving me a look far beyond your years." He paused, and I guessed he was lost in the memories.

But I wondered if he was losing his mind. No such memories existed in me. "No," I said, curiously. "I recall a troll named Roland, but I don't remember meeting you."

"How strange. It happened. A siren had me under her spell and commanded me to kidnap you and bring you to her. But as soon as I reached the castle, the spell wore off. You told me, and I quote, 'I'm created from the seven magics. I can do anything, know anything, and become anything.'"

I leaned back, shocked that he sounded so sure of a memory I didn't have, especially since it involved me. "I said that?"

"Yes." He patted my hand.

"That doesn't sound like me. I would've only been ten."

Christopher's pulse beat against his neck and I licked my lips. I didn't know why I was so hungry, but it felt like weeks since I had any blood.

He watched my eyes, one side of his mouth lifting in amusement. "I know. At ten you had more confidence in your little finger than most creatures have in their whole bodies over their entire lives."

I shook my head, unable to meet his gaze, my eyes still focused on his pounding vein. "What else?" I was distracted, not really thinking about what he said, but how good his blood would taste.

He moved closer so his neck was only inches from my mouth. "I believed you could read minds, for one thing."

I blinked, taking my eyes from his neck for the briefest moment. "You did?" I shook my head. "If only I could."

"You also told me to become the man I was meant to be." He swallowed as emotions I didn't understand surged through him.

The need in my throat grew. "May I?" I didn't wait for an answer, but pulled him to me as I sank my fangs into his neck.

He remained quiet, the only sound was of me drinking his blood. Heat filled my body, full of need, hungry and hot. I ached for the Hunter, the feeling so strong. Before I knew what I was doing, I climbed onto his lap, wrapping my legs around his hips, pulling his body tight against mine.

Christopher's body went taut. "Jasmine, what is going on?"

"I don't know," I said, licking the vein and trailing kisses up his neck, past his jaw, until I found his lips. I kissed him, desperate to feel all of him at once. "I want you."

"No." In one fluid motion, he pushed me off and I sailed back, slamming my head against the wall on the other side of the room. He shot me a look of concern but didn't approach. "Are you all right?"

"I don't know. What happened?" I shook my head, the previous few moments fuzzy. We were talking about a memory and then it was like someone else took over my mind. I saw myself kissing Chris and my face got hot. No!

I told you, Sharra said in my mind, her voice jubilant. Her wicked laughter filled my head like a million buzzing bees. There is your truth, Dragon Boy, she said, spitting the pet name for Troy into my mind like dirty oil.

Jazz. Troy's hurt voice pierced deep into my soul.

Troy, I don't know what happened. I didn't mean it. I-I swear, I said into my mind.

Wiped Christopher's blood from my mouth and went on: It had to be Sharra. She and I are linked because she has my wings and she somehow controlled me, but I swear to you, that isn't what I wanted.

I glanced at Christopher, who was breathing heavily, though his eyes were filled with anger.

Troy's voice sounded as broken as I felt: I can't do this.

He's mine now, Jasmine, Sharra hissed. Her triumphant words echoed through my mind. Over and over until I thought I'd go mad.

Then, as suddenly as they appeared, they vanished.

"Don't go," I said, standing.

"You can't get rid of me that easily," Christopher said, his expression savage. "But what the hell, Jasmine? I know you're in love with Troy. I can taste it in your blood every time I drink from you. But the way you just kissed me tells a different story."

OceanofPDF.com

YOU'LL BE ALONE

I SAT ON THE BED, burying my face in my hands. "I'm so sorry." The words were meant for both Christopher and Troy, but I felt the emptiness again and knew Troy was gone. "It was Sharra. The link between us is growing stronger. She did that. Not me."

Christopher sat beside me and wrapped an arm around my shoulder. I was torn between shrugging it off and burying my face in his shoulder and sobbing.

"I am in love with Troy, but I think I might have lost him after what I just did."

Christopher gave me a light shake. "Bull. I won't tell him and if you don't tell him, everything will be fine."

I leaned my head against his shoulder. "That's not true. He witnessed the whole thing."

Christopher stiffened, and I lifted my head. "Explain how that's possible."

I told him about Troy and the dragon vision and the telepathy. All of it while clutching the dragon dangling from my wrist like it was my lifeline. When Troy first contacted me, I'd been so excited, but Sharra had taken Troy's beautiful gift and turned it ugly, like she did everything else. "He'll never forgive me."

"I'm sure he will, once he understands that it wasn't your fault." Christopher took my hand in his.

"I doubt it," I said, pulling away and wrapping my arms around myself. Every time I thought I might have a chance against Sharra, she did something to prove me wrong.

"He asked you to marry him, right?" The corners of Christopher's mouth were turned down.

I nodded, unable to speak.

"Without a doubt, he loves you too. I'm sure what he saw you do was difficult, but it'll all work out." He sounded so sure.

"I hope you're right." I wasn't convinced. "But how could I let her get ahold of me like that? How could I do such a thing? To you and to Troy?" I stood, feeling the beginnings of a freak-out coming on. "I'm an awful, terrible person."

"No, you aren't." Christopher walked over to me. "You're kind and good." He pulled me into a hug. "Want to know what the rest of the prophecy says?"

I looked up. "There's more?"

"Oh yeah. But Sharra doesn't want you to hear it."

I sniffled and released him. "I don't know if I can handle any more."

"This you can handle, because I know it's about you. It goes like this: The Eternal Vampire will grind the Earth to powder between her fingers until a new child is born, and then peace and prosperity will return to the land of magics and man."

"So, you think I'm the new child?" I thought about the words he'd just spoken. "Because if so, then wouldn't peace and prosperity already have returned to the land of magics and man?"

He shook his head. "You know, for the longest time, I believed the first part of the prophecy was about you, but then when I met you, I realized there was no way you could do the evil things spoken of. That's why I know you aren't the Eternal Vampire. And the answer to your first question is yes. I do believe you're the new child and that you will accomplish all the prophecy says. I know it."

I wanted to believe him. I did, but I couldn't. If anything, I thought I very well could be the Eternal Vampire. Look at what I'd done? Wished away my wings, giving Sharra the power she needed to bring about the darkness and take over the world. Maybe I hadn't killed anyone with my own hands, but there were plenty of people dead because of me.

Christopher went on, "If there's one thing I've learned, it's that predictions tell only a small fragment of the total outcome. You being born can't bring peace and prosperity by itself any more than holding a sword can slay a nation. It's what you do to wield the powers that will bring the prophecy to pass." He cupped my face with his hands as he spoke. "I wish I could help, make you see what I see, but I can't. I know that now. You need to choose to believe and then act. Only then can the rest of us follow." He watched my face, searching for what, I wasn't sure.

I pushed away his hand and walked toward the window. Gatsby sat on the ledge just outside, his head on his front paws and his eyes closed. "Maybe once I have the last piece of the crown, I can bring about peace. At least that's my hope." I didn't have any confidence - not in myself or in the future.

Troy! I shouted his name within the confines of my mind, frantic for him to tell me everything would work out and that he still believed in me. But he didn't answer, not that I expected him to.

"Maybe you're right," Christopher said, standing beside me. His closeness brought me some comfort and I was grateful for him.

I wanted to believe I was the person he thought I was. I really did, but I couldn't get there. Not yet. "Whether it's true or not, thank you for sharing. I needed to hear it and I so need your belief in me."

"Anytime." He rested his hand on my shoulder. "You need to get some rest."

I shook my head. It was highly unlikely I'd be able to rest again until Sharra was gone for good. "I can't. I need to be doing something." I found the amulet Silindra gave me and took hold of it. "We need to talk to Cindy."

Christopher hesitated. "She might be sleeping."

Time in Polonias passed differently that it did here. "Please. I can't be in this room another second." I knew I sounded like a whining child, but if I stayed for one more moment, I thought I might die.

"All right. Cinderella might try to take my head off for waking her, but I'll do anything for you." His tone was light, but a hint of worry lingered in his eyes.

I couldn't help the smile that formed. "Let's do this."

"Good." He took hold of me and I thought of the land of Polonias, working to imagine the hallway just outside Cindy's bedroom.

It was difficult.

My mind kept wandering over what just happened.

How I kissed Christopher. It didn't seem real, but the heat on my face told me it was.

"Are we going?" Chris gave me a worried look.

"Yeah, sorry. I'm working on - " Before I had the chance to finish, a small white light began to form in my room.

It grew brighter until there was a pop, and a pixelette dressed in various shades of green appeared before us.

"Christopher, oh thank heavens. I've been looking everywhere for you."

"Arianna?"

"Hi, Christopher." She waved, her whole body turning a lovely shade of pink. She glanced at me, but didn't acknowledge my presence. As the princess of Sharra, I could have her killed for the impertinence, but I banished the thought as soon as it entered my brain.

"What are you doing here?" He actually sounded happy to see her, which surprised me. Chris was rarely happy to see anyone.

"I have an urgent message for you. It's about the vampires in Sharra. A group of them found out about Sharra holding Snow and Dorian and are going after them."

"Great," I said, sighing heavily. "They're going to get themselves killed."

"Princess Jasmine," she said, bowing stiffly, finally doing her duty as a member of my realm. "I am Arianna."

"Good to meet you," I replied, crossing my arms.

Arianna flew toward Christopher. "What are you going to do about them? As leader of the vampires, it's your job to keep them in line and they are way out of line."

"I don't need you to tell me my job, Arianna." He removed his arm from around me.

"Oh my goodness. I'm terribly sorry. You're right. I'm just so flustered." Arianna glared at me. "I don't want to see another member of our realm hurt or wounded because of - " She had the good sense not to finish that sentence, but I did it for her.

"Because of me." I rocked back on my heels, returning her glare. "She's right, Christopher. You should go after them. They need to be stopped."

Christopher turned back and forth between Arianna and me. "If they come to harm, it'll be their own fault. I'm not leaving your side."

"But if they die, will you be able to live with yourself?" Arianna asked. Despite her other faults, the pixilette had a dramatic flair that I found endearing.

"I will not leave you," he said.

I could tell by the apprehension in his eyes that while his words sounded sure, he really wasn't. "Go after them. You have to," I said, taking his hands.

"But you'll be alone." The last word ripped from his throat and I knew how difficult it was for him to make a decision.

"It'll be fine," I lied and then stood up straight. "As Princess of Sharra, heir to the throne, I order you to do your duty and stop those vampires." My shoulders slumped. "If you don't, something worse might happen."

Christopher clenched his teeth together. "As you wish."

I reached over and hugged him tight. "Don't be mad. You know I'll miss you and when you're finished, you can come and find me. I'm still wearing the wooden bear you carved." As I spoke I showed him the bracelet attached to my wrist.

He relaxed slightly. "I'll take care of the idiot vampires and then return to you as quickly as possible."

"You better," I said in mock severity.

"Let's go, Arianna." He went to stand beside the pixilette.

She sat on his shoulder, crossing her arms. Right before they vanished, Arianna stuck out her tongue.

I shook my head in disbelief. Had I messed things up so royally in Sharra? If Arianna's treatment of me was any indication, then returning might be a really bad idea. "No." I couldn't worry about that now.

Troy, my mind softly called for him.

Wounded, Troy responded: I'm here, Jasmine.

He hadn't called me Jazz. My insides hissed with a combination of sadness and excitement. Because at least he responded.

I'm sorry, I said, determined to hang on to him. It wasn't me. It was Sharra. She made me do it. I spoke each word in my mind to him with earnest.

Troy laughed darkly: Since we first talked, Sharra has shown me what you were like as a child. The only reason I knew it was you was because of the wings beating against your back. That girl had tons of confidence. She could read minds, tell the future, do anything. And since I know she is you, then I have to wonder what you've been playing at this whole time. Because if you wanted to, you could save me now. You could save your mom and dad. You could stop the darkness and the Akuma. I bet you could even stop Sharra if you wanted to.

He paused, his breathing heavy before he went on: But that isn't what you want, is it? You want to be the victim. You want to play the part of the damsel and let those who love you suffer.

Hurt raced along my veins as I spoke: Why would you say that?

Tears trickled down my cheeks as I fell to my knees.

Pain like I never experienced before ripped through my core.

I went on: Whatever you believe, that isn't true. I don't know that girl. But I do know Sharra is poisoning your mind. You have to believe I would never kiss anyone the way I kiss you. I would never -

Sharra's cackling laugh rang out through my mind: This is too much fun.

I gasped.

I should've known it'd been Sharra toying with my emotions and pretending to be Troy.

The words she spoken in his voice still hurt and I curled into a ball.

That she could enter my mind so easily was terrifying, especially since I didn't know how to stop her.

The need to give up sank deep in my soul. If I gave up, then this would all be over, wouldn't it?

If I let Sharra take me over, then she would have no reason to keep my mom and dad or Troy. She would have to let them go. Those gloomy thoughts went through my mind until it felt like they would consume me.

At some point, I thought about Cindy.

Grasping the amulet once more, I closed my eyes and thought about the hallway just outside her bedroom. It was long, with many doors on either side.

All were the same except the one Cindy and Gabe slept behind.

That one was painted gold.

As soon as my mind found her door, I focused on it and told myself that was where I wanted to go.

I clutched the amulet and whispered two words: Help me.

OceanofPDF.com

MOTHERLY IRRITATION

My head felt foggy.

Had I passed out?

Something I learned in the past few months was that it didn't matter how strong my physical body was, emotional exhaustion could still get the better of me.

I tried to open my eyes, but they felt so heavy.

Voices floated to me.

"Where did you find her?"

I knew that voice. It was my aunt Cindy.

Gratitude filled me and I knew I made it to Polonias.

"A guard discovered her on the floor outside your bedroom door. It's a good thing you heard the commotion and came when you did. Otherwise, with things as they are with this horrible darkness, the guards might have cast her into prison. Or worse."

"They wouldn't have been able to kill her." Cindy clucked her tongue with motherly irritation. "Bring her into my bedroom, please, and then you may go. I know you have a lot you need to do. Thank you for helping me. I spent most of the night enchanting more of the serum and my magic needs a break."

I felt my body floating through the air before it drifted gently down against something soft. Quilla must've been using her magic to lift me off the floor and carry me into my aunt Cindy's room.

"Of course. Shall I have someone go get Gabe?" Her accent brought a smile to my lips.

"No, he left early to help the men secure the perimeter and will be back when he can." Cindy's tone was brisk, but I could still hear the worry she fought to conceal.

"Very good, dear. I'll see you later."

"Thanks, again, Quilla."

As I listened to my aunt's exchange with her fairy godmother, Quilla, I debated whether to try to reach Troy again with my mind.

"Jasmine, can you hear me?" Cindy sat beside me.

I opened my eyes to find Cindy studying me, her face screwed up with worry. "Hey."

"Hey, yourself. What's going on with you? Last I knew, you were searching for the pieces of the elven crown. I see you've found most of them." She lightly touched each of the four jewels embedded in my forehead. "Are you all right?"

"No," I said simply. "I'm really not all right. I still need to get the last piece of crown, but I'm hoping you can help me with something first."

"Anything. What is it, sweetheart?" Cindy brushed some hair off my face.

A bit of light shone through the window, lighting Cindy's beautiful bedchamber. An enormous glass chandelier hung from the center of the vaulted ceiling while sheer panels of blue and green arced from the light fixture and streamed down the upper walls. The matching furniture was upholstered and comfortable looking. The bed I lay on had a white bedspread with a handful of pillows covered in blue lace, satin, or ruffles.

I stood and tottered my way over to the loveseat situated in front of the fireplace, then sat. "It's about when I was a child."

"What about it?" Aunt Cindy gave me a look and I knew I came to the right place. She sat beside me. "Talk to me."

I did. I told her everything. Poured out my heart about Laeddin, my wishes, Troy, Christopher, the Gargoyle realm, going back in time, every last detail I could recall. She listened intently, only asking questions when I wasn't clear enough or if she needed more information. By the time I finished two hours later, she appeared to be upset, even looked a little guilty. "You've been busy."

"It's been crazy," I admitted. Restless, I went to the window. It was midday, but there was barely any light left. Urgency filled my chest. I needed to finish. "But it is what it is. I'm to blame so it's my responsibility to correct all my mistakes." I faced her.

"Cinderella," a woman shouted from the corridor. "It's the Akuma. They've invaded the castle."

"Gabe," Cindy gasped, jumping up and running to the door before looking back to me. "Follow me." She went after the woman down the hall.

I rushed after them, dodging around people and creatures scrambling through the hallways, their faces grim. "Will you help me?" I asked, catching up to her.

"Not right now. There's only one way to stop the Akuma and it isn't going to be pretty." Her pace increased. "This way." She led the way up several flights of stairs. "I hoped the wards I gave Gabe and the outer guards would protect us against invasion. If the Akuma are beyond the castle gates, then that means Gabe, Leo, and the others failed." Her voice shook with worry for them.

"I'm sorry, Aunt Cindy. Where are your children?" Anxiety over them ate at my heart.

"They're someplace safe. Not to worry." She didn't look back, but kept going.

"I'm really sorry," I said again, feeling horrible.

"Shush, it's fine," she lied. I could hear the deception in her voice, but I didn't correct her. It was sweet that she was trying to protect my feelings.

A noise that sounded like a rushing wave filled the corridor, and I glanced over the railing to see the pestilence of Akuma swarming around the steps below us. They appeared as grasshoppers, but I knew them for what they were. Consorts of the wicked Sharra. One bite carried a disease that would turn a person into an Akuma. With sickening awareness, I watched hundreds of them swarm a guard, biting him repeatedly. He screamed in pain, flailing and thrashing until he fell over the rail, hitting the ground with a sickening thud. Nauseated, I hurried after my aunt, wishing there was something I could do. At the thought, my fingers twitched with a need I didn't understand. The only way I knew to kill the Akuma was to kill the person who'd been bitten. "You're going to kill them?"

"No, I have a spell to reverse the curse, but it's in The Eye of Abernathy. I need to get it. The ingredients are up there as well."

"Wait, you can reverse the curse of the Akuma? Without killing?" I hadn't realized such a thing was possible unless Sharra performed the magic herself.

Cindy nodded fervently. "The problem is the spell isn't an inoculation. If you get bitten again, then you'll become an Akuma again. Several of my guards have been bitten and transformed multiple times and all I can do is reverse their transformation each time it happens." She reached the door at the top of the stairs and stopped. Then proceeded to say a few strange words before tapping the door five times. The door groaned as it opened on its own. The room it revealed smelled of old books, dust, and ancient magic.

I followed her in, unable to stop my mouth from falling open. The room was perfectly round, every wall covered with bookshelves all the way up the long, cone-shaped ceiling until it stopped at the point. Books lined the entire expanse. "This is incredible."

"Within these walls are the histories of all magic. I've been here eighteen years and still haven't read them all." She went over to one of the shelves, tapped the wood, and said some words. This time the shelves folded in on themselves to reveal a secret door. "This is where we keep the most dangerous books." After more magic words, the door opened. Wind blew loose strands of hair off my face. She said a word and the room lit up.

In the center of the room rested a white pedestal similar to the one in Pops' museum of the supernatural.

"Oh no." Cinderella dashed over to the podium.

"What's the matter?" I thought I knew, but hoped I was wrong.

Cindy faced me. "The Eye of Abernathy is gone."

My assumption was right and I internally kicked myself. I knew a little about that spell book from my mom. It contained the most difficult and scary spells anyone had ever seen. Witches had killed for it for eons until Abernathy finally took it and hid it away. Eventually, Abernathy had given the book to Cinderella and explained she was a witch. That had been more than eighteen years ago. According to my mom, the whole thing affected their friendship for a time.

I took a deep breath, trying to contain my panic. "If Sharra has the book then it's only a matter of time before she finds the spell she needs to finish creating the new child." If there was a bright side to all this, it was that Sharra wasn't as far along with her spell as she led me to believe. That meant I still had time.

"Oh no. Oh no. Oh no." Cindy took my hand. There was a look on her face I'd never seen before. "Whatever you do, don't let go of me."

"I won't." I gripped her hand in return, nearly crushing her fingers. Cindy was scaring the crap out of me.

"Good." She chanted a group of words that I guessed was a spell. Right before my eyes, a beautiful garden appeared on the other side of a magical portal. "Hold tight." She stepped through.

As I followed, I studied the enchanted opening. With my vampire eyes, I could see thousands of layers between the library and the garden on the other side, almost like I was looking sideways at a giant honeycomb.

I clung tighter to Cindy's hand, thinking if I let go, I might be lost. Finally, we stepped into the garden. Relieved, I glanced back the way we came. The library and all of the books were gone. A quick glance around verified that the castle was a ways off. We'd travelled quite far in only the briefest of seconds. Cindy's magic was really something. "What is this place?"

She didn't answer, but ran over to a spot on the other side of an exquisite pool of water. A waterfall roared and splashed from high above us. "I'm too late." She sank to her knees, picking up some of the loose dirt around her and letting it trickle through her fingers in despair.

"Too late for what?" I stood beside her, eying the large hole in the ground in front of her, but unable to comprehend what was wrong.

"They've taken the heart of Polonias."

"Oh no." My mom and Cindy had told me that story too. How Abernathy infused the land with magic. "What does that mean?" I asked, confused.

Cindy stood and reached for me. "Abernathy changed the land, but it still possessed a heart, or the place where all the magic generated from. As you can imagine, since it's kept this realm going for many years, the heart contains a lot of powerful magic." She clutched her hands together. "If Sharra has taken it - " She didn't finish because the ground began to shake and a large crack split the land in two.

I tripped over some rocks. Cindy grabbed me and moved me out of the way as the crack widened, swallowing the ground where my feet had been moments ago. "What's happening?" Fear raced along my spine.

"Without the heart," Cindy said, pushing some wayward strands out of her face as the wind picked up. "The magic within the realm is failing." She sniffled. "Polonias cannot survive. The entire realm will crumble into nothingness and everything and everyone within will perish." Dirt whipped against my skin and into my eyes and mouth as she spoke.

I turned, hoping to see what was causing the gusts. It was Abernathy. The enormous golden dragon landed in the clearing a few feet away. "Abernathy!" At seeing him, I wasn't relieved, but suddenly frustrated. If he would just stop pretending he did things for a wise purpose and use his power, he could fix everything! I marched forward, jabbing an accusing finger at him. "I've a bone to pick with you, dragon."

He chuckled, sending smoke curling out of his golden nostrils. It only made me madder, but he didn't seem to care. "I see. Well, pick later. You have work to do."

"Abernathy," Cindy cried, breezing past me and leaning into him. My normally confident aunt appeared small and broken.

It was then that I remembered Abernathy was Cindy's father as well as Troy's. I wondered not for the first time how many supernatural children the dragon had helped to create over the years. As I watched the two of them, some of my anger subsided followed by a surge of anguish. Did Abernathy love Cindy more than Troy? Was that why he'd come to her aid and not his?

"So many questions," Abernathy said, and I realized he was watching me and had possibly read my mind. "As I've said before, this isn't my fight. If I were to rescue my son and your parents, I would eradicate your destiny and that is something I will not do."

"But she's hurting them!" I couldn't help the gasp of despair that escaped in a sob. I felt as broken as Cindy looked.

"Then do something about it," he growled at me, smoke swirling from his throat in a waft of heat. "You are an original vampire, Princess Jasmine of Sharra. It's time to start acting like it!"

His words bit into my soul and I cowered beneath them. "I can't. I'm not strong enough." I fell to my knees, wishing I could ask Laeddin to make me disappear.

He shook his head in frustration. "You felt the power when you drained Arthur, didn't you?"

I nodded numbly.

"Well then call it forth. Use it like I know you can, like you've used it before." He lifted one of his clawed feet and touched my forehead.

The razor sharp tip pierced my skin just above where the jewels had embedded themselves in my forehead. In an instant, memories flooded my mind. It was like watching a movie on super-fast forward. For several seconds, I rocked and writhed as my body took in everything he showed me. I saw the memory Christopher had spoken of and remembered it like it was yesterday. Not only that, but I saw something - I couldn't believe it was real. My mom, dad, and Cindy standing in a circle while I sat in the middle of a seven-pointed star.

Along with my forgotten childhood memories, I also got flashes of Sharra torturing Troy. His thrashing form shifting back and forth between dragon and human.

Stop it! I shouted into my mind.

Sharra turned as though she had heard me: Have you found the final jewel yet?

Frustrated, I answered her in my mind: I'm working on it.

She stopped torturing Troy and walked away, leaving him shivering and gasping in his human form.

To me, she said: I won't stop until I have what I want so you'd better hurry.

Then she waved her arm and my mind went blank.

I shook my head as the pain of seeing Troy hurting raged along my spine. Mixed in with that were the feelings I had as a child. When it was over, I put my head in my hands. "Whoa." My head pounded like someone knocked a hammer against it. "Troy," I whimpered.

"What about him?" Abernathy asked, his gaze causing my head to pound harder.

"She's still torturing him."

The dragon raised his head and roared, sending licks of flames into the sky. When he finished, he looked at me. "And what are you going to do about it, vampire?"

I wiped at my face, rolled back my shoulders, and stood. "I'm going to get my fiancé back."

"Good." His anger dissipated and he settled his head against his paws, his colossal eyes piercing me as I met his gaze. "What do you mean fiancé?"

Closing my eyes, I clutched at the dragon carving, unable to face Abernathy as I spoke. "Troy asked me to marry him," I said softly, hanging onto him for dear life.

He chuckled and shook his head. "Young love. So sweet." He closed his eyes a moment. "As a child, you were arrogant and difficult to control," he said, changing the subject.

I was glad he moved on. I wasn't ready to discuss the engagement, especially since Troy might have changed his mind after what he saw between me and Christopher.

Abernathy went on, "Your parents thought it best for you and for all realms if you reined in your powers. They had some of your memories removed. I advised against it. Secrets never bode well and tend to resurface at the worst times." He eyed me, inquisitive. "But now that you have them back, do you feel any different?"

"Confused," I said. "A little dizzy. But a bit more - normal." That was a strange word for me to use. But it was true. Like my own normal. The only thing missing was my wings. Still, I wanted more. More confidence. More power. More something. "A little - " My knees buckled as dizziness grew. I felt sick.

Cindy wrapped an arm around me. "When this is over, I want to hear more about the proposal, but for now, I need to tell you something." She looked guilty.

"What is it, Aunt Cin?" I pressed my palms into my eyes, trying to force away the nausea as she helped me to lie down in the grass.

"It was me who did the spell that took your memories," she admitted. "I'm sorry."

"It's - " I wanted to be furious, but that emotion didn't register. It was fine. Now that I had them back, I didn't have room in my brain to be upset. I wanted to say that, but the dizziness became stronger and closed my eyes to stop the spinning. "It's too much." It felt like I was falling into a deep, dark hole.

I was falling or floating. It was hard to tell. Darkness was all around me and I didn't know which way was up. In the distance, I saw my mom. She lay on a bed. Heathcliff sat beside her. It looked like he was talking to her. I forced myself closer. Like swimming through space, I pushed through the expanse until I hovered above my mom. She opened her eyes. "Jasmine, you need to understand." She reached out. "Show her Silindra," she said.

"Show me what, Mom?" I asked.

"You'll see." She pulled me to her like she intended to hug me, but instead of feeling her body, I went through her and into her mind.

"Hello Jasmine."

The voice was that of Silindra. I recognized it from when we spoke in the gargoyle realm. "Silindra?" Confusion filled my heart. It was like her consciousness was inside my mom.

"You heard the story of how your mom's consciousness infiltrated my mind while I was alive. Our connection remained unbroken, even after Sharra destroyed my body."

That meant she'd been in there for eighteen years. For the briefest moment, I thought about what Sharra wanted when she talked about taking over my body. It was the same thing, wasn't it?

"No, Jasmine. It would not be the same. Your soul would be gone, if Sharra took over your body. She would burn out your soul so all that was left was your body. With your mom, it's different. She lets me hang out inside her mind and she even speaks to me, but it's still lonely sometimes. Now though, because of your mom." She paused.

"What?" I asked.

"Open your eyes."

Wary, I opened them. I no longer looked through my own eyes, but those of Silindra. The original queen of the vampires.

Wings beat at my back and I shuddered at the feeling. Exquisite happiness filled every inch of my body. How I missed my wings! But before I could completely enjoy the moment, my thoughts dulled.

"You have all of your memories back," Silindra said. "And that includes my memories as well."

I didn't grasp what she meant. "Why are my memories and your memories connected?"

"You are an original vampire, same as me. Same as Sharra. That's why you are connected to her and that's why you and I are connected now."

As she spoke, my mind tangled with hers. No, it was more than that.

I became Silindra -

OceanofPDF.com

SILINDRA AND JASMINE

I, Silindra had been ruler of the vampires for over a thousand years. I ruled because of systematic planning, a shrewd knowledge of the citizens I governed, and the cunning to deal with other magical creatures in the world.

Like dragons.

Dragons and vampires coexisted peacefully, for the most part. While some of the human vampires craved dragon blood, the originals, like me, had no stomach for the foul-smelling creatures.

The oldest and most impressively magical dragon of them all was called Abernathy. He was kind of a prickly character but, once you got around his rough edges, he had the heart of a gentleman.

I needed to speak to him.

His cave reeked of mortality. A mixture of decaying flesh, bat guano, and seawater. Despite the thick darkness, I could make out the bones of the damned scattered on the dusty earth. Carefully I flew over them, but they were everywhere, and occasionally my bare feet brushed against one, sending whisperings of the life of the dead.

Noises echoed off the walls, adding to the bizarrely solemn surroundings. Rats scurried, squeaking angrily. There was a repetitive drip-dripping of water falling from stalactites clinging to the ceiling. And a mild, continuous rumbling reverberated from the sleeping dragon.

I bent to enter a low-ceiling cavern, making sure to tuck my wings more closely to my back. A startled bat caught its feet in my sapphire blue hair before flying away. Though I knew I had nothing to fear, I flinched.

Taking a deep breath, I crouched and continued.

The closer I got, the warmer the air became. Perspiration trickled along my hairline and lower back, making my fur stick together. I wiped my forehead with the back of my hand.

Along the fringes of my mind bubbled strange memories of another time, filled with humans and places I somehow knew but couldn't place. The memories begged to be set free, but I didn't have the time to entertain them. I needed to find a way to stop my twin sister, Sharra, before she destroyed everything I held dear.

The rumbling, which sounded a lot like the purring of a giant cat, grew louder and louder. When I stepped into the dragon's chamber I stood up, straightening my spine.

The stunning golden dragon's snoring stopped. His languid saffron eyes blinked open and he studied me the way a bird of prey would examine its meal. I cleared my throat, waiting for him to acknowledge me with a salutation, as was custom. Though his head was more than double my size, I didn't fear being eaten. Dragons didn't like the taste of vampires, especially originals, like me. On the other hand, Abernathy might enjoy Sharra's fleshy, softened hide. Snorting in disgust, I rolled my shoulders back, allowing my wings to beat and expand.

Abernathy was a remarkable creature. Our wings were similar, though his were a beautiful metallic shade of gold while mine were black. The way he held them draped over his back reminded me of a glorious cape. On either side of his face and under his chin was a mane of wavy hair. The top layers of his scales shone metallic gold, while the scales underneath glistened in hues of amber and bright yellow.

He yawned, exposing his razor-sharp teeth as he shook his head. "Hello, Silindra," he said, his voice booming against my bones. "Nice to see you."

I bowed slightly. "Greetings, Abernathy."

The dragon rose, his scales clicking against each other as he moved. With him on his feet I felt like an ant - small, insignificant, and easily crushed.

He returned my bow. "It's an honor. To what, or whom, do I owe this - pleasant interruption from my slumber?" He smacked his lips as though considering my nutritional value. I stepped carefully back.

"I need your help," I said tentatively, raising my chin. I refused to let the overgrown flying lion intimidate me.

"Of course you do," he responded. He sat on his haunches and the earth beneath him groaned in discomfort. Abernathy blinked. "Tell me."

I focused on his long black lashes. "My sister, Sharra, is ambitious and grows ever more greedy for power. I fear if she succeeds in her plans, the world as we know it will be lost and only those she deems worthy will retain magic." And I knew that meant her and no one else, at least not to any measurable extent. I paused, unable to meet his gaze, and took a secret breath.

A big part of me hadn't wanted to come. Doing so meant betraying Sharra. I loved my sister. Sharra and I were the best of friends for more than a thousand years, until she discovered humans and bent them to her purposes. Until she realized she could change them into a new variety of vampire and force them to do her bidding.

Until she decided she should rule instead of me. Remorse filled me and I shoved those feelings away.

To Abernathy, I continued, "We may drive her back for a time, but she'll return. She's strong-willed, her power grows stronger every day, and she's so determined." I swallowed. "I - We need a way to protect a portion of Earth's magic so it can't be muddled to suit Sharra's lust for power."

"I see." Abernathy's tail whipped and curled around his feet. I got the feeling he really didn't see, but wanted to mollify me. "You realize, dear vampire, life is evolution whether you want to believe it or not." He drummed his clawed paws on the ground, sending wisps of dirt into the air. "Had a tadpole not longed to roam on land, it never would have become a frog."

I nodded. It was the same argument Sharra used, but that didn't make it right.

"Why do you want to stop what so naturally is?" Abernathy continued. "Unless you're worried creatures of magic will agree with her instead of you?" He gave me a knowing glance, and I cringed.

Clearing my throat, I steeled myself and tried to match his glare. The idea of losing one's magic made no sense. Why would someone willingly give up such a gift? Choose to mate with lesser creatures? Weakening their power. There was no rhyme or rationale behind the logic. Flapping my wings in frustration, I said, "The unicorns believed as Sharra does, and they are all but extinct, each generation their magic is diluted until the youngest no longer grow a horn and can't communicate with other creatures of magic. It's a disgrace! They are mostly horses now and they do the humans' dirty work." My words came out ragged, but that was the truth. It was despicable the things that happened in the name of evolution.

"Perhaps," Abernathy said thoughtfully.

I fisted my hands, the muscles under my fur straining from the pressure. Would he refuse me?

Abernathy exhaled, sending smoke out through his nostrils. I took another step back. "If you wish to save Earth's magics, there is much you must do. While I do not agree the horse is less of a creature than the unicorn, I do think there is merit to what you request. Saving magic will benefit all creatures."

I felt my shoulders relax. My wings vibrated in response. It didn't matter if he agreed with my beliefs or not, only that he told me what I needed to do to protect the world's magic from dying out completely. "You'll help, then?"

"Yes, Silindra, Queen of the Vampires. I'll give you what you desire, but remember, all choices come with a price."

"Thank you," I breathed, feeling a little giddy and wondering where the emotion came from. Usually I was exceptional under pressure.

Abernathy tossed his head back. "Hhhmmmmm. Aaarrgggghhhh. Hhhmmmmm. Aaarrgggghhhh." The noise trembled deep within the dragon's body. He pranced from one foot to the other, as though dancing. Then he rose up on his hind legs and let out a roar, breathing fire. Flames licked the high ceiling of the cavern. The bats died instantly, falling like black rain all around us. I leapt back, pinning my wings against the floor and the rocky wall. And waited.

After several minutes he stopped, turning his ferocious face my direction. An angry pain burned in his eyes. He opened his mouth and I had a momentary flash of fear that he would send his fiery breath my way.

Instead, something small rolled off his tongue and landed on the dusty floor beneath him. "Take that," he said, returning to his sitting position, looking as though he'd done nothing bizarre.

I hesitated. "What is it?" A hairball, I thought. Nasty.

"Go on, it won't bite."

Yeah, but it might be oozing saliva and other disgusting dragon-stuff, I thought, gingerly standing over it.

Abernathy chuckled, his eyes twinkling merriment. "Go on," he prodded.

Cautious, I picked it up. It was warm and, thankfully, slobber free. It looked like a topaz gem shaped like a teardrop. A grey-black substance swirled within. Holding it between my thumb and first finger I peered at it more closely.

"What is it?" I asked, hearing the wonderment in my voice.

"That, dear Silindra, is a piece of my soul."

I gasped and almost dropped it. "Why?" To give away a piece of one's soul was a travesty.

"In order to save magic, you must combine my soul with six other magical elements," Abernathy answered.

A vibration began within my body, and I knew he spoke the truth. "And they are?" I asked, pressing the gem into the palm of one hand.

"The horn of a unicorn, the strength of a troll, the heart of a fairy, the essence of a vampire, and the blood of a Hunter - but not just any Hunter. When the time comes, you'll understand what I mean."

I nodded.

Two different shrieks came from the nethermost part of my mind. I sucked in a breath, surprised. I hadn't made the noise, but what had? Shaking my head, I tried to rid myself of the clutter. After a thousand years of living, I thought I'd experienced everything, but there was something new happening inside me.

Abernathy spoke, "Do not fight what is meant to be. You have two young vampires within your mind. One will rule sooner and the other later. They will restore the magical balance to the Earth when the time comes." Without waiting for my response, he lay down, curling his back toward me. Within seconds he was snoring again.

With the gem firmly in my grasp, I retreated from the cave. A part of me worried about keeping the dragon's soul safe. In the wrong hands, it would destroy lives. With the elements combined, whoever wore the gem would possess more power than all others, including the dragons.

Excitement shot through my heart.

I would be the most powerful creature in the world.

OceanofPDF.com

18 DAYS UNTIL TOTAL DARKNESS

SILINDRA SEPARATED herself from my mind so that I could sense her once again, though I remembered all she'd just shown me as well that my mother had been in her mind too. We shared the experience, which I found wonderful. It also seemed impossible. Silindra's body had died thousands of years ago, but I could feel her.

"See, your conflict isn't new, Jasmine. You and your mom have more in common than you know and it was time you realized that. And you have her power as well as your father's. You must defeat my sister. To do so, you'll have to sacrifice everything. It's the only way to bring balance for those who have died at her hand and for those you love. It won't be easy. In fact, it'll be the most difficult thing you've ever done, but you must or the world will be forced to bow down to my sister and all will be enslaved to her vicious whims."

"I understand," I said.

"Good."

Her voice left my mind and I woke. Opening my eyes, I was no longer in Polonias. I was back at home.

Gatsby jumped onto my bed and stretched. "You've been with Silindra for seven days. I had to battle those disgusting Akuma in this realm while you were asleep. If you see singe marks, don't blame me, just realize I saved your life while waiting for you." He yawned. "And I'm exhausted." His claws dug into the blankets. "But hopefully you are now ready to do what must be done."

A surge of newfound confidence filled me. "I am." Then I blanched. "I think." I still had to find the magic within myself and I believed I could do that by first going home and collecting the final piece of the crown. "Definitely," I said, getting out of bed and rolling back my shoulders. "Where's Cindy?" She had been upset because of what had happened to the heart. "Is Polonias still in one piece?"

"It is, for now - " He paused a moment. "But she had to do something she didn't want to," he said, walking onto my stomach and lying down.

"What did she do?" I searched his furry, gray face.

"Nothing you need to concern yourself with." He jumped off the bed and went to the open window of my bedroom. The cat bounded through the air.

I ran over and peered out as a shadow passed over me. And I saw the flicker of Abernathy's golden tail.

"I'll meet you in Sharra," he said from far above, though I had no trouble hearing him.

I closed the window and took hold of the amulet around my neck. A rush of Silindra's power - of my power - coursed through me.

Silindra's voice echoed in my mind I felt it in my bones: You don't need the amulet, Jasmine.

And then I heard Abernathy's words: You have the power within.

Taking a deep breath, I released the amulet and closed my eyes.

"I can do this." I pictured my bedroom in Sharra.

The rock walls held together by mortar. The jade green bedspread covered in wistful green and black pillows.

A painting of my parents and me hanging on one of the walls. I loved how my mom and dad were looking at me while I hammed it up for the artist. I took a deep breath and remembered the smell of the flowers beneath my windows and the way the birds and insects chirped first thing in the morning.

Then I thought of my bathroom and Zenny.

I missed him as well as my best friend, Abrea. For the briefest moment, my soul longed for the time before I met Laeddin and made those wishes.

There was a slight breeze and when I opened my eyes, I was back in my room, standing beside the rocking chair.

Reaching out, I dragged my fingers along the familiar frame. Emotions I hadn't expected overwhelmed me.

How I missed my home!

Though I needed to hurry, I took a moment to sit in the chair my nanny, Ciana, had rocked me in as a child.

Memories I'd long forgotten swirled through me.

Like when I was ten and my mom made me mad. "I hate you," I'd shouted, flying away from her. In my room, I determined to run away to the human world.

Slamming the door, I'd used magic to create a suitcase like one I'd seen in a magazine. The suitcase was round and covered in orange and yellow flowers. Without care, I threw clothes inside and then sealed it shut, not with my hands, but with magic.

"With magic," I whispered, sitting up, as understanding dawned on me.

That tiny feeling squirmed its way to the tips of my fingers.

I held them up, studying them, waiting for the ease of the magic I had then to appear now.

Not only did I have my recovered memories to prove it existed, but I also knew what I'd done when Arthur had gone after Christopher and then me.

Magic and power had overtaken me.

The feeling still scared me a little.

"There is magic in there. I know it." I touched each finger to my thumb, hoping the magic would spring to life as it had when I drained Arthur.

When nothing happened, I slumped back into the chair and closed my eyes. There were so many memories, it was difficult to wade through them.

The first thing that came to mind wasn't a memory though, but the vision Laeddin showed me of Troy and me.

It didn't even matter that the Unknowns said Laeddin only showed me what I needed to see.

Lie!

Nor did it matter that Troy was mad at me.

That was my future. I wanted it and I would do all I could to have it.

"Jasmine, I felt your return," Ciana said, shaking me from my momentary happiness.

I blinked, trying to get my bearings.

She wore a dress from the fifteenth century. The lace collar went all the way up to her chin and was the same color as the skirt, a deep purple. Her hair was up in a bun.

But she was a traitor!

"Get away from me," I said, pushing out of the rocking chair, my breathing heavy.

Fury filled my chest, the same fury I felt when Arthur nearly drained Christopher.

It raged forth, ready to fight.

Ciana betrayed us, not only me and my mom and dad, but all of Sharra.

And like Arthur, she deserved to be shut up in the cave of lost souls.

I felt my teeth grow in my mouth and then paused. Maybe she didn't know that I knew she betrayed me and I wondered why Sharra hadn't told her.

"Jasmine, what's wrong?"

My eyes narrowed as I studied my former nanny. Was Ciana pretending? That was a possibility. But if not -

Could I use her lack of knowledge to my advantage?

With a deep breath, I forced down my fury and allowed my fangs to recede.

"Sorry, you woke me from a dream." I tried to smile. "Hello, Ciana." It was an effort to keep my voice pleasant.

"My dear, where have you been?" She rushed over, concern filling her stark face. I fought the urge to step back in disgust. "We've all been so worried. There's pandemonium in Sharra. Do you know where your mom and dad are? Because of your parents' absence, the council believed they left us."

She appraised my appearance as she spoke, touching the sleeve of my black shirt, checking out my boots, and tugging at a piece of wayward hair before her eyes landed on the gems buried in my forehead. "Isn't that pretty? A new style?"

I gritted my teeth, forcing myself not to call her on her crap. She knew what the gems were and she knew Sharra had my parents.

She probably even knew where they were. "I don't," I lied, stepping around her and heading toward the door.

"I was told there was a rogue group of vampires going after my parents. Do you know anything about that?" I had to divert her attention away from me while I tried to think about what information I could garner from her.

"It's a rescue mission is what I've been told." She faced me, clasping her hands together tightly.

"What of Christopher? Have you seen him?" The Hunter was supposed to have stopped the rescue mission.

"Yes, he went after them." Her eyes danced with joy I hadn't seen in her for years. "Isn't it exciting?"

I growled as some of my pent-up anger escaped. "Actually, it isn't, Ciana. What if they get hurt? Those vampires have no idea what they are getting themselves into."

Ciana tittered softly. "But they're vampires, Jasmine. If they get into trouble, I have every confidence they can take care of themselves. Besides," she paused and went to the window, pushing back the curtain to gaze at the gardens below. "Christopher will help them."

There was something about the way she spoke of Christopher that had me worried. "His job was to help them return to Sharra." I opened the door. "There's something I need to do before he returns. Perhaps you can help me?" It was a long shot. Or maybe not. Sharra wanted me to collect it for her before I went after my parents and Troy. If Ciana knew where the final piece of the crown was, I wanted her to tell me. As I studied her, I thought it possible that was the reason she'd come to my room in the first place.

"Oh, what is it?" She gave me a motherly smile.

I wanted to smack it off her face. "There is one more gem I need to collect. It's a piece of an elven crown created a thousand years ago. Have you heard of it?"

She gasped, feigning surprise, and I saw the façade she wore cracking. "I have." She clapped her hands. "In fact, I know where it is. Would you like me to show you?"

"I would. Let's go." I held open the door, indicating she should lead the way.

She spoke as we walked. "You know, I'm so glad you're here. Perhaps before we go you'd like to call a meeting with the council. I'm especially sure the trolls would be anxious to hear your thoughts on what is happening." At her words, I paused. She must've sensed it because she stopped and looked back. "Is that a yes?"

"No, take me to the crown piece right now," I ordered, moving again.

"Very well, princess." She started down the hall toward the staircase. Her light footsteps echoed.

My hands were clutched together in fists. I felt like a lamb being led to the slaughter. Questions filled my mind. Would Ciana try to take me to Sharra as soon as I collected the last piece? Did she intend to kill me and take the pieces to Sharra herself? What would I do if she went after me? Could I call forth the power I felt with Arthur and use it to drain Ciana? I didn't know. My powers were there, but I still wasn't sure how to control them.

Ciana led me out of the castle. "Where is it?" I asked, moving so that I walked beside her.

"I bet you can guess. You were always good at games as a child." She gave me a sideways glance, her eyes watching me.

"Athwana Meyana," I said, surprised as the words left my mouth. In the tomb. The same one where Arthur had been buried before Sharra wakened him.

OceanofPDF.com

VAMPIRE MAGICS

OceanofPDF.com

ATHWANA MEYANA

SOMETIMES THE BIGGEST villains we fight are the ones we create within ourselves.

Not saying that was always true.

Sharra was the big bad for sure but I was suffering from a serious lack of confidence.

Maybe it was because of all I'd done. Making a wish to take away my wings as well as other things. There were consequences for my choices. Big ones. Including the darkness swallowing realms and the akuma.

Could I defeat Sharra and save everyone?

The question was on a continuous loop in my mind. It had been weeks since I met Laeddin and made my first wish. Days since Laeddin left and I fell in love with a half dragon. Troy. It seemed like a lifetime ago since he proposed and I accepted. Part of me didn't believe that moment was real, but a figment of my imagination.

Only a few hours ago, I left Pops and Joanna in the fifteenth century. There I got to know Joanna and my grandfather a little more. There I also drained the vampire Arthur before Christopher took him and imprisoned him in the Athwana Meyana - the supernatural prison in the realm of Sharra.

It was a lot and I still had so much to do.

I forced my thoughts back to the present as my former nursemaid Ciana and I used our vampire speed to rush from my family's castle in the realm of Sharra to the base of Athwana Meyana. Arthur was no longer inside the prison. Sharra had wakened him after she took my wings.

The grand mountainous tomb stood majestically in the distance.

Covered in trees, shrubs, and plants in every shade of green, Athwana Meyana gave off a deceptively welcoming vibe. The closer I got, the more tangled the greenery until Ciana slid to a stop at an unassuming wooden door nestled in the mountain's base.

I thought again of Arthur, out in the world, ready and eager to do something horrible, if he wasn't already.

As Ciana faced me, I debated what to do with her. Obviously, she was helping me find the final piece of the elven crown because Sharra told her to. But once I found it, what then?

"The last fragment is inside. Good luck, young one," Ciana said and moved to run away.

"You're just going to leave?" I was irritated with the vampire, but grateful too. She didn't intend to try to force me to go to Sharra. I guess she figured she didn't have to. I would go to the original vampire when I had the entire crown because she had my parents and Troy.

Still, now that I knew what Ciana had done, her treachery, pain lanced my heart. Ciana had been my nanny for years, and was practically family. "I can't believe you betrayed me for her," I added in a whisper. Sharra had been around for thousands of years. If anything, her evil had grown over time. The original vampire was awful and deserved to be extinguished. For good. It made no sense to me that anyone chose to follow her, especially not Ciana. When I was young, she had been kind and fun and such a good caregiver.

"I loved you, Jasmine," Ciana said quietly. "You were like my own child, but I made my choice a long time ago and can't go back on it." Her shoulders slumped before she ran off with a whoosh.

Wind brushed against the wispy hairs clinging to my face and I sighed, rolling back my shoulders. It hurt watching her go, but I couldn't focus on that. There was work to do. Determined, I stepped to the door. The gems embedded in my forehead warmed, causing some pain. At least Ciana told the truth about the location. With little effort,

I pushed aside the vines covering the door and turned the handle. Before I was able to pull it open, a rustling sounded from the direction where Ciana had gone. Hope filled my chest. Had Ciana changed her mind?

It wasn't my nanny, but an enormous female troll. Her nose flared and she lumbered toward me like a charging bull. She was infected by the akuma pestilence. Her eyes were empty. She bared her teeth, sending spittle out of her mouth.

I dodged at the last moment, using my speed. Stopped and whipped around. I didn't want to kill her, but I would knock her out.

No more death, I thought darkly.

But before my thought had time to filter, a blade sliced through the troll's neck, severing her head from her body. She teetered for a moment then dropped to her knees, her head rolling down her chest before hitting the ground and progressing forward.

Shocked, I covered my mouth and looked up to see who had slain the troll. The culprit was dressed in a brown tunic and trousers. Her flaming red hair blew out around her like a raging fire while vivid blue eyes sparkled against her freckled face.

"Joanna?" I said her name, but thought I must be imagining things. "Is that you?" I clutched at my chest.

"Bonjour, Jasmine. It's been a long time." She gave a small curtsy as she wiped the troll's icky blood off her sword and onto one pantleg before sheathing the blade.

I was in shock, to say the least. I knew how history recorded Joan of Arc's death. Burned to death by fire. Not once, but three times, just to make sure she was dead-dead. "I thought you were - " I didn't finish but continued to stare. "How can this be?" I finally tried again, the need to retrieve the final section of crown momentarily forgotten.

She came around the fallen troll and pulled me into a hug. "As I'm sure you read, the Cardinal of Winchester ordered me to be burned at the stake." She squeezed me tightly. "But as you know, I was a revenant and could not easily die." She pushed me away, kissing each of my cheeks before hugging me again. "After I lived through the fires not once but twice, I escaped. To save face, the Cardinal burned a wild cat and revealed the ash to his people, telling them it was me." She released me and shook her head as long ago memories surfaced before she steeled her face. "But that is no matter." She smiled. "It is so good to see you again. Five hundred years is too long to go without talking to you." Her smile grew.

My mouth opened and closed as I tried to think of what to say. For me, it didn't feel like five centuries. I'd only just left her. "I - But Pops, I mean Adam Henry, does he know you're still alive?" Joanna was the love of his life. To my knowledge, he'd never loved anyone since.

Her features dimmed. "Non, it was better that he believe me dead."

I wanted to ask, "better for whom", but simply nodded. "Why reveal yourself now?" I hoped that didn't sound rude, but I was curious. She had to know I would tell Pops when I got the chance.

Joanna clucked her tongue and glanced back toward the trees. "I am here to help you, Jasmine. This darkness is affecting everyone. Once we knew - " she paused, as though debating how to finish.

Something was different about Joanna. I wasn't sure what, but I felt the need to be on my guard around her.

Joanna indicated the door at the base of the mountain. "The final piece of the elven crown is inside, I gather?" Her gaze traveled up the wall as far as one could see before she returned her focus to me.

I didn't ask how she knew about the crown. Having been around more than half a millennium, she probably knew a lot. "That's right. I must find it and then find Sharra and hopefully restore light to the world." Just another crazy day, I thought darkly.

Joanna clasped my hand between both of hers and her face softened. "This is your destiny, Jasmine. From the moment I met you, I knew our paths were intertwined and that we would meet again one day. Much has changed since our last encounter." A shadow crossed her features before it vanished and she placed a fisted hand over her heart. "I am here to assist you in any way."

I was glad to see her, but I didn't know what help she could be. "It might be dangerous," was all I said. Last I knew, Joanna was a revenant because she refused to drink from her true love. Unless - I studied her more intently and drew in a breath. Her scent revealed the truth. She'd become a full-fledged vampire. "Joanna?" What had she done? The person I'd watched defy Sharra to her face was no more, replaced by the woman in front of me. Somehow I knew she was a vampire, but she was also more than that. What, I didn't know, but she was filled with something like light.

She waved her hand, dismissive, and glanced over her shoulder. Obviously, she knew that I knew what she was, but she didn't want to discuss it. "I've waited for this moment for hundreds of years. If I die, then I die. I'm ready. But not until you have succeeded in defeating Sharra. Understand?" While she spoke, others dropped from trees and came out from behind enormous boulders until there were a dozen people spread out behind her, all of them carrying multiple weapons. None of them looked friendly.

They were the reason Joanna was being vague.

Immediately on high alert, I bared my fangs.

"It's okay, Jasmine," she said. "These are my warriors. We call ourselves the League of Huntsmen."

I'd heard that name once before and recently. In the dream with Laeddin where the Unknowns spoke about me. The Unknowns made it seem like the League of Huntsmen would work against me. And if the League was real, then it stood to reason the Unknowns really were holding Laeddin captive. I swallowed down my anxieties. "Hello," I said, my voice hoarse, and clenched my hands into fists. The Unknowns loved to lie and to play tricks. Creatures of Earth, specifically supernatural creatures, were just playthings to the strange beings. Regardless, I would be on my guard with these warriors.

"You needn't fear them," Joanna added. "They are here to help, same as me, and I trust them with my life." She grasped the forearm of the lead warrior then turned. "This is Elkin. He is my second."

Elkin put out his arm and I grabbed hold the way Joanna had done. "Good to meet you," I said. His scent revealed he wasn't a vampire, but a chayot. How odd that he would team up with a vampire.

Chayot were created solely to defend humans.

That meant they mostly dwelled in the human realm.

Except for one, the chayot I met didn't like other supernaturals, especially vampires.

A quick glance at the other warriors verified they were a mix of vampires and chayot.

Such an unlikely combination.

"And you," Elkin replied, glancing at Joanna. "Joan has told us stories of your visit to France and your friendship with the great dragon, Abernathy."

"That was quite the experience." I thought of Joanna watching as I drained Arthur and cleared my throat. "Thank you for coming, but this next part I must do alone." My gaze flicked to each of them, curious about whether I could escape so many if they weren't on my side.

The answer was no. Still, I forced down my worries and went over to the door, yanking it open with all my strength. "Do not follow," I said, hoping I sounded confident enough.

Joanna put a hand on my shoulder. "Whatever your apprehension toward us, you needn't fear. We will remain outside until you return. Our task is to guard the door until you finish."

"I appreciate that," I said, lifting my chin and going inside.

OceanofPDF.com

HOT AND COLD

THE DOOR CLICKED SHUT behind me and I sighed. Hot air filtered along my skin and brought with it the stench of decay. The gems on my forehead burned hotter, giving the room an eerie glow. All around me were thousands of honeycomb shaped coffins, home to supernatural prisoners required to serve out their eternal existence within.

I walked across the room, my boots striking the dirt floor with a rhythmic dull thud. Once I reached the other side, I noticed my head hurt less. For the next several minutes, I played a not very fun game of Hot and Cold, except my version was more like Pain and Less Pain.

If the final piece of the crown was buried with one of the undead, it could take me months or years to find it. An overwhelming sense of foreboding filled my chest as I thought about Sharra and Arthur and -

"Arthur." I searched the cavern for his crypt. "Is it possible?" My voice echoed around the room, but I didn't pay it any attention.

Was that another reason Abernathy sent me back in time? Not only to meet Arthur, but also as a clue as to where I would find the final fragment of the crown. Inside Arthur's crypt? It was as good a place to start as any.

Closing my eyes, I thought back to all those days ago when Sharra took my wings. I'd flown with her inside this very mountain. She opened Arthur's coffin, and - My eyes flashed open. I knew where to go and started to climb.

Arthur's resting place was way up. As I traversed over the cells, I thought about the time I'd spent in the vampire's presence. He had no qualms about killing. Humans were food, like ants to the anteater.

According to the lore Laeddin shared about the elven crown, the pieces were buried a thousand years ago. Had someone moved the piece to Arthur's coffin? If so, I could guess who.

Dirt and grime covered my hands and got onto my shirt and pants as I climbed, but I kept going. The farther up I went, the harsher the gems on my forehead burned until my eyes started to water.

When a sharp pain stabbed between my eyes, I knew I had arrived.

Rolling my shoulders, I opened the cell. The metal bars screeched with a cacophony that could wake the dead. I hoped not literally.

The vampire's coffin was already open. Gingerly I lifted the folds of black fabric that lined the inside, searching for the crown with my hands. When I didn't find it right away, I ripped away the cloth and panels, but still it wasn't there. Which meant it must be under the coffin.

Frustrated by the pain burning between my eyes, I growled and shoved the coffin out of the cell, sending it sailing down to the damp earth where it splintered into thousands of wooden pieces. Wiping my hair off my face, I squatted and took a deep breath. The hexagonal cell smelled of ancient soil and strong magic. As my fingers grappled with the ground, the magic stung me and I flinched. Each time I clawed away the dirt, it would move, but only for a second before resettling in its original place, like I hadn't dug into it at all.

After several tries, anger creeped along my back. The magic from the soil seemed to be leeching my strength and a cold chill moved up my hand to my wrist and into my arm. Tears blurred my eyes. I screamed with fear as black dots filtered along my vision. Dizziness overwhelmed me and I fell back, landing on my butt while my head smacked against one of the prison walls.

Was this how the final assassin would fight to stop me? It made sense that the last assassin would be the strongest. If I got the final piece, the power of the crown would be mine. The assassins were created specifically to stop that from happening.

Or was this the magic of the cave fighting against me?

Possibly both.

Nauseous, I rolled onto my knees and wretched. Nothing came up. The dizziness grew so strong, I felt my body roll until I was on my back, staring up at the ceiling as it spun. That just made me sicker and I closed my eyes.

"Jasmine," a voice called, but it sounded so far away.

I worked to sit, to search for the voice, but couldn't manage the position. Peeling my eyes open, I recognized the voice. She sounded like Silindra. "Where are you?" At one point, I'd gone back in time and spent seven days with her, just as my mom had. When that experience was over, I had believed Silindra was gone, but perhaps I was mistaken.

"I didn't leave your mind, Jasmine, just quieted myself," Silindra whispered. "See, once I was allowed inside your mind, I kept part of myself with you and part with your mother." She paused and I let that sink in. "Now relax and allow your subconscious to find me. As we're original vampires, we're connected."

She'd said that before. "Okay." I unclenched my hands, letting them fall to my sides as I worked to calm my nerves and reach out for her.

"That's it," she encouraged.

Resolute, I urged the tension from my shoulders, arms, and thighs. My spirit separated from my body. And like the lock on a treasure box, I heard a click. Opening my eyes, I saw I was no longer in Arthur's cell, but in a garden. One I recognized. It was one of my favorite spots, especially when the flowers bloomed, filling the air with the sweet scent of vanilla and honeysuckle.

I glanced around, knowing I was behind our family castle in Sharra.

Silindra stepped into view, walking slowly, a lovely smile on her bewitching face. Her teal blue hair was loose and long, and her wings - her glorious teal wings extended behind her. "I hope it's alright we meet here. Once upon a time, long ago, this was my favorite garden in all of Sharra."

"Mine, too," I said, and swallowed as an overwhelming feeling of nostalgia rushed through me. My parents had brought me out here when I was a child. I missed them terribly.

Around Silindra's neck hung a pendant. It dazzled red and pulsed as though in possession of its own heartbeat.

She noticed my eyes on it and grabbed it in one hand, yanking it from her neck and holding it out to me. "This is the final piece of the crown. The gem contains all of the seven magics. It is the same pendant used by your mother to destroy Sharra eighteen years ago. Obviously, Sharra didn't die, but that's because your mother isn't an original." She pressed the gem into my hand. "Combine this piece with the other pieces of the crown and it will work for you, dearest Jasmine."

Even in my spirit form, I felt the power of the gem pulse against my palm. The magic traveled the length of my arm, into my shoulder, up my neck and face where it stopped on my forehead. I couldn't see it but I knew it was next to the others, a portion of it buried into my skin. "You're the final assassin?" I asked, confused.

"Not necessarily, no. When the elves created the assassins, they were something different. Entities filled with magic that would demand those who touched the crown piece fight them."

"And you fought the final assassin already?" The words left my mouth, but something began happening with the gems. My forehead started to blister, the pain excruciating. Grabbing hold of my head, I bent over, breathing heavily.

Arms came around my shoulders. "Jasmine?" Silindra spoke my name and I sensed her worry.

I tried to respond, to stand, but found myself on my knees. It was impossible to keep my eyes open. Dizziness and nausea made it impossible to see or hear, as though I'd been tossed into a vortex of pure pain.

"Get away from her," Silindra said, her voice steely.

I didn't know who she was speaking to, but I felt Silindra's arms tense around me.

"You cannot be here. She already has the final crown piece. It's over, assassin." Silindra's spirit moved to block the assassin from reaching me.

"I must complete my duty, Original," the assassin said.

With strength I didn't know I possessed, I pressed my hands against my head and forced myself to stand. The assassin's dark form was menacing, both swords drawn and at the ready.

"I can do this," I said to Silindra through clenched teeth. My fangs were out and I felt them bite into my skin. "I must." As I stepped from Silindra's grasp, twin blades formed in my hands. They shimmered as red lightning flicked along the edges. Rolling back my shoulders, I widened my stance, preparing for the assassin's attack.

He came at me. I darted out of the way but couldn't focus. The pain in my forehead and the lightning around my sword had me seeing reds and blues and yellows until all the colors of the gems sparked around my weapons and surged through my veins. Or maybe it was the other way around.

"You cannot defeat me, assassin," I said, my voice not sounding like my own.

"Of course not, but I must obey and die." He leaped into the air, both sword tips aimed at me. As he came down, I blocked his swords with my own, sending sparks and the smell of melting metal into the air. His sword shattered into thousands of pieces, like glass from a broken windshield. The assassin looked at his hands, then looked at me and fell to his knees. "Finish it, Jasmine." He lifted his chin, exposing his neck.

I didn't hesitate, but crossed my swords and pulled, severing his head.

There was a gasp from behind me. Silindra was still there, clearly surprised by what I had done. I faced her as the gems on my head settled slightly. In my mind's eye, I watched a crown begin to form and take shape. When it was finished, I touched it.

Silindra smiled, her shock giving way to happiness. "Now you can go to my sister and save the world." Her form swirled into nothingness and dark spots formed in my vision once more. I was no longer in the garden in Sharra, but also nowhere else either.

Inky darkness was all around me. I searched for a light - for something to tell me where I was and where I needed to go, but there was nothing to see.

"She did it," a female voice said from somewhere in the distance. Which direction was impossible to tell. Without knowing how, I knew the female voice was one of the Unknowns.

"With help," the male added. "Silindra is becoming quite the nuisance."

I thought about responding to the two of them, but I knew doing so was a waste of my time. My opinion wouldn't matter to them. I was their toy and nothing more.

"There is still much Jasmine has to do and I'm still betting on Sharra. After what Jasmine's mother did, the former vampire queen's desire for revenge burns more brightly than this one's need to defeat her," the female said.

"Jasmine has the elven crown. She has her memories back. With those two things, there is nothing that can stop her, not even Sharra, and you know it," the male said, his voice only slightly harsh.

"I know that and you know that, but Jasmine doesn't. She still believes herself a child. In her heart of hearts, she's still the victim, not the champion the world needs." The female giggled.

It surprised me the Unknowns weren't aware I could hear them. Maybe they couldn't see me, either. I glanced down at my hands. There was nothing. I was nothing. A wave of relief washed over me. If I became nothing then those I loved would be safe.

But no. I thought of my mom and dad and Troy. They needed me.

If I didn't save them, no one would.

"Once Jasmine loses and she dies, we can give magic its rebirth and this time do it right. As of now, there is too much out of our control and that needs to end," the male said.

"Yes, my darling. Jasmine is the key. The only thing holding all magics together. She must lose." She let out a slow growl. "That Snow White and her mate created Jasmine in the first place still burns me up," she added and I heard the bite in her words.

"Agreed. We must make certain Jasmine does not gain the confidence she needs to use the magic she possesses. She must die and when she does, so will all magic. Right now, there is too much out of our control and that needs to end," the male said.

I didn't want to die. I wanted to live and to love and to make the world a better place. Somehow, I wanted to make a difference for good. A memory or a vision of a time I didn't remember filled my mind.

My parents were surrounded by shadows that were whispering to my dad. My dad had a look of horror on his face and he took hold of my mom's hand. "The shadows say if Jasmine dies, then so will all magic. We have to protect her at all costs."

My mom leaned against his chest and said, "We will keep her safe."

In that moment I understood exactly why my parents had asked Cindy to hide away my power when I was young. I'd been too flamboyant with my magic and too confident in my use of it. Their worry for me led them to lock away most of my magic and all of my memories of using it. They did it to protect me. And even though their plan didn't work, I felt their love and understood their reasons.

Despite what the Unknowns said, I would somehow stop Sharra and I would live.

OceanofPDF.com

ABOUT THE CROWN

"LEAVE HER ALONE!" Laeddin's voice pierced through my soul.

My heart pricked with pain. My genie was the Unknowns' prisoner. I almost spoke his name, but I covered my mouth - or tried to. The Unknowns didn't know I could hear them. I was at an advantage because I knew their plan. They wanted me dead so they could start over. I wouldn't let that happen. Somehow I would get back to my body. I would save Laeddin and everyone else. As Joanna said, it was my destiny and had been since the day I was created.

"The genie wants to fight back," the male said, interrupting my thoughts. "How amusing."

"I know what to do about him - about all of them," the female said.

Laeddin, I cried out in my mind, desperate.

"Can the girl hear us?" the male asked, surprise in his voice.

"That isn't possible," the female responded.

But it was. I wanted to rub that in their faces. But all at once, there was a whoosh and I was immediately back in my body. Hands rested on my shoulders and my head lay on something soft.

"Jasmine," Silindra said again. "You are fine, young one."

I opened my eyes to see her glorious face staring down at me. "Silindra?" I croaked.

"That's right."

"But how?" That was impossible. Her body had been destroyed a thousand years ago.

Silindra shook her head. "I do not know. Nor am I sure how long I will remain and there is something I must tell you."

I tried to sit up. "Tell me," I said to Silindra, growling away the lingering pain in my forehead.

"You're angry with me?" She looked surprised, her eyes blinking several times.

"You knew about the crown. You knew what I needed to do all along yet you didn't say anything. Instead you treated me like a child. It's frustrating." I stood, cracking my neck.

Silindra smiled and patted my hand. "Don't be angry. Your mother had a vision about the elven crown more than a year ago and knew you would need to collect the first four pieces before I could give you this one. She knew about the crown, too, but understood you would need to do most of the work finding it on your own in order to learn for yourself how to use it. There is an order to things. Your mom and I knew that and now you do as well." She got to her knees, staring at me innocently.

"I suppose," I said and blew out my breath. My legs were shaky and I leaned against the opposite wall.

Silindra stood as well, her vivid teal wings fluttering lightly.

I gritted my teeth, working to find my center. "So now what?"

"Now you must listen." She took my arm and together we went to the edge of the prison cell. We jumped down and landed with hardly more than a thud. Then she released me.

My nerves jittered. What more did she have to tell me?

"Do you remember the story of the time my sister and I went in search of the wish dragon?" She clasped her hands together as her wings beat lightly behind her.

"Of course." My mom told me that story many times when I was little. But now I was distracted by the way Silindra looked. "Wait, why do you look human? What happened to the body you were so proud of?" One thing my mom always emphasized when she spoke of Silindra was that the original vampire loved her furry, almost ape-like body. I'd seen the pictures, too, in the book from Pops' Museum of the Supernatural.

Silindra's features became sad. "Alas, that body is no more. When I was slain all those years ago, that form was stamped out and will never return. Since I've been in your mother's mind all these years, I'm guessing all I can imagine is a form like hers - like yours." She glanced down at herself. "It isn't all that bad, especially since I still have my wings." She glanced back at them, stroking one side, the same way I used to when I had my wings.

Tears pricked against my lashes, but I shook them away. It was no use crying over something I couldn't change. My wings were gone. End of story. "That makes sense."

"But this form is better than nothing." She wiggled her toes. "Don't tell Sharra, but I actually don't mind it at all." She paused and ran her hands along her bare arms. "Though sometimes I do get cold." She shook her head. "Anyway, about the wish dragon. He is still alive and continues to dwell deep in the depths of the Mediterranean Sea."

"Okay," I said, confused about why she was telling me this.

"You must go to him and demand a wish," Silindra said, glancing down at her hands.

My stomach lurched. The past had proved I wasn't good at making wishes. "I don't know, Silindra." The power of the crown coursed through me, sensitive like a new skin. Even my insides felt different but despite that power, I felt raw and untamed. Certainly in no shape to find a water dragon and make a wish. "Making wishes is what got us into this mess in the first place," I reminded her.

She clucked her tongue. "Not so. Sharra would've returned with or without your wishes and she would've brought the akuma, too." She waved her free hand as she spoke. "But that is neither here nor there. When you find the dragon, you must wish Laeddin free from the Unknowns. They are being most unkind to him and he needs your help. Surely, after all he's done for you, you are willing to help him."

I had tried to help him more than once and he wasn't happy with me. Beyond that, the Unknowns had him. They were the creators of all supernatural beings and even more powerful than Abernathy.

Surely they didn't have to answer to my wish. "Did you know they took Laeddin's magic as well?"

A cloud passed over her face. "I didn't know that. When you make your wish, make sure to include that he will have all of his powers back as well."

I nodded though I was still doubtful. "The Unknowns are all powerful. They don't have to answer to a dragon, do they?"

Her eyes twinkled with glee. "They most certainly do. See, the Unknowns created all supernatural creatures." She paused and I waited. "Except dragons. They came into exitance the same time as the Unknowns."

I didn't know that. From what I learned at the Seven Magics Academy, the dragons were part of the seven magics and the Unknowns created all original creatures whose power extended from the magics, including dragons. "But I thought the Unknowns created the seven magics?"

"They did, that is true, but they didn't create dragons themselves. Their magic comes from their souls." She crossed her arms, proud that she still had secrets to reveal.

I thought about what she said. That meant the dragons had been around for a very long time. "I see," I finally said, though I really didn't.

Silindra went on, "That is why Abernathy doesn't meddle. And that is why Netherby, Abernathy's water brother, keeps himself under the sea." She shook her head as sadness caused her bottom lip to tremble.

"So if I wish Laeddin free, why won't the Unknowns just imprison him again?"

Silindra smiled. "Because the magic that returned his powers won't be from them. It'll be from the dragon and dragon magic is out of their control." She clucked her tongue again, her happiness returning. "They can manipulate. They can still interfere, but they will never be able to take Laeddin's powers away ever again." She grabbed hold of her long teal colored hair and brought it to one side, twisting it nervously. "I know Laeddin was hesitant to intrude in the past, same as the dragons, but if you free him, he will help. I just know it."

I wanted to believe her, but I had my doubts. An image of Troy and me and the future Laeddin showed me filtered into my mind. My heart lurched with hope. I wanted that future more than anything. I wanted to marry the man of my dreams. I wanted to have children of my own, and I wanted to defeat Sharra so she couldn't hurt anyone I loved ever again. I nodded. "Okay, I'll do it," I said, rolling my shoulders back. "And then I will go after Sharra."

"Good." She smiled, and it took my breath away. Her body began to shimmer. "I'll still be in your mind as well as Snow's," she said. "But now I must go and recuperate for a time."

"Netherby," I said, thinking she'd forgotten. As soon as I said his name, I was no longer in the mountain, but at the mouth of a cave, deep in the ocean.

OceanofPDF.com

INTO THE CAVE

As a vampire, I didn't need to breathe, but the pressure caused my ears to pop. It was uncomfortable. The red pendant I used to travel from place to place was still around my neck. It bobbed up and tapped me on the mouth. I tucked it into my shirt collar where it stayed for a moment before smacking me in the mouth again.

Some of my hair came loose from my braid and swirled around my head like black tentacles. I tried to push them away but to no avail. Using my feet, I kicked forward, heading inside the mouth of the cave.

A school of fish, their skeletons and sharp teeth glowing beneath their iridescent skin, zoomed toward at me so quickly, I thought they would smack into my face. Before the inevitable happened, they darted around and disappeared into the eerie water. Usually when a group of fish swam away, it was because something bigger was after them. With that thought in mind, I peered carefully around. Blue light gave the inside of the cave a peculiar glow.

The ground was covered in white sand interspersed with thousands of colorful gems and gold coins. I guess it was true what Kenmei said about all dragons: they loved their treasure.

Without much confidence, I swam deeper into the cave. The gems sparked to life as I went, lighting my way. Farther and farther I swam until the cave opened into a much bigger cavern. Off to the right and taking up most of one side was a white dragon. Instead of clawed feet, he had fins, and a long tail like flower petals.

The ground rumbled and two blue eyes the color of midnight opened at once and fixed on me.

"I suppose you're here for a wish, little vampire." He shook his stark white mane, making it dance in the water while his fins and tail hovered - he looked like a blossom floating on water as he swam over.

"That's right," I admitted in awe. He was a stunning creature. More striking even than Abernathy.

"Very well. What is it?" His large head was so close, my eyes began to cross and I had to swim back to be able to see him clearly.

I thought about what Silindra said and what Laeddin told me about wishes. There were always consequences. Would he be grateful to be free?

Twin sets of bubbles escaped the dragon's nostrils. Inside them was smoke. I didn't think a water dragon could breathe fire, but maybe I was wrong. As they floated up, I saw that pictures formed inside each bubble. The foremost held two female vampires and I knew at once they were Silindra and Sharra when they were younger. The next bubble held creatures I didn't know. More bubbles left his nose, and those also filled with smoky pictures of things and places I didn't recognize.

"Vampire?" he said again, licking his lips over his very large mouth. "Make your wish so that I may get back to sleep."

I swallowed back a sudden burst of irritation. As with Abernathy, this dragon could make things right with the world, but he chose not to. Grinding back a retort, I made my wish. "I wish for Laeddin to be freed from his captors and his genie magic returned," I said quickly, clasping my hands together nervously.

Netherby blew more bubbles and pushed away from me, swimming over to his corner. "That is your wish?"

"Is that too much?" I sank to the ground, my boots brushing against the sand and the gems on the cavern floor.

"Not too much, but too little."

I was confused. "What do you mean?" Had I not said the wish right? If that was the case, I wasn't surprised. My wish making skills sucked.

"I'm just surprised you didn't wish Sharra destroyed instead of wishing to save Laeddin, especially since there are billions of lives who will suffer because you didn't think bigger."

I was taken aback. He was right. Why hadn't I thought bigger? Silindra told me what to wish for and I didn't even question her. Surely she had considered the rest of the world. "Can I change my wish?" I asked softly, already knowing the answer. It was too late. I'd made my wish and there was no takebacks.

"I'm afraid not." He curled up into a ball in the far corner of the cave. "Your wish is my command," he said languidly and closed his eyes.

I floated there a few moments before it occurred to me he was done talking. "But where is Laeddin?" I asked, only just realizing I wasn't speaking with my mouth but in my mind.

"He is in Salem, Massachusetts, in your mother's old house, awaiting your arrival, dearest vampire." One eye blinked open and for the briefest moment he reminded me of Abernathy. "You have the power to travel from here to Salem within you, but I sense you aren't confident enough to use it yet." He sighed. "Use the necklace Silindra gave you and go. Otherwise, I might decide an original vampire without wings would make a delicious snack."

My mouth fell open and water filled it. I closed it and quickly kicked my way out of the grand cavern and back into the smaller cave before exiting. Believing myself far enough away, I grabbed hold of the pendant and thought about the little house in Salem, picturing my room and the window with curtains dancing in the breeze, Gatsby jumping onto the ledge and curling up on my pillow.

Moments later, my ears popped and I was back in my room, dripping seawater on the wooden floor. Dashing from the room, I call out for Laeddin.

"Jasmine?" He exited the master bedroom, astonishment on his face. "How did I get here?"

I rushed forward to hug him, but Laeddin put out his arms to stop me.

"You're wet and - " He took a small breath, wrinkling his nose. "You smell like the sea."

I glanced down at myself and took in my soaked clothes and my boots. "You're right," I said.

"You wished me free, didn't you?" he asked. This time there wasn't disappointment on his face though but relief and even happiness.

"Yes," I admitted quietly, hoping I did a good thing.

He took my hands in his. "Thank you, Jasmine. With all of my heart, I thank you. Serving the Unknowns - " He paused again and shuddered. "I'm sorry I was such a terrible genie the first time, not to mention a horrible friend. This time, I promise you I will serve you to the best of my abilities."

That didn't make sense. He wasn't supposed to be my servant, only have his powers back. "What do you mean?" I asked, confused. Then I saw the tattoos around his wrists. After all we'd been through together, after using my final wish to free him, we'd come full circle. We were back where we started. "I'm so sorry." I failed in the wish department once again. "When I made the wish, it was that you would have your powers back and be free of the Unknowns. I didn't realize Netherby would do this." I hung my head, feeling terrible. Had Silindra known this would happen?

"Not to worry. I am as I was meant to be." He gave me a gentle smile. "Better serving you than serving the Unknowns."

"Then I have three wishes?" Perhaps Silindra did have the right idea. With Netherby I had one wish. With Laeddin I had three. I could wish Sharra imprisoned or defeated or something where she no longer had power to hurt the world and everyone in it.

Laeddin tilted his head as though thinking. "I actually don't know. You may have three or thirty-three hundred." He closed his eyes a moment. "I might be your servant for eternity. The connection is strong." He peered at me. "Can't you feel it?"

OceanofPDF.com

SMELLY AND GROSS

I CLOSED MY EYES, trying to sense the bond, but detecting nothing. "No," I admitted. Christopher had believed we were meant to be together. Now Laeddin might be tied to me forever. Where did that leave Troy and me? Suddenly, being free of Laeddin was the only thing that mattered and I blurted out the words, "I wish you free. You are no longer required to serve me, genie of the lamp." I was proud of the way I worded my wish. But as soon as the words left my mouth, I realized my selfishness. I didn't want him to be my servant, but I needed him to help me defeat Sharra.

His eyes grew big. He knew my mistake too. "Why?" he asked.

Nothing could be done as the black tribal tattoos around his wrists shimmered a moment before returning to normal.

Laeddin's shoulders slouched and he stared at his wrists. "Your wish didn't work." He was astonished but also relieved. "Strange. I don't know what happened. Maybe I'm out of practice. Try another wish, but this time wish for something of value."

I didn't utter that I believed he was of value and that wishing him free was important to me too. Still, I knew what he meant. "I wish Sharra imprisoned, never to bother the world again," I said in my most commanding voice. Again, I was pleased with my wording.

His tattoos came to life for a moment before returning to normal.

"Is she imprisoned?" I asked, hopeful.

Laeddin ran a hand through his hair. "I'm afraid not."

"What's going on?" I crossed my arms as desperation filled my heart. "Make my hair teal," I shouted, demanding. His tattoos flashed, but my hair remained black.

He shook his head wryly. "This is very weird."

Before we could talk more about the situation, there was a knock on the front door. "Who could that be?" I growled and ran down the stairs, yanking the door open. The shadow of a person filled the entryway as the mostly dark morning sky filtered through the edges.

"Tell me you remember all of your memories," Christopher said, sweeping me up into a hug then quickly putting me down and looking at himself. "You're wet." He worked not to make a face.

"Yeah." Glancing back at Laeddin who was at the top of the stairs, I said, "I'm sorry. I know I'm smelly and gross, but - " I needed a shower. No doubt about it. There just wasn't time.

Laeddin shook his head. "Allow me." He flicked his hand and I was immediately dry.

A quick look down revealed I still wore what I had on before except now my clothes were clean and dry. I glanced at the mirror in the living room and saw that my hair was no longer wet and it was pulled back into a loose ponytail.

"Thank you, Laeddin," I said, grateful for his kindness but also distracted by what I saw in the mirror. What held my attention was the elven crown. Made of gold and silver metals twined delicately together, there were five points, each holding a gemstone, with the largest stone in the center.

Without realizing what I was doing, I reached up to remove the crown. But when my fingers brushed the metal, the crown vanished. "Oh no," I whispered. Had I destroyed it? That would be just my luck. I leaned in closer to the mirror.

"Think about the crown again," Christopher said, shutting the door behind him. "It should reappear."

I swallowed and did what he suggested. Sure enough, the crown reappeared. "Thank you." Relief washed over me and for the briefest moment I thought I looked like my mom. I said her name in my mind.

Silindra's voice cut through my own thoughts and her image appeared in the mirror as she spoke into my mind: If you want to tell her something, I can get her a message.

I stared back, concealing my astonishment over her sudden appearance and responded: Tell her I love her and that I'm coming for her and Dad, please.

I sniffled and fought to keep emotions from spilling out.

Silindra said: I will. Oh, and she also said to remind you that if you die, all magic dies with you. I can't believe the Unknowns want to kill us all, she added, the words catching in her throat.

No pressure, I responded softly.

She nodded and her face disappeared from the mirror.

"You alright?" Christopher asked. "You look like you're all up in your feels." He winked, tucking his hands in his back pockets.

I tried to smile, but couldn't find it. "I'm fine," I said, working to sound like I meant the words.

"Good." He stepped closer, eyeing me warily like he wasn't sure I told the truth. "And you have all your memories back?"

I didn't respond right away as my mind flicked through the recovered remembrances. It was like watching a movie on fast forward, except I was the main character. As each moment passed, I saw myself, and a whisper of recollection blew through me.

"You shouldn't be here," Laeddin growled at Christopher.

"Yes, he should. He's my friend," I returned, only slightly perturbed. Then to Christopher, I answered. "I think so." As I spoke, a memory of helping Cindy with her magic came to mind. In the recollection, I sounded wise beyond my years. As I filtered through the memory, I tried to find the confident girl within, but she was nowhere to be found.

"Do you remember the time I tried to bring you to the siren." Christopher walked over to the couch, sitting heavily, his eyes still trained on me.

Laeddin crossed his arms like a bouncer at a club.

Christopher glared, finally acknowledging the genie. "What are you doing back? I thought I'd seen the last of you." His eyes fell to the tattoos around the genie's wrists and he gritted his teeth.

"So did I," Laeddin began, "But evidently I'm not that lucky."

Tension pulsed through the room and I came to stand between them. My head bobbed back and forth as I debated what to do. At any moment, Sharra would realize I had the crown and if I didn't go to her, then she would force me. If that happened and I wasn't prepared and then I failed in defeating her, all would be lost. The Unknowns would kill us all. I needed a plan as well as more than one backup plan. As I carefully studied each of them, it was clear they both cared for me, but they wanted to stop Sharra too. They were my friends and my allies. I could trust them.

In that moment, I remembered Joanna and her League of Huntsmen. "Crap!" Were they still standing guard outside the mountainous tomb? Probably.

"What?" Laeddin and Chris asked at the same time.

"Nothing." I wouldn't tell them about Joanna. Not yet. I needed to focus on what to do next.

"I need help with Arthur," I said, focusing on Christopher. I needed to discover what Sharra's plan was for Arthur, and then the evil vampire needed to be taken out. If anyone was capable of accomplishing such a feat, it was Christopher. He'd already fought the vampire once. He could do it again. "Have you heard anything about what he's up to?" Then I glanced at Laeddin. He might have heard the Unknowns say something.

The genie shook his head. Whatever Sharra's plan, the Unknowns didn't seem to care enough about it to discuss it.

"I have, actually," Christopher said, interrupting my thoughts. "That's why I'm here. Arthur is secretly trying to round up supernaturals to back him in a power play. He's got the siren - the one I tried to bring you to - " His voice trailed off.

A jolt of understanding shot through my veins and for the briefest moment, my confidence from my childhood returned. The siren's magic couldn't affect me. An instant later it was gone. I wasn't that vampire anymore. I didn't have my wings and I'd made terrible, narcissistic choices. "Like they would support him instead of Sharra?" That wasn't good. If he and Sharra fought, my parents and Troy could be in even greater danger.

"If what I'm hearing is true, then yes." Christopher ran a hand through his hair. "I'd like to go after him. The group of vampires that were going to rescue your parents is waiting for me to lead. I think," he paused a moment as though considering his words. "I think I can stop Arthur."

I was relieved and so thankful. He knew what I needed even before I did. "Yes," I said, hugging him. "That is exactly what you need to do." I didn't know why but tears pressed against the back of my eyes as I spoke. "Thank you, Chris."

He squeezed me tight. "Anything for you."

I buried my face in his neck, beyond grateful for Christopher's friendship. "I appreciate you so much." Saying the words caused a knot to form in my stomach. Could I defeat Sharra without him? Would I have to? I hoped not, but if Arthur was building up his own army, then it was even more that important Chris stopped him.

He kissed my cheek. "I'll leave right away."

"Thank you." I pushed him away so I could see his gorgeous green eyes. "Capture and imprison Arthur if you can, then come back to me. I may need your help." If I'd learned anything in the last few months it was that asking for help was a good thing.

A smile lit up his whole face and he touched the bear on my wrist. "I will."

I hugged him again. "You are one of my dearest friends, Chris. Thank you," I said and squeezed his hands.

He nodded and went to the door. I went with him. "Stay safe, Jasmine. You are the Eternal Vampire and the supernatural world needs you."

"You, too."

I watched him walk at a human's pace past the half dozing National Guard unit on our street as he headed toward Pops' house. There were lots of trees and plenty of forested cover on Pops' property, which would give Chris the opportunity he needed to use his vampire speed once out of sight.

OceanofPDF.com

A VAMPIRE GENIE

ONE OF THE guards snapped to attention when Christopher passed. The guard glanced at me, his hands hefting a machine gun as it rested slightly against his chest. I waved at him and then felt like an idiot. The uniformed guy didn't return the gesture but moved away to the other side of the tank.

Once both he and Chris were out of sight, I closed my door and faced Laeddin.

His features were twisted in grim worry. "What would you have me do? Since my abilities aren't working properly, I can't be much help."

I tucked my hands in my front pockets. "I don't need to wish if you meant what you said about helping me as a friend. That still stands, right? Your magic is powerful, more so even than mine. Together we can take Sharra and save my family." As I spoke, a wave of hunger washed through me and I felt dizzy. How long had it been since I last consumed blood? I didn't know.

"Of course I will," he said and paused, glancing at my lips. "You need blood, don't you?"

I worked to force down my hunger. There wasn't time.

"Here." He sat on the couch and tilted his head. "Go ahead. Take what you need. It's the least I can do." A wry smile crossed his lips.

"You're sure," I said, feeling slightly embarrassed as I sat beside him.

He nodded.

"Thank you." I took his wrist instead of going for his offered neck. The reason was simple. If Sharra showed me to Troy again, I didn't want him to see me drinking from Laeddin that way. The position was too intimate.

Taking his wrist into my mouth, I sank in my fangs directly over the tattoos.

A rush of magical blood filled my mouth and I sighed.

Since he'd been brought back with Netherby's magic, his blood tasted slightly different than before.

A little like Troy's, but not enough to be the same.

There was also Laeddin's genie magic. As I allowed his blood to fill me, I savored both magics.

And that's when I saw Troy. Through the dragon connection as Abernathy called it. My beloved lay on the floor, naked. His bottom half was shifted into dragon form, while the top half was human.

Troy, I called out in my mind.

He didn't move and I tried again.

Troy! I silently prayed he wasn't dead. That I wasn't too late.

He lifted his head and turned so I could see his handsome face. My heart ached at the sight of him.

Jasmine? he asked, his voice inside my mind.

Yes, I said, sucking more deeply against Laeddin's wrist. Then I continued: It's me. I have all five pieces of the crown and I'm coming to save you. I promise.

He lay back down, this time on his back, and rested his hands behind his head. He asked: Whose blood are you drinking this time? Is it Christopher's again? Or someone else?

I flinched at the hurt and anger in his words.

Laeddin's blood, I admitted.

A scowl crossed his features and he said: It seems I'm always sharing you with someone.

I know and I'm sorry, I responded, forlorn.

But this wasn't the time to wallow and I added: You can be mad at me after you are safe. For now, please fight. I am going to rescue you and my parents. And when you're free you can go on with your life and forget all about me. Okay?

Saying the words shredded my heart. I wanted Troy to love me anyway, but that was selfish.

He gave me a grim smile and said: If that is your wish, vampire.

Then Troy turned away and cut the connection between us.

Despair filled me and I was about to release Laeddin's wrist when I saw the spirit of Silindra in my mind's eye.

She seemed afraid.

What's the matter? I asked her in my mind, when she held out her arms for me to see.

Look, she responded, her voice was full of wonder and even a little fear.

That was when I saw them. Tribal tattoos on each of her wrists. They were the same as Laeddin's.

I shouted into my mind: What the hell?

She responded and blew out a frustrated breath: There are always consequences to a wish. Because you and I are bound, either Netherby or the Unknowns or both thought it a great idea to connect Laeddin and me to each other instead of connecting him to you. I didn't expect this.

As she spoke, I wondered whether or not she was lying. Because, now she could wish for a body and live once again without the need to hide inside my mom's mind or my own.

Before I could question her, Laeddin shoved me off him, looking weary. "You'll drink me dry, Jasmine."

"Sorry," I admitted, wiping my mouth with the back of my hand.

"I'll survive," he said, and then stopped, tilting his head in question. "What is it? I can tell something is wrong." He grabbed my shoulders, holding onto me like I was a lifeline.

"It's - I know why my wishes aren't working." I stood and walked over to one of the kitchen stools, in need of space.

"Tell me?" He wasn't hopeful, but worried.

I didn't have a chance to respond.

Silindra uttered her first wish in my mind: My first wish is for a human form with teal wings, long teal blue hair, sky blue eyes, lips red as rubies, and a perfectly sculpted womanly body.

"Jasmine, what - " Laeddin stopped and ran a hand through his hair as he tilted his head. "Someone made a wish and I am bound to respond." As he spoke, his tattoos glowed.

Between Laeddin and me there began a swirl of twinkling lights, a combination of the seven magics, as a body began to form.

With honey colored skin, the noticeably female body was taut and strong and lean, as Silindra asked.

Teal hair grew from her head, long and wavy.

The body spun so I witnessed her face forming, one so beautiful, I ached to look on it.

Once her arms, hands, breasts, fingers, toes, ankles and feet were all formed, the twinkling lights stopped.

She hovered there a moment before there was another pop and large wings the same color as her hair appeared on her back. She was beyond stunning.

Silindra's spirit left my mind with a jerk and I somehow felt it rip from my mom's as well.

When the magic finished, Silindra opened her eyes. She blinked several times and smiled, clapping her hands and jumping up and down. "I'm alive!"

Laeddin stepped back, surprised by the overexuberant woman who had appeared out of nowhere.

"It worked. Glory be, it really worked." Silindra spun in a circle before rushing forward and hugging me. "Can you believe it? I'm no longer just an essence in your mind. I'm actually here and I have a body once again!"

I patted her naked shoulder uncomfortably. "It's wonderful, Silindra. Um, but let's get you some clothes," I said and started up the stairs.

"Nonsense, Jasmine." She smiled and her whole face lit up. "I'll just wish for some." She turned to Laeddin. "I wish for clothes that fit my body and will be easy to maneuver in."

Laeddin's wrists glowed.

"Your wish is my command," he said and bowed as though he had no control over his actions.

Frustration oozed from my pores. "Stop using your wishes, Silindra. You only have one left!"

"Not true." She glanced over at me as a pair of tight gray pants and a yellow shirt covered her.

After a few moments, gray boots similar to the ones I ruined when I went to speak with Netherby appeared on her feet.

"I believe I possess unlimited wishes." A shrewd look spanned her face.

I crossed my arms, trying to calm down.

I didn't know what was happening, but she might be right. "How do you know?"

Silindra didn't respond, but Laeddin did.

"Because she is also a genie." He held up one of her wrists, exposing the tattoos there. "The tattoos are the tell. I am beholden to her and she is beholden to me," he said, dropping her wrist like it felt funny.

Some of the joy left Silindra's face. "I am no longer a prisoner inside Snow and Jasmine's minds, but it appears I am still trapped." She clenched her hands into fists and stomped her foot.

"Why did this happen?" Her smile vanished and she gave me an accusatory glare like this was somehow my fault.

I shrugged. "You were there. You heard my wish. I did exactly what you said I should do." I wanted to add that I should've wished for something else, but I didn't want to hurt her feelings.

"Consequences always accompany wishes. You know that," I added, coming over to stand between them.

"Jasmine's right," Laeddin said. "I don't know why but when Netherby returned my powers, he also connected the two of us together." He shook his head in confusion. "I'm sure the Unknowns had something to do with this turn of events as well."

Silindra's features turned furious. "I wish to be free from Laeddin," she shouted.

The force of her wish sent her flying backward into one of the bar stools.

She landed with a loud crash."

Laeddin's tattoos flared at the same time Silindra's did, but nothing happened.

"I wish to leave Laeddin and go to Sharra to confront my sister," she said through clenched teeth as she pulled herself to her feet.

Their tattoos flared, but both she and Laeddin remained.

How weird, I thought.

Silindra could wish for things like a new body and clothes, but if she wished to break free of Laeddin, it didn't work.

"I think you two are bound to each other for good," I whispered, sensing the rightness of my words.

"You can use your power for anything except being free of one another." I gripped my hands together, wondering what all this meant. "Laeddin, wish yourself free of Silindra and see what happens."

Laeddin nodded but didn't wish right away.

From experience, I knew he was carefully considering his wording.

"I wish the bands that hold Silindra and me together be loosed so we may be free from each other."

That was a good wish.

Both sets of their tattoos glowed, but it was obvious they were still bound.

"I am sorry, Silindra," he said, studying her a moment.

"But it is evident our bond cannot be broken." He shrugged and looked at me.

"That's why, when you made a wish, it didn't work. Because I am not connected to you any longer. Instead I am Silindra's master and she is mine. Whatever wish she commands, I must obey, and vice versa."

He sank onto the bottom step, defeated. "I'm sorry, Jasmine, but I don't think we can be of much use to you until we figure out how to use our powers together."

He glanced at Silindra. "Would you be willing to come to my realm with me?"

She gave him a look full of frustration. "Fine."

"Wait." I wasn't ready for them to leave.

Silindra was alive again for the first time in a thousand years. That was a big deal.

"Are you still a vampire?" I swallowed. "Do you crave blood?"

Silindra looked thoughtful. Then she opened her mouth, revealing her fangs.

Still a vampire and now a genie as well.

"I really don't like this." She crossed her arms.

"But you're alive," I said, trying to help her see the positive. "You're here. Not dead. Not just hanging out in my mind, but really here." A vampire with genie power. I didn't know if that made her stronger than when she was original vampire. Maybe she had a combination of both. There was no way to know or even guess without more information. Laeddin was right. They needed to do some research.

Silindra smiled again. "You're right, Jasmine. I am here. Thank you for helping to bring me back." She hugged me again then faced Laeddin. "Do you think there we can discover what I am?" She shook her head. "I highly doubt it."

"You're probably right, but we need to at least try before we help Jasmine. Figuring out how our new magic works could make all the difference. Agreed?" His gaze flicked between Silindra and me.

"If you think going to your realm is the right thing to do, then I'll follow. But we must hurry. Jasmine needs all the help she can get to fight against my sister." Silindra brushed some of her hair off her shoulders before wrapping an arm around my waist. "Jasmine, we will be back to help soon. Stay safe. And maybe you should talk to your Professor Pops about figuring out a way to control the elven magic within the crown. Every time I touch you, I feel its power. If I were less powerful of a supernatural, I would probably be dead."

Laeddin nodded. "I felt it too."

"Okay." Speaking of Pops reminded me of Joanna. I needed to get back to Athwana Meyana.

"We will figure this out and be back to help. I promise." The look on Laeddin's face and even Silindra's showed me they meant every word.

"Good," I said, but struggled to believe them. It could take a thousand years before they figured out how to work their magics together.

Just as they vanished, someone knocked on my door. I guessed it was one of the guardsmen. He probably heard Silindra crashing around. I quickly turned on the TV before opening the door a crack. "Yes?"

"Is everything alright in here? I heard some unusual noises." His dark eyes studied mine as though searching for any sort of deception.

"Oh, sorry. It was just the TV. I had it up too loud, but I turned it down." That lie wasn't bad. The guard seemed appeased.

He squinted, causing his eyebrows to scrunch together. "Okay, then. That's fine. Good day."

I watched him walk back to the oversized green tank.

Once the door was closed, I sank to the floor, resting my head on my knees and working to regain some equilibrium. A lot had happened in a very short amount of time. But my friends were doing their part. I needed to do mine. That meant first going back to the land of Sharra and finding Joanna.

Rolling onto my knees, I clasped the gem in one hand and thought of Athwana Meyana, the Cave of Lost Souls.

OceanofPDF.com

SEVEN HUNTSMEN

As soon as I was back inside the cave, I sensed something was wrong.

Sounds of fighting echoed beyond the exit.

Panicked, I yanked open the door just as an elf with long silver hair and empty eyes fell into me, knocking me back so my butt hit the ground.

I didn't want to kill anyone else. That was the last thing I wanted to do, but as though on autopilot, my newfound crown powers took over and as I pushed the elf off me, white lightning danced across my fingertips and into her body.

She disintegrated instantly.

What. The. Hell!

But I didn't have time to contemplate what happened as another elf came at me.

I rushed to my feet and put out my hands, revealing my fangs as he came for me.

Again, white lightning lit my hands and the elf disintegrated.

Was it because they were elves coming after me, or was it because I was in danger?

I glanced around, preparing for more.

The remaining akuma were occupied with Joanna and her League of Huntsmen.

The battle was intense.

A troll fought Elkin while Joanna fought against three elves.

There were a dozen vampires as well. One of them looked familiar. She jumped onto the back of one of the huntsmen and sank her teeth into his neck, ripping away flesh.

Blood gushed from his throat and sprayed the vampire.

She glanced up.

"Ciana," I breathed in horror.

But it was no longer Ciana. She had been changed into an akuma. Ciana smiled, revealing her fangs before wiping her face, smearing the blood across her cheek. She shoved away from the dead huntsmen and rushed Joanna. In seconds, Ciana was on her. Instead of trying to feed, she grabbed Joanna by the head. One hand on her chin and the other on her forehead and she twisted.

Joanna wasn't having that.

And neither was I.

I scuttled forward, my fangs extended. My power blazed to life. This time, instead of sending a lightning bolt from my hands, the twin swords I used to battle the assassins appeared. They were bathed in light.

There wasn't time to question their appearance and I used them to flash into akuma after akuma on my way to Joanna, slicing through each of them like a boat through water.

"Ciana," I yelled. Though I knew she was no longer my childhood caregiver, hesitation pulsed through me. I didn't want her to die.

The akuma that had been Ciana glanced up.

In that moment, I knew she intended to change Joanna, not kill her, but I couldn't let that happen.

Without thought, I tossed one blade at Ciana's head.

With the precision of a scalpel, the blade found its mark, slicing into her skull, directly between her eyes.

Ciana's face wore a look of surprise before she disintegrated, the same as the others.

Joanna stood, her sword still in both hands, her eyes slightly glazed over.

Had she been changed?

"No," I pleaded.

Joanna straightened, searching the landscape for more danger.

But the akuma were gone.

At least for the moment.

"Thank you, Jasmine. For a moment, I thought myself a goner." She sheathed her sword.

"Of course," I said with a shrug and followed Joanna as she spoke with her huntsmen and assessed the situation.

Seven huntsmen were in the process of changing to akuma. Without hesitation, Joanna chopped of their heads. I cringed, forcing myself not to reveal my revulsion, surprised at how easily she destroyed those who were supposed to be her friends, including Elkin.

"I'm so sorry," I said, as Joanna wiped the blood from her sword onto her pants.

Joanna clenched her teeth. "This isn't your fault, but the nature of war. That is why you must defeat Sharra and bring peace to all realms once again." She eyed me shrewdly. "And that is why I am here."

It was my fault. All of this, but I didn't say that. "Thank you. I'm glad you're here." And I was. With Christopher, Laeddin, and Silindra gone, I would have been alone.

"You have the crown. Now what?" She brushed off her hands before crossing her arms, her gaze pinning me with her question.

"I must find Sharra," I said, though I didn't feel ready. The blades in my hands vanished as well.

A small smiled played across her lips. "You are worried that now you have the power, you don't know how to use it?"

"That's right." I tucked my hands into my pockets, glancing up at the nearly black sky. How many hours since I'd been back? Since I retrieved the final piece of the crown and it became a part of me? It felt like years, though I guessed it might have only been a day.

Thick darkness filtered through my insides. I missed Troy and the love we shared before Sharra stole him away. Would he ever forgive me? I wanted to believe that when this was all over, if I won, then he would forgive me and we could be together forever. Sharra had manipulated us both when she showed him the vision of Christopher and me. My love for him would have to be strong enough for us both until I could help him see the truth. But Sharra had been torturing Troy for weeks. Who knew what lies she'd told him? By now, he could completely hate me.

"Jasmine, did you hear me?" Joanna asked.

I shook away my preoccupations. "Sorry. Can you repeat it?" I bit my bottom lip sheepishly and started back toward the castle at a human's pace. Joanna was a vampire as were some of her huntsmen, but there were also chayot in the group too and they didn't have super speed.

"My huntsmen need to eat, as do I," she said, her eyes flicking to my throat as she came to walk beside me.

It still pained me to know she'd become a vampire. "Yes, of course. The orchards near the castle will nourish the chayot as well as the vampires.

She raised an eyebrow in question.

I went on. "The fruit changes according to each supernatural's needs so that it provides sustenance according to the supernatural creature. A human will only taste an apple. Vampires will be given blood and so on."

"Bien." Joanna was quiet for a few moments.

I glanced back at the remaining huntsmen, then at Joanna. "What happened to you?" I finally asked.

"What do you mean?" Her eyes became guarded and I thought I recognized guilt. She knew what I meant.

The Joanna I knew would do anything to stay on the side of right. She'd stood up to Sharra and had refused to feed from Pops, telling the queen she would rather die than partake. Joanna and Sharra had battled - will against will - and Joanna won. In the end, Sharra had ordered Kenmei to kill her and Pops. Thankfully, Kenmei hadn't complied, leaving Joanna as a revenant. But something had changed. She was a full-fledged vampire. I sensed it. Smelled it even. The only way that could've happened was if she drank from Pops. "You drank Adam's blood, didn't you?" I asked the question though I knew the answer already. There could be no other way.

Joanna swallowed, her eyes hooded. "Three hundred years after becoming a revenant, I met and became fast friends with a woman. A vampire. She was easy to talk to. Though I was cautious, over time I grew to trust her more than any other supernatural. We understood each other - the pain and sheer loneliness that came with being what we were." She paused, her eyes pleading that I would understand.

I nodded for her to continue.

"One night, while in the wilderness of Montana, we started a fire and had drinks, sharing our stories. By this time, we'd been friends a decade. Like I said, I trusted her and she never gave me a reason to doubt her sincerity."

Worry began to eat at my insides. I thought I knew where she was going with the story, but I kept silent.

"She brought out a flask," Joanna went on, "filling our cups with blood." She groaned. "The scent was like magic and I drank the blood down without a second thought." She shook her head, but a red tear dropped onto her cheek. "Immediately, I recognized my mistake. The changes grew inside of me, as did the hunger, and my friend - Well, she wasn't a friend at all."

"Sharra," I whispered.

"That's right," Joanna said bitterly. "She changed before my eyes, a cruel smile dancing on her wicked lips. 'Now you will become what you were always meant to be.'" Joanna didn't speak for a good long while as she got her emotions under control. "I killed several innocent humans," she finally eked out.

My heart broke at the pain in her words. Tears pressed against my lashes. Joanna would never hurt an innocent on purpose. "Joanna," I said.

She shook her head, wiping away her tears. "The chayot found me and were determined to kill me until they discovered who I was. Now I am a vampire, but also something more."

I waited for her to continue, but we'd reached the orchard and I instructed the huntsmen to eat as much as they needed. Joanna and I went to the far end of the castle. "What else are you?" I asked when we were far enough away that no one could overhear us.

She glanced around to make sure we were by ourselves. "The chayot took me to - an angel realm. There, I met someone and confessed my sin." She met my eyes.

I was reeling. An angel realm? That was new.

"There are lower-, mid-, and upper-level angels, Jasmine, and I became one."

"Like a chayot?" We studied them at the Academy. But I hadn't heard of upper, mid, and lower angels. Obviously, I still had much to learn.

"No, Jasmine. I am an upper-level angel. They call me an angel of death." She let out a laugh, but there was no joy in it, only bitterness. "I always believed myself able to hear angels. Now I am one and have been for more than two hundred years." She shook her head. "But I couldn't stay with them. I - " She didn't finish. "I needed to leave that place and help out with the supernaturals. That is why I created the League of Huntsmen, and that is why I am here to help you stop Sharra. She deserves to pay for her crimes."

That almost sounded like revenge talk, not that Joanna was wrong.

One of the huntsmen came over to us. "Is there a place where we can get cleaned up?" he asked, indicating his clothes. They were caked with blood and dirt and I didn't want to know what.

"Sure," I said, and debated where to send them. There were the locker rooms used by students when the Seven Magics Academy was in session. They should be empty - I figured they closed down the school while the akuma and the darkness hung so heavily in all lands.

I stood, knowing our talk was done for a while, but I had to say one more thing. "That's why you haven't found Pops? You feel guilty about drinking his blood?"

Joanna nodded. "Oui." She closed her eyes a moment and she looked like she might crumble. "I cannot face him. Ever."

I disagreed. I understood the weight of guilt, but I also knew that sooner or later her past would sneak up on her and she would have to talk to Pops whether she wanted to or not. "Thank you for telling me," I said and hugged her tight.

She hugged me back. "You and I, more than anyone else, I believe we can relate."

I snorted. "You have no idea."

OceanofPDF.com

SHE'S ALIVE

INSIDE THE CASTLE, I walked the huntsmen, including Joanna, down to the Academy's locker rooms. They were empty, as I suspected. "Towels are in here," I said, opening a cabinet. "Clean clothes here," I went on, opening a closet. "Showers are back there."

"Thank you," the first huntsman said. "I'm Gris," he added. Then he turned to the rest of the group and introduced them. I forgot the names as soon as they were mentioned but appreciated Gris's efforts.

"Good to meet you all. I'm going to get changed too," I said, though that wasn't strictly true. Joanna was suffering and I needed to be there for her. "If you need us, Joanna and I will be in the dining hall in an hour."

"You are most kind." Gris saluted as we walked out.

The castle was like a ghost town. A servant or two would scuttle along, keeping their eyes down, focused on putting one foot in front of the other.

I hurried up to my rooms where I sent Joanna in to shower, hoping the warm water would get her out of her funk. Inside my closet, I searched for clothes that might fit her. As I was about to leave, I caught my reflection in the mirror. There was some blood spatter on my neck and cheek.

"Jasmine, it's so good to see you," Zenny said, appearing in the mirror. He wore purple pants, shiny purple shoes, and a yellow and purple checkered shirt. His hair was silver and swooped to one side like a cursive L.

"Hello, Zenny." I wiped at the blood and tucked my shirt into my jeans.

"You look like you've been in a battle," he said. It was then I noticed how tired he sounded.

"I have," I admitted through clenched teeth. "But I'm fine. How are you?"

"Sick of this darkness and what it's done to the people of S - " He stopped talking and leaned in close to study my crown. "That a crown?" he asked, his eyes wide. "It's beautiful. Can I hold it?"

I shrugged. "Sure." I tried to take it off, but it wouldn't come. I could make it appear and disappear, but it was stuck to me. It was at that moment I realized the only way Sharra was getting this crown was literally over my dead body.

And I didn't want to die - unless doing so would save the people I loved.

"Here, why don't you touch it?" I leaned in and he reached out, touching the crown lightly.

"Ouch," he said, pulling back quickly. "It shocked me something fierce."

"Sorry about that. Are you okay?" I'd forgotten about the crown's need to defend me and was glad it hadn't killed Zenny.

"Fine." He waved a hand at me. "It's a lovely, if not lethal bit of jewelry." He sucked on a finger and shook it again.

"I need to learn to control it," I admitted, standing and turning from side to side, remembering that Laeddin had suggested I speak with Pops. But going into the human realm might be tricky, especially with Joanna and her huntsmen in tow.

Zenny shook his head. "Well, if you're going to save the world, you're wearing the perfect outfit. Good luck." He disappeared.

I sighed. "Thanks, Zenny."

Outside the closet, I went to my window. There were only sixteen or seventeen days left until total darkness and it showed. The sky was grayish black even though it was still the middle of the day.

"How do I find you, Sharra," I whispered aloud, taking the clean clothes I'd found into the bathroom. The water had shut off and my friend the angel-vampire would need something to wear. "Clothes are on the counter," I said.

"Thank you," she hollered, still getting dried off in the shower area.

Before I could respond, there was a quick knock at my bedroom door.

Immediately on high alert, the assassin swords appeared in my hands. "Who is it?" I said, trying to calm myself. My gaze caught my reflection in the full-length mirror to the left of me. There were shadows under my violet eyes and my skin was paler than usual. The swords in my hands were scary. I looked scary. Deadly, I thought. That was good. I needed to be a regular horror show to defeat Sharra.

"It's your grandfather," Pops said through the door.

I shook away the swords and ran to the door, flinging it open. Pops was there and I flung my arms around him. "You're exactly the person I needed to see," I whispered into his chest, enjoying his usual scent of peppermint and cigar smoke. At least one thing in my life never changed.

"Is everything alright?" he asked, kissing the top of my head. "I see you have the crown. That's why I came. To check and see if you needed my help."

"Yes, I did," I said. "And yes, I need your help desperately. Because I'm not sure how to control the magic of the crown or even my own magic for that matter. If feels so strong, so powerful, but it kind of bursts out of me on its own. Can you help me?"

He smiled and it was like a breath of fresh air, touching his lips. "That was why you shocked me just now."

"Sorry," I said mournfully.

"Don't be. It's fine." His smile widened. "I believe I can help. Why don't you come back to Salem with me? I have some books that talk about the elven crown and - " He stopped talking, his eyes getting big as they trained on something over my head.

It wasn't something but someone. Crap!

"I can explain," I said at the same time Joanna did.

Pops gently pushed me out of the way and went to Joanna. "Is it really you?" His voice was so pained, I wanted to cry all over again.

"It's me," she whispered, emotions tracking across her face too fast to read.

I just stood there, unsure how to respond. Their reunion felt too personal for me to watch, but I couldn't move.

"How is this possible?" Pops asked, still in shock. He stopped directly in front of her.

"I didn't die but became a vampire after all." She appeared spooked, like she would bolt at any moment, and beyond guilty.

I could so relate and wanted to reassure her, but I held back, knowing Pops could help better than I.

"I've done things - " Joanna added. "Things I'm not proud of. Horrible, awful things." Her voice broke and it was like she was speaking from my heart.

Pops took her hands, holding her to him. "It's okay," he said, pulling her into a hug.

She fell against his chest as a sob caught in her throat. "Adam, ma chere," she whispered over and over.

Tears streamed down my face as the ache in my heart grew. Was it possible Troy would forgive me so easily? I didn't know.

"How I've missed you," Joanna said.

"And I you, my dearest Red." Pops kissed the top of her head and hugged her to him.

They stayed like that for a long time, until I felt like a spy and I cleared my throat. "I'm going to go down to the dining hall," I said. It wasn't the best excuse, but I'd told the huntsmen that was where we would be in an hour. I could visit with them until Joanna and Adam had their time together.

Pops cleared his throat and wiped at his eyes. "Joanna and I will have time later, but first, we need to get you some training."

"I have agreed to train her," Joanna said.

Pops nodded. "Let's go back to my home in Salem and we can discuss it."

"Will your men be alright without you?" I asked Joanna.

"They will be fine. I may be their leader but they are capable of acting independently." She still clung to one of Pops' arms as though now that she had him near, she would never let him go.

"Very well," Pops said. "Let me see - " he began.

"It's okay, Pops. I can get us there." I rested a hand on Pops' shoulder and grabbed the amulet.

"Of course, you possess the power, but I wasn't sure you were aware of your capabilities," he said, a grim look on his face.

"I-I have this amulet that can transport us." I held it up for him to see.

He looked like he wanted to say more about it, but he only nodded. "Go on."

I knew the amulet was a safety net, but right now, I needed it. Closing my eyes, I thought of Pops' study in his mansion in Salem, filled with books and old papers, the low light, and the dark stained wood.

The three of us arrived within seconds. I knew even before I opened my eyes. Pops' office had a distinct smell and I smiled.

Joanna searched the room, though she kept a hand on Pops. "This office looks like you," she said, her voice warm.

He kissed her cheek but didn't respond. Going over to one of his bookshelves, Pops began pulling down books and placing them carefully on his desk. Once the shelf was empty, he found what he was looking for and pressed down on something I couldn't see.

In a flash, the bookcase slid over to reveal a stack of secret tomes.

They rested on glass shelving in what looked like a clean room. A light flicked on, but it was muted, giving off a soft glow.

Joanna and I stood there with our mouths open as Pops went into the small room and calmly scanned through the books until he found the one he wanted. Once he was finished, he stepped out, pressed down on the shelf again, and the bookcase slid closed.

"What are you looking for, Adam?" Joanna asked, moving back to his side.

He smiled. "Jasmine needs to go to the dragon realm," he said and carefully turned the pages of the book until he found the page he wanted. To me, he said, "Your mom created realms for the creatures of the seven magics after she defeated Sharra the first time. You know that?" he asked.

"Of course." It was taught at the Academy, though I'd never heard of a dragon realm. Just add that to the list of things I didn't know existed, including an angel realm.

"Doing so took most of her power. You know that too," he continued.

"Yes," was all I said.

"What you should know, but obviously don't, is that you have all of her power and more within you." He watched me intently until I looked down at my hands.

In theory, I knew that as well. Between the crown and my original vampire powers that were reawakened after my memories were returned, I should feel practically omnipotent. That wasn't the case. "And?" I finally asked, having no idea where he was leading the conversation. My eyes flickered to Joanna and she nodded.

"You need to train, and while I know Joanna said she would help, it's better that she doesn't - "

"But mon amour," she began.

Pops held up a hand. "Jasmine's magic is too powerful. She could accidentally kill you." He looked at me and I swallowed, not even wanting to picture it. "But she cannot hurt the dragons," he said with finality. "She must train there." He paused a moment, and a distressed expression crossed his face. He bookmarked the place in the book with his finger and closed it, leaning against the bookshelf and watching me. "It will be hard. The dragon realm is dangerous, as you can imagine, but that is why it's the perfect place to hone your magical skills."

"But I don't want to kill dragons either," I said softly.

"As you know, the Unknowns created all supernaturals, except dragons. Because of that, their power is beyond even yours." His eyes bore into mine until I had to look away. "If you tried hard enough, perhaps you could kill one, but it would be very difficult." He opened the book, studying it a moment. "The dragon realm is known as the Hollow. After Sharra began to coax other magical creatures into diluting their magic, the dragons understood what would happen and wanted no part in it. Though Abernathy thought it perfectly normal for magic to alter over time, the other dragons didn't agree. They demanded he create a secret realm known only to them. Without telling anyone, and going against Sharra's wishes, Abernathy formed the Hollow. All dragons went to live there, except Abernathy and Netherby."

I leaned forward in shock. Joanna was surprised as well, though she didn't say anything. Unease crept through me and I wondered if Pops had revealed to much in front of Joanna. Her loyalties had changed. She worked for the angels now. "What did Sharra think when they were suddenly gone?" I asked, my gaze on Joanna.

Unaware of my distress, Pops answered. "According to Abernathy, it took her a while to notice." He shrugged. "It wasn't like there were a lot to begin with and the world is big enough that the dragons spread out. When she finally discovered their absence, she confronted Abernathy, but he refused to tell her what happened to them."

"And no one goes against a dragon, not even Sharra," I said as a new wave of frustration rolled off me. "If only Abernathy would just take matters into his own hands and destroy the original vampire queen. It would be easier."

"Easier, yes. But life isn't about easy. Besides, it isn't Abernathy's responsibility to clean up everyone else's messes. We must be responsible for our own actions. Abernathy knows that. You should too."

I let that sink in. It was like a lightbulb went off. "You're right," I said, and my feelings toward the dragon softened. I felt bad that I believed all of the responsibility should fall on Abernathy. Just because he could fix things, didn't mean he should.

Pops winked. "I believe in you, my dearest granddaughter."

I forced myself to grin as I flopped into a leather chair opposite his desk. Despite my doubts, it filled me with happiness to know he had such confidence in me. But I wasn't there yet. "So there's a secret realm of dragons?" I asked, getting back to the task at hand. If he intended to send me there, I might as well go now.

"That's right," Pops said. "The realm doesn't follow Earth's rules of time or space like the other realms do. It's completely separate. Sort of like the way Polonias used to be before Abernathy changed it." He came around and sat on the edge of the desk in front of me. "I dare say it isn't even part of Earth, but only tethered to it. Not that it matters. What does matter is, Abernathy gave me the spell to find the realm a long time ago. I wrote it down right here and haven't shared it with anyone. Ever. Until now." He pointed at the page.

I looked but didn't read the handwritten words. The notion of a realm full of dragons excited and terrified me.

Pops studied me. "Are you ready to go?"

My mind raced like it might explode. According to Pops, the dragons couldn't kill me nor I them, so I needed to put my big-girl pants on and just do it. "And you're sure there's time?" I liked the idea of training. After all the mistakes I'd made, jumping into another one and expecting to defeat Sharra seemed immature, especially since I might end up killing my parents or Troy in the process. But the darkness would be here in - I looked at the digital calendar on Pops' desk. The darkness would be here in fourteen days. Two weeks!

"Definitely. Time in the Hollow is different than time here." He crossed his arms and waited while I deliberated internally. There was really nothing to consider. It was the right thing to do. Necessary, even.

"I'm in," I said.

"I will go with you, Jasmine," Joanna said.

"No!" Pops shouted, fury suddenly on his face. It only lasted a moment before his expression went blank. "That is a bad idea, Joanna."

She flinched and crossed her arms, looking mutinous. The woman hadn't changed much in five hundred years. She would do what she wanted, when she wanted, and no one could stop her once she put her mind to something. I also knew Pops needed time with her - she needed to tell him why she hadn't come looking for him and they needed to heal.

"I appreciate the offer, Joanna. You've always been a true friend to me. But let me do this alone, please," I begged, hoping she would listen.

"Very well." She didn't want to agree, but I think she sensed she and Pops needed a conversation too.

There was evident relief on Pops' body. "Now that's settled," he said, handing me the book.

I took it as he pointed. "Read this," he said.

I studied the spot where his finger rested. The words weren't any I knew and I had to read them more than once. By the third pass, something strange began to happen. As I thought the words, images formed in my mind. I saw dragons of all colors flying through the air. Swirling and twirling. Some breathing fire, others playing together, doing stunts in the air.

"Do you have the images?" Pops asked, his eyes on me.

"Yes," I said, surprised he knew what I was seeing.

"Now say the words from the book aloud," he instructed, crossing his arms, his eyes falling on Joanna for the briefest moment before he returned his gaze to me. "Go on."

"Gethawa. Soulatha. Yonasha - " I began but stopped.

"Don't worry, everything will be fine here," Pops said. He took hold of Joanna's hand and she wrapped an arm around his waist, giving me a nod.

I swallowed, desperate to believe them. "Shaveneth," I whispered.

The world shifted. I was tugged through time. As I went, there were images of dragon battles. Lands on fire. Stacks of bones piled high. I hoped that wasn't the state of the Hollow, but if my luck continued to hold the way it was, then death and destruction were exactly what I would find.

OceanofPDF.com

ENORMOUS NESTS

As soon as I arrived in the Hollow, the hot air caressed my skin like flames on cooking meat. I wrapped my arms around myself, working to get my bearings. The sky was dark, and I had a moment of fear - perhaps Pops was wrong and Sharra's powers reached here as well - until I noticed the pinks and oranges in the distance. The sun was rising. A shiver of joy touched my heart. Light was coming and that filled me with hope.

I took a step forward and something crunched under my boot as my shin cracked against something sharp. "Ow." I glanced down and discovered the ground was made of sticks, several of which were jabbing into me. "Where am I?" I knew I was in the Hollow, but where specifically? The thick twined sticks were woven together but that gave me no indication. Lifting myself up onto the wall of twigs, I peered over the side. A wave of dizziness sent my head spinning. Below and across the expanse as far as I could see stretched an unending valley filled with craggy hills, some much taller than others, and shaped like giant twisted fingers. The ground was black, just as it had been in my vision as I passed into this realm.

As the sun continued to rise, there shone a body of water, the rays of the sun dancing on the small, rippling waves. To the right stood a densely thick forest, the trees so tight together, the colorful leaves reminded me of an afghan Ciana crocheted for me.

Turning away from the forest, I glanced around the valley far below before allowing my eyes to wander up the strange mountains, reminiscent of anthills. At the top of several sat what looked like enormous nests.

A quick perusal of my immediate surroundings and I knew that I was inside a nest. Three great eggs were nestled together in the center.

Thankfully, I hadn't broken one when I arrived.

From outside the nest came an atrocious sound. I turned in time to see an enormous emerald dragon appear out of the sky and hover above one of the nests with what looked like the remnants of a broken cow dangling from its claws.

Little faces appeared and began devouring the carcass.

"I need to get out of here." If a mamma found me inside her nest, she would probably tear me to shreds.

As I debated how to get down, I thought about my schooling at the Seven Magics Academy. There hadn't been a lot of information on dragons. Kenmei gave us some instruction, but he was always a bit mysterious when it came to whether dragons could have children and so on. And how were they born.

With care, I maneuvered around the nest, avoiding the eggs. Dragons, at least full-blooded dragons, were similar to birds in that they laid eggs. Freaking cool!

But what about Troy? He was half dragon. If his mother was human, then was he born like human babies? I never thought to ask him. When I saw him again, and if he would talk to me, I would find out.

After skirting the nest, I stopped back where I started. There was only one way out and that was down. Way, way down. The thought terrified me. It didn't matter that I was a vampire or that I had flown once upon a time. Nor did it matter that I was strong and fast. The idea of falling filled me with fear.

A noise momentarily brought me out of my funk. The eggs rumbled like they were about to crack open. I didn't want to be a baby dragon's first meal, either. I climbed up on the edge of the nest just as a head poked out, pushing aside the eggs like they were rocks. Too big to be one of the baby dragons, it had just been covered by the eggs. The dragon's head was covered in ruby, scarlet, and burgundy scales and had eyes the color of the sky. When it saw me, it pushed all the way out and stood on the eggs. Probably two feet tall, it charged me, baring its teeth and sending a puff of smoke from its mouth.

Frantic, I reached out, touching the dragon on the nose as the power within me shot from my hand and went directly into the little dragon. "No," I said, as guilt washed over me. I hadn't meant to hurt the baby.

Instead of crying out or disintegrating like others who attacked me in the past, the little dragon shook its head as the magic rippled across its scales harmlessly.

Relief filled my veins as the dragon spread its scarlet wings like twin kites and flapped them once, then twice, but didn't fly away - almost like it couldn't.

"You're okay, little one," I said, but I kept my hands out, sliding down to the floor with my back to the edge of the nest. The twigs scratched and dug against my skin, but I ignored the pain. "Easy, buddy. I'm leaving." When I knew it wouldn't attack me, I scrambled back onto the edge again, my eyes trained on the dragon. It came forward, sniffing me like a dog checking out a new toy or a delicious treat. It opened its mouth, but instead of biting, it licked my hand.

"I don't taste good, I promise." I stood, glancing back so I didn't accidentally step off the edge.

The dragon used its wings to lift off the ground so we were eye level. It didn't seem scared anymore. Probably just curious and hungry.

"I am not your mother," I said and swallowed. No duh. Dragons didn't want to eat their mothers. At least, I didn't think so.

From above, a whoosh of hot air rushed over me and I had to squat and grab hold of the edge so I didn't fall over. Nervous, I glanced up in time to see a stark white dragon in the distance. The hot air I felt came from the blast of dragon fire it had roared at me. Thankfully, the flames hadn't reached. But now the dragon had turned around and was coming for me at speeds beyond what I could comprehend. I thought it would crash into me, but at the last moment it pulled up, revealing sharp claws that reached out to grab me.

Quickly I jumped out of the nest, grabbing hold of the dirt and rock mountainside and working to climb down. With my vampire strength, I dug holes into the sheer cliff, hanging on for dear life. One wrong move and I'd plummet thousands of feet down. The dragon kept coming, flying sideways, its wings flapping as it sent a stream of flames at me. I screamed and jumped to the side before continuing down. The dragon wouldn't give up and came around yet again, this time with its claws aimed at me.

Without thinking, I sent a bolt of magic at it. The dragon flinched and snapped her jaws, just barely missing me with her enormous pointy teeth.

More frazzled and afraid than I'd ever been, I continued down the sheer mountain, moving as quickly as I could while sending out protective bolts of magic. About halfway down, the dragon came at me again with both claws. One sharp talon ripped across my back as it dug in. Unable to hold on, I fell down, down, down. Spinning and twisting, I rotated so that I saw the ground coming. I flipped myself around in time to see the dragon chasing after me. Letting out a final scream of frustration, magical lightning bolts shot from both of my hands and into the dragon.

It was surrounded by white light as it fought to be free. Before I knew whether I was safe, I hit the ground, feeling myself go deep into the earth. Then came the pain, so potent it knocked me unconscious.

OceanofPDF.com

LIRLE, THE DRAGON

I WAS DREAMING.

That much was clear.

Because Troy was there and he was laughing.

It'd been a long time since I heard him laugh.

Warmth and love radiated from him and I felt such joy. Even when he started to lick my face.

"Troy," I said, giggling. "Stop it."

His face changed from my gorgeous Troy to something red and scaly.

I opened my eyes and looked directly into the face of the dragon that had been in the nest with me.

Surprised, I rose up on my elbows, hoping the dragon would get the hint and get off, but it just scooted down into my lap before resting its forehead against me.

I heard the distinctly female voice inside my mind: Hello, my name is Lirle.

"Can you get off me, Lirle," I said, aloud, forcing myself to remain calm.

Of course, she said, flying up and landing on the ground beside me.

The ground was cracked and flaky like it hadn't rained in months.

When I fell, I felt myself go into the ground, but now I'm lying on a flat surface without an indent where my body would be.

"Did you pull me out of the hole?" I asked, rubbing the back of my head as I sat all the way up and glanced around. I noticed several claw marks in my shirt and guessed she must have.

Lirle responded in my mind: Yes. I hope that is okay. I didn't want you to wake beneath the ground. That might be terrifying.

As she spoke, she shuddered.

"You're right," I said, sticking my fingers through the holes. "I appreciate you getting me out."

Then I remembered the white dragon. "Where is your mother? Won't she be worried and come looking for you?"

At the thought, I jumped up into a crouched position, scanning the surrounding area.

The dragon snorted, sending a puff of smoke into the air and said: That was not my mother. The dragon's name is Vanera and she kidnapped me from my home several weeks ago. I was trapped in her nest by a spell for weeks as she intended to use me as food for her babies' first meal. But when you shocked me with your magic, the spell was broken and I was freed.

Lirle flew forward and kissed me on the cheek before going on: The least I could do was help you out of your hole, though I doubted you'd survive.

She tilted her head to one side and said: How did you survive? Was it your magic?

Her scales were warm and her lips tickled my face.

"I'm glad I could help," I said, stepping back. She didn't understand what personal space meant and I was struggling with her closeness.

"Magic was part of it, I'm sure, but I am a vampire. The only way to kill me is to chop of my head." I thought about that. No one knew if that would work for me. It seemed logical, but I added, "Maybe."

A vampire? she asked and clapped her hands, flying in a circle.

Lirle spoke in my mind again: I've heard fairytales about vampires and always wanted to meet one.

She flew around me, her face super close as she studied me. I felt like a statue on display but waited for her to finish.

Finally, she made her way back to my face and said: You're very beautiful, uh, what's your name?

I hated to admit it, but she was absolutely adorable.

"Jasmine," I said, kicking at a clod of hardened dirt.

She squinted, her eyes searching mine and replied: Well, Jasmine, it's lovely to meet you. But - What are you doing here? The dragon realm isn't safe for most dragons let alone other supernatural creatures.

I hesitated a moment before deciding to tell her the truth.

"I recently acquired this elven crown," I said, touching it to make sure it was still there.

"It contains a great deal of power, but I don't know how to use it. My grandfather thought it would be a good idea for me to come here to practice using the magic since it doesn't effect dragons."

Her face scrunched with distress and her voice became angry: Did he not worry you might be killed?

"I am an original vampire and I have access to all of the seven magics. Though I don't look it, I'm actually pretty strong myself." I didn't sound convincing.

Lirle tilted her head to one side and said: Hmmmm, well, perhaps I could help you practice using your magic while we travel back to my family's home to the north of here. I'm sure if you returned me they would be very grateful and grant you a reward.

I didn't need a reward but I did like the idea of practicing with the dragon.

I thought about the white dragon - Vanera. "Is the white dragon dead?"

Lirle snorted, sending out a large smoke ring before she spoke into my mind: No. Dragons are very difficult to kill, Jasmine.

She paused, gave me what looked like a very toothy smile, and continued: But you did keep her trapped long enough for me to rescue you, so now she can't find us.

Lirle's smile disappeared and she gave the landscape a quick perusal.

I did the same and saw we were very near the forest, just on the outskirts.

It made sense she brought me here.

The trees would provide cover and plenty of hiding places.

"What's wrong?" I asked, when her gaze returned to mine.

There was fear evident in her sky blue eyes when she answered: It won't be long until Vanera sends her Ondror Slayers after us.

"On-what? Why would she do that?" I asked, unhappy that we might be in danger again so quickly.

Lirle headed to the edge of the forest and asked: I can trust you, right, vampire?

"You can, without a doubt." Even if she couldn't, I had no one to talk to but her anyway.

"Whatever you share, I will keep secret. I promise," I said, following after her.

She glanced over her shoulder briefly, then bobbed her head once and said: My parents are the king and queen of the Hollow. There are many dragons who wish to kill the only heir to the throne. But the most treacherous and the strongest is Vanera. Twenty years ago, the day after I was born, she started the Dragon War. Not to long after that there began to be tales of the Ondror Slayers -

She paused and I held up a hand. "Wait, you're twenty years old?" That was a surprise.

Lirle sniffed and said: I'll be twenty-one in a couple of weeks.

"And you're a princess?" Lirle and I had a lot in common.

She responded: That is right. And as the sole heir to the throne, I am a very valuable hostage to those who oppose my parents.

Lirle's wings sent wisps of air at me and I was grateful for the breeze.

The longer the day grew, the hotter it became. She was like my own personal fan.

An eerie feeling washed over me. "Should we be out like this in the daylight? I feel vulnerable."

In response, she said: It is a risk. But we have a long way to travel and the longer it takes, the more likely that the slayers will find us.

"Alright, then lead on, Lirle.," I returned, full of gratitude.

I followed after the flying dragon for hours.

More than once I admired the rainbow colored leaves on the strange trees all around us.

We didn't speak much as we went and the silence was nice.

Lirle told me there were animals in the woods, some large, the size of deer or even a big cat, but I didn't see any, only heard them.

They were very good at hiding.

As she flew, I had to admire Lirle's wings and the way she soared with such ease.

By late afternoon, she became tired and we decided to take a break near a small brook.

She said: I'll be right back. Stay here.

I sat on a rock and waited, the dappled light causing the clear water to sparkle.

Lirle wasn't gone long and when she returned she carried an animal I didn't recognize in her mouth.

Blood dripped from the carcass as she dropped it to the ground and began to eat.

Trying not to be disgusted, I turned away, kicking at some of the rocks near the edge of the brook.

More than once, Lirle crunched on bones and I had to force myself not to flinch or gag.

Into my mind, she said: That's better.

She smacked her lips.

I glanced over my shoulder just as she flew by, landing in the center of the stream and ducking her head under the water, cleaning herself off.

When she was finished she flew back over to me and said: Once we are through here, we can follow this stream to the end.

"What's at the end?" I asked, picking up a rock and turning it in one hand.

She bowed her head and said: My home. I would offer you some of my blood, but it's highly unlikely your fangs would break through my scales.

I gave her a small smile. "Thank you for the offer but I'm not hungry."

Relief washed through her vivid eyes and she said: Great. Do you want to practice your magic on me?

I shrugged. That was the reason I was here. "Sure, but first, isn't following the stream a little too obvious? Won't the Ondror expect us to follow the stream?"

She flew over to a tree stump and sat on her hind legs, folding her wings behind her back and responded: Five streams lead to our family's castle and stronghold. It rests in the center of the realm. The Ondror won't know which stream we are taking. Let's hope by the time they figure it out, it'll be too late. She flew around my head. Now then, let me see you use your magic, Jasmine.

"That's my problem, I don't know how. Usually the magic just comes out of me when I'm feeling threatened." I crossed my arms, feeling self-conscious.

She studied me intently, her head tilted to the side like that of a curious puppy and said: Of course, I don't know exactly how your magic works, but the best advice I was given was to let your body and your spirit connect. Close your eyes.

I made a face but did as she said.

She went on: Good. Now relax your mind and search for the magic. When you find it, let me know.

I wanted to tell the little red dragon she was kooky, but I decided to give her advice a try.

So I took a deep breath and felt for the magic.

In my mind, I saw my heart, my ribs, my stomach -

It all seemed pointless and a tendril of panic started to rise in my throat.

I would never get this right. I was too immature, too - something.

But then I felt a change. A power near my bellybutton.

It pulsed like a heartbeat and I went to it.

Surprisingly, there was a light. Bright and shimmering.

Then I felt another something, this time near my heart.

I drifted toward it.

The power swirled, like an endless black hole.

It was almost terrifying, except somehow I knew it was my original vampire magic - a part of me that had always been there.

Dormant but waiting for me to recognize it.

"I found them," I said, hearing the awe in my voice.

Lirle clapped her paws together and said: Way to go, Jasmine.

I smiled but kept my eyes closed.

She said: Now imagine that your magic is something you can pick up and wield, like a weapon.

Immediately my mind went to the swords that appeared in my hands just before I battled each of the assassins who had been forced to protect the elven crown.

As I thought about them, the swords appeared in my mind, their blades electrified with the elven magic.

Could I attach my original vampire magic to the swords as well? I wondered.

At the thought, I felt the two powers shift and move so that the elven crown powers and my own powers converged just under my ribs.

They combined with a flash of white light.

A dull ache formed on my skin and I wanted to scratch the pain away but didn't move, allowing the magics to do their thing.

Lirle asked: Can you think of a weapon?

"Swords," I said as I watched the swords blacken.

One at a time, the swords attached to my ribs, the magics running up and down my bones until it felt like they were infused. I sucked in my breath.

Not necessarily pain, but a tightness. Until the magic rested and the swords appeared in my mind again, but different now.

The handles had become onyx in color and the blades silver and gold. They were beautiful, but more than that, they were a combination of my vampire magics as well as the elven crown.

"I have them," I said.

Lirle said: That is excellent. Next, think about the swords and imagine your magic becoming one with them.

I didn't tell her that had already happened. I just nodded.

Though I was still full of questions, a peace passed through me, and I opened my eyes.

The dragon smiled and spoke into my mind: Your crown is gone. The magic must be -

She didn't finish as a menacing sound, like a low growl and a hiss at the same time, came from deeper in the forest.

Lirle's blue eyes grew wide and fear flickered into her words: We must continue on and find a place to hide. While its dangerous to be out during the day, it's even worse at night.

"Lead the way," I said, standing and immediately on my guard.

The dappled sunrays no longer touched the water and darkness covered the forest. How long had I been working on my magic?

OceanofPDF.com

ONDROR'S MAGIC

LIRLE TOOK TO THE AIR, her attention on the direction where the sound came from. Her whole body trembled.

"You're frightened. What is it?" I asked, fighting my own nerves.

Lirle's eyes bore into mine and her terror shone brightly as she said: We're too late. The Ondror's magic is upon us. Listen carefully. A dragon's magic comes from the soul. Our greatest weapon is using the weaknesses of our enemy against them by showing them what they fear most.

She flew over to the stream before coming back to me and pointing with one claw.

Lirle asked: Do you see the soul magic coming?

I followed her gaze and squinted until I saw the blackness, traveling like a deadly mist through the trees, and heading right for us. "Can we outrun it?"

She shook her head and said: No. It's everywhere.

She spun in a circle and I followed her.

Lirle was right. It was coming from every direction, like we had a homing beacon on us.

She met my gaze and said: You see? Whatever happens, whatever you experience or hear, know it isn't real. The Ondror's magic can't last forever. Just hang on. When it's finished, if we aren't dead, we'll figure out what to do next.

She came over and scratched my arm with the talons of one hand.

"Ouch. What was that for?" Blood pooled and lined my forearm where she'd raked over my skin.

Her eyes were trained on me and she said: I know vampires heal quickly, but a dragon wound takes the longest to mend. Focus on the physical pain. Whatever the soul magic throws at you, remember to focus on the pain.

I nodded that I understood.

"What about you? What will you focus on?" I didn't know what to expect but I worried for her.

Lirle's voice sounded haunted but strong as she said: I'll be alright. My instructors have trained me for this moment my entire life.

Within moments, the wispy darkness enfolded me, almost caressing as it rubbed along my body until it reached my face before making its way into my mouth and through my nose and eyes.

My swords sprang to life within me, but it was too late. My body sank to the ground and I fell over.

There was screaming or roaring.

Whatever the noise, it reminded me of agony.

And I descended into the dark magic of the Ondror -

I OPENED my eyes to the sun shining brightly. Birds cooed in nearby trees and the ocean roared in the distance. I was in Sharra, resting in a hammock. "How did I get here?" I thought about Lirle and the dread she mentioned. A quick glance down at my arm revealed it was still sore, her scratches still visible. But the world around me seemed fine. No danger. No -

Troy came out onto a balcony above me. This was my family's castle and he was on my balcony, the one outside my bedroom. When I saw him, my breath caught in my throat. He was gloriously handsome.

"Troy," I called, climbing out of the hammock as a gurgle of happiness filled my insides. He had escaped the evil vampire's clutches and was here. Safe. All was right with the world. The sun shone brilliant. The birds sang their happy songs. Darkness no longer ruled the land. I was lighter than I had been in months.

As I watched Troy stare out, his gaze traveling over Sharra, butterflies danced in my stomach. "Troy, I'm down here," I said, shouting louder.

He still didn't hear me or acknowledge me. I went toward him and was about to shout again when I heard giggling coming from inside my room.

Before I had time to think, a woman appeared beside Troy. Her hair was long and blond and beautiful like the rest of her. He wrapped his arms around her, kissing her temple as she leaned into him. "How did I get so lucky?" he whispered, his lips on her hair.

Pain tore through my chest. Shredded it into ribbons. "Troy," I called again, this time without much fervor, as I fell to my knees. But I couldn't look away. Not even when he kissed her thoroughly and deeply, the way he used to kiss me. "Stop," I said, my word catching in my throat. "Please. I'm sorry. Don't choose her, choose me. Love me." Tears leaked onto my cheeks and wet my neck, dripping into my shirt.

"Do you miss her?" The beautiful woman asked like I wasn't even there.

"Jasmine?" Troy made a face like my name tasted disgusting in his mouth. "Not even a little bit. How could I miss her when I have you?" He took the woman's hand and brought it to his lips, his eyes holding hers. "Let's go back to bed. I want lots and lots of half dragon babies and I want lots of chances to make them with you." His features turned hungry. For her.

She laughed softly, tugging him against her. "But you promised me we could go flying. I want to see this land we are destined to rule."

What? Where were my mom and dad? And vampires? This was Sharra and this realm had always been ruled by vampires. Not dragons. Another lance of pain rushed through me. Were my parents dead? Did they not survive? Had I failed them all?

"Right, let's fly, my love," he said, pulling me out of my thoughts. Troy smiled and jumped up onto the balcony rail. The woman joined him wearing a lovely cream night dress, her feet bare. Hand in hand they bounded into the air. On the way down, they shifted into dragon form. Troy's bronze scales glittered and shone, but the woman was even more exquisite with scales the color of the sun. They flew down toward me, so close, I could almost touch them, but I didn't move. It hurt too much. Everything hurt.

It felt like I was dying.

And it was my own fault. The consequences of my actions come to life.

I had hurt Troy by making out with Christopher. At the memory of what I had done, guilt rose like bile in my throat. I didn't deserve Troy. I'd known that from the day we met. He was everything good, kind, courageous and gorgeous all rolled into one while I was arrogant and only concerned with myself.

That understanding did little to ease my pain. Instead I felt worse and wished I would just disappear. I fell onto my face and rolled to my back. As I lay there, I watched Troy and his new lover flying joyfully together. One thought kept playing over and over in my mind:

I wish I were dead.

I wish I were dead.

I wish I were dead.

Something snaked around my leg, but I didn't care. Nor did I move, except to lift my head and see. It was a thick green vine. The pressure of its constriction like that of a snake. I cried out as it squeezed my bones until they broke. Tighter and tighter.

But I didn't care.

All I could do was stare up at the bronze and summer yellow dragons as they flew together in harmony. Troy deserved that, I thought, someone who was like him. Good and unselfish.

The vine gripped my other leg. Agony shot through me once again but I breathed into it, recognizing that I deserved to suffer and knowing that once I was gone, the world would be free of all I'd done.

Without remorse, the vine wound its way around my hips and moved up to my waist, squeezing as it went. I panted through the pain.

Once the vine swallowed me, would I suffer endless torment? It was what I deserved. The thought woke me to the slightly different aching coming from my arm. Casually, I glanced down at it. Five savage cuts resided in my skin.

And then I remembered Lirle's words.

"This isn't real," I whispered and tears blurred my vision. Troy wasn't with the blond woman - not really. This was the work of the Ondror's magic, and it focused on what I did to Troy. That knowledge surprised me. I would've guessed my biggest shame was the consequences to all realms by making my wishes and bringing about the darkness and the akuma. But that wasn't so. The soul magic drew on my deepest, darkest pain. And that was the belief that I didn't deserve Troy - that he was better off without me.

But there was still hope - if I could break free from the soul magic.

At the thought, my magic, now connected to the twin blades, roared from my chest and sprouted out of my hands. I sat up, cutting away the vines until I could stand.

Above, fake Troy and his fake lover still circled in the sky happily, but I ignored them now. I needed to escape the Ondror's magic.

At my feet, the vine was retreating and I followed it as it led me to the edge of a forest. This wasn't in the real realm of Sharra, but I had a hunch that wherever the vine retreated, that was where I would find the source of the magical hold. So I stepped into the blanket of the trees, using my vampire vision to track the vine. A quick glance up and I could no longer see the sky. In a way it was a relief. Even though I knew this wasn't real, seeing Troy flying with another woman, even in dragon form, was excruciating.

I followed the vine for what felt like several miles until it stopped at an enormous tree. The trunk and branches were white, the leaves yellow, and as the vine slunk into the dirt near its base, I was reminded of the dragon, Vanera, the white dragon who'd taken Lirle.

At the thought of the dragon doing this to me, I lashed out with my swords, cutting into the trunk. At first it was random, just me throwing cuts out of anger, but slowly, I began to feel my magic within. The ebb and flow. At the moment, it was not buried, but not being used either. I closed my eyes, trying to see my power. And there it was, gold and silver, waiting for me to use it because I wanted to. Not out of uncontrollable rage, but with controlled fury. That was the secret. Choice. Control. Intention.

Taking a deep breath, I opened my eyes and circled the tree, searching for its most vulnerable spot. I wasn't sure what I was looking for but hoped I would know when I saw it. About halfway up the trunk, in the back was a hole where the trunk split. As soon as I saw it, I knew that was where I should aim my magics. I grasped both blades together with both hands, and the blade shifted and became one single enormous blade.

The change didn't surprise me because it came from within.

Another deep breath. My power hummed. And I jammed the magical blade directly into the center of the hole. As soon as I did, the world around me became watery. The pretend land of Sharra evaporated and I was once again near the stream in the forest of the Hollow.

How the Ondror Slayers didn't find us, I wasn't sure, but no way was I going to stick around and find out. Lirle was on the ground, her wings tucked at an odd angel under her body as she writhed, seemingly in pain. She was still caught up in the soul magic. Debating for only a moment, I picked her up and carried her in my arms while I walked down the center of the stream in the same direction we'd been traveling before this all happened. She'd told me how to get to her home and I didn't want to wait.

It was more than an hour before Lirle freed herself from the magic. Her body shivered and she opened her eyes.

At first she looked afraid and then she spoke into my mind: Jasmine.

Her eyes were hooded.

"That's right. I hope you don't mind, but when I saw you still suffering, I decided to carry you while I continued on." I tried to smile, but it was no use.

Too much weighed on me.

She pushed herself from my arms and tested her wings as she spoke: I should eat. That took a lot out of me.

Without another word, she flew away, disappearing into the thicket.

I considered whether to wait or keep going but decided moving was the best option.

Not too many minutes later, Lirle returned, and looked better.

She said: Thank you for carrying me, Jasmine. You went above and beyond. She hovered near my shoulder. You could have left me. I will be sure the king and queen know you protected me and that you are loyal.

Leaving without her hadn't crossed my mind.

"There is no need to tell them anything. I have no doubt you would've done the same," I said.

She nodded her head and said: You aren't wrong, but still. Thank you. Has your wound healed?

With her question, she placed one of her paws on my shoulder.

I glanced down at the area where I'd been wounded and saw that it had. "Yes. All good."

Then I decided to change the subject. "How long did Vanera hold you captive?"

Too long, she said but didn't add more.

I sensed a great sorrow in her.

Changing the subject again, I asked, "When will you be considered full-grown, like Vanera?"

I didn't want to specifically comment on her size, but she was much smaller than any dragon I'd seen before.

Her ears perked and I knew I'd found a safe subject as she responded: At least a hundred years. Perhaps longer.

"When do dragons marry or - mate?" I wasn't sure of the correct word.

Not until after their one hundred and fiftieth year. But there is this one dragon - Lirle said into my mind as her eyes turned dreamy. A waft of smoke left her nostrils and formed what I guessed was a heart in the air.

"I want to know all about him," I said, tucking my hands in my pockets.

All through the night I trudged through the water while Lirle flew beside me.

I listened as she talked about Byne, the dragon she had a crush on.

He was older and one of her trainers.

A dragon her parents would never allow her to mate with let alone tie herself to, but she couldn't help the attraction.

I asked her whether other supernatural creatures lived in the Hollow. She explained that a few had found their way here, but it was rare. Mostly there were wild animals similar to those found in the human realm.

When Abernathy created the Hollow, he made sure to include creatures good for snacking on and eating.

I tried not to dwell on that since I had no room to be squeamish.

I drank blood for goodness sake.

By the time we reached the edge of the forest and light began to form in the sky once again, I knew more about dragons than Kenmei had taught in all my years attending the Academy.

In the distance sat an enormous stronghold made up of giant rock fences and metal gates.

A grate lifted and went over the circular hold, reminding me of a bird cage. In the very middle and up above everything else was an enormous castle.

Outside the stronghold, in the valley, I was able to see two other streams.

Lirle was right. It seemed the source of the streams all began or ended at her family's castle.

How that worked, I didn't know, but I guessed it had to do with magic.

Lirle interrupted my thoughts: That's it. That is my home.

I was about to tell her it was beautiful when she pulled me back and behind a tree.

"What?" I whispered.

There, she said, pointing.

In the distance was a group of three gray dragons. They had metal armor around their arms and legs as well as their heads.

"What are they?" I watched them fly, their eyes trained on the landscape below.

Her voice quivered lightly as she spoke: Some of the Ondror Slayers. They are looking for me. For us. This time, they will not go so easy on us.

"How did they not find us the first time?"

She snorted and said: They didn't know where we were and blanketed the entire land with their power. Such a feat requires a lot of magic. Obviously, they were hoping to take us out that way.

"Do they know we're still alive?" I debated how we were going to get from the cover of the forest to the stronghold.

From the forest to the outskirts was probably more than twenty miles of open land. I could use my vampire speed and I guessed Lirle could fly fast, but not faster than the enormous Ondror.

Still, I could carry her.

I might be faster than they could fly.

Lirle shuddered nervously as she spoke: They don't, but they are unrelenting. They won't stop until they find us - dead or alive. That is their quest and they have no choice but to do whatever Vanera says. I don't know what to do.

I was about to tell her my idea when I was hit in the side of the head by something large and hard.

I sailed back, cracking my bones against one of the trees.

OceanofPDF.com

A FIGHTER

"HOW NICE TO SEE YOU, LIRLE." The voice came from a gray dragon with blood red eyes. His sharp and pointy teeth glistened like they held their own light.

Huge talons clamped around Lirle from behind, holding her like a sharpened straight jacket. She gasped and struggled but couldn't move. Her captor's clutches were bigger than Lirle's body.

The first dragon looked at me. "And you are Jasmine, heir to Sharra and an original vampire. But where are your wings?" He opened his mouth and I thought he intended to burn me to a crisp. Instead his tongue came out and he licked me. Tasting. "Strange," he said.

"Gross." I wiped my cheek with the sleeve of my shirt. It occurred to me he was speaking like Abernathy did, with his mouth and not in my mind like Lirle. Perhaps speaking aloud was a skill that came with age.

The first dragon pushed through the trees, causing them to snap and break. Then he pounded his tail on the ground several times in a rhythmic fashion while lifting his head. He roared, sending a streak of fire into the early morning sky.

I guessed he was telling the other Ondror Slayers that we were found.

"Should I eat you or bring you to Vanera?" the dragon said, his nose brushing against my shoulder.

My first instinct was fear, but when the second dragon captured Lirle, another emotion engulfed me. Fury. And with it came my controlled power.

"You can try," I said, quietly, as my twin swords appeared, one in each hand. White lightning skittered around the blades, emitting a light crackling noise.

The dragon reared back slightly, his eyes wide. Then he chuckled, a deep rumbling that started in his throat. "A fighter. I like that, but it's hardly possible your little swords can hurt one such as me." He got in my face again, but I wasn't having it.

"We'll see," I said, and using my speed, slid under him. As I went, I jammed both swords up through his throat until they reached his brain. How the magic worked, I wasn't sure, but they pierced his scales and thick skin like a thorn through soft flesh.

The dragon roared and shook his head. I hung on as I was flung back and forth. His distress only lasted a moment until he dropped to his knees and rolled over, dead.

I yanked out my swords, sending them away before disentangling myself from him. The second dragon still held Lirle, but now his black eyes were afraid. I used that to my advantage. "Do you want to die too or is it possible Lirle can escape?" I rolled my shoulders back and waited for the dragon to respond, prepared to bring forth my swords once again.

He didn't respond, just lifted into the air with Lirle still clamped tightly in his paw and flew away. Without giving me the chance to fight. Coward!

I couldn't follow in the air and that awareness frustrated the crap out of me. My wings! How I missed them. Not giving up I used my vampire speed to follow, tracking the dragon by sight, and watched as he joined a group of other gray dragons. They continued away from the stronghold, heading east, and back the way I'd come.

They were taking Lirle to Vanera. That much was clear. When Vanera got a hold of her again, I worried for Lirle's safety. Would the white dragon kill Lirle instantly? I hoped she still intended to use her as a pawn, to make the king and queen trade the kingdom and their power in exchange for their daughter.

Either way, I couldn't let Vanera or the Ondror harm my newest friend. Now that they had Lirle, they weren't interested in me and I ran without hindrance all day and into the night. Weariness began to settle over me, but sleep wasn't a necessity like it was for other creatures. Sure, I could use it, but not now. I would sleep when the darkness and the akuma were gone. I could sleep when Sharra was no longer seeking to destroy all realms. Or I would be dead. Either way, rest was out of the question until all of this was over.

When they arrived at the blasted mountain that held Vanera's nest, I ground my teeth in irritation. Right back where I started. As I watched the dragons, I expected them to fly Lirle up to the top and drop her into the nest since that's where I found her.

Instead a portion of the mountain slid open, one giant door on each side, making an enormous hole. Without hesitation, the dragons flew inside and the doors began to close.

I pushed myself faster, darting through the opening just as the doors rumbled shut. Dirt and debris from the ceiling rained down, but I ignored it, focusing on finding which direction the dragons were headed. Darkness loomed. I didn't know what to expect but I should've known there would be guards. Too late. Strong, clawed hands wrapped around me.

"You're the one they are talking about. The one who killed Halged. Won't I win the best prize for bringing the killer to my queen?" His voice was like nails on a chalkboard.

How he knew about the Slayer's death was beyond me. Perhaps certain dragons could communicate like a hive mind. I didn't know. What I did know was that I wouldn't be going to the queen as a prisoner. Not if I could help it.

Drawing on the power within, my swords sprang to life in my hands. In one motion, I cut myself from his grasp, turned, jumped, and beheaded the dragon before he had the chance to cry out.

Another appeared to my right and from behind. Though it was dark, my vision made it easy to see the second, smaller dragon. I leaped in the air and landed on its back before shoving one sword through each side of his head. The dragon let out a fiery breath and fell to the ground, dead.

Heaving my swords, I jumped off the dragon as he fell, landing between the two corpses. Quickly, I stood and spun, making sure there were no other guards. When I was certain I was alone, I closed my eyes, saddened by their deaths. "I am sorry," I said, and meant it. Killing wasn't something I liked, but it seemed that was all my magic could do. Was that how I was meant to defeat Sharra? By killing her?

Of course. But I didn't like the idea.

Could my magic do more?

I wanted to believe the answer was yes. If I learned to control it. Make it do what I want. Magic, like the swords, was a tool, one I was learning to use. As I headed down the expansive corridor, I decided I would do better.

Sending my swords away so the lightning sparking around them wouldn't give me away, I carefully reached the end where I could turn either left or right. I listened, hoping to hear something of Lirle. She hadn't spoken to me since her capture and I wondered why. Just as quickly, I knew the answer. If I could hear her, then perhaps the other dragons could as well. She was protecting me.

At the thought, my insides warmed. The friendship between Lirle and me had built rapidly. Perhaps because we were so alike. Possibly because we needed each other. She was everything I hoped to be. Everything I was working to become.

I heard the dragons moving on the left and went that way. They were flying slowly, probably to avoid smashing into the walls on either side of the vast hallway, but I didn't have that hinderance and caught up to them.

Carefully, I peeked around the corner. They were in a room more than three times the size of the entrance. Nestled in the center near the back wall was the Vanera. She was looking at the dragons and they were looking at her, but no one spoke. I guessed they were talking in their minds.

I thought of Troy and our dragon connection. Obviously these dragons were using the same magic. A shard of remembrance filtered through my mind. Duh. I was an original, created from and in possession of all seven magics. With my memories returned, I saw myself in a memory, speaking to Abernathy the same way these dragons were speaking now. If I wanted to, I could use dragon magic too.

I closed my eyes and searched for that magic. It didn't take long to find the golden power hovering near my sword blades, still part of the other magics, but distinct. I reached for it and opened it, calling forth its power, and was immediately rewarded.

Instead of connecting to them, I connected to the man I loved. Troy. He was no longer lying on the ground but dressed and showered. It even looked like he combed his hair and shaved, though the hair on his head was longer than when I last saw him.

Troy, I uttered into my mind, feeling hesitant.

My bottom lip trembled, knowing he might not want to hear from me.

I went on: Are you alright?

That he was dressed and clean made me think of a lamb going to the slaughter.

Did Sharra intend to kill him soon? I didn't know. Pops said time moved differently in the Hollow.

Troy answered, his voice soft: Jasmine. I'm fine. Safe for now. I know something is coming, otherwise I wouldn't have been allowed to clean up.

I sensed hesitation in his words.

He went on: There isn't much time. Sharra wants you here now.

She knows you have the elven crown and is furious you haven't come to her yet.

I'm sorry, I said into my mind, urgently. Apologizing for a whole lot with those two simple words. That was okay, as long as it did some good.

Then I went on: I am coming. It's only that I needed some help first. To control the power of the crown as well as my own magic. But soon.

Irritation flashed across his features and he said: With me out of the way, you won't have any guilt over Christopher. You can be with him.

Then his shoulders drooped and his head fell to his chest.

I blew out a devastated breath and gritted my teeth as I said: I have no desire to be with Chris. He is a friend. Nothing more. What happened -

I paused, pressing my fingers against my temples.

Then tried again and said: What happened between Chris and me wasn't because of anything I wanted. Sharra used her power to make me do that. I swear.

I swallowed down my hurt feelings, hoping to convey through my mind how much I loved my dragon boy.

Swallowing as tears pricked against my eyes, I continued: Troy, I have only ever loved you. You mean everything to me and you always will.

OceanofPDF.com

HE LOOKED up and for the briefest moment, I thought he was staring right at me.

No longer angry, but still unsure.

Troy spoke: I love you, too, Jazz.

He stopped speaking and adjusted his weight, sitting up straighter.

They added: Someone is coming.

He closed his eyes and pretended to be sleeping.

His cell door cranked open and a female voice spoke. "I brought you a friend. Try not to kill each other."

Christopher stumbled into the room before turning and flashing his fangs. "You touch me like that again and you won't live to tell anyone about it." His hands were behind his back and black magic held his wrists together.

The person he spoke to laughed. It was Sharra.

I focused on Troy. His eyes burned into Chris like he would kill him.

To Troy, I begged: Please remember, Chris is on our side. He believes in our love too. When Sharra forced me to kiss him, Chris stopped me and freed me from her magic. He's changed and he can help.

I hoped that was true. As much as I trusted Christopher, there was still a tiny part of me that remembered what he did to my mom.

He'd betrayed her at the last moment.

Would he do that again?

I wanted to believe the answer was no.

I said: But I'm on your side, Troy, and always will be.

If I ever had to make a choice, it would always be Troy.

Thank you, Jazz. Stay safe and I'll see you soon, he replied and broke the connection between us.

Something grabbed me, the edge of one of its claws scratching me deeply, nearly severing an arm. "It seems we have the little rat that caused all of our troubles."

A flash of pain filtered through me, like golden poison, until it reached my heart.

Then everything went numb. I couldn't move or call forth my blades.

All I could do was watch as the dragon carried me like a mouse over to the white dragon before depositing me at her feet.

"What are you doing in the Hollow?" Vanera asked, licking her lips as she spoke.

I glanced around for Lirle. She was inside a cage to my right.

It dangled from the ceiling near Vanera, probably so the dragon could keep an eye on her. Lirle glanced at me, her eyes sad. I wanted to scream that I would save her, that she would be all right, but this whole scenario was all too familiar. She was in a cage, same as my parents, same as Troy, and a narcissistic creature held her because she believed she deserved to rule in Lirle's place. Anger at the injustice of it all welled up inside me and I fought to have my swords spring to life, but with my arm taking its time to heal, it was difficult.

"Answer me," Vanera roared, sending smoke and flames from her mouth as she spoke.

My face felt like it would melt off, but the flames didn't quite reach. I licked my lips, working to figure out what to say.

Before I came up with an adequate response, Vanera plucked Lirle out of her cage and dangled her in front of her mouth. "Lirle explained the two of you have become friends. Let's put that to the test." One eye lingered on me. "Either tell me what business you have here or I will eat the little runt."

I decided to go with some truth and a lie. "Our realms are falling into darkness and I hoped to ask for help from the king and queen of the Hollow."

"Is that so? And why would you think the Hollow would want anything to do with the other realms? We are separated from you and your kind as well as the rest of them for a reason." She brought Lirle closer to her mouth.

"I'm desperate," I said, and meant it. I was desperate. Desperate to save Lirle. To save my parents and Troy. To save the world. As my thoughts fed my anxieties, they rose and so did the magic. What little control I gained over it disintegrated. The seven magics erupted from the blades and suddenly my skin was glowing, hot like the sun. The dragon who held me burst into flame. I was free.

Surprised, Vanera dropped Lirle. In the back of my mind, I noted that Lirle took flight and didn't seem hurt. Vanera sent a stream of raging fire at me. "How dare you? What have you done?" She was furious. I sensed it, even more overwhelming than the fire she breathed. Instead of being afraid, her fury fueled my magic and I took it into myself before sending it back to her, one hand raised out in front of me. An inferno of magic pressed against hers, will and against will. But that only lasted a moment before my magic took her fire and used it to pull her near.

"You will cease this madness and let Lirle's parents rule the Hollow in peace or I will destroy you here and now."

Vanera eyes glinted with impotent fury but she didn't respond.

"I mean it. Stop this and promise me you will go your way in peace and I will let you live." The words coming from my mouth didn't sound like me. My voice was calm and so self-assured. My magic reached up to Vanera's mouth and lassoed her nose, clamping her teeth together.

From behind, I sensed the soul magic from the Ondror.

It tried to sneak up on me and leech into my soul, but my magic was too strong and the Ondror couldn't infiltrate my magical barriers.

"You cannot harm me. But I can kill you all with just a thought." I shivered at the words I spoke, knowing they were true.

Vanera nodded and said into my mind: I will stop trying to take the king and queen's stronghold.

I released her, bringing the magic back into myself, though I was still glowing.

As soon as Vanera was free, she flicked her tail, knocking me off my feet before landing on me, her front paws pinning me down.

She was so heavy, I thought my ribs would turn to powder.

Dark sadness overwhelmed my pain as my magic lashed out at Vanera as well as the Ondror.

Gossamer like a spider's web, white lightning lassoed around each of the dragons' necks, encasing and igniting their flesh until they became charred husks then shattered to dust.

I had never seen so much power used all at once, let alone coming from me.

It was terrifying.

Black ash coated me from head to toe.

I blinked it away, trying to wipe my face with the underside of my arm.

Lirle sounded freaked when she said: Wow, holy baby dragonflies. You-You saved us.

Her eyes were wide with awed fear.

"Yeah, I'm - " All around the room were piles of ash.

Dead dragons.

Guilt washed over and through me, drowning me.

Without waiting for Lirle, I ran. As I went I saw there were more dead bodies.

Had I killed them all? A shudder of fear rushed through my veins. Had I killed all the dragons in the Hollow? Of course not. Lirle was still alive. Hopefully others were, too.

When I reached the double doors, my face was wet. I looked for a handle or doorknob. Was there a button or did the dragons use soul magic? I didn't know and didn't care. I didn't think, just wiggled my fingers into the space between the doors and pushed them open wide enough that I could squeeze through and out into the fresh air. It was still stifling - the whole realm felt like it was a hundred degrees.

I fell to the ground, curling into the fetal position. All of my control was gone. Any kind of confidence I had was gone and I felt useless.

"Jasmine," Lirle said gently, coming up behind me.

She spoke with her mouth instead of into my brain. Surprised, I studied her through my tears, unable to express my shock.

Instead I asked the question weighing most heavily on my soul. "What about her babies? The eggs in the nest?" I squeezed my eyes shut, hoping against hope they weren't dead, that I hadn't taken innocent lives. "Did I kill them too?"

"Let me check." There was a whoosh and when I opened my eyes, she was gone.

Despite the heat of the realm, my body shivered uncontrollably.

After what seemed like forever, Lirle returned. "The babies are fine," Lirle said. "When we reach my home, I'll send dragons to collect them. They will be kept safe." Her voice was soft as she landed beside me, resting a hand on my shoulder.

"I'm so sorry." I rose to my knees, pleading, hoping she could forgive me for all of the killing, but grateful at least the babies were safe.

She tilted her head to one side. "What do you have to be sorry for? Saving me? Because without doubt, those awful dragons would've killed us both. Maybe not right away, but we would've died." She touched my face, carefully wiping at the tears.

When she pulled it away, her hand was streaked with black dust, the remnants of Vanera and her minions.

Then Lirle pressed her paw between her eyes leaving a mark. "You are a hero, Jasmine. My hero. Slayer of the White Dragon. No one, not even the Ondror, had the power to kill her. Our realm has been at war for years, since before I was born, because of her. Without you, the Hollow would still be in a mess." Her eyes softened. "Now I can go home." She wrapped her arms around herself and spun in a circle. "Now there will be peace. Because of you." She shook her head. "My parents - They are going to be so happy to meet you." She smiled, flashing all of her sharp teeth.

My guilt subsided but only a moment. "But what if I killed them all? Not just those in the mountain but every dragon in the Hollow?" With the power that surged through me, I thought it might be possible.

Her mouth fell open and she blew out a puff of smoke. "Nonsense. I'm still here, aren't I? Others will be, too, you'll see." She stuck out a paw and I took it as I stood. "Let's go home so you can meet the king and queen."

My legs were shaky, but I agreed.

We walked slowly, heading over to the nearest river, where we both climbed in and rinsed off.

OceanofPDF.com

NIPAFORTE WOOD

NOW THAT WE had nothing to fear, Lirle and I moved quickly and undeterred toward the stronghold. As we went, Lirle talked more about the dragon she liked as well as growing up in the dragon realm. Hearing her talk, I couldn't help but admire the Hollow. It was stark and vast and though it wasn't blooming with all manner of flowers like Sharra, it still held beauty.

That night as we rested and ate under a canopy of trees, I was able to witness one of the wonders of her realm. Here, the forest stirred to life at night. Everything seemed to possess a bioluminescence. Trees whose leaves were pink during the day glowed a soft white, like millions of fireflies covered them. Animals I hadn't known were there, insects and little creatures that reminded me of spider monkeys, lit up as well. It was beautiful and a little terrifying.

"Why does it do this?" I asked, mesmerized.

Lirle took another bite of whatever she was eating. Her lips were luminescent blue like the spider monkeys and I forced myself not to shudder with disgust. The dragon needed to eat.

"No one knows." She shrugged, her wings flapping behind her lightly. "We call this portion of the forest the Nipaforte Wood."

"Why neepaforty?" The name was strange.

"Nipa for tay is what we call the creatures in the branches above us." She sucked on the bone before tossing it behind her. "Seemed appropriate."

"If you say so." I sighed, exhausted. My eyes closed and I was asleep before I had a chance to decide whether or not I should.

WHEN I WOKE, it was still dark. I didn't know how long I slept, but I was done. Dreams of Sharra torturing Troy had consumed me. I jumped up and went over to my new friend. "Ready to keep going? The sooner we get to your home, the better." I carefully touched her head. No surprise, she was warm.

"I suppose." Lirle stretched, smacking her lips together. "Let me get something to eat and then we will be on our way." She disappeared into the forest and returned quickly, another of the nipaforte monkey-looking things in her mouth. I couldn't watch her eat again and got up, wandering around the forest while I waited, admiring all of the lovely creatures.

When Lirle was finished, we started on our journey again.

Once we left the forest, we followed the stream, Lirle's enormous Stronghold standing monstrous in the distance. Above, millions of stars twinkled in the night sky. If I weren't in such a rush, I would've admired the vastness.

By the time we came to the front gate, light had filtered away the stars, turning night into day. Two dragons were there, guarding the entrance. They were nearly asleep, their eyes closed and their bodies slack against the wall.

We were nearly upon them before they heard us and snapped to attention, preparing to fight.

"It is I, Lirle, Princess of the Stronghold. You will let us pass." Her voice was commanding.

"Of course, Princess." The guards bowed, allowing us to enter. Their eyes never left me and I sensed their unease at my presence.

The Stronghold was truly grand and expansive. Within the gate, I felt like a mouse. There weren't homes or even buildings as I was used to thinking of them. Just nests and different open areas, including enormous training grounds. In the very center was the castle.

When the dragon guards opened the double doors, I felt smaller than a mouse.

"This place," I whispered.

"Yeah, it's easy to get lost, so stay close." Lirle flew beside me, always on alert, though I guessed the other dragons we came across in the castle were doing their hive mind thing to communicate with each other because none of the dragons gave us trouble.

We didn't make it far before Lirle's parents appeared. Her mother, a lovely burnt orange dragon let loose of a cry of relief at the sight of Lirle. Her father was midnight black and intimidating, except for his eyes which were the same sky blue as Lirle's. Neither of them wore crowns or robes, though they each had an amulet that rested at the base of their necks. The king's looked to be made of onyx while the queen's gem was citrine. Beyond the strange gems, there was something different about them. An "it" factor that seemed to say, "we are your king and queen, so be civil."

"Mother," Lirle said and flew toward her, hugging her neck.

"My dearest," the queen said, snuggling against her daughter carefully. She and the king were much bigger than Lirle. In fact, they appeared to be bigger even than Vanera and she'd been huge.

As I watched the king nuzzle his daughter next, I tried to imagine if they were bigger even than Abernathy. I didn't think so.

After several loving minutes, the king and queen turned their attention toward me.

Lirle flew back over, hovering next to my shoulder. "Mom and Dad, this is Jasmine. She's the one who saved me not just once but twice." Lirle glanced at me and smiled before continuing. "She's an original vampire and the best." She rested a clawed hand on my arm.

"Nice to meet you both," I said, and bowed, not sure what the protocol was to show respect for dragon royalty. I'd met Abernathy before, obviously, but he was less formal.

A deep rumbling came from the king's throat and he smiled, showing off his brilliant white and pointy teeth. "I am Armond and this is my stunning mate, Karelle."

I bowed again. "I've heard lots of good things about you from Lirle," I added, trying to remember all of the etiquette I was taught as a child.

"Come and let us discuss things in private," Karelle said, her voice deep but sounding more feminine than the king's, and very kind too.

They turned and took flight, heading back in the direction they came.

"They like you," Lirle said as we followed after them.

"I'm glad," I admitted. "Is bowing the correct thing to do when meeting them or is there something else I should be doing to show my respect?"

She giggled lightly as we entered a chamber. Along the right wall were pipes like those from an organ. As soon as the king and queen entered, a smaller dragon began to play. The music was soft and haunting but not like funeral music. More upbeat. "You're doing great," she said.

Once Armond and Karelle sat, their tails curling around them, the king ordered a chair be brought for me.

Thanking him, I sat. Lirle sat beside me and I couldn't help the warm gratitude I felt toward her. She truly was a friend.

"Now then, I would offer you food but our blood is sacred and I cannot allow you to consume it. However, if you would like, I can offer you cow's blood or that of a deer or elk?" The king regarded me with interest.

"Thank you so much for the kindly offer, but I am not hungry." That was a lie. I was beyond famished, but I didn't want cow blood. It wouldn't sustain me anyway. Dragon blood would, but I couldn't ask. It felt too forward and I suddenly missed my dragon boy.

"Very good, then tell us why you're here and how you came to meet our daughter," he said.

"Yes, please share everything," Karelle added.

I did just that, explaining how I was born and about my wings. I described meeting Laeddin and making my wishes, followed by the arrival of the darkness and the akuma and Sharra. I also told them about Troy and Christopher, about going back in time with Abernathy. Next I mentioned my parents and the gargoyle realm as well as the elven crown and my uncontrollable magic. Then I told them about arriving here, and finding Lirle, and our quest to get her home, followed by her recapture and then using my magic to kill her kidnappers. The last part was hard to get out. Guilt radiated from my heart and I worried how they'd take me killing dragons, even enemy dragons, especially since I wasn't one.

At some point during our conversation, both the king and queen had lain down. I glanced at Lirle, wondering if they were asleep. Before she could respond, the king told me to continue, which I did. They listened intently, asking questions so I could fill in gaps. By the time I was done, it was well into the night. They didn't seem upset, but they might be saving their energy for when I was finished. I stifled a yawn, not necessarily tired, but mentally exhausted.

Armond's eyes blinked open and he and the queen returned to their sitting positions. Lirle still stayed beside me, keeping me company. She seemed thrilled by my story, even though parts of it she'd already heard once or experienced firsthand.

"That is quite a tale, young vampire." Armond studied me a moment as though considering what more to say. The direction he took next surprised me. "Did you know I am a direct descendant of Abernathy, the dragon you spoke about?"

Before I could remember my manners, I blurted, "Like one of his children?"

Armond chuckled. "That's right. I am his oldest child, which is why I rule the Hollow with my wife. My father created the Hollow at my request many, many years ago."

Pops had told me part of the story, but listening to Armond tell it was still fascinating. "I didn't know that," I said. Then smiled. "My fiancé, uh, Troy, the guy I told you about that's half dragon, he is also Abernathy's son. So is my aunt Cindy, though we aren't really related. She's a witch." I realized I was rambling and stopped myself.

Armond shook his head and laughed. "How very interesting. My father was always more forward thinking than the rest of us." He glanced at Karelle. "I would say that makes Jasmine practically family, wouldn't you say so, my darling?"

Karelle nodded. "I already consider her family because she rescued our Lirle. I was lost without her," the queen said, her eyes getting misty.

"You said you killed the white dragon and her minions?" Armond asked, his gaze shrewd.

"Yes," I said and swallowed, bracing myself for his anger. "The magic of the elven crown mixed with my original magic and got away from me. I didn't want to kill them, but I did." A new wave of guilt swallowed me. "I'm so sorry. But when Vanera was about to kill me, my magic rolled out and I lost control - " I glanced at Lirle. "Your daughter taught me a great deal about my magic before that moment. She taught me to focus my magic on a weapon, which I did - dual blades." I hung my head, unable to meet their gazes.

"Controlling magic can be difficult," Armond said, "especially if you have as much power as you say you do. Killing our kind is not easy, even for dragons."

I nodded but still couldn't look up.

"Jasmine, do not apologize for saving the Hollow," Karelle snapped.

I looked up then, meeting her angry glare. "That dragon intended to use our daughter against us, but you saved her and us." She paused, a billow of smoke coming out of her nostrils. "We are forever in your debt."

"Which is why we would like to present you with a gift." Armond met his wife's eyes. She smiled and nodded before they both faced me.

"Nothing we ever give you will be enough to repay the return of our daughter, but maybe this will help to show our appreciation." Karelle touched the gem near her throat as did Armond, each grasping their gem between two clawed fingers. They brought their paws together and their two gems became one before forming something like a liquid.

This was the first time I'd witnessed two dragons doing soul magic together. It was a beautiful moment and I felt a pang of envy at the love the king and queen shared.

After several long moments, the magic stopped and Karelle held the vial of liquid out for me to take. "May this provide you with more control as well as something you are greatly missing," she said.

"Thank you," I said, unsure what to do now. The clear vial was made of glass and the liquid inside was black with glittering orange flecks. I went to tuck it into my pocket when the queen stopped me.

"No, darling, you must swallow it." She gave me a brilliant smile. "Drink it up," she said again, encouraging.

"Okay." I forced myself not to be nervous even as my magic flared to life protectively. There was a small black stopper in the top of the bottle and I removed it before bringing the liquid to my mouth. I gave it a quick sniff. Notes of brimstone and smoke filled my nose.

"Drink," Lirle said, reassuring.

I tilted the vial back, pouring the liquid down my throat. It was cool and tasteless and when I swallowed, it seemed to go everywhere at once. Like my veins and sinews were railroad tracks and the liquid was the train. As it traveled, I began to heat up with pain, aching, ferocious pain. I fell to my knees.

"What's wrong with her?" Lirle asked with concern in her voice.

"Just wait, darling. She is in pain now, but it will be worth it," Karelle said.

I wanted to believe her, but the pain was beyond anything I'd ever experienced and I found myself going in and out of consciousness. The liquid filled my insides and moved up to my back, where it burned so hot, I thought I would become a pile of ash to match those of the dragons I'd incinerated.

And then the liquid pushed through my skin.

I screamed out, panting. "Please make it stop!" I pleaded as tears of agony filled my eyes.

"Be strong, Jasmine. Give it time. The pain will be worth it," Armond assured me. I didn't believe him. Nothing that hurt this much could ever be worth it.

Where was my magic? Why didn't it fight against what was happening inside me?

I felt something growing from my back, and I glanced back, not sure what I expected. What I saw stunned me.

It was a new set of wings!

Shock blocked out the pain, and I pressed my fists against each other in sheer joy. Now that I understood what gift the dragons had given me, I knew they were right. The pain was worth it. I gritted my teeth, closed my eyes, and forced myself to keep quiet as the inferno roared through me.

An eternity later, or maybe it was only a few minutes, the pain subsided and I heard Lirle gasp.

"They're beautiful," she said. "Jasmine. Can you hear me? Look at your wings."

I carefully opened my eyes which were still throbbing from the remnants of the spell. There was a flutter at my back, and I jumped to my feet. "Is there a mirror?" I asked, desperate to see my new wings.

"Over there," Lirle said.

I started to run over, but my wings lifted me from the ground and I gasped. Crying and laughing at the same time, I studied my reflection in the polished glass. Though I was relatively clean from my bath in the river, my hair was a mess and my shirt was in tatters. I pushed that aside and turned, watching my new wings flutter. They were large and black and reptilian, like those of a dragon - like Troy's. My love, I thought, desperate to be with him again. I moved and the light hit my wings just right. They sparkled with the colors of the seven magics. "They are beautiful," I said, flying back over to Armond and Karelle. My hands clasped together in prayer, I bowed before them with profound gratitude. "Thank you for the gift." Tears continued to stream down my face. "This is the best gift." To show them I meant it, I twirled in a circle, shot up into the air so I skimmed the top of the stone ceiling, and then flew over to Lirle. Taking her hands in mine, I flew the both of us in a circle.

She and I laughed and laughed.

"Not only did we give you the gift of wings, Jasmine, but also a little of our combined soul magic. Hopefully our magics will help temper yours so you have more control."

Their gifts were beyond anything I could ever have hoped for. "From the bottom of my heart, I thank you," I said, bowing low for a second time.

"It was the least we could do," Armond said.

"Now," Karelle began, "I am famished. Do you wish to stay for dinner?"

The thought of watching them eat turned my stomach and I fought to keep my expression even. "I should probably get back," I said.

"So soon?" Lirle asked, her face sad.

"Sharra still has my parents and Troy and her darkness is consuming everything in its path. I need to stop her." Part of me didn't want to leave. I felt safe here, and even with all that I'd gained during my time in the Hollow, there was still no guarantee I could defeat Sharra. Plus I'd miss Lirle. She'd become a true friend. "I'll come back often, promise. And," I looked at the king and queen, "if it's okay, I'd like to bring Troy too. I think he will love it here."

"We would be honored to have you," Karelle said.

"A piece of the Hollow resides in you now. With that, you will always be able to return," Armond added.

"Thank you." I grasped for the amulet on my neck, but it was gone. "Oh no!" I flew around the room, hoping I'd dropped it recently. "My amulet. I don't know how to get back."

"Jasmine," Karelle began. "The magic is within you. Just think of where you wish to go and there you will be."

Armond nodded. "Karelle is right. Your magic is strong enough to take you anywhere you want to go. You do not need to rely on trinkets."

I nodded and closed my eyes, sensing they were right. With their magic inside me, I felt a new sense of control as well as the full weight of the power I possessed. I opened my eyes and faced the king and queen. "Thank you again." I turned to my new friend. "Lirle, thank you for being such a great friend. I will be back soon and I promise to bring Troy," I paused. "If he'll still have me," I whispered so only she could hear.

"If he doesn't, then he's an idiot." She rubbed her nose against my cheek. "See you soon."

I nodded and closed my eyes, imagining myself back in Pops' office. He and Joanna would want to know I was okay. And I wanted to know how things were going with them. Plus, they would be able to help me come up with a plan. Everything worked better when I had help.

"Goodbye," I said. Using only my magic, I began to cross through the realms. As I passed through the dragon realm, I noticed there was no more war and I was grateful for the opportunity to help the Hollow become a realm of peace. Soon, I expected to see Earth, still filled with terror and upheaval.

Instead of seeing the human realm overrun by darkness and the akuma, I went into complete blackness. Emptiness was a better word. It swirled around me and a tendril of fear rose into my throat. Had my magic gone wrong?

"Welcome, Jasmine," a female voice said.

It was the Unknowns. Somehow I traveled into their domain. Glancing down, I saw I was floating in the nothingness, like a speck of dust.

Twin shadows swirled around me, their presence only slightly visible in the vast ocean of night.

"We've waited a long time for this moment," the male voice said.

Fear was replaced by anger, but try as I might, my magic wouldn't ignite. It was useless here.

"Shall we kill you now? Doing so will begin the catalyst to end all magics, all supernaturals, all realms - including the Hollow - giving us the chance to reset and start anew," the female said, her words sharp like my twin blades.

"That's right. Earth is in serious need of a supernatural cleansing," the male added.

"But I'm glad to see your wings up close before you die," she said, her strange presence brushing against them.

I gritted my teeth to keep from screaming.

"They are lovely," she went on. "Too bad you won't need them much longer."

Slowly their eyes appeared followed by faces and hair. Bodies and clothing. They hovered in front of me, looking like two sides of the same coin. Slightly different, but still the same.

"Have you nothing to say?" the male asked, his bright eyes, like those of a full, moon boring into mine.

"Don't do it," I blurted.

"Do what, dear? 'It' is such an uninteresting word," she said.

"Don't destroy all magics. Don't destroy supernaturals. Let me fix this," I begged, my hands out in front of me, pleading that they would listen. "Let me find a way to - " I thought of the word they used before continuing, "reset all magics."

Both laughed heartily, doubling over.

"She thinks she can fix everything wrong in the world by herself," he said, wiping his eyes.

"I can." I swallowed, my hands in fists. "I will. There is enough power in me. I intend to end Sharra." Rolling my shoulders back, I clenched my hands together, praying I could make them see I could do this.

"Killing." She tut-tutted. "It's such a final word."

"Agreed. And not a reset as such. But - " he began, then looked at me. "Stop Sharra without killing her. Do that and we might consider allowing all supernaturals to live."

I was flabbergasted. How was I supposed to stop someone as powerful as Sharra without killing her? It was impossible. On the other hand, I found I liked the idea. I hated killing. Doing so left me feeling so much guilt and I was tired of that. "Fine. I'll find a way to do that," I said, nodding with finality.

"If you can stop Sharra without killing her, that will initiate the reset we require," the woman said, and snapped her fingers.

OceanofPDF.com

WINGS

DETERMINATION WEIGHED my shoulders down as I traversed the inkiness. As I went, I called out in my mind, using the magic within me to speak with Silindra and Laeddin. At once, my mind was there, in Laeddin's realm, in his library full of books. He and Silindra were there, standing close, reading something aloud.

"Laeddin," I said.

Laeddin glanced at me, or rather, my mental presence. Silindra looked up as well. "Is it just me or am I seeing Jasmine?" Surprise flickered across her too lovely face.

"I see her too - somehow." Laeddin reached out, but his fingers couldn't touch me.

I was there, but not really there. "I'm going to Sharra," I said, and looked from Laeddin to Silindra. "The darkness will swallow the earth soon. There is no more time. I need your help now. Please find me."

"We're coming, Jasmine," Laeddin said, and took Silindra's hand.

Were they a couple now? There was no time to figure it out.

Silindra said, "Watch out for my sister. She's tricky."

"I will," I said, and the world around me swirled before I found myself in Pops' study. He and Joanna were there, looking as though I'd only just left. They were speaking together softly, words I chose not to hear since they weren't for me. "Grandfather," I whispered.

He looked up. Joanna turned as well so they were both staring at my essence. "I've completed my time in the Hollow and am going to Sharra's to free my parents. Please help."

Joanna and Pops stood.

"We will be there," Pops said and Joanna nodded her agreement.

"Thank you," I mouthed, as I swirled again through the emptiness of space.

When the blurriness stopped, I was no longer in empty space. Sharra had to be here, but where I was made no sense . Instinctively I tucked away my new wings, grateful for the way I could hide them from view if I wanted. A jolt of happiness shot through me. Wings! I had wings. I shuddered with glee before tamping down the feeling and got to work trying to figure out my location.

The room was bright and airy. Windows were open and white curtains billowed in the slight breeze. Birdsong filtered through the room along with the sounds of the rustling trees as well as the ocean waves. This was a living room, but the furnishings were sparse. Off to the right was an eat-in kitchen and beside that, a dining room.

"Oh, Jasmine. Welcome." Sharra was dressed in a light blue flower print shirt with white capri pants. She wore an enormously oversized hat to shield her creamy skin from the sun. In one hand, she carried a basket filled with cut flowers and herbs. In the other, she held a pair of scissors. "I thought you'd run away for good." She set the basket on the table and waved her hands. Immediately, the sunshine vanished and darkness shone through the windows. "Glad you finally made it."

Beside her stood a woman with graying hair wearing nearly the same outfit as Sharra. She looked to be in her early sixties and when she saw me, her face twisted in fear. "Who's your friend, Shari?"

Shari? I snorted.

Sharra waved a hand in my direction. "This is Jasmine." Then to me she said, "I'd like to introduce you to my lovely neighbor, Mrs. Lubbot."

"Good to meet you," I said with a wave, wondering if the woman was a magical figment of both our imaginations or if she was real.

Sharra went on. "Jasmine has brought me something and I need to get back to work. Can we meet tomorrow for tea?" Sharra kept her voice light. She sounded just like a regular uppity middle class human.

"I'll put on a kettle around three," the woman replied, her smile transferring orange lipstick to her teeth. Before she left, she sniffed as though I disappointed her somehow. "Lovely to meet you, Jasmine." With that, the woman left.

I clasped my hands together, still unsure about where we were. "What is this place?" I asked, working to stay calm. Not only was Sharra dressed like a lady of leisure, but she appeared cheerful and happy. It didn't fit anything I knew of the vampire. Not even a little bit.

"The suburbs, dear." She waved me over and I glanced out the enormous living room window to see that we were in a neighborhood filled with immaculate lawns, clipped hedges, and lots of bright flowers. Each house looked similar to the next.

"Why?" It was the only question I could utter. I'd expected a lair or at least something sinister. She was supposed to be hiding out. "And how are the flowers growing?" With the darkness, I didn't think such a feat was possible.

Sharra laughed. "Living near me has its perks." She took her basket of flowers and went into the all-white kitchen where she took a glass vase from a cupboard and filled it up halfway with water. "And to answer your question, why not" She picked up a dark purple tulip, clipped the end at an angle and placed it into the vase. "Martha's Vineyard is beautiful this time of year." She continued snipping the ends of the flowers before arranging them in the container.

The sound of an infant's cry startled me. I turned and saw a bassinette in the corner. "Is that a baby?"

"She isn't not a baby," Sharra responded vaguely, taking the flower arrangement and placing it in the center of the clear glass coffee table. Then she went over to the bassinette. "There, there, little one. You are almost done. As soon as we take the elven crown from Jasmine, I'll be able to complete the spell and you will be the newest original vampire. Mine to mold and shape. An heir as I rule the world." She picked up the blanket-wrapped bundle. Freakily, there was a head with hair, but no eyes or nose, just a mouth. It looked like someone's nightmare doll come to life.

"What have you done?" Sickness funneled into my heart as I recalled all the times Sharra mentioned creating her own original vampire. By the looks of things, she hadn't worked it out.

"You'll see as soon as you give me the crown." It was then she really looked at me. "Where is it, Jasmine?" She placed the "baby" back in the crib and rushed me, frustration arching her brow.

"Well - " I didn't know how to respond. The elven crown was gone. It was a part of me as much as the ribs in my chest. And when I told her what had happened, she would do what? Kill me? Siphon it from me somehow? I wasn't ready to find out. "Where are my parents, Troy, and Christopher?" I returned, thinking it safer to respond with questions of my own. "Let me see them and make sure they are safe. Then we can discuss the crown." If I had to, I would trade myself for them, but I hoped it didn't come to that. I wanted to live, and I wanted all realms to be free of Sharra's tyranny. I just had to find a way to do both without killing Sharra in the process.

"Very well," she said shrewdly.

The room went out of focus, like I'd been standing in a watercolor painting, as the house and the contemporary décor changed. Sharra's clothing did as well. The oversized hat, old lady shirt, and capris were replaced by a sleek black dress that looked to be made of rubber; it hugged her curves, the collar high but still revealing a lot of cleavage. Her hair was slicked back and hanging in a long ponytail. Her staff appeared as did my wings - or rather, the wings that used to be mine.

The haziness dissipated, replaced by a cave of sorts - there were walls and a floor but no ceiling. Above was the darkness, looming hungrily like its own entity. Ready to consume at any moment. Like the ticking of a clock, each second sent another star from view. "This is more lair-like," I whispered. The walls appeared to be made up of the akuma. They seemed to be stacked one on top of the other, though there was a solid wall there too - almost like the akuma had been painted into the walls. The twisted creatures writhed and moved like millions of spiders, their eyes staring as they gnashed their teeth, waiting for the moment when they could attack. The effect was both eerie and claustrophobic - it felt like the walls were closing in.

My pulse quickened as Sharra waved her staff, speaking several foreign words. Jumping up, I tried to get my bearings. All around us were oddly shaped red rocks staggered against the blackness and similar to the Hollow. Besides the mountainous pillars, there was nothing else around. We were an island of solace.

On the far left appeared cages. My loved ones were in them. I sensed them.

A quick glance revealed Sharra was still casting spells or whatever. She almost seemed to be in a trance, and if I was going to kill her, now would be the time. Did she know about the rebirth? About what the Unknowns demanded of me?

As I went over to the nearest cage, I determined she must now know. Either that, or she believed she was more powerful. She'd proven herself beyond arrogant.

"Jasmine?" my mom whispered, her eyes wide on her dirty face.

"Yes, it's me," I responded, blinking away the tears.

"You're safe?" Her eyebrows lifted in question.

"I'm okay," I returned with a smile. "How about you?"

"Fine," she said, then glanced behind her at a body lying on the ground, his back to me.

"Who is that?" I asked, my mind zoned in on the form. I knew it was my dad. He didn't look good. In fact, he looked dead. There were no visible wounds that I could see, but somehow I knew there was something very wrong with him. My magic zinged along my ribs, trying to break loose, but I managed to keep it contained. I'd need it to defeat Sharra and I would do it for my dad - for all of them.

Mom shook her head. "Sharra did something to him. Tried to leech his magic." She glanced down at her hands. They were shaking and my heart broke for her. "He hasn't been conscious in days."

"Dad." I gritted my teeth. My magic did another lap around my ribs, ready to be called forth. My eyes went to Troy as anger buzzed through my mind. My fiancé stood in his cage, his hands grasping the bars, his eyes alert. Christopher was beside him, a smile on his still-not-healed busted lip. I wanted to run to Troy, but the thought of my dad and what needed to be done kept me in place. I relaxed my hands, taking a deep breath. Again, I checked on Sharra. She was still in her trance. "Do you know what she's doing?"

"No idea," Mom said. "But this isn't the first time. I'm not sure why, but she believes it's necessary." Mom shook her head.

"Pops and Laeddin should be here soon," I said, hoping that was true and not mentioning Silindra and Joanna. They would take too long to explain.

"Good," Mom said.

Please hurry, I thought, sending out a silent plea to Silindra and Laeddin as well as my grandfather and Joanna. I needed them.

"Don't worry, Jasmine. As soon as you give me what I want, your father will be fine." Sharra's voice was close behind me.

I jumped at her nearness and swung around. "Don't touch me," I seethed, then breathed deeply to stop my magic from lashing out at her.

The soul magic Armond and Karelle gifted me really helped to keep my emotions from flying every which way. I closed my eyes and centered myself. Beyond Sharra was the bassinet. Interesting that she at least kept the "baby" with her.

"Or what?" Sharra laughed. "You see I kept up my end of the bargain. They are alive. But if you want them to remain that way, give me the damn crown so we can all get on with our lives."

"I can't," I finally admitted. "It's a part of me."

"No," she began and then was suddenly directly in front of me, her fangs buried in my throat.

I gasped and shoved her away, my wings exploding from my back, flying me to the other side of the lair. Above, the darkness approached thick like smoke, as though it sensed Sharra's attack on me.

"What is this?" Sharra said, wiping her mouth. Then she licked a droplet of my blood resting on the back of her hand. "Very interesting." Her eyes narrowed, lingering on my wings.

I resisted the urge to gloat. Now wasn't the time to underestimate Sharra. The only creatures older than her were Silindra, Abernathy, and the Unknowns. She was no one to trifle with and I needed to keep my wits about me. "Surely you taste the truth in my blood. The magic from the crown is mine. You can't have it." I didn't mention my new wings, waiting for her to visit the obvious.

"On the contrary." She aimed her staff at me and a bolt of green light shot my direction.

Before I could think, Silindra and Laeddin appeared in front of me. Silindra took the brunt of the evil magic meant for me with a grunt of pain, taking a step back.

"Stop this, Sister! You've done enough. It's time to die." She took Laeddin's arm and was about to say more, but her mouth was suddenly gone.

Sharra smiled evilly. "Be quiet, Silindra. You always did talk too much."

My swords appeared, white lightning flickering along the blades as I flew to free my loved ones. Sharra sent another shot of magic at me but missed.

"If you free them before I have what I want, you'll be sorry. There is magic protecting every inch of this place and it's tied solely to me. Give me the crown or they all will suffer the consequences." Her eyes flashed with fury and she sent a bolt of magic at Laeddin.

It barely fazed him. "You can't hurt me, Sharra," he said.

"Perhaps not, but I still possess the ability to remove your genie power and if I do that, Silindra will be no more once again." She cackled. "I sense losing her would be - disappointing." Her laughter grew. "Isn't it sweet, sister dearest? You can only find true love once you no longer look like a hideous monkey."

Silindra tried to respond. Without a mouth she couldn't say anything, but she flipped her sister off, which spoke volumes.

"Do not speak. Do not even move, genie, of I will destroy you once and for all," Sharra screeched.

"Very well," he said, glancing at me. "I'm sorry, Jasmine."

Before I could respond, Sharra send a bolt of magic into Laeddin. This time it was as though he allowed her magic to affect him and he disappeared inside a golden lamp. His lamp. The same one I found all those months ago. "Better," she said, smug, and faced me, shooting a bolt of magic directly at me from her staff.

Instead of hurting me, my swords absorbed the blow. I centered myself and lifted my chin. "Stop this, Sharra. Release my family, free the world from the darkness, get rid of the akuma, and let us live in peace. You won't have to be alone. I'll make sure there is a place for you as well, if you want." I was surprised by the words leaving my mouth, but I meant them. I didn't want to kill her and not just because the Unknowns ordered me not to.

My words surprised her too. "You would let me live if I agreed to your terms?" She seemed amused.

"Yes," I said, relaxing my arms.

She appeared to be considering my words. "I see. And your wings? Where did you get those?"

That was quite a channel change, but I got the feeling she was searching for my ulterior motive. Too bad for her, there wasn't one. "A gift from the king and queen of the Hollow," I admitted, figuring the truth wouldn't hurt at this point.

"They are lovely," she said. "Too bad you won't get to enjoy them."

She tilted her head to one side and sent a spell into my mom. The attack was so sudden and unexpected, I just stood there, stunned, as Sharra opened the cage with one hand and dragged my mom out by the hair.

My mom tried to fight, but it was no use. Even before Sharra's latest spell, my mom had been weakened from all her time as a captive. Now, she could barely lift her arms.

"Give me the magic this instant or your mother dies," Sharra said, sending another wave of green magic into my mom.

My mom screamed, panting as her eyes rolled back at the pain.

The infant thing started to cry.

Behind Sharra, Troy and Christopher were shouting - at me or Sharra, I couldn't tell. My head was fuzzy from panic. This wasn't how the battle was supposed to go. My family was supposed to be safe before I confronted Sharra, not completely at her mercy. What should I do? How could I stop this? Power surged inside me, but I still felt helpless. I could kill her - I was strong enough to do it. But if I did, the Unknowns would destroy us all. There was no way to win. No matter what I did, my family would die.

I couldn't let that happen.

A thought occurred to me, so simple and terrible, it sent ice flooding through my veins. "What if - " I allowed my voice to trail off as I thought about what I intended. I could allow Sharra she could use my body, the way she'd done with others for centuries and the way she'd envisioned for my mom eighteen years ago. Sure, there would still be the darkness and the akuma, but at least those I loved and cared about would live to fight another day. Sacrificing my life for theirs wasn't a choice at all.

"Fine," I said. "Let them go, and you can have me. My body, I mean. I can't give you the power of the crown, but I will give myself to you freely."

"Is that so?" Intrigued, Sharra threw my mom back into her cell, slamming the door shut with the flick of her staff. She turned toward me, examining my face. "You're serious." It wasn't a question.

"I promise you. Release them all and you can have my body." I sent my blades away and dropped my hands to my sides as an inkling of a plan began to form in my mind. Completely outrageous and utterly preposterous, but it just might be exactly what was right.

Behind me my family was screaming. Even my dad. Tears pricked my eyes at the sound of his voice. He would be okay. They all would be. I would make sure of it. And once I was gone, Silindra and Laeddin as well as Pops and Joanna could rescue my mom and dad, Troy, and Christopher. They could defeat her.

"Very well," Sharra said, and relaxed enough to go over to the baby. "Shush, little one. You will be whole sooner than you think." Slicing one of her fingers open with her thumbnail, Sharra squeezed so her blood dripped into the crib.

She was feeding the baby her blood.

Abhorrence, disgust, and horror rolled through me, but I gripped my hands into fists. If I had to, I would allow Sharra to have my body - if my plan didn't work. Neither of us would die. It would be just as the Unknowns wanted. Their terms would be met and my family along with billions of others would survive.

I glanced back my family, giving them each a possible last goodbye with my eyes. My gaze went back to Troy. "I love you," I mouthed.

OceanofPDF.com

ACCESS TO YOUR NECK

"DO NOT DO THIS," Christopher said, a look of complete disbelief on his injured face. "You have the power within you to destroy her. You know you do. So why?"

I couldn't explain. But I hoped one day he and the rest would understand. If I failed, Laeddin could tell them the truth about the Unknowns, what they had planned. In the end my family would see I made the best choice. The only choice.

"Silence, Hunter. I'll deal with your insubordination later," Sharra said, sending a bolt of magic at Christopher.

He was thrown back, landing against the other side of the cell before falling to the ground with a groan. Chris bared his fangs in anger and jumped to his feet, though slower than expected.

"Hurt them and the deal is off," I seethed, facing her, my hands in fists at my sides.

She gave me an innocent look. "I didn't do any permanent damage." She crossed her arms, sauntering toward me. "Now then, let's do this."

I swallowed, forcing myself to remain calm. My plan would work. It had to. My family's lives depended on it. But deep inside I was nervous. What if I was wrong? If she possessed me, would my spirit hover inside Sharra's mind like Silindra's had in mine? I doubted it. Sharra didn't like to share. She would burn everything that was me right out of her. Maybe the Unknowns were counting on that. My existence wasn't part of the Unknowns' plan and they'd been trying to get rid of me since.

"The transformation will go rather quickly since you've allowed Christopher to drink from you and you've drunk from your true love." Sharra clapped her hands, circling me like I was the prized pig at a country fair. "And I didn't want to say anything, but your new wings?" She paused and ran her hands along them. I fought back a tremor of revulsion. Her touching them felt too intimate and I didn't like it. "They are exquisite," she went on. "Delicate as a butterfly's, but still badass."

"I'm glad you like them," I replied through clenched teeth as my magic rumbled angrily within.

She came back around, a smile dancing along her lips. "Tilt your head, darling and give me access to your neck," she said, her voice icy and demanding.

I did as she asked and before I could prepare myself, she sank her fangs into the vein at my throat.

All around me my loved ones screamed that I shouldn't do it - that I should kill her - but they didn't know what would happen. If I destroyed Sharra, I would destroy all of them too. Closing my eyes, I blocked out their words and allowed myself to succumb to the inevitable. My plan would either work or it wouldn't, but it was too late to turn back now. I smiled at the thought of finally doing good. Most of my choices hadn't great, but this would rectify them. My giving Sharra my body, I was fighting for the ones I loved. I was making amends for my choices and making the most out of a horrible situation.

Sharra grabbed my arms and tugged me to her, gaining better access to my neck. I was like a rag doll, allowing her to do with me as she pleased.

Something crashed loudly and Sharra jerked away from me. "What are you playing at, girl?" She glared, my blood on her face, her fangs out, her eyes red. She never looked more like a vampire than she did in that moment.

There was another loud bang and one of the walls came down. The filthy akuma scattered away like rats in a sewer, but most were vaporized. As the dust settled, Joanna and Pops appeared. They stood, their feet hips' width apart, looking for all the world like superheroes.

Pops charged Sharra, his eyes flashing with fury. Joanna, red hair flying around her like auburn fire, attacked Sharra from the other side. They fought Sharra like the perfect tag team, their movements so quick it was tough to keep up with them. They weren't making progress in subduing her, but they were distracting her.

I didn't know what to do. Fighting against Pops and Joanna was out of the question. Instead, I stood there, feeling dazed and slightly out of it.

The baby began to cry once again.

And a different plan filled my mind. One in which I could save the strange child, stay alive, and stop Sharra without killing her. My magic skipped to life, and I lifted my hands. "Sharra," I called with all of my newfound confidence. Power skittered across my body as I walked with purpose toward the original vampire who was throwing magic at Pops and Joanna, her back to me. Sending out a wave of lightning magic, I used it to lift her off the ground.

Beside me Silindra still struggled to move. Her eyes were on me, pleading, but I knew what needed to be done. I would end Sharra, but not in the way everyone believed.

"What are you doing? Put me down!" Sharra wiggled and jolted, trying to shoot magic at me from her staff, but it was no use and I held her tightly above my head until I reached the crib.

Peering in at the upset being, I hoped I was doing the right thing. All it took was one thought.

And I spoke it clearly into my mind: Rebirth.

I thought that same word over and over. Each time I hissed the word in my mind, Sharra's body shrank and became lighter. With ease, I brought her down so I could watch until she was smaller than the infant.

Rebirth, I thought again.

Now, she was barely the size of a pixilette. Still fighting, she used her staff to send magic into my hand, but I barely felt it.

"There, there, Sharra. I'm going to give you a second chance to get it right." As I spoke, she continued to get smaller until she was just a particle of light. Her spirit, I thought anxiously and tore open the pad of one of my fingers.

"What are you doing?" Joanna whispered, suddenly beside me.

I didn't respond, determined to finally set things right.

Pops spoke for me. "She knows what she's doing, Red."

I had to smile. My grandfather always had such faith.

Blood dripped from my finger and onto the infant's lips. The Frankenbaby opened its mouth and while it drank I spoke the word again, this time out loud. "Rebirth." I dropped the particle that was Sharra's spirit. It hovered above the infant a moment before entering the child's mouth along with my blood.

Two things happened simultaneously.

The first was the akuma. They stopped writhing and moaning. It was like the silence that comes when the crickets stop chirping.

"What's happening?" Joanna asked.

All of us focused on the walls and I watched as one after another the akuma changed into dark shadows. They surged around the room, swirling over us and through the cages until they sailed out into the sky like water after a dam breaks.

"They're gone," Christopher said.

I met his gaze before allowing my eyes to flicker onto Troy.

He was watching me, his features unreadable and I had to quickly look away.

The second thing that happened was the thing in the cradle shifted into something much for infantile. Little ears grew and peeked out of thick, curly white hair. Her face formed eyes and they opened, shining the color of lilacs. And wings! They were white and gossamer.

Instantly, I knew those wings had once belonged to me. Now though they fit with the child in the crib as though they belonged to her from the beginning.

Surely, it was a different kind of rebirth, but the wings suited the baby perfectly. Besides, I liked my new ones better. In fact, I was proud of them because I'd earned them.

The baby's nose appeared and it was small and pert and perfect. Her mouth changed slightly, the lips blood red and pursed together sweetly. The blanket she was wrapped in disappeared as the child became a fully formed baby - who looked an awful lot like Sharra might have in her infancy, had she been an infant, which I knew she hadn't.

The child began to cry again. "It's okay, little one," I said, lifting her into my arms, careful not to squish her wings. I used my magic to cover her naked body with a dress the color of the baby's eyes.

"Wait," Mom shouted, still locked in her cage. "She's supposed to be evil incarnate. That was what Sharra was trying to create. Don't touch it."

I smiled, tapping my healed first finger on the baby's bottom lip. She grinned back at me adorably. "It's okay, Mom." I brought the cooing child over so my mom could see. "She isn't evil, Mama. She's just a baby now. See?"

"Oh," Mom said, covering her mouth with one hand. "Is it - is she Sharra?"

"Yes," I admitted. "This body houses Sharra's spirit, only she's reborn."

"And you thought this better than killing her?" Dad asked, his eyes on me as he leaned against my mom. He still looked like death, but I was happy to see him awake and on his feet.

"Definitely. If I had killed Sharra, the Unknowns would have immediately destroyed all of us. Magic had to have a rebirth and it was either Sharra or the rest of us," I said, smiling sadly at the baby I still held. It was hard to picture anyone so innocent-looking causing so much destruction. Hopefully she'd make better choices the second time around.

"It was true then. What the underlings told us all those years ago." Mom looked up at my Dad and continued. "They said if Jasmine died, then so would all magic." Mom wrapped her arms around Dad's waist, resting her head against his chest.

"It would seem so," Dad said, pulling her to him and resting his cheek on her head.

They gave each other a look and I knew they were sharing a conversation meant only for them.

I swallowed and nodded. "That's right. The only way to protect all supernaturals was to stop Sharra without killing her." I rubbed my nose on the baby's and she put her hands on my cheeks. "At least I think that's how it worked." I glanced at Pops, knowing he probably had a better understanding than I did of all that had just occurred. Or even Joanna. As an angel of death, she might be able to decipher what happened, especially with the akuma. "But I believe through Sharra the seven magics have been renewed?" I shook my head, unsure, as I studied the baby.

"In effect, you are right, Jasmine," Pops said and looked at Joanna. Relief was etched on his face. He was alive, but more importantly Pops was glad Joanna was too. He had just got her back. It was obvious he hadn't wanted to lose her again.

I smiled at them both, grateful for their opportunity for a happily ever after.

And Troy and me? I sought him out again, but before I could meet his gaze, Joanna came over, cutting off my line of sight to him. An ache of need ripped through my chest.

"You are correct, Jasmine," Joanna said. "Magic has been reset. There is a disturbance among all the dead and something is happening." She closed her eyes and breathed in deeply. "It's strange, but I believe those possessed by the akuma are returning to their original forms and will once again live as they had before the akuma invaded them."

She was right. My magic somehow verified that Joanna spoke truth. But I didn't say anything, waiting for several beats to see if Joanna had more to say, but she opened her eyes and shook her head.

"That's all I know for now." She wiped some hair out of her face.

"See?" I said to Mom, moving aside so I could make eye contact. "It's all good." Without meaning to, my eyes focused on the bars of the cage. I wanted to release my mom and dad as well as Chris and Troy, get them out, but the baby was helpless and I needed to concentrate on her first. Still, I went over to my parents. "She'll need a home too." My gaze flicked back and forth between my mom and dad. I glanced back at Silindra. She looked confused and unsure about what to do.

"Of course, Jasmine," my dad said.

Mom nodded her agreement.

Silindra was suddenly beside me, one arm around my shoulders. "I will help if you need it as well," she said, using a finger to stroke the child's cheek.

I glanced up at her, hoping she was alright with the way things turned out for her sister. She seemed to be. "And you're okay with this?"

Her eyes darkened. "As you said, there wasn't another way. I can live with this outcome since it means I get to live." She smiled. "Can I hold her?" Silindra held out her arms.

I hesitated, feeling protective. "You won't hurt her?" Sharra was responsible for Silindra's original death. No one would blame Silindra for wanting revenge.

"No," she said. "I couldn't," she added, cooing softly.

"Here you go." I handed the baby over carefully, tucking the blanket around her to keep her warm. When she was content in Silindra's arms, I used my magic to release mom and dad from their cage.

"The white lightning," Mom said, watching me curiously a moment. "Is that from the crown?"

I sent the magic away, returning it to my ribs where the blades still rested. When I was sure it was secure and wouldn't harm anyone, I hugged my mom tightly. "I think it's a combination of my magic as well as the crown," I finally said.

"Makes sense." She squeezed me to her, kissing my cheek.

Dad came over and hugged us both. "You are amazing," he said. "And I couldn't wish for a better daughter." He kissed my other cheek. "I always knew you could do anything."

The three of us held each other for several long minutes.

Someone cleared their throat.

"I hate to break up the love fest, but I'd really like to get out of here."

I released Mom and Dad.

Mom gave Dad a look before heading over to Christopher's cage. "What you did for my daughter. Helping her. I will be forever in your debt." She held out her hand and took Christopher's through the bars.

Dad stood beside Mom. "Agreed," he said.

"Thank you," Chris said, soberly. I noticed his face was finally healing, thank goodness. "That means so much," he added.

"Let me open this cage," I said, moving. "Stand back."

Chris and Troy moved out of the way as did my parents. Channeling my magic, it separated from my ribs and skittered along my body. I tore through the bars like they were paper.

As soon as he had the chance, Chris pulled me into a hug before I'd completely sent away my magic and he winced.

"Sorry," I said, hugging him back.

"Nonsense." He looked at me. "Watching you use your magic is beyond cool." He hugged me again, then moved over to Silindra and the baby. He might want revenge on the child too and I was suddenly nervous.

"Be careful," I said in warning.

"I will," he admitted and winked. "Now, let me have a look at this baby," he whispered at Silindra.

I watched him until I was sure the baby would be safe. Then glanced up at the sky. There was still one more person I needed to be reunited with. The most important person. Troy. But I was nervous and sensed he was too. I glanced up at the sky. The darkness was dispersing like a storm system moving at a quick pace.

Steeling myself, I glanced at Troy. He was standing just outside the cell, his arms at his sides and his hands in fists. He was breathing heavily and I took in a quick breath. "Hi Troy," I said, my eyes locking with his.

And the rest of the world vanished. There wasn't anyone else but Troy and me.

"Hi yourself." He came forward and swooped me into his arms, crushing me against him. "How I missed you, Jazz."

OceanofPDF.com

AN ANNOUNCEMENT

BEFORE I KNEW IT, I was laughing as tears of joy leaked onto my cheeks.

He set me on the ground and pushed my hair out of my face, then cupped it in his hands. "I love you vampire girl."

"You do?" I believed him, but needed reassurance as my hands curled around his wrists.

"More than I believed it was possible to love." He bent his head and gently touched his lips to mine, his eyes still open and on me.

I kissed him back, as a gurgle of happiness shot through me.

The sweet kiss turned hot and needy. I loved him and wanted him and didn't care who knew it. He pressed my mouth open, deepening our kiss as his arms went around my waist and he lifted me off the ground.

"Hey you two?"

It was my Mom.

I froze and opened my eyes. Troy was watching me again.

"Should we tell them?" he asked.

I knew he was talking about our engagement. "Now's as good a time as any," I said as he set me on my feet.

Troy took my hand and I turned to face the group.

"We have an announcement," he said.

They were stunned. Pops had an arm around Joanna.

Silindra was still beside Christopher who was holding the baby.

Mom and Dad stood beside them.

And poor Laeddin. He was still in his lamp. My eyes landed on it and Silindra gasped and ran over to pick it up.

"Troy and I are engaged," I blurted, then covered my mouth.

The baby let out a laugh and everyone turned to the child, doting on her like what we shared was yesterday's news.

"I see how we rate," Troy said and chuckled, taking my other hand and turning me to face him. His eyes danced with joy.

"You're number one in my book and always will be." My wings appeared and I flew up so our faces were close. "I love you, Troy."

He stroked my wings and I shuddered. "You're so damn hot," he said, kissing me again.

"Is this really the time?" My dad huffed.

I smiled, biting my lower lip. He had no idea.

Silindra rubbed on the lamp and Laeddin appeared, frustration evident on his face. "What happened?"

Silindra patted his cheek. "I'll tell you all about it." She glanced at me and then the two of them vanished.

Pops and Joanna came over to look at the baby and suddenly I couldn't stand being in the lair one more second. Closing my eyes, I teleported everyone to my parents' drawing room in our castle in Sharra.

Mom and Dad and the others gasped with surprise and I smiled. Yep! I could do that.

Home, I thought happily, my eyes going to Troy. He was speaking with Christopher, but he caught me looking at him and smiled. My heart filled with joy. Safe. He was safe. My family was home. I'd never been so happy in my life.

The baby cooed and babbled, delighted with her audience as everyone gathered around. She really was quite beautiful.

Troy wrapped an arm around my shoulders and pressed a kiss to my temple. His eyes were haunted. "May I?" he asked, holding out his arms for the child.

"Sure." I carefully handed her over, feeling so much love and joy and happiness. I wanted to remember this moment forever. With a thought, I healed Troy's physical ailments. I hoped he would talk to me if he had any lingering issues because of what Sharra did to him while imprisoned. We needed to talk about everything, but that could wait. He loved me and I loved him. We would work through the rest in time. We had time now.

As Troy talked to the baby, he walked around bouncing her in his arms. I went over to my dad and mom. My magic flared to life and I healed them each with just a touch. Healing them felt like a gift, and it was the least I could do after everything I'd done. I opened my mouth to apologize for everything, but my dad swept me into a hug and I knew no words needed to be said. This was what unconditional love felt like, and I hoped I never forgot it. Then my mom locked her arms around my dad and me. We hugged and then hugged some more. Eventually, we broke apart and Pops introduced everyone to Joanna.

When there was a break in the chatter, I gave Christopher a hug. Long and hard, squeezing him until he said he would pop. "Thank you for always being there for me," I said, tears misting my eyes. "You are without a doubt one of the best friends a girl could ever want."

"Thank you," he said.

"Did you ever find Arthur?"

His face fell. "No, but I intend to keep looking."

"What about me?" Abrea asked, interrupting as she flew into the room from an open window. "Am I still your best friend?"

"Always will be," I said, laughing and used magic to make her my size, just for a moment, so I could give her a big hug. "The best ever," I added.

She giggled but was grateful when I shrank her back to pixilette size.

"I'm still worried about those who became akuma," Mom said.

Dad was holding the baby now but put one hand around my waist as he spoke to Mom. "Since Sharra has had a reset, so to speak, all who were affected by her evil doings will be reset too. They will return. No doubt about it." He kissed her softly on the lips.

"So that means?" Mom asked, studying him with a quizzical look on her face.

"The darkness is no more. The akuma are no more. And all realms are free once again and those who became akuma are alive and well."

"That is wonderful news." She gave me such a look of admiration, one filled with love. "You are amazing, Jasmine," she said and kissed my cheek.

"Thanks, Mom." Of course there would be some drawbacks, like Arthur and Ciana were still alive, but they could be dealt with at another time.

The baby cooed, her hand wrapped around my mom's finger. "What should we call her?" Mom asked, her eyes never leaving the child.

"Not Sharra," my dad said, his eyes crinkling as he smiled.

"How about Clare?" I asked, caressing the little girl's curly head of hair.

"That's a great name," Mom said and my dad agreed.

"You'll help us with her, won't you?" my mom asked, her eyes misty.

"She's my sister. I wouldn't have it any other way," I said, and smiled when Troy's arm slipped around my waist. the four of us hugged, our eyes on the beautiful baby. Together, we could raise Sharra to love the way we loved each other.

And if she still chose evil - Well, that was a story for another day.

FOUR MONTHS LATER, on a Monday, I entered Salem High. Troy was at my side. After a long conversation and a lot of make-up kissing, we agreed to never be apart again unless absolutely necessary. Still, as we made our way into the high school, chayot guards lined the walkway, for our protection as well as the humans. Since the darkness had vanished, much had changed in the human realm.

Troy and I were kind of supernatural celebrities, which was weird. Everywhere we went, a picture of Troy and me kissing was plastered all over social media. People created fan accounts with more than two hundred million followers. Entertainment news called us the biggest thing since the Kardashians.

As part of my new job as supernatural ambassador in the human realm, I was asked to speak at many functions as well as colleges and schools all over the world. They all wanted me to share first-hand what happened with the darkness. No one knew about the akuma. Since there was a reboot, it was like that never happened and I was grateful.

Dressed in jeans and a tee shirt as well as my black combat boots, not to mention my new wickedly-cool wings, I was no longer embarrassed. No longer worried about what normal looked like. The wings on my back were part of me and that was all that mattered.

Together, Troy and I walked the sidewalk leading to the entrance of Salem High. Students pointed and whispered. Some clapped. Other jeered. I ignored them. There would always be bigoted individuals as well as those who couldn't stand to witness another's happiness. It wasn't completely their fault. For eighteen years, the government had fed their fears regarding the supernatural. Now, times had changed, and I intended to do my best to help humans see that not all of us were bad just as not all humans were good.

On either side of the school's entrance stood a chayot guard. Ever the protectors of humans. Their angelic magic reeked of light and overcompensation. Not that I minded much. For the most part, I didn't pay them much attention. They were a part of the human realm and I respected their position, but that was where my care for them ended. Except for Gabe. Though he'd given up his power and position for Cindy, he was still a chayot and one of my favorite uncles.

Rolling my shoulders back, I landed at the bottom of the steps. Both guards wore sunglasses. Each one gave me a barely perceptible nod. I wanted to smile, to put them at ease, but couldn't. My thoughts swirled as I rehearsed what I intended to say.

"You're going to do great," Troy said. He knew I was nervous to speak here. The school was a small venue, but it was also the beginning of my new journey.

"Thank you," I whispered, squeezing his hand until all the blood left it.

Inside, the halls were pretty sparse. Many parents as well as students didn't want to be near me. The rest moved off to the sides to let me pass.

I held my head high, trying not to flinch every time I saw a poster of myself with the words: JASMINE, PRINCESS OF SHARRA across the middle.

Definitely not any kind of normal.

But that was okay.

Humans and I wouldn't be friends, at least not right away.

I'd tricked them and hurt many of them.

But at least they are all alive. I welcomed their scorn because it was better than them being dead.

Inside the auditorium were more chayot guards. I ignored them, knowing they would be with me for every tour. That was part of the deal.

When the principal saw me, he waved.

Troy and I made our way over to him. I extended a hand. "Thank you for having me," I said.

He laughed nervously before shaking my hand and then Troy's. "Glad you both could come," he said, pulling his hand away like I burned him.

"Of course."

He studied the floor in between us awkwardly a few moments. "I'll be back." He scurried away, leaving Troy and me at center court, all alone. With a tiny sigh, I glanced at Troy.

He smiled and all of my worries vanished. I could do anything with him by my side. Even speak at this school. "I'm going to go stand over there." He pointed to an empty portion of the wall under the basketball hoop. "You're going to do great, okay?"

He kissed me and I touched his face. "Thank you."

When he was gone, I took one of the chairs beside the podium and pulled out my phone. I don't know why. Habit maybe.

"Watched any of The Vampire Diaries lately?"

I glanced up and into a pair of hazel eyes. She didn't seem mad, but then why would she? As far as she was concerned, the akuma thing never happened. That was what all the humans believed. "Hi, Abby." She looked great today. Same nerdy cool girl with cropped honey brown hair, a nerdy tee shirt, and her worn paperback copy of Wuthering Heights.

"Jasmine, huh?" When we first met, I'd lied and said my name was Jack. Obviously, one of the dozens of posters had set her straight.

"Yeah," I admitted, bracing myself for whatever she would dish out. I deserved it.

"I like it better than Jack." She shrugged, scrutinizing me. "Your wings are awesome." She sat in the chair next to mine.

"Thank you." I studied her a moment. "I'm really sorry, Abby. Are you okay?" I wanted to ask if she remembered being dead, but I didn't have the guts.

She gave me a big smile. "I'm more than okay. No worries. I feel more energized than ever." She reached over and grabbed my hand. "All is forgiven."

I glanced down. "And Cameron? Have you seen him?"

"Of course, but he isn't coming. His mom wouldn't let him."

I met her eyes. "I get it," I said, and meant it.

She patted my arm. "Maybe we can get together for pizza sometime. When you aren't being all Supernatural Ambassador of the World Vampire." She winked.

I laughed. "I would like that a lot," I admitted. "And maybe you might want to meet a friend of mine, Lirle. She's a dragon."

Abby's eyes got wide. "Yes," she said, laughing lightly. Her attention turned to the filled bleachers. "They'll come around, but it might take time, so have patience with us." She paused. "And by us, I mean the human race."

I laughed again. "Got it. Patience. I can do that."

The principal was headed our way.

Abby stood. "I'd better find a seat. Good luck."

"I'll need it," I said, and took a deep breath. I could do this.

OceanofPDF.com

ONE YEAR LATER

"ARE YOU READY?" I asked. We were standing outside on my balcony. I took Troy's hand as my wings fluttered behind me. My engagement ring sparkled in the midday light and I couldn't help but admire it. Troy had asked Jesse and the gargoyles to create the ring for me. A thick platinum band with vines filigreed on either side leading to the center where sat a delicate jasmine flower made of diamonds and blue topaz.

"Are you sure you can do this?" Troy was teasing me, pretending to be nervous about me flying him around Sharra.

"There's only one way to find out," I said, and leaped into the air.

Troy whooped out a holler as he clung to my hands, his body dangling below.

"Don't drop him, Jasmine. It isn't every day you find someone crazy enough to fall for you," Abrea said beside me, her pixilette wings fluttering gracefully.

"True." I laughed and the action felt really good.

"Jasmine? We need to leave for the wedding," my mom called from back in my room.

I rolled my eyes and glanced at Abrea, who giggled. "Just like old times," I said.

"Should we keep her waiting this time?"

"Probably not." I angled my wings turned to fly back to my room.

Below me Troy shuddered and shifted into his dragon from, his magnificent bronze wings spread wide to keep him aloft. "We can keep her waiting long enough to have a race, don't you think?" He smirked and blew out twin puffs of smoke.

"You're on," I said and took off. "See you at the wedding, Abrea," I shouted over my shoulder.

"Don't be late," she responded.

Troy was coming up on me fast and I pushed myself, determined to beat my fiancé once and for all. Just before we reached the finish line, which is this case was the water's edge, Troy shot past me.

I growled. "Not cool, dragon boy."

His laugh sailed back to me as he turned around, hovering over the finish line, his wings beating lightly behind him. Even in dragon form, he was gorgeous.

When I got to him, he swooshed me into a hug. I laughed. "I don't like to lose," I admitted after a few moments.

"You're the Eternal Vampire. You can do anything you want and are almost as powerful as my father. Letting me win at flying is the least you can do." He winked. "I may be secure in my manhood, but I need a win once in a while." He chuckled and I joined in.

"I guess." I pulled him into an awkward dragon slash vampire hug.

His arms went around my waist and he pulled me tight against his body. "Should we have a wedding tonight or what?"

"I'm all for it," I said, my gaze lingering on his mouth. My heart raced with excited nervousness. With Troy by my side, our happily ever after would be epic. No doubt about it. Dragon boy and vampire girl. Together we'd overcome every obstacle thrown at us and found our way back to each other. Nothing could stop us.

OUR WEDDING WAS in my favorite rose garden behind our castle in Sharra. Rustic yet sophisticated décor interspersed with plenty of magic was everywhere. Rows of wooden benches lined either side of the wide grassy aisle. At each end was a wooden container filled with teal and copper hombre roses and fluttering pixilettes.

At the front was a wooden arch covered in fresh roses and more pixilettes. They were all dressed in their finest, giving everywhere they touched a magical shimmer. The arch was also draped in gauzy white material. A light breeze caused the edges to dance happily.

All around us were the roses I loved so much. Cindy had spelled them so they slowly shifted smoothly from white to teal to bronze. It was beautiful and so fit Troy and me and our wedding colors.

"How are you doing?" Dad asked.

"Good," I said, leaning into him, grateful he was alive and well. He'd mostly recovered from his time in captivity, when Sharra tried to steal away some of his magic. His eyes were more hazel now, and I heard him and my mom talking about whether or not he was human. I would tell them later tonight that my dad, though he appeared to be human, was more like me than my mom. He was human, but he still possessed a great amount of the seven magics. Perhaps Cindy could train him or better yet, Abernathy.

Dad lifted one eyebrow. "Just good?"

I smiled. "I'm great," I corrected. "So happy to be marrying Troy. And beyond glad to have you and Mom back." My gaze left his face and once again, I scanned the crowd of creatures who'd come.

My gaze went first to Netherby, the sea dragon who granted my wish. Though I'd invited him personally, I hadn't expected him to come. It was a nice surprise to see him.

He was transformed into a human-ish looking man with long white hair. His body was wiry and lean and he was dressed in a light blue suit, the jacket long, coming to just below his knees and he wore white boots. On his light face he had a white mustache and just under his bottom lip was a patch of hair that was long and swayed in the wind.

Beside him sat Silindra with her long, bright blue hair and matching wings, as well as a face so exquisite, it made my eyes water to look at her.

Silindra sensed me and turned, giving me a thumbs up.

I nodded in response, glad she was back. She deserved to find a life of her own. Laeddin sat beside her, his arm around her waist. The two of them made an amazing couple.

Silindra's eyes went to Clare. The little girl who used to be Sharra stood in front of me, waiting for her cue to go. In the last year, she'd grown quickly, as I had, going from a baby to what appeared to be a five-year-old.

I still wasn't sure whether it was the combination of my magic and the elven crown or something the Unknowns had done that allowed her to become the child. If I had to guess, I would say it was mostly the Unknowns. They made it clear messing with our planet was their favorite pastime. And even though they had wanted me to die so that all magic would die with me, it seemed they were placated by the new turn of events. Sharra would get a second chance. We all deserved at least one.

On Troy's side sat Christopher. Extraordinarily handsome in his loose fitting white shirt, opened at the collar and navy dress slacks, he needed to find love as well. More than once he admitted to feeling like what he had was enough, but I wanted more for him.

Somehow. Someday.

As my eyes traveled up to Troy, he winked and I smiled. Pops stood beside him looking elegant in his three piece tuxedo complete with black and teal tie and a white shirt. The suit showed off his tall and lean body. His graying hair was combed back, revealing his striking face and vivid eyes. He smiled.

I returned it before my gaze flicked over to Troy, the man I would spend the rest of eternity with. My insides jumped and my newly reacquired black wings fluttered at the sight of him in his deep teal suit and bronze and white tie.

He winked and my smile grew as I thought about the vision of my future Laeddin gave me. Someday soon, Troy and I would have children and a life of our own. Of that I had zero doubts.

Next to Pops was Jesse as well as Heathcliff, Gabe and the remaining seven uncles. They were all exceedingly fine. More than once, I heard someone in the supernatural crowd comment about how gorgeous all of them were. Among the guests were vampires, unicorns, gargoyles, elves, fairies, Locanis, Vaktare, and more. Some from the different realms and others from the Seven Magics Academy, including some friends from my classes. Even the brute, Jonathon, was there. In a small way, I felt like I owed him. If he hadn't been a jerk to me, Troy and I never would have met.

My side included my mom, Cindy, and Joanna. Lirle was there too. She wasn't old enough or didn't possess enough power to shift into a human form, so she stayed off to the side where she wouldn't accidentally singe someone. I glanced at her and she winked.

Joanna followed my gaze before glancing at Pops. Much to my delight and everyone else's, the two of them would marry soon. It made my heart happy that they finally found each other. I already considered her part of the family.

All the women standing up for me were breathtaking, especially my mom in her light teal dress and soft rose buds in her hair, creating a crown. She looked my age with her long, dark hair down and curled at the ends, hanging to her hips. Her eyes danced with joy. Our relationship had come a long way. During the course of the last few months I was able to see her for who she really was - a strong and intelligent woman. I was beyond lucky to have her as a role model in my life.

The music began and Clare started down the aisle. Her pearly wings flapped as she walked and flew toward the wedding party. When the light hit her wings, they seemed to change colors. Though she was still quite young, she was like me - an original vampire.

She glanced back, her violet eyes, so like mine, studying me inquisitively.

It's going to be okay, I spoke encouragingly into her mind.

It still surprised me how easily she'd become my sister.

Though she'd been the evil and awful Sharra six months ago, she was now kind and loving and cared deeply for our family.

She gave me a single nod before turning around and continuing down the aisle until she reached the end where Kenmei, who waited stoically in the center of the arch, patted her head kindly before indicating she sit down beside Laeddin.

The music changed and everyone stood.

"Here we go," I whispered. Cindy had done my makeup to enhance my eyes and my tanned skin, highlighting my high cheekbones and thick lashes. My black hair had been pinned up in a delicate bun and my enormous black wings were draped against my back. My long white dress had a train and several pixilettes including Abrea held the ends. The dress was hand made by elves of the most delicate white fabric. Delicate black roses were woven around my waist as well as on random places across the dress. The sleeves were spaghetti straps and the collar was low and round in the front and the back, allowing plenty of room for my wings. The dress glistened in the light and hugged my body like a satin slip.

In one hand I held a bouquet of roses. I knew they were beautiful, but I didn't look at them. Now that our wedding was about to happen, I only had eyes for Troy.

When I reached my spot across from him, I handed Cindy my bouquet.

I barely heard him as Kenmei gave his speech and said the words that would seal Troy and me in matrimony forever. Though I was young, I wasn't afraid. Marrying Troy was the best thing to happen in my life and I would cherish every moment.

"Is there anything you want to say?" Kenmei asked, his eyes flicking to Troy.

My beloved swallowed and looked straight at me. I was beaming, my smile so big my cheeks hurt when he spoke. "You are a light in my life. You've taught me what it means to fight for what you love and never give up. Beyond the fact that your stunning - " He paused, his eyes roaming me, as the crowd laughed. " - Jasmine, you are the most exquisite being I've ever had the pleasure to meet." He swallowed again, forcing down his nerves at speaking in front of so many. "It means the world to me that you've chosen me to be your husband. I promise to be there for you as a friend and a lover forever." He gave my hands a light squeeze.

"And you, Jasmine?" Kenmei asked. "Anything to add?"

"Troy, before I met you I didn't know what it meant to love unconditionally. Not because I hadn't seen it, because I had in my parents and my family. But I wasn't able to recognize that love or understand it until I met you." Tears blurred my vision as I struggled to say all that was in my heart. "Not only are you the most gorgeous man in the world, you are also the most giving, the kindest, and most caring, too. Despite my mistakes, you continue to root for me and to love me. If I've changed at all for the better, it's because you inspired me to do so." I closed my eyes. Tears dripped onto my cheeks. "You've helped me become the person, daughter, sister, and friend I'm supposed to be and all of my relationships are fuller because you came into my life." I shook my head and worked to contain my emotions. "It means the world to me that you have agreed to be by my side forevermore." I quickly wiped at my eyes, smiling around the tears.

"By the power vested in me, I pronounce you husband and wife," Kenmei said. Then he grinned at Troy. "You may kiss your bride."

I didn't wait but flung myself into Troy's arms, using my wings to lift off the ground and press my lips to his.

His arms circled my waist and my wings circled the two of us.

"My sweet Jazz." He pressed my mouth open, kissing me so deeply, I felt it in my toes.

We parted when we heard clapping.

Then I reached back and touched the arch, sending my magic into the wood and the flowers. The pixilettes fluttered away as teal and bronze flames sprang to life around us. They didn't burn anything, but they sparkled and glittered against the setting sun.

The clapping grew louder and everyone got to their feet.

My mom lifted Clare so she could see. The little girl reached out a hand and sent her own magic into the arch so it mingled with mine. All seven magics grew, their colors blending and lifting until they nearly touched the sky.

OceanofPDF.com

THE KPID

THAT NIGHT, after all of the festivities were over and we said our goodbyes, Troy and I went back to the small house that used to be my mother's. Now that Sharra was no longer a threat, the chayot set up a meeting between several of the heads of different countries in the human realm and me. There, with the help of the chayot, we discussed relaxing the laws for supernaturals. Together we came to an agreement and I created a magical system with the help of Heathcliff and several other human scientists. After much discussion, I became aware of the KPID, a supernatural government agency known as the King's Paranormal Inquiries Division. The organization had been tracking supernaturals for hundreds of years, at first in the United Kingdom, but in the mid seventeen hundreds, they'd moved over to America as well.

Given access to the KPID's super top secret information, I was able to update and strengthen the magic already in place as well as add some newer, more technical attributes with Heathcliff's help. All major world governments agreed to keep the name of the agency a secret as long as their agents from around the world could work alongside certain supernaturals within the agency. Each time a supernatural entered their jurisdiction, an alert would sound. Then it was determined whether they were a threat or not. The system wasn't perfect. There were many supernaturals who slipped through the magical cracks, including Pops and his adoptive sons. But it was better than anything the human realm had before.

By unanimous vote, I became the human realm's figurehead for all supernatural creatures. That meant meetings and other such duties, but, as long as Troy was with me, I was ready to take on the responsibilities that came with my power and do my part.

I noticed Troy watching me. "What?" I asked, leaning into him. The man had the sexiest lips and face and - yeah, the man was damn sexy. Period.

"Just watching your mind work," he said with a sultry chuckle. "This place is ours. Is it big enough for the world's only Eternal Vampire?" His eyes sparkled at the silly name.

I played along, enjoying his teasing. I still didn't even know what it meant to be the Eternal Vampire. It was a term the Unknowns gave me but I thought it was pretentious. "I don't know, my love. Perhaps we should find out if every room is suitable." I hoped he understood my meaning.

His chuckle grew. "I like the sound of that." Troy caressed my face and I shivered, kissing his palm.

But neither of us moved. Probably because he sensed the thoughts still running through my head. Excitement that this little house my mother grew up in was now mine and Troy's while we resided in the human realm. Of course, in Sharra, we would stay in the castle. It was big enough to hold us as well as my mom and dad.

But here, this place, it felt like a delicious secret. Together we'd changed the house's décor to suit our style, filling the rooms with light paint and new windows and white curtains. When Clare came to stay she would use the same bedroom that had been my mother's and then mine. We changed the room color to pinks and painted the walls with unicorns.

The master bedroom was now mine and Troy's.

"Come on, lover," he said, taking my hand.

Slowly we walked up the stairs, Troy leading. A nervous punch filled my stomach. I wanted to make love to Troy. No doubt about it. Troy and I would be together forever and tonight we would seal our promises to each other physically as well as emotionally.

At the top of the stairs, he turned and pulled me into his arms. "Are you scared?"

"No," I said and meant it. "Only a little anxious about what to expect." I knew what it was like to kiss him and want him, but we hadn't gone further.

Troy gave me a look that said how much he loved me and kissed my hand before leading me into the bedroom.

The room was decorated in an airy contemporary fashion. The enormous bed piled with pillows in creams and white with hints of teal and bronze. The window coverings were closed and the room was lit with thousands of candles.

"Did you do this?" I asked in surprised wonder.

"You're not the only one with magic," he said, his eyes alight with joy.

Music began to play, a soft beat with melodic singing. It was enchanting. "You're really good at this wooing thing," I said, wrapping my arms around him and leaning my face against his chest. He smelled amazing, like sunshine and warmth and a hint of sandalwood. I could feel his heart beating beneath the soft cotton of this shirt. We'd both changed into more casual clothes after the wedding.

We swayed to the music a few moments, until he tilted my head up and kissed my lips. It was soft and full of love and I responded in kind, inexpressibly grateful for the man in my arms.

"I'm going to change," I said, feeling a little lightheaded. As a vampire, I wasn't prone to any kind of sickness or human frailty, but my head was spinning with love and happiness. Well, it was more than happiness. And excitement too. I was married to Troy!

"Great," he said, keeping hold of my hand for as long as possible before I disappeared behind the door. Inside the bathroom, I studied my complexion. My hair was still in the bun from the wedding and I decided to remove all of the pins. It relaxed me, pulling pin after pin from my hair and setting them on the sink. When I was done, my hung long, nearly to my waist, and had some wavy curl in it. "You can do this," I told my reflection.

Again, I reminded myself it wasn't the love making that had me nervous. As I studied my face in the mirror, it became clear I was nervous about baring my soul completely to the man I loved most. He had agreed to love, honor, and cherish me, in sickness and in health. Did that include pride and arrogance too? Or what about whining and selfishness? I had grown up a lot but there was no doubt I still had more growing up to do. Would he love me then?

Taking a deep breath, I sent my wings away, a new development since receiving my new wings from the king and queen of the Hollow. Then I kicked out of my black combat boots, sliding off my jeans and removing my shirt. In my undies it occurred to me I'd gone into the bathroom to change but had nothing to change into.

"Crap!"

A soft knock came on the door and he opened it a crack, sliding a soft aqua satin nightgown through. "Jazz, I thought you might want something to put on."

I took it, thinking it looked too fancy for me, but was grateful. "Thank you," I said meeting his eyes. He winked and I returned it before pushing the door shut. Holding the thing he gave me up against my body, I stared at myself in the mirror. "You definitely want this," I whispered, and quickly took off my underthings before sliding the nightgown over my head.

Then I fluffed my hair and brushed my teeth and stared some more, bringing my wings back. How grateful I was for them. How I had missed flying! Still, I was beyond grateful I could have them appear and disappear at will. It made things like dressing and showering and life in general much easier.

"Jazz, is everything alright?" Troy asked through the door.

If occurred to me that he might think I was having second thoughts, I was taking so long. "Yes," I said, giving myself a smile before opening the door.

The bathroom light bathed Troy in light. The man still had his jeans on, but he'd removed his shoes and socks and shirt. The button on his pants was undone, too. My heart raced at the sight of him. Hot. Beyond gorgeous. He was everything.

And I wanted him.

"You look like an angel," Troy said, awe filling each word.

"Thank you." I quickly whisked my wings away.

"Bring them back," Troy said, stepping so close that his chest caressed mine. My skin prickled and shivered.

"Are you sure? I-I don't want them to get in the way." I wasn't embarrassed by them any longer and I loved them, but I didn't want Troy to feel like my wings had to be in our lives constantly.

The word freak flickered through my mind and I momentarily panicked. Then I took a deep breath and brought my wings back. I wasn't a freak. I was me and I was okay.

Troy caressed my wings, sending a tremor of desire through me. There was something to be said for having the wings. They were very sensitive and Troy knew how to awaken the need in me. He pressed his lips to mine, opening my mouth and kissing me soundly.

My arms went to his waist and he trembled at my touch. I smiled against his mouth, grateful I could make him feel as undone as he did to me.

"My beautiful Jasmine." He lifted me into his arms and I whisked my wings away again just as he laid me on the bed. Climbing on, I admired the way his muscles flexed as he moved, hovering over me. "Together forever and always, right?" He leaned down so we were nose to nose.

"Absolutely."

As he studied me a moment, I thought about all I still didn't know about him. At some point, I would learn more about the man I loved more than myself. "Tomorrow, will you tell me about your mother?"

The question surprised him.

I did have horrible timing, but I didn't want to forget to ask.

He kissed my mouth, letting it linger before trailing kisses down my neck to my collarbones. As heat rose within me, I decided I didn't give a flying flip about his mom or where he came from. He was here and he was mine. That was all that mattered.

He paused, then brought his face up so I could meet his eyes. "I don't know anything about my mom. How about we find out together?" A mischievous smile splayed across his beautiful lips. "But not today. Maybe not for a while. Deal?"

I ran my fingers through his hair, arching my neck so he would have easier access. "Deal," I finally whispered and then lost myself in the love between Troy and me.

OceanofPDF.com

A BEAUTY SO BEASTLY

OceanofPDF.com

PROLOGUE

EIGHTEEN YEARS AGO

"GO, LENORA! THEY CANNOT CATCH US." Fisher pressed his nose against her furry cheek, urging her deeper into the woods.

His whiskers tingled with the realization that the Locanis were close.

Too close.

They were being hunted by the king, his father's servants, the worst of the worst of the Locanis.

And Kevoney had not been a kind master.

He'd been ruthless.

Fisher was nothing like him, but that didn't matter to the Locanis. He knew if he and his wife were caught, the werewolves would slaughter them without remorse.

Fisher and Lenora had to endure.

They were all that was left of the Vaktare royal family, and his mate carried the child that could save their species.

Fisher looked back, peering into the dark night.

A strong smell of smoke wafted through the air, and Fisher knew the werewolves had burned their palace home.

"I can't do it." Lenora stopped, panting.

Her beastly body swayed, her swollen belly nearly touching the ground before she caught herself. "Our child is unhappy with all the running. It's making her sick."

Lenora fell onto her side. "It's making me sick, too." As though to prove the point, she retched on the ground.

Fisher moved close, taking a protective stance, sensing the Locanis were getting closer.

A quick glance down revealed that the pendant still dangled from his furry neck, the red stone gleaming in the moonlight.

The pendant was their only chance, the one significant advantage they had over the Locanis: each Vaktare was born with a unique preternatural ability.

He had been given the gift of conjuring, which was why he could use the pendant.

His wife, Lenora, could control the elements but couldn't use her power now for fear the strain would harm their unborn child.

One of the Locanis howled.

Others responded.

There were at least a dozen, and they were getting closer.

"Please, Lenora. Get up." Urgency caused him to roar. "If we can get to the top of the mountain, we'll be able to jump realms. It isn't far." Fisher nudged her, encouraging her to stand.

Lenora's legs shook and wobbled.

"Oh," Lenora cried. "I think the baby is coming."

"How much time do we have?" Fisher asked, fear causing his heart to beat rapidly.

Her ears twitched, and she shook her head. "Minutes, possibly just seconds."

Fisher knew there was no way to predict when the child would come, but he wouldn't let them give up.

Another set of howls.

The werewolves were gaining fast.

He closed his eyes.

Unlike Lenora's gift, his usually required additional components in order to work. He needed a spell that didn't require any ingredients, something that would slow the werewolves down.

If only Lenora could use her talent and create a thunderstorm to conceal and wash away their scent.

“What is it?” Lenora asked, her breathing heavy.

Fisher opened his eyes, considering his mate. Could he ask such a thing of her, especially in her condition?

Lenora’s legs shook, but she held her ground.

His mate seemed to understand.

She closed her eyes, focusing.

And Fisher immediately felt the winds pick up.

Dark thunderclouds appeared in the already opaque sky as it began to rain heavily.

“It’s done,” she said, falling against him.

“Get on.” He nudged her onto his back.

When she was secure, he hefted up the mountainside, digging his thick paws into the dampened earth.

More than once, he debated changing into his human form but tossed the thought aside. If he and Lenora were caught, it would be easier to fight the Locanis in his werecat form.

On and on, he pushed.

So high up, the wind whipped fiercely against their faces, slapping through their fur, stinging their skin.

He kept going, bowing his head against the tempest his wife had created.

“Stop, you mangy cat!”

Even with the wind and the rain, it was easy to hear the Locanis’ growling words.

It had been the leader of the pack, Beck, who shouted.

The werewolf was young and arrogant, but he was also fearless and exceptional in the art of killing.

Many Vaktare had died with their throats in his mouth, their blood dripping from his fangs.

“It’s okay. Keep breathing.” Fisher spoke softly to Lenora, keeping his back to the werewolves.

Lenora opened her eyes with a look of amused irritation. It said if she had more strength, she’d lovingly claw his eyes out.

“I know. Sorry,” he whispered, a wisp of a smile on his face.

She rested a paw against his cheek.

He leaned into it, setting her down.

He would use the pendant now.

If they weren’t close enough to the gateway, it wouldn’t matter.

They were dead anyway.

“Turn around, Fisher. Don’t be a coward like your father. Face your death honorably.”

Fisher’s hackles rose.

He wanted to make the werewolf leader pay for his insolence.

Instead, as water dripped from his face, he chanted the words for the incantation.

The wind and the rain kept the portal hidden until it was nearly big enough to jump through.

“Go,” he shouted ferociously, shoving Lenora into the opening.

But Beck was suddenly on his back as Fisher took a step toward the portal.

“So you are a coward,” Beck hissed, sinking his teeth into Fisher’s shoulder.

Fisher bucked Beck off him with a mighty heave, trying to snap his neck in the process. “You’re a lot of talk, Beck.”

The gateway was beginning to close.

Beck stood, shaking his head. Then he charged.

Fisher planted his feet.

Beck lowered his head, preparing to ram Fisher.

At the last second, Fisher sidestepped and leaped into the closing portal.

He heard Beck howl in frustration just as the gateway locked behind him.

It was dark in the new realm like it'd been in Hiraken, the realm of his birth, but Fisher's enhanced eyes allowed him to see that Lenora was on her side, breathing rapidly.

"Lenora," he shouted, running to her. He shifted into his human form now.

Lenora already had. Her creamy skin was almost translucent in the moonlight.

She didn't speak, all of her attention on birthing her baby.

As the child came, Lenora let out a loud scream, which sounded more like a roar.

Then she fell silent.

Fisher picked up the human child.

"Lenora," he whispered when the baby started to cry. "Our baby girl."

It was strange.

While he'd been so terrified for the child moments before jumping realms, he now found he had no emotion at all.

He remembered he'd had emotions, that he'd once known what it was like to smile, to love, but he couldn't find where they'd gone.

The medicine woman had explained that when they crossed into the human realm, the magical enchantment would shut away the werecat part of themselves and all of their emotions.

"I feel nothing," Lenora said.

"Neither do I. This is what she said would happen." Fisher looked down at the baby.

"What should we call her?" The question seemed appropriate, though he couldn't understand his need to name the child now.

Lenora closed her eyes, nodding. “We’ll name the child Beatrice.”

“Agreed.” Fisher glanced down at his naked chest. The pendant was gone.

He remembered when Beck rushed him, as he’d moved to the side, he’d felt a tugging. “Beck has the pendant,” he said.

“He won’t be able to use it. He has no power. We are safe.” Lenora stared up at the starry sky.

Fisher nodded, but a strange buzzing deep inside made him think otherwise.

OceanofPDF.com

YOU AREN'T INVITED

FROM MY LOUNGE chair near the pool, I studied the waterfall. It rumbled monotonously down the enormous rocks and dumped into the pool.

I closed my eyes against the blaring sun, focusing on the heat kissing my skin.

Unwanted memories flooded my mind.

As I brushed some waterproof mascara on my lashes, I thought about the first time I realized how much power I possessed.

I was seven.

My dad rented out an entire amusement park for my birthday.

I invited the kids in my class to come.

We rode the rides as many times as we wanted, watched the shows over and over, and ate ice cream, funnel cakes, and homemade fudge from the food shops.

Throughout the day, more than one classmate told me I must be "the richest girl in the world" or asked if I was a princess.

Of course, at that age, I wanted to believe I was a princess.

So I said yes.

After that, I gained a lot more friends.

It didn't matter that I felt nothing.

No one cared if I treated him or her badly.

Those who I allowed to spend time with me felt privileged.

I was given everything and took what I wanted without consequence.

I was ten when one of my classmates first called me on my personality or lack thereof.

She'd said I was a heartless bitch.

My dad had rented out the entire theater so my friends and I could watch the newly re-digitized Beauty and the Beast movie. Dad and Mom told me to invite as many people as I wanted. I invited five.

Alice Lindell came over to me one day in school, sat primly in the seat beside mine, and informed me that I should be kind and invite everyone.

She was one of those trendy girls, very friendly, super pretty, and her parents obviously had money too, which was why I wanted nothing to do with her.

I was the princess.

No one else would ever be allowed to claim my title.

She'd been wearing flower pants, a white half shirt with the word princess sparkling in hot pink across her chest, a hot pink tank shirt, and matching hot pink boots.

The girl loved hot pink.

Her hair was blond, and she always flipped it with her hand when she talked.

I'd picked up my fruit punch juice container and "accidentally" spilled it all over her shirt and pants.

"I don't have to be kind," I said, thinking I had no idea what kindness felt like. "I can do what I want, and you aren't invited."

That was when she used the words - heartless bitch.

They stuck.

If it were true or not, I didn't know.

I didn't care.

Those types of emotions meant nothing to me.

Eight years later and people still called me a heartless bitch behind my back.

And it still didn't bother me. Nothing did.

A lot happened since Alice Lindell and her words.

I'd just turned eighteen, graduated from high school, and was the owner of a brand new LaFerrari. It was yellow, had black leather seats, and cost my parents more than a million dollars.

The car was beautiful, and I knew I should be excited, yet my mood remained the same as always - blank.

"Would you like lunch by the pool or inside?" Mrs. Dotts asked, interrupting my thoughts of the past. She was Cavanaugh Mansion's cook. An older lady with gray hair, a friendly smile, and sensible shoes.

"The pool," I answered, opening my eyes lazily.

"Very well, Miss Beatrice." She bowed slightly, making her ruffled, white apron arch outward.

"Have you seen my parents?" I asked before she left to go downstairs.

"No, miss. When I arrived, they were already gone."

The way her round face puckered, it was easy to discern she was distressed by their actions. I knew why.

My parents were creatures of habit.

They woke each morning, including weekends, at five o'clock.

Exercised.

Got ready for the day.

Ate breakfast.

And then my dad would go into work, and my mom would do whatever it was she did.

I rarely rose before seven, but they'd been following the same routine for so long, even I knew their schedule.

Occasionally they took a trip, but they always gave plenty of notice so Mrs. Dotts and Isaac could prepare for their absence.

"Did they leave a note?"

She wrung her hands, filled with worry. “No, miss.”

If they were gone, they were gone.

I shrugged. “You’re blocking my light,” I said, waving her away.

Mrs. Dotts nodded and headed away.

The pool was a few hundred feet from the main house, past the adobe-style patio. Cavanaugh Mansion was twenty thousand square feet of traditional grandness.

The outside was a combination of stucco and brick.

There were dozens of windows and a balcony across the front and back of the house. It rested on the side of a mountain overlooking Salt Lake City.

Spanning fifty acres, Cavanaugh Mansion’s grounds had everything, including its very own nine-hole golf course, tennis courts, and stables, along with three guesthouses.

“Alone,” I whispered.

The pool water shimmered in the sunlight. I adjusted the lounger so I could lay flat, soaking in the warm summer rays.

Birds chirped in the nearby trees, singing so happily I suddenly wondered what that must feel like - to be cheerful enough to sing about it.

“Miss Cavanaugh, may I present Will, Eva, Ashley, Cassidy, and Greg.” Isaac came over to the pool, followed by my guests.

He wore black pants, a black jacket, a silver vest, a white shirt, white gloves, and a black bow tie.

Always pristine, and by the book, he was a butler’s butler.

When I was little, he scared me.

He was tall and thin with receding salt and pepper hair and thick eyebrows that seemed to grow thicker by the year.

“Can we get some drinks, Isaac?” I sat up, my toned abs contracting as I moved.

“Yes, miss.” He bowed and withdrew.

I’d known my friends were coming.

Yesterday was my birthday, and they’d texted that they wanted to bring me presents.

I wasn’t going to pass up gifts, no way.

What they gave told me how dearly they held my friendship.

“The hard kind,” Eva said, smiling coyly up at a guy that I guessed was Greg. Then she said, “Happy eighteen, Bea. You look hot.”

Greg nodded.

He held a present in his other hand.

“Thanks. I am hot.” Everyone except Greg laughed.

He obviously hadn’t been schooled on what was appropriate in my presence.

I’d find a way to make him see.

I went to push my sunglasses on my head and then remembered I wore a tiara.

Yes, the tiara was perfectly acceptable sunbathing attire.

My bikini was red, the exact shade of the red diamonds in the rose crown.

I took the glasses off and set them on the end table next to my chair.

“Damn, Bea. Where’d you get that crown?” Cassidy asked, setting her present on the patio table and moving closer.

She liked shiny things almost as much as I did.

Ashley shook her head. “Seriously? Only you would think to lay out next to a pool in a bikini and a tiara. What’s that stone in the center? A ruby?”

I shook my head, feeling like the cat that swallowed the canary.

“It’s a red diamond.”

Will, who’d been quiet so far, blurted out, “Holy shit.”

His father was in the diamond business.

I knew that because he talked about diamonds all the freaking time.

“That thing is probably worth eight million, give or take.” He sat on the patio chair beside me, smiling.

The present in his hand was small, with a brilliant blue bow and the word “Tiffany’s” etched across the box top.

I smiled back, knowing it was expected.

“Where did you get it?” Ashley asked, still referring to the tiara. She took the chair on the other side of mine.

Eva, Cassidy, and Greg pulled up patio chairs and sat as well.

Glancing at each person, verifying I had their full attention, I gave them a brilliant smile.

“My mom and dad gave it to me for my birthday.” I spoke about it like it was no big deal. To me, it wasn’t, but I knew it was a big deal to them.

Picking up some tanning lotion, I held it out for Will. “Would you mind?”

“Not at all.” Will was always so accommodating, just the way a boyfriend should be.

He put down his gift, shook the lotion, and squirted some on his hands.

Then he rubbed them together and placed his hands on my back.

The lotion was cool against my warm skin.

I winked, knowing he liked when I did that.

He rested a hand on my knee, his blue eyes sparkling with need.

I pulled away.

His hand was still covered in lotion.

Will’s face fell.

I knew it bothered him that I had no desire to get physical.

Eva crossed her legs, leaning into Greg.

“I’m so sorry, Beatrice. I know you had your heart set on that yellow Ferrari.”

I laughed. It was hard and cold. “I got that too.”

Cassidy whistled.

“You driven her yet?” Will asked, massaging lotion into my shoulders. Some got on my hair. My maid Celeste had curled it and swept the front up, but the back was still down.

“Watch it,” I snapped, pulling the ends out of the way.

“Sorry.” Will sounded repentant.

“No, I haven’t driven the car yet,” I said, putting my sunglasses back on. “I’m thinking tomorrow or maybe the day after that.” Several magazines were on the table next to my chair, and I picked one up, casually flipping through the pages.

Of course, I wanted to drive the car. Why wouldn’t I? But I didn’t want to take him.

“This is for you,” Greg said, handing me Eva’s present.

I gave him my special smile, taking it.

The paper was a bright yellow with an even more colorful orange ribbon.

“Should I open it now?” I was playing demure.

To fit in with regular people, my parents taught me what was expected during specific situations at a young age.

“Yeah.” Eva glanced at Greg. “We hope you like it.”

I tore off the paper and opened the box.

Inside was one of the Fall collection Christian Dior bags. The colors morphed from red into orange and then yellow. It was gorgeous - score one for Eva and the hot new guy.

“Love it.” I set it back in the box and on the concrete ground.

Eva beamed with pride.

The look on Cassidy's face told me that either the gift she got was too cheap or it was the same one.

Without focusing on her, I watched her push it back and under her chair.

"Do you want me to open your gift next, Cassidy?" I asked, purposely putting her on the spot.

Her already pale face got whiter. "No, I - I've brought the wrong gift. This one is for my aunt." Her face turned red as my bikini. "I'll bring you the right one tomorrow."

I raised an eyebrow, telling her with my expression that I wasn't happy with her efforts. "Whatever," I sniffed, lifting my nose.

Ashley handed me hers. "Happy birthday."

Her present was long and thin, like a hefty envelope.

It was wrapped in yellow paper with a black bow.

It reminded me of a bee, and I randomly wondered if she'd done the colors on purpose. I didn't ask.

When I took the box, I waited a few seconds for her to comment on the color scheme, but she didn't.

I could see she was a little worried.

The skin around her eyes was tense, but she was also less willing to bow to my desires than the others.

If the gift was lame, it was because she'd had enough of my bitchiness, and I would drop her like a hot plate.

"What could it be?" I ripped off the paper and opened the envelope.

It was a trip for two to Belize.

I was actually impressed. She'd remembered that I'd mentioned I'd wanted to go to Belize a few months ago.

Maybe she wasn't worried about me so much as something else in her life.

“This is great. So unexpected.” Then I smirked. “I suppose the second ticket is for you?”

She played it cool. “Whoever. I’ve been to Belize a bunch of times.”

“Right. I’m sure I can find someone.” I set the envelope with the tickets in it on the ground next to the Dior bag.

The only one left was Will. He handed me his present.

“It isn’t anything big, but when I saw it, I thought of you.” He gave me a bright smile. The one that lit up his eyes.

I took it and untied the ribbon. In the distance came a yowl, like a cat, only the sound was louder than a house cat.

Living on the side of a mountain, it wasn’t uncommon to hear strange noises.

Bobcats were prevalent in the higher altitudes.

What was strange was the way Will glanced in the direction of the noise.

“Afraid of bobcats?” I asked, smirking.

One of his eyes twitched. “No, not really.” He chuckled nervously.

Since the box was from Tiffany’s, I expected to find diamond earrings, a tennis bracelet, or even a pretty diamond necklace.

I mean, his dad worked in diamonds, so believing I would get diamonds didn’t seem far-fetched, even if whatever it was would seem trivial next to my amazing white and red diamond tiara.

I opened the box.

There were no diamonds inside.

Instead was a key chain with a yellow and onyx textured leather bee with palladium-plated wings on the end. I picked it up.

“Read the back. There’s an inscription,” Will said, leaning closer so that I could smell his spicy cologne over the strong chlorine from the pool.

I turned the bee over and read aloud, “You’ll always be my Bea. ~ Love, Will.”

It was corny and cheap and totally stupid. “Wow.” I forced myself to smile, internally debating what in hell I was supposed to do with it.

“You see,” Will said. “It’s a bee, and you’re my Bea.”

I nodded, gritting my teeth. “I get it.” I bit my cheek. “It’s - it’s - ” I studied his features, wondering why I even bothered to keep him around.

He had black hair he spiked in the front with gel.

His eyes were a dark blue, and his lashes were black.

He had olive skin, and even though school had only been out a couple of weeks, he looked like he lived in the sun. His tan was so deep.

“You hate it?” His expression was filled with hurt.

It would have been proper to thank him and move on, but I couldn’t. The present was stupid.

Eva and Ashley had each spent several thousand dollars.

His probably cost a hundred, if that.

“I don’t exactly hate it,” I said and took a deep breath.

Blowing out, I tossed the bee into the pool.

He gasped, his eyes getting wide.

“The gift is stupid, Will. My parents gave me an eight-million-dollar tiara and bought me a million-dollar car. Ashley got me a trip, and Eva got me a bag worth thousands of dollars.” I tossed the box onto his lap.

“Don’t you care about me?”

Will’s mouth opened and closed. His eyes permeated with pain and anger.

I turned away, watching the Tiffany’s bee sink to the bottom of the pool. “It’s pitiful,” I said, clasping my hands over my stomach.

He stood, his hands forming fists at his sides, letting the box crash to the ground. “I’ve got to go.” He walked a few steps and glanced back. “Happy birthday, Beatrice.”

A cruel grin spread over his face.

It was a look I hadn’t seen on him before, and I couldn’t decide if it was new or if I just hadn’t paid enough attention to his facial expressions before.

“I hope you get exactly what’s coming to you.” He stomped past Isaac, who carried a tray of drinks.

“Are you leaving?” he asked Will.

“Hell, yes.” Will shot me a final glare.

Disappointment settled on Isaac’s features. His bright brown eyes locked on mine.

They spoke volumes about how I should understand that I could show my friends, if not kindness, at least respect.

But he said nothing, which was a damn good thing.

It wasn’t his place.

Isaac cleared his throat, set the drinks on the patio table, and walked away without a word.

OceanofPDF.com

WANT TO KISS ME

THOSE WHO REMAINED SPENT the afternoon with me outside, by the pool.

Mrs. Dotts brought out a lunch of marinated salmon with mango-kiwi relish. After we ate and had a few cocktails, Ashley, Eva, Greg, and Cassidy swam.

I didn't.

I wasn't a fan of spending long periods of time in the water.

No one mentioned what had happened between Will and me. They kept the conversation on easy stuff, like summer plans, parties, and college.

I hadn't decided where to go yet. I had no idea what I wanted to study.

Ashley was going back East to Harvard. She wanted to study law, which fit her perfectly. Most days she wore black horn rimmed glasses and kept her short, dark hair pinned back. She was short, like me, and had brown eyes, not like me.

Mine were hazel.

Cassidy was going to the University of California, Berkeley. She said she was going to study the fine art of hot men and surfing. Her long blonde hair, green eyes, and unnaturally tanned skin would fit right in on the California beaches. She was also tall and super into working out.

Eva was staying in Utah to go to the University of Utah.

When I found out that was where Greg went, I understood. It was hard to know what the true color of Eva's hair was. She changed it monthly.

Today it black with white streaks throughout. She had a tattoo of a butterfly with fangs on her left collarbone and her nose was pierced.

Her clothes were edgy too. She said she wanted to work in a zoo, and her plan had been to go to Africa for a semester.

But the way she kept looking at Greg, I wondered if she would now. Probably not, which was completely idiotic. She'd probably known the guy five minutes.

I didn't know where Will planned on going to college. He hadn't told me and I hadn't asked.

I'd been accepted into a few schools but since I didn't know what I wanted to study, I couldn't decide which school to attend.

My parents didn't seem to care where or even if I went, unlike other kids' parents, so I figured I had time.

Maybe I'd go to Belize and not come back.

Ashley dunked Eva under the water. Eva screamed as she surfaced, spitting water out of her mouth.

"Don't do that again," Eva shouted, splashing Ashley with water.

Ashley gasped as though she couldn't believe the nerve of Eva. "You've ruined my makeup!"

Greg jumped out of the pool and walked over to where I was sitting. He picked up a towel from the chair next to mine.

I decided to use the alone time to make my move. "Can you help me get some more wine?" I asked him, smiling sweetly, the way I always did when I wanted something.

"Can't Isaac get some?" He glanced back at the pool, at the still fighting girls.

I pouted. "Yes, but I want some now."

"All right." He grinned, wrapping the towel around his waist so that it hung low on his hips. I knew this was going to be easy.

I took him down the back stairs into the cellar. It got cooler the deeper we went.

"What's your major?" I was trying to be conversational.

“Engineering, I suppose.” It was hard to see in the dim light, but his eyes seemed to take on a strange color, almost turquoise.

What did he mean, he supposed? Not that it mattered.

I didn’t want to get to know him, I wanted to make out and mess around.

Do just enough damage to remind Eva just how much power I had over anyone I wanted.

I didn’t want sweetness, Greg’s life story, or anything personal.

“How much longer do you have?”

Greg glanced up as though thinking about it. “A year, this time.” He gave me a strange smile.

I did the math on his age as I flicked on the lights.

The walls to our wine cellar were made of stone. There were wood cabinets. The wine slots were wood as well. The floor was made of slate.

“You must be twenty-one then?” I preferred older men. They weren’t as immature as the guys my age. They seemed less gushy with their feelings.

“My age is of no consequence.” He walked over to the wine rack. “Did you want red or white?” Greg pulled a bottle and held it out.

“Sure, whatever.” I slid up to him, putting my hands on his naked chest and tracing my fingers along his muscles.

“What are you doing?” He grabbed my hands, his strange eyes studying my face.

“Come on. Don’t you want to kiss me?”

Greg released my hands. Sadness crossed his face. “Are you sure you want to?”

“Yeah. Are you kidding? You have to know you’re gorgeous.” I ran my fingers down his muscled arms. He didn’t move.

“Don’t you want to?” I removed his towel, letting it fall to the floor.

“What about Will?” He put his hands on my waist. A strange tingle wriggled in the back of my mind. Like it was trying to tell me I’d forgotten something and was on the verge of remembering.

I ignored it. “We are definitely not together anymore. You saw what happened.”

Greg leaned down so his lips were next to my ear. “And what about your friend Eva? She and I are an item. What about her?” His voice was soft and warm.

The irritating tingle came back but this time it was stronger. It felt like my mind was trying to tell me no, that it wanted me to run away. But that was ridiculous.

I did what I wanted, when I wanted.

And right now I wanted Eva’s boyfriend.

“She doesn’t have to know.” I didn’t say I’d make sure Eva found out within minutes after he and I were finished. He didn’t need to know that. He didn’t need to know anything, except that I wanted him right now and that meant I should have him.

He sighed heavily. “Then it’s come to this.” He pinched the bridge of his nose and shook his head.

I tried to kiss him but he pushed me away.

“Come to what?” I frowned, unused to being denied anything.

He kept silent, picking up his towel and wrapping it around his hips again. It was then I realized he no longer held a wine bottle.

When had he put it back? I thought, a little confused.

Greg’s turquoise eyes were a mixture of sadness and delight. “When we designed your species we believed you were perfect. We thought you would be the precise combination of ferocity, tenderness, humility, generosity, power and love. I was most excited. Your kind was to be my finest creation.”

Greg ran a hand through his thick, dark hair.

I watched, caught between being mesmerized and terrified, even though I had no idea why. Maybe it was because he was crazy.

What did he mean by perfect species?

I was a human, not some beast that was bred to be domesticated like the house cat. He wasn't making any sense and the tingle in the back of my brain had changed to an annoying buzz. I felt myself take a step back. The heel of my shoe caught on the grout between the slate slabs. I started to fall, but felt my body turn so I landed on my hands and the balls of my feet.

"Whoa," I said, pushing myself up. How had I done that?

OceanofPDF.com

A CURSE I LEAVE UPON YOU

I TURNED BACK to Greg curious to know what he thought of my quick reflexes.

He seemed unimpressed so I shrugged it off.

Besides, Greg's body shimmered strangely in the dim lights. Like he was a wraith or a ghost.

Or maybe it was all in my head.

I'd drank more than my normal amount of alcohol. I pressed my palms against the sides of my head, hoping that would clear the incessant buzzing and whatever was going on with my eyes.

Greg came in super close, invading my space, so I caught hold of is smell - like air and spice. "Beatrice Cavanaugh?" he began.

I blinked several times. "Yeah." I thought maybe he'd changed his mind about kissing me. "You want me now?"

He held me at arm's length. "It's time you understood that being beautiful doesn't give you the right to be beastly and that sometimes those who seem the most beastly are actually quite beautiful."

Profound, I thought.

"Right," I blurted, each letter oozing with sarcasm. "Whatever you say, Greg." Obviously the combination of too many fruity drinks laced with alcohol and too much time in the sun was causing issues.

Greg's distorted eyebrows rose and he crossed his arms. "For your vanity, your cruelty, and your cold unfeeling heart, a curse I leave upon you - " While Greg spoke his body changed into something I could see through.

Maybe he really was a wraith or a ghost.

The buzzing in my head was so loud that if he said more I didn't hear him.

Turquoise eyes watched me from within the dark mist that had once been Greg. The mist shot up, passed through the ceiling, and was gone.

“What the hell?” The words came out but I didn’t think about them. All I could focus on was the noise inside my brain getting louder and louder by the second.

The buzzing was all I knew.

It seemed to engulf my body.

I fell to my knees, pushing my palms more tightly against my head.

The room started to quake.

The lights swung from the ceiling.

Bottles fell from their shelves, crashing to the floor.

Glass cut my skin.

Wine broke free of the bottles.

One of the lights detached from the ceiling, smashing against my forehead. Red liquid ran into my eyes. I closed them, forcing the world to go black.

I WOKE WITH A START, light bathing my face.

There was a quick knock at the door and then Celeste came in, carrying a tray with what I knew held my breakfast.

“Morning, Miss Beatrice. Did you sleep well?” Her voice shook slightly and I wondered why.

Celeste sat the tray on my desk and pulled open my curtains.

“I guess.” I stumbled out of bed, making my way to the bathroom.

After flushing I went to the sink to wash my hands. It was habit to check my reflection. As I let the water run through my fingers I studied my face.

Flawlessly creamy skin.

Perfectly pert nose.

Red lips. And hazel eyes, the same as before.

Except…

I leaned in closer. My eyes were different.

Usually I had a yellow ring around the outer edge, but today the ring was a thick orange.

I dried my hands and stuck my face right up to the glass.

And that's when I remembered what'd happened in the wine cellar.

Greg and I had gone down there together.

Then I'd tried to kiss him. And he'd… he'd… what?

For your vanity, your cruelty, and your cold unfeeling heart, a curse I leave upon you… That was what he said.

Those odd words - his words played themselves over in my mind.

He'd called me vain, cruel, cold and unfeeling.

He said he cursed me and then he changed into something, like a ghost or mist.

The wine cellar had shaken and crashed in around me.

I'd been bleeding, hadn't I?" I studied my face, checked my arms and hands. Not a single scratch was visible anywhere.

"What an asshole," I whispered, trying to forget his words but they seemed to get louder. Whatever he'd changed into had vanished into thin air.

It was unexplainable.

A feat, until that moment I believed only happened in fairy tales.

I looked away, frustrated. Celeste had brought me in breakfast, including sliced watermelon, cantaloupe, and strawberries. She also topped it with -

I yanked the bathroom door open. "I want steak. Rare," I growled, scaring Celeste.

One hand went to her chest.

I'd spoken before thinking about them and felt a twinge of something. Almost like guilt but shook that aside.

I wasn't a big meat eater. But today meat was all I could think about. I was ravenous for it.

Celeste hesitated slightly, eyeing me and then the fruit and then me again. "Yes, Miss Beatrice."

She picked up the tray. "I'll let Mrs. Dotts know right away."

"That'll be fine." I left the bathroom and went into the closet, absently scanning my clothes as I tried to remember how I got from the wine cellar to my bedroom. There were swimsuits all over the floor, including the red one I wore yesterday.

I heard my door open and knew Celeste was about to leave but I had a question for her."Celeste, can you come in here a moment?"

There was a clattering of utensils as she set the tray down. "Yes?" She entered empty handed.

"Did you help me change?" The last I remembered I was being cut to pieces by wine bottles.

An enormous light fell on me, cracking my head open.

The feeling as the heavy light hit my head, and the way the glass cut my skin was still fresh in my mind. Yet again, I checked my appearance to verify there wasn't a wound.

"Yes, miss."

I caught her gaze in one of the many mirrors in my closet. Celeste was an older woman, probably in her late forties. She had mousy brown hair, a few wrinkles, and a firm worker's body under her uniform of gray skirt, white shirt, tights, and practical gray shoes.

At least her body wasn't soft like some of the other servants.

"How did I look?" It confused me to think about how I got from the wine cellar to my room. And the curse?

Why had Greg cursed me?

And what was the curse?

I forced myself not to think about the way I saw Greg change from a hot college guy to a dark mist.

“Tired. You appeared to be almost asleep where you stood.” She went over and picked up the swimming suits I’d tried on yesterday and began folding them.

“They’ve been on the floor, the suits need to be washed,” I snapped.

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.” She set them in the laundry basket.

“I was wearing a crown yesterday, remember?”

“Of course. It is very beautiful,” she said, wringing her hands.

“I know. Where did you put it?”

“Right here.” Celeste opened the cupboard above the drawers. The crown sat on the mannequin head.

She leaned in closer. I heard her suck in her breath.

“What is it?” I asked, ready for her to go and get me my freaking steak. My hunger grew stronger by the second. It was possible I might be able to eat two.

“The red jewel in the center? It’s gone.” Her voice had gone soft and her eyes flicked back and forth.

I peered closer. She was right.

“That diamond is worth millions, Celeste. You’d better find it.”

OceanofPDF.com

THE DIAMOND

"RIGHT AWAY, MISS." Celeste got on her hands and knees, searching under the drawers and all along the edges.

I casually glanced around the closet as well.

When Celeste finished, she stood, but kept her head bowed. "It isn't here."

"Was it on my head when I came upstairs?" I went over to my makeup desk and peered around the bottles and containers.

She seemed to think about it.

And that's when I knew. "You stole the diamond, didn't you?" I slapped her face. "You think you can steal from me and get away with it?"

"N - No, Miss Cavanaugh. I didn't take the diamond. I wouldn't do that."

I let out a roar. It felt good. Right. "You're lying!"

I reached out and twisted my fist into the collar of her white button down shirt, lifting her off the floor.

A part of my mind wanted to be shocked at my newfound strength, but my fury overpowered everything else.

"Tell me the truth or so help me - " I let the sentence die in my throat. So help me what? What would I do to her? Kill her?

Just that thought sent my mind into a whirlwind.

I didn't understand what was going on inside my head.

"Swear - No - Diamonds." Her words came out in gasps and her fingers dug at my fist.

I was choking her.

That was clear by the change from cream to purple on her face.

If she died it would serve her right.

Stealing wasn't something I accepted with any sort of leniency.

When I was fourteen one of my friends stole a necklace from me and claimed I'd given it to her. I made her suffer until her family finally moved out of state.

"Please." Tears lined Celeste's lashes and leaked down her cheeks.

One dripped on my arm.

I watched as it slowly crawled up my skin. Its perfectly round wetness sparkled in the light.

A figure appeared within the tear.

I peered closer and saw a hideous beast.

Forcing down a scream, I took a deep breath and dropped her.

"Fine."

She fell in a heap to the floor, taking giant gasps and coughing.

"But I'm going to call the police," I said, walking from the room.

IT DIDN'T TAKE LONG for the police to arrive. When I explained the situation, they placed Celeste under arrest and took her away in handcuffs.

She was sobbing, still claiming her innocence.

I knew better.

She'd always seemed overly polite and hard working.

No one could be that decent.

Mrs. Dotts and Isaac watched the situation unfold from the front porch.

Mrs. Dotts hugged Celeste.

"Good-bye." She wiped her face and glared at me.

"You have something to say?" I asked, returning Mrs. Dotts' sad gaze with daggers of my own.

"No, Miss Cavanaugh."

“I didn’t think so. Bring a rare steak to my room.”

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.” Her voice was laced with disappointment.

“Hurry up,” I snapped, climbing the steps and walking past her and Isaac into the house. “And make it two,” I added.

I trudged up the stairs to my room.

My cell phone vibrated as soon as I opened my bedroom door.

It had been placed upside down on my bedside table.

I picked it up. It was a voice message from my mom. I debated whether to listen or not, but after a few seconds decided I should.

“Hello, Beatrice. This is your mother.” Her voice sounded strange. Garbled. Scared. “We’ve gone away for the summer. Your dad and I need some time away from everything.” She paused and I knew the word everything was code for me.

They wanted to get away from me.

“I’m sure you’ll have a great time on your own. You’re all grown up now.” Mom sniffled and I wondered if she were crying, which was impossible.

I’d never seen my mom shed a single tear.

I didn’t remember her ever being sick either so it couldn’t be a cold.

She cleared her throat. “You may start to experience some changes.”

That part bothered me the most. Changes? What kinds of freaking changes?

“Seek out the Vaktare histories,” she continued.

Then my father spoke in the background, “You’ve said too much. Hang up.”

Mom sighed. “Take care, Beatrice.”

Then she was gone.

I flung myself onto my bed, smacking my head on something.

“Ouch.” Reaching back, I wrapped my fingers around the culprit and brought it up to eye level.

“Shit.” It was the large red diamond from my tiara.

I guess she didn’t steal it, I thought, a strange feeling washing over me.

I shook it off, pressing the Play button on my phone so I could listen to my mom’s message again.

How could they just leave?

Sure they’d never been the most loving of parents, but at least they normally said good-bye. And what was Vack Tare?

I closed my eyes, debating all my mom said while I waited for my food and my mind drifted.

A knock at my bedroom door startled me.

I sat up, realizing I must’ve fallen asleep.

For how long, I didn’t know.

“Go away,” I hollered even though it was probably Mrs. Dotts with my steak and I was starving.

There was another knock. “Sorry, miss. There’s a gentleman at the front door and he’s made it clear he won’t go away until he speaks to you.” It was Isaac. If he’d come up, then it must be serious.

“Oh, for hell’s sake.” My breathing came more heavily. “Okay. I’ll be down in a few minutes. Put him in the main room.”

“Yes, Miss Beatrice.”

I stood, considering what to do with the diamond.

A wholly unique emotion crept around my heart.

It was barely there, like it was tiptoeing, testing what my heart would do with such a thing.

I rejected it.

In my closet I got on my knees and pushed aside my pants.

Feeling for the button I knew was on the back wall, I pushed it.

A secret door opened, revealing a hidden safe.

Entering my code, I put the diamond inside.

Then I took off my clothes and went into the bathroom to shower.

When I was finished, I dressed in a pair of jean shorts, a butter yellow tank top and Prada wedge sandals.

I went to my bedroom door and pulled it open to call for Celeste to do my hair and makeup.

That's when I remembered she wasn't around anymore.

I'd sent her to jail. "Dammit!" I went into the bathroom and brushed my hair.

It was wet and tangled and I got the bristles caught in it.

When I finally got it untangled, I quickly braided my hair, securing the end with a tie.

Then I applied some makeup. My eye shadow was too dark, my blush too light and in all the wrong places, and my lip-gloss was the wrong color. "Gah!"

Whoever the jerk downstairs was, I would make him pay for insisting on speaking with me. Me. No one ordered anything from me.

Not from Beatrice Cavanaugh.

I stomped down the stairs and walked into the living room.

"Where is he?" I demanded of Isaac, searching the room.

My butler stood beside the fireplace and held out one gloved hand. "Good afternoon, Miss Beatrice. May I present mister Beck Haddox?"

From the high back chair directly in front of me stood a man.

He stepped around the chair and I couldn't help but admire him, drink him in like he was water and I was parched. He appeared to be more god than man.

He was tall with piercing light blue eyes and blond hair.

His body was fit, beyond fit.

He caught hold of my gaze.

I saw a slight tremor of his lips as he took in the color of my eyes.

But he recovered quickly and smiled, making his already glorious face come alive.

“Hello, Beatrice. May I speak with you?” He glanced at Isaac. “Privately?”

OceanofPDF.com

BECK AND CALL

"THAT'LL BE fiNE." I nodded to Isaac, letting him know it was okay.

"If you need me, I'll be right outside." Isaac exited and slid the pocket doors shut, leaving Beck and me alone.

I swallowed, forcing away another new feeling, like fireworks were going off in my stomach. The buzzing I'd experienced yesterday was back too.

It pounded against my head, like a raging herd of horses.

The throbbing pressed against the backs of my eyes.

My pulse raced and it was all I could do to walk past him and sit on the love seat across from him.

"What do you want?" I asked, trying to force away the pain by focusing on my surroundings.

The room was on the smaller side.

It was normally used to entertain two or three guests in a formal setting.

Beck stood in front of one of two gold high back chairs.

There was the love seat I sat on and to my right was a large stark white couch.

It was directly opposite the tall rock fireplace.

Above the fireplace ticked a large glass clock with onyx pieces.

Behind the couch were three floor-to-ceiling windows.

White curtains with gold and black polka dots hung at either side.

Potted plants and lamps decorated the corners, the end tables, and the coffee table between Beck and me.

A baby grand piano stood regally behind the love seat.

And two straight back gold and black chairs were placed in front of

it. A small table with a chess set sat between them.

My knees bobbed up and down, a reaction to the pain, I guessed.

It was like my body had a mind of its own. I put my hands on my knees to stop the movement, and noticed my fingers were trembling.

What the hell was happening to me?

I swallowed.

“You recently accused my mom of stealing - ” Beck’s piercing eyes swept over me. “A diamond.” His crossed his arms. “Is that correct?”

I couldn’t help but admire him.

While my body raged with an unknown storm, he was calm as a hot summer day.

If someone had accused my mother of stealing I would seek revenge.

Yet, all I saw in his eyes was compassion.

His blond hair was thick and wavy and a little on the long side. He sat up straight, showing off his broad shoulders and tapered waist.

He had loafers on his feet, but he wasn’t wearing socks.

His appearance seemed kind of prissy, yet everything about him screamed alpha male. He was older but no more than twenty-five.

“Celeste is your mom?” The words came out shaky.

“That’s right.” Beck leaned forward. “I’ve come to ask you to drop the charges. She didn’t do what you accused her of. She wouldn’t.”

That irritated me even though I knew the truth. “So you think I lied? That I blamed her out of spite?” How dare he?

Regardless of whether or not it was true.

The arrogant ass had no right.

“How about I have you arrested,” I began and stood.

The world started to spin. Probably because I hadn’t eaten in I didn’t know how long. Hunger caused my stomach to rumble.

My hands went out as I tried to balance myself. “For harassment,”

I continued as a thick darkness covered my vision.

I couldn't see anything except two white lights.

And then I hit the floor.

"Hey, Beatrice. Are you okay?" I felt arms come under my body and gently lift me.

The pain subsided slightly.

I wasn't sure why.

I blinked as my vision cleared. "Put me the eff down. How dare you put your dirty paws on me," I scoffed, adjusting my clothes.

"Sure. Sorry."

When I was on my feet, I pushed him away. "Don't ever touch me again."

I carefully sat and watched as Beck went over to his chair. "I'm sorry if I upset you." His eyes softened. "I'm not calling you a liar, Beatrice."

When my name left his lips, it sent a hot quiver down my spine.

I internally shook it off. He was the son of a servant.

I was royalty. The man was beneath me. I glared.

"My mom told me you strangled her." He flinched as though he felt her pain. "I've seen the bruises."

Another wave unfamiliar emotion - guilt, my mind said - racked through me.

It was true.

I had strangled her.

But it was her fault.

She'd obviously misplaced the diamond and tried to cover up her insolence.

No freaking way I'd tell him that.

Or that I'd found it.

The man didn't deserve any kind of generosity and neither did his mom.

So she hadn't stolen the diamond, I had no doubt she was dishonest.

I decided his kindness was actually arrogance and that would not be tolerated.

"For your vanity - "

The words entered my mind. I clenched my fists. I was not vain.

"Your cruelty, and your cold unfeeling heart - "

I wasn't cruel or cold.

Beck was the one who was cold and cruel.

He was the one who'd come to me, questioned me like a common criminal.

"A curse I leave upon you - "

I would curse Beck.

I would make him suffer.

The way I suffered.

A plan formed. I smiled.

"Call me Miss. Cavanaugh," I said and pretended not to notice his thoughtful grin.

"Very well, Miss Cavanaugh."

More fireworks went off in my stomach.

"I'll drop the charges. On one condition." I placed my hands on my hips, ignoring the pain in my head and focusing on the plan.

Beck's face lifted. Hope revealed itself on his handsome face.

I would use it against him. Hurt him, whatever it took.

"What is your condition?" he asked.

"You must agree to live here and take her place as my personal servant." That would be a sight. To watch this gorgeous man bend to my every whim.

Beck leaned back, surprised by my demand. “Why would you want that?”

I bit back a trembling smile.

It would be such fun to break him.

Anger piled on top of more anger.

But I wouldn’t let him know he was affecting me.

I put my hands behind my back. “My reasons are none of your concern. If you agree, I will have the charges against your mom dropped, and she can go free. But you must sign a contract agreeing to live here and be my servant until such time as I release you, and not a second before.”

Beck growled.

It was low and barely discernable.

But I heard it.

“I appreciate your offer, Miss Cavanaugh. I’d like to take a day to consider it and get my affairs in order.” His handsome features, while still gentle, became pinched. “If that’s what I decide.”

Affairs. I wanted to snort.

No one talked like that unless they were from the eighteen hundreds.

“Fine,” I said. “But if you agree, you’ll be here to do my hair and apply my makeup by - ” I glanced at the clock. “Eleven tomorrow morning. Once the contract is signed, I’ll make the call and have your mom released.” I crossed my arms, feeling proud of myself.

OceanofPDF.com

A DEAL

BECK CROSSED his arms as well. His delicious lips twitched.

I wondered if he was mocking me.

“Why would you want me to apply your makeup or do your hair? Those things - ” He let out another growl. “I don’t know what I’m doing. It’ll end horribly.”

I smiled for some reason, unable to help myself.

A peculiar new feeling crept along my spine, like a winding rose reaching for the light.

“That’s what your mom did and it’ll be one of your responsibilities too. I guess you’ll need to learn and fast," I said.

Beck raised an eyebrow. “You’re foolish,” he responded, so soft I speculated if he’d said it aloud or if I only thought he did.

“It’s the only way I’ll drop the charges. Take it or leave it.” I released his gaze and glanced out the window. “What’s it going to be, Beck?” I said his name with sarcasm.

“Fine.” He rose quickly and opened the pocket doors. “I’ll be back tomorrow morning.”

“See you then.” I felt a strange urge to giggle.

It went against everything I’d ever known about myself so I resisted, leaning back, closing my eyes.

The buzzing had subsided, but my pulse seemed to be going the same speed as that of a hummingbird.

My palms were sweating too, which never happened.

That was gross and so unbecoming of a Cavanaugh.

My mom especially would be horrified.

I wiped the wetness on my jeans, curious about my bizarre reaction to Beck.

He was arrogant.

Completely rude.

And I would crush him.

I would make him pay.

I would make him wish he'd never stepped foot inside my world.

Isaac walked in. "I've shown Mr. Haddox to the door. Is there anything you need?"

"Yes, there is." I sat up straight. "The small room in the basement needs to be readied as well as the bathroom. Stock it with things a man might require, but don't go overboard. Keep it simple. Beck will be staying with us for a while and those two rooms will be for his use."

Isaac crunched his unruly brows, perplexed. "If he is to be your guest, wouldn't you rather he stay in the large room across the hall from your bedroom?"

"He isn't going to be my guest. He's going to be my servant," I snapped, shooting him a glare for his insolence.

"Yes, miss." He pulled at the edges of his vest with both gloved hands, something he did when he was nervous or irritated. "Will there be anything else?"

"As a matter of fact, yes." I rose and walked past him. "Contact our lawyer and have her draw up a contract stating that Mr. Haddox will be required to stay in my service until such time as I release him. In return I will drop the charges against his mother."

"Very good."

"And I'm starving." The hunger was past the point I'd ever felt it before. And it felt differently too.

If a cow walked by, I might eat it where it stood.

"I still haven't had my breakfast. Mrs. Dotts was to prepare two steaks." I wanted to tell him to make it three, but that would look too bizarre. “That’ll be all,” I said, excusing him.

“Right away.”

I went up the marble staircase and down the hall toward my bedroom.

When I reached my door I paused, unable to stop myself from glancing at the door across from mine.

I hadn’t been inside that room for a long time. It could’ve been amazing. Instead, I knew it was dusty and unused.

I sighed, a small part of me wishing I’d put Beck in there.

“Oh well.” I walked into my room.

It was decorated in the same color scheme as the rest of the house.

Golden curtains hung from the windows.

My king-sized bed had a white duvet and lots of fluffy pillows in shades of gold, white, and black.

At the end of my bed was a shiny black chest. Inside was an extra blanket, nothing more.

My room had a fireplace, smaller than the one in the living room, with two white chairs with gold stripes arranged in front.

The fireplace was covered in smooth white rock that matched the walls. Over the mantle was a large picture a photographer had taken of me on my sixteenth birthday. It was the only picture in the room.

Against the opposite wall rested my desk. On it was my laptop, a pencil holder, a few books left over from school, and a notebook.

Next to that was the entrance to my walk-in closet, the best part about my room.

It was set up like an expensive little boutique.

One-of-a-kind dresses, expensive shirts, pants, jeans, skirts, and casual dresses overflowed along every rack.

The tiara I wore last night sat atop one of the shelves.

Seeing it without the center diamond filled me with rage.

I was angry. That emotion shocked me and I thought about Greg and what he'd said again.

Had he cursed me?

Two rows of floor-to-ceiling shoe racks covered the furthest wall in my closet. There were also drawers for sunglasses, scarves, gloves, underthings, and various other accessories.

I grabbed my phone and went into my closet, flinging myself into the chair in front of my makeup desk. It sat at the end of a large round seating area that I used to put on shoes and twirl in front of the full-length mirror.

All sorts of pretty things sat on my desk, including perfume bottles, lotion bottles, powder puffs, attractive tubes of gloss and lipstick and my favorite Bobbi Brown lip balm.

I opened the lid and rubbed some on my lips.

It immediately made me feel a little better.

"Nothing like a little makeup to lift a girl's spirits."

I jumped, staring at my phone.

The voice had come from there.

I picked it up, thinking maybe I'd accidentally dialed one of my friends.

The face staring back wasn't my own and it wasn't one of my friends' either.

It was the face of a girl I'd never seen before.

"Do I know you?" I asked, trying to regain my composure.

The girl winked.

I guessed she must be a girl from my school.

"Kind of," she said. "We've met twice. Once at your birthday party and then again recently, at your pool party."

I tried to remember all the people I'd talked to at the formal dinner my parents held for me before they left.

It'd been filled with my dad's work colleagues and my mom's bridge friends.

There had been several people I'd never seen before.

I knew for sure she hadn't been at the pool.

"I don't think so," I said. "What's your name again?" I glanced over my phone and into the mirror, unable to help the surprise at again seeing the odd new color of my eyes.

The girl sniffed as though offended I didn't remember her.

"My name is Fizban. I'm here to help you in any way I can, Beatrice. This next year is going to be remarkable." She chuckled. It was a kind laugh, like that of a child.

"I know for a fact we didn't meet yesterday." I propped the phone against the mirror so I could talk to her with my hands free.

Fizban made a tsk-tsk sound and shook her head back and forth. "You opened birthday gifts from your friends. You tossed your boyfriend's present into the pool." Her head tilted and she lifted a brow. "You tried to make out with Greg in the wine cellar."

I gasped. "How do you know that?"

The idea that Fizban been there and I hadn't seen her really freaked me out.

Taking the lid off my new Bobbi Brown beach perfume, I sprayed a little on each wrist and my neck, hoping the scent would calm my nerves.

"Well," she said, her nose twitching.

I wondered if she could smell the perfume, its fragrance the epitome of summer - a breezy day at the beach with a fruity drink in one hand as I lounged in the sun.

As I thought about taking a trip to St. Tropez, I caught my reflection and tilted my head to one side. Something else besides the color of my eyes had changed.

What was it?

Fizban interrupted my thoughts. “My appearance is slightly different now than it was yesterday.” She shifted positions and I caught a glimpse of her bright red hair.

It was the exact shade of her lips.

The color seemed tame compared to the blue of her eyes.

They weren’t like any blue I’d ever seen on a person. They were turquoise.

Like Greg’s, I thought.

“What did you look like yesterday?” I asked carefully as my pulse raced.

“I was a little taller, a little broader. My voice was deeper and my muscles were thicker.” She winked. “You knew me as Greg.”

My first thought when she said that was to hang up on her.

Obviously she was messing with me. Maybe one of my friends put her up to it.

Probably Eva.

That’s when I realized there was no way to end the call.

I picked up my phone, trying to figure out how to make her go away. I even pushed the button to turn off my phone. Nothing worked.

“You’re lying.” I finally said, setting the phone down like it’d burned me.

“Am I?” She touched a finger to her nose and suddenly I was staring at Greg’s face. “For your vanity, your cruelty, and your cold - ”

“No, stop,” I shouted, covering my ears. “It can’t be. It can’t be.”

The buzzing was back, louder than ever. I squeezed my eyes shut. “Go away.”

I questioned whether someone had slipped something into my drink yesterday and I was still tripping.

I wouldn’t put that past any of my friends.

Greg’s voice seemed to climb inside my head. "For your vanity, your cruelty and your cold, unfeeling heart, a curse I leave upon you -" he began.

Then the voice changed back to that of Fizban’s. "A year shall not pass before your true form will be revealed. You are Vaktare, daughter of royalty, born to deliver your people, created to save your species from the extinction they so rightly deserve.

Her voice went back to Greg's. " You, your father and your mother have been sentenced to die."

Fizban again. "Unless you can learn to give love unconditionally. Only then will your species have a chance."

OceanofPDF.com

SNAPPING HER NECK

THE NIGHT CALLED TO ME.

I raised my head and roared at the full moon, surprised at how free I felt.

How happy.

It was a sensation I'd never experienced.

Joy seemed to bubble along my veins and out each of my pores.

I ran through the thick trees, climbing higher into the mountains, stalking something.

The scent drove me onward.

When whatever I was tracking moved, my body instinctively compensated.

It stopped.

I did too, but only for a moment, and then crept forward at a slower pace.

My body was stealthy. I knew exactly where to step and how much pressure to use. My ears turned back and forth as I listened. I sniffed the air, allowing the breeze to caress my whiskers, almost tasting what I was after, seeing with my senses everything that was around me.

To the right was a small stream used by my prey to get water.

That's where what I tracked was heading.

My prey had no idea I hunted it.

The snap of a leaf straight ahead told me it was moving again.

I picked up speed, knowing I would catch it at the stream.

My heart raced with excitement.

The trees opened slightly.

A deer stood at the water's edge, her ears turning, listening for sounds of danger.

Finally she dipped her head and began lapping at the water.

My throat burned with need. I was starving. I dug my front paws into the earth, preparing to attack. Then I ran.

One. Two. Three. I leapt on the doe, my claws digging into her back, my teeth grabbing hold of her neck. I shook, snapping her neck until she was still.

When I knew she was dead, I let go, roaring in triumph.

Leaning over, I went for her stomach, but that's when I noticed my reflection in the water.

I was - I was a -

I jerked myself awake. "A monster." I'd fallen asleep at the makeup desk in my closet.

Lifting my head, I glanced in the mirror, and noticed whiskers.

"Impossible." I tightly shut my eyes.

Counted to five. Opened them. The whiskers were gone.

"Thank goodness."

A white china plate had been placed on the edge of the table. Two seasoned steaks sat in the middle. To the right of the plate was a steak knife and a fork, a white linen napkin underneath.

The meat smelled rotten. Not fresh like the deer in my dream. I poked at the meat slabs. They lay there, dead.

"Cold." Frustrated, I picked up the plate, determined to give Mrs. Dotts a piece of my mind.

Why hadn't she wakened me?

Juices the color of blood swirled along the edges of the meat. They made my mouth water. My stomach gurgled.

"Gross," I said, aloud.

But picked up the steak and took a large bite, tearing off a piece with my teeth.

I chewed a couple times, swallowed and took another.

My hunger increased as I ate.

I couldn't get it inside me fast enough.

As I shoved the final piece in my mouth I caught another peek of myself in the mirror.

And froze.

My teeth were long and pointy.

A piece of meat hung in my mouth. Some of the juices dribbled down my chin. One droplet hung and quivered and then fell onto my shirt.

I screamed, horrified and dropped the plate.

There was a laugh. It sounded like Fizban.

I couldn't stop to deliberate what it was though. I ran to the bathroom, barely making it to the toilet before I puked.

"Miss Beatrice. Is everything all right?" It was Isaac knocking on my door.

My body shook. I wiped my mouth and flushed. At the sink I turned on the water, closing my eyes to avoid the mirror, and rinsed my mouth.

"Miss." Isaac knocked again, harder.

I spit. Cleared my throat. "I'm fine, Isaac." I thought about the plate and the juices staining the thick white carpet in my closet. It should be cleaned up.

"Come in." I walked to the window, peering outside.

It was dark.

A glance at the clock told me it was after midnight.

I'd been asleep nearly twelve hours.

That was unnatural for me.

The moon shone three quarters full, a waxing gibbous, if memory served.

There were no clouds. Millions of stars twinkled brightly.

A satellite blinked across the sky, slowly making its way around the Earth. A shooting star shot across its path.

Most people believed in wishing on a shooting star. Not me. I didn't need wishes.

I always got what I wanted.

Except love, a voice inside my head whispered.

It sounded like Fizban again. Or Greg.

Their words filled my mind - male and female, they spoke in unison: "For your vanity, your cruelty and your cold, unfeeling heart, a curse I leave upon you. A year shall not pass before your true form will be revealed. You are Vaktare, daughter of royalty, born to deliver your people, created to save your species from the extinction they so rightly deserve. You, your father and your mother have been sentenced to die. Unless you can learn to give love unconditionally. Only then will your species have a chance."

Isaac had walked in and paused just inside. "What do you require?"

I heard Isaac speak, but his voice sounded so far away. The curse burned itself on my heart, my soul, and each and every fiber of my being.

"Miss Beatrice? Are you ill?" He came forward and touched my arm.

I flinched, turning away. With my back to him I answered, "I dropped my plate in the closet." I pointed in its direction, too afraid to go in there myself. I didn't want to catch a glimpse of my reflection, worried I might see the changes on my face.

"I'll take care of it." He left and I heard him pick up the plate.

Then he reappeared.

In one hand he held the plate and in his other was my cell phone.

"It seems you have several missed calls from your friends." He handed me my phone.

“Thank you.”

Isaac raised his eyebrows in shock.

His features contorted in surprise.

I figured that was how my face must seem as well.

Words like “thank you” weren’t part of my vocabulary.

I didn’t owe him my thanks.

My family paid him handsomely for his service.

That was all the thanks he required.

The words had just slipped out, probably because of my crazy dreams or whatever.

“I’ll have Nelle come in right away to clean the carpet,” he added.

I nodded. “Have Beck’s rooms been prepared?” I asked, quickly glossing over my comment.

“Yes, miss. And the contract has been faxed over as well. All is ready for Mr. Haddox’s return in the morning.”

“Good.” I said, sitting on the window seat, my body thirsting for the moon’s light like a fish needed water.

“Is there anything else you require?”

I stood. “Will you wake me at ten in the morning?”

“Of course.” He went to the door.

“Oh, and please -” Another freaking word I didn’t use. “Have Cook prepare me a rare steak for breakfast.”

Isaac scanned the empty plate.

I could almost hear him questioning my need for so much red meat. He didn’t ask though.

“Very well.” He left the room, closing my door.

“What is my problem?” If I were suffering from some kind of drug-induced dementia, it was lasting a long time.

For the first time in my life I was scared.

I felt like a little girl. And I was alone.

Ask Fizban. She said she'd help, my mind whispered.

"No!" I growled, flopping onto the cushioned window seat. The moonlight on my skin was like a salve. I'd never been a night person.

In many ways it'd always unsettled me. "What's happening?" I curled my small frame into the window seat, pulled on a blanket and closed my eyes.

OceanofPDF.com

RIDE IN YOUR FERRARI

MRS. DOTTS BUSTLED into my room carrying a tray and humming. “Good morning, Miss Beatrice. How did you sleep?” She busied herself, setting the tray on my desk.

“Fine,” I said, feeling slightly more like my old self today.

I yawned and stretched.

Mrs. Dotts walked over and picked up the blanket I’d used last night.

She folded it and placed it back on the window seat.

She then picked my clothes off the floor.

It was Nelle’s job to tidy my rooms, but Mrs. Dotts was one of those who saw a need and handled it.

I glanced down and realized that at some point while I slept I’d removed everything except my underthings.

“It’s ten o’clock. Mr. Haddox will be arriving shortly. You’d better come and eat.”

I glanced over at the tray. As I requested there was a steak, along with some orange juice and fresh fruit, which up until yesterday had been all I ate for breakfast.

Determined to get my life back, I picked up a strawberry and popped it in my mouth, excited for its sweetness.

I could barely taste it. I tried another.

If anything I tasted the second one less.

I took a sip of orange juice.

In the past I’d treasured the flavors of the juice and the strawberries mixed together. Just like the strawberries, the juice was completely bland.

I cut into a piece of steak. It was rare, way too rare for my previous tastes, but I put it in my mouth anyway, practically drooling.

It was delicious. Ignoring the fruit, I quickly took another bite.

“Chew it well. You don’t want to make yourself sick.” Mrs. Dotts spoke as she went into my bathroom.

I took another bite and tried to chew more slowly.

The shower in the bathroom turned on. Mrs. Dotts returned with my clothes and towels in her hands. “Your shower is ready.” She gave me a once-over before her eyes found mine. “Will you need me to help you with your hair?” Her eyes kept a steady gaze on my face and not my almost naked body.

Now, she was doing Celeste’s job.

My hair was long and could be unruly.

I had a hard time dealing with all of it.

Celeste had been a master. Now she was gone.

“Yes, p - ” I paused, changing my mind, remembering I’d told Beck he would do it. “Beck will do my hair when he arrives.”

I watched her work to keep a smile off her face. “As you wish.”

“Th - pl - ” I let out a strange growl. “Send Beck up to my room when he arrives.”

“Yes, miss.” She left, taking the tray and my clothes and somehow managing to close the door behind her.

I went into the bathroom, took off my underclothes and got in the shower.

When I finished, I got out and spent extra time brushing, flossing, and sterilizing my teeth, tongue, and mouth.

I left the towel on my hair and went into the closet.

My phone rang and I dashed out. “Hello.”

“Where the hell have you been? I’ve been calling you and calling you. I’ve left tons of texts. Why haven’t you returned any of them? I mean you just left your party and we haven't seen you since."

It was Ashley. The girl knew how to have a one-way conversation.

"Bea? Are you there? Bea? Bea?"

"I answered the phone didn't I?" I put my phone on speaker and went back into my closet.

I needed something totally hot, yet casual, so Beck wouldn't think I was trying to impress him.

"Okay so talk. Tell me what's going on? Eva said you slept with that guy she liked. Greg. She's pissed because she saw you walk down to the wine cellar with him. After that she couldn't find him and he never came back. She thinks you have him stashed in your room." Ashley sounded pouty.

She constantly worried that I was mad at her. It drove me insane. Her personality made me mad at her.

I contemplated what to tell Ashley.

Obviously as soon as we hung up she would call Eva and tell her what I said.

Should I make Eva mad?

Should I lie and say Greg and I did hook up, even though it didn't happen? It depended on what I wanted.

"Beatrice!"

"What?" I pulled on matching underthings.

"Are you sad because your mom and dad left? That's impossible. I'd be beyond glad if my parents, especially my mom, would leave me the hell alone. Today she told me -"

I spaced out. Ashley's stories could last a while.

I found a Free People slip dress with the tags still on.

It was a bright blue and reminded me of Beck's eyes. I removed the tags and slid the dress over my head.

I had the perfect shoes to go with it, my Sam Edelman sandals.

They went all the way up to my knees, zipped in the back and were black.

“ - I mean isn’t that the stupidest thing you’ve ever heard?”

“Yeah,” I agreed. “I can’t believe it.”

“I know. I mean if she’s going to go to Lake Powell with some random dude, the least she can do is find out if his parents are rich.”

“Your mom?” I asked, confused.

“No. Cassidy. Have you heard a word I’ve said?”

I opened my accessories drawer and slid a set of Natasha Couture bangles on my wrist.

“Yes, of course.”

She exhaled dramatically. “When are you taking me for a drive in your Ferrari?”

I shrugged, sitting in my makeup chair and flipping the mirror up so I wouldn’t catch my reflection. “Soon. I’ll call you.”

“Yeah, sounds good.”

There was a knock at my door.

“Beck.” His name left my lips before I could stop myself.

“Who’s Beck?” Ashley asked.

“I’ll tell you later. Gotta go. Bye.” I hung up and ran over to my window seat, grabbed a magazine and pretended to be reading. “You may enter.”

I internally snorted at my words. I sounded like an idiot.

Isaac walked in.

Beck trailed behind him.

I noticed he was slightly taller than Isaac and broader.

Today he wore a pair of tan chinos and a crisp white shirt.

His hair curled at the ends, touching his collar. The sunlight struck his locks and it shone, golden.

And his eyes? They were the brightest blue, like the sky on a clear winter's day.

Not for long, I thought, irritated.

"Beck Haddox is here, miss." Isaac carried papers in one hand.

"Is that the contract?" I asked, closing the magazine and setting it on the seat.

"Yes, miss. Would you like me to place them on your desk?"

I could have said yes. Let Beck sign them right away. But that would be too nice, too easy.

He needed to suffer.

The buzzing came back at those thoughts.

I growled within, forcing it to stop.

"Take the contract to the office. Beck must first prove to me that he can do my hair and makeup. If he can't, it won't do to have him as my personal servant, now would it?" I allowed the sneer to show on my face.

OceanofPDF.com

HE WAS TENDER

"VERY WELL, MISS BEATRICE."

I could tell Isaac was unhappy with the decision.

That hadn't been part of the deal.

But I was a Cavanaugh.

I would do whatever the hell I wanted.

Isaac closed the door, leaving Beck and me alone.

He faced me.

I couldn't read his expression.

My stomach was letting off fireworks again.

In the bright sunlight his blond hair, blue eyes, and completely drool-worthy body seemed more perfect than yesterday.

"Come on." I walked into my closet and sat at my makeup desk.

He followed.

The mirror was still flipped up so it was horizontal.

I didn't move it. "Use this to brush my hair out and be careful."

"Yes, Miss Cavanaugh." He took the brush from my outstretched hand.

One of his fingers touched mine. A tingle shot up my arm.

I ignored it. I did not tingle.

"Do you mind if I remove the towel from your head?" Beck's voice seemed to flash through my body like lightning.

I crossed my legs and cleared my throat. "No, I don't mind. Go ahead."

He carefully unwound the towel, letting my hair fall down my back.

“Just put the towel in the hamper over there.”

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.” He tossed it from where he stood behind me.

The towel landed in the hamper. If they had been a basketball and a hoop, there would’ve been a swoosh.

I didn’t have time to be impressed because he took some of my wet hair in one hand and began brushing. He was tender, even more tender than his mother had been.

Once he’d finished with the ends he worked his way up.

We didn’t speak.

I had nothing to say and Beck seemed too intent on his work.

I closed my eyes, allowing myself to enjoy the sensation.

When my hair was completely tangle free I heard him set down the brush.

I opened my eyes, preparing to say something, but Beck began running his fingers over my scalp, massaging it.

My body responded immediately to his touch. Every nerve ending from the top of my head to the tips of my toes came alive.

My skin prickled and I shivered.

“Are you cold?” Beck asked.

“A little.”

He reached behind him and pulled a shawl from one of my shelves, then wrapped it around my shoulders.

“Thank you,” I said, taking the edges and pulling them close.

“You’re welcome, Miss Cavanaugh.” He began massaging my head again.

“What are you doing?” I asked, trying to shake off the feelings.

“I’m sorry, Miss Cavanaugh. I learned that a scalp massage stimulates the hair follicles. Did you want me to continue?”

“Fine.” I pulled the shawl more tightly around my body.

After several minutes, he ran his fingers through my hair.

“Now what?” I asked, irritated that my body had never been so relaxed.

“I’m going to braid your hair. The video I watched instructed I separate your hair into three pieces.”

“Oh. Well hurry up. I haven’t got all day,” I barked between gritted teeth.

“Right away.”

I didn’t respond.

Instead I closed my eyes again, unable to stop myself from reveling in the wonderful sensations.

If braiding was all he knew, I wouldn’t mind.

He could do this every day for the rest of my life. I sighed contentedly.

He must’ve taken the sound to be impatience. I felt his fingers move more quickly.

“There. I’m finished. Would you like to see it?” Beck asked.

“No.” I kept the bite in my voice, too afraid to see my reflection. “Get started on my makeup.”

He turned me in my chair. I realized I was very low and he was tall. My chair could raise and lower with the press of a lever, but I didn’t say anything. I wanted to see what he would do.

“Hang on.” He went over to my makeup and began going through my things.

For such a large man he was very agile.

He didn’t bump the bottles into each other.

It was almost sensual watching him touch my perfumes, handle my eye shadow, pick up my liner pencils and makeup brushes.

His eyes caught hold of my lip balm and he smiled. That snapped me out of my daydream.

Beck was supposed to be suffering.

“Get your grubby hands off my things!”

“Sorry, Miss Cavanaugh.”

“And stop smiling for goodness sake. This is serious business.” He stood straight, putting his hands to his sides, making his face stoic.

I huffed. “Better.” I pulled my makeup bag over and opened it. “What do you need?”

He didn’t meet my eyes when he spoke. “I need a light foundation with SPF in it, if you have it. Your skin is already flawless without it but a little would be nice.”

I felt my cheeks warm at his compliment.

“Some powder. Your makeup brushes. A pink shade of blush. Some brown eyeliner and some eye shadow in shades of brown and pink. Mascara in brown, if you have it. And then, if you don’t mind, I’ll apply lip balm to your lips.”

So that’s why he smiled.

The lip balm was something he recognized.

I took out the things he’d asked for and set them on the desk.

“There. Anything else?”

“No, Miss Cavanaugh, that should do it.”

“Great.” I closed my eyes. “You may begin.”

My chair began to rise and I was glad my eyes were closed. I felt his body come close to me. His breath caressed my cheek. It was warm and smelled like mouthwash. The effect was disconcerting.

“Don’t breathe on me,” I hissed, though there wasn't much authority behind it.

“Sorry.” He put some of the foundation on first, using only his third and fourth fingers.

He was extra tender. And I had a strong desire to lean into his hand.

With the powder, he brushed it over my face in an upward and outward motion. On my cheeks, he ran the blush brush in exactly the right spot.

“I’m going to line your left eye first.”

“Good.”

He lined my lids and then did the shadow. I heard him pull the mascara wand from the tube. He touched it to my upper lashes and brushed it on several times. Repeating the same process on the other side.

“Now for the balm and then you’re finished.”

For some reason the idea of him touching my lips made me nervous. “I’ll do the lip balm, thank you very much.” I opened my eyes and came face to face with Beck. He must’ve been holding his breath because I didn’t realize how close he was.

“Oh,” I said, breathing in, catching hold of the scent of his body, like cedar wood and something sweet yet earthy - pineapple.

“Would you like to see how I did?” He kept his features composed.

“Damn right I do.” I had to. So I took a deep breath and held it.

Beck turned me toward the mirror and pushed it so I could see myself.

I was too high though. Beck realized this and pressed the lever to lower my chair.

I kept my eyes forward, slowly watching my reflection come into view.

First impression was. Dayum!

My face glowed with freshness. The makeup wasn’t overly done. I pulled my braid over my shoulder. Each of the three sections was exactly the same.

“How did I do?” Beck asked. I bent down so that I could see his reflection in the glass as well.

I let out my breath. “You did a - ” the word awesome almost left my lips, but I clamped a hand over my mouth. “Acceptable.” I shrugged, pressing some lip balm against my lips. “I guess.” I stood. “Let’s go sign that contract.”

“And then you’ll free my mother?”

“Yes. I said I would.” I kept my features blank.

Inside I was glad he’d done so well.

Glad! And happy!

I remembered the bird singing while I lay out next to the pool.

It’d been only two days ago, but it felt like a lifetime.

I’d wanted to know what it felt like to be happy enough to sing.

And suddenly I knew.

Knew the feeling soaring through my chest was happiness.

But it couldn’t be. That wasn't how I was built.

Yet, that was what I felt.

Clearing my throat, I walked past him. I sure as hell wouldn’t let Beck see it.

OceanofPDF.com

LOOPY LETTERS AND CHICKEN SCRATCH

THE CONTRACT LAY on the black desk in my father's office. Beck sat in a modern sleek chair across from me. A foot rested on his opposite knee.

My father's office was designed in the same color scheme as the rest of the house, but that was the only similarity. Where the rest of the house was decorated in a classic traditional in style, his office was sleek and modern. It smelled like sterilizer and metal. Chrome shelves lined the top half of the wall behind me and behind Beck. Books lined the shelves. To the right was a window. The black curtains with white stripes were pulled open. The view outside the window showed our tennis courts. An urge to play bubbled up inside and I thought about demanding Beck play with me.

Maybe tomorrow. Right now I needed to make a phone call.

I picked up the phone and dialed the police station. I'd brought my cell phone downstairs and noticed Eva and Cassidy had left messages.

Eva sent me a text: You didn't screw Greg did you?

I wanted to roar with frustration. No! I texted back.

Well then what were you and him doing in the wine cellar? And where is he?

So dramatic. I didn't answer.

Another text from Eva: ???

Getting wine. Duh. And I don't know where he is. I couldn't tell her that he was somehow in my phone and that he/she/it might be a ghost.

I turned off my cell. Then placed the office phone on speaker so Beck could hear.

"Salt Lake County police station," a voice said.

I sat up. “Who do I need to speak to if I want to drop the charges against someone who was arrested?” My eyes roamed over the signed contract. Beck’s signature was in black. It was a series of loopy letters and chicken scratch. I could read the A, the H, and the X. Everything else was scribbles.

“Let me transfer you.”

I was put on hold for several minutes. While we waited, I glanced out the window. A bird was perched on the tennis net. I had the sudden urge to chase it.

“This is Officer Mack. How can I help you?”

I took a deep breath. “I’d like to drop the charges against Celeste Haddox.”

“Her last name is Simmons,” Beck said, leaning forward.

“I mean Celeste Simmons. I had her arrested yesterday, but have changed my mind.”

“I see. And your name?” His voice was laced with sarcasm.

I huffed. “I’m Beatrice Cavanaugh, Officer Mack. Just in case you didn’t know, my family donates tens of thousands of dollars to the police department’s annual charity events.”

The officer coughed. “And you want Celeste Simmons to be released?”

“Yes, I do. Right away.” I glanced at Beck. His face was still stoic.

“Very well, Miss Cavanaugh. She’ll be released immediately.”

“Thank you.” I hung up.

“I appreciate you doing that,” Beck said. Tension seemed to leave his shoulders and he rolled them back. “I’ve been so worried about her.”

“It’s done and now it’s time to go to work. You may want to take notes.”

“Right.” He sat back in his chair and took out a small notebook and clicked a pen.

I was impressed, but didn't let it show. "Every morning you will do my hair and makeup. Sometimes, if I go to an event, it may need to be done more than once in the same day. You'll need to drop off and pick up my dry cleaning. Drucinda is in charge of the laundry and Nelle is in charge of cleaning my rooms, but it will be your job to make sure it's been done." I paused and watched him write. "You can use any of the cars in the garages, except my yellow LaFerrari. That is off limits, no matter what."

He nodded.

I opened the drawer, pulled out a black American Express card and slid it over to him. "Use that for purchases, for gas, and to pick up anything I ask for." He picked it up and turned it back and forth. "Don't even think about using it for anything personal. Understand?"

"Yes, Miss Cavanaugh."

I stood and walked out of the office. He followed. "I'll show you to your rooms."

We went down the hall, through the large industrial kitchen. Everything was slate or stainless steel. There were no colors but gray, except in the windowsill where we allowed Mrs. Dotts to grow fresh herbs. Mrs. Dotts was cutting up cucumbers. She was still humming. "Lunch will be ready in fifteen minutes. It's your favorite. Cucumber sandwiches."

"As long as it's accompanied by a steak, cooked rare - very rare - that'll be fine."

Mrs. Dotts frowned, wiping her hands on her apron and opening the refrigerator to retrieve a steak. "Very well."

"Beck Haddox, this is Mrs. Dotts. She's in charge of the kitchen. If you're allergic to anything, or have special dietary needs, Mrs. Dotts is the person to talk to."

"Hello, dear." She smiled at Beck as she unwrapped the package of meat.

Beck didn't smile, but nodded his hello.

“Would you like a steak as well, Beck?” Mrs. Dotts asked, eyeing the two T-bones on the butcher’s paper.

My mouth watered. “Beck will be massaging my feet while I eat. After that he’ll need to put away whatever stuff he brought. He can eat with the staff later.”

Mrs. Dotts’ smile fell. “Very good, Miss Cavanaugh.”

We went through the kitchen. “The garage is here.” I opened the door leading to the garage. My yellow LaFerrari was parked on the far end. I glanced up at Beck. “See that yellow car?”

“Of course.” Beck crossed his arms.

“That’s my LaFerrari and it’s off limits. Don’t even touch it.”

“I understand.” There was a catch in his voice, like he wanted to say something else. He didn’t.

“The rest of the cars are available for driving.” I watched his eyes check out each one. There were seven visible on this level and more underneath. Up top were my LaFerrari, a white Jaguar F-type R coupé, a silver Mercedes S65 AMG, a bing cherry red Lamborghini Veneno Roadster that resembled a modern version of the Bat Mobile, a cashmere colored Lexus LX, a green Range Rover Autobiography, and a black Lykan Hypersport. I overheard my father say he’d paid more than three million dollars for that last one and there were only seven made. He’d probably flip if he knew some random guy was driving it, but what did I care? He and my mom had left me for the entire summer without saying good-bye.

“Even that one,” Beck asked, pointing at the Lykan.

“Sure. Just get the keys from there.” I pointed at a key box on the wall. “Make sure the keys are put back immediately when you return. And never let any of the gas tanks get below half full.”

His eyes shone with unshed tears. Guys and cars - I didn’t understand it. Because the prospect of driving the Lykan seemed to make him so happy, I was tempted to tell him I changed my mind, just to hurt him. At the last second, I held my tongue.

We left the garage and made our way down into the basement. The stairs were wide and not very steep but they turned several times as we descended. The air grew cooler the deeper we went.

At the bottom of the stairs I pointed to the bathroom. “This is yours to use. Keep it clean.”

He nodded.

I opened the door to the bedroom. Isaac had done a nice job. The blankets and sheets were navy blue and white. There was a lamp on the nightstand, a computer on the small desk under the window over which was obscured by Navy curtains. That was probably for the best, since it was doubtful there was anything to see aside from the empty window well. A decent chair had been pushed under the desk. Next to the computer was a cell phone with a piece of paper under it. I picked up the paper. It listed the phone’s number. I quickly typed it into my cell. “So I can text or call at any time.”

He took the phone and flipped it over.

“This is my room?”

“Yes. It is.” I ran my fingers along the bedspread.

“Thank you.” He sat on the bed, bouncing.

“I get up at ten in the morning. I expect you to be done with all of your personal - stuff, and have my breakfast up to me by then so you can begin working on my hair.”

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.”

“Any questions?”

“No.”

“Good. Let’s go upstairs. I’m famished and my feet need to be rubbed. After that you can drive me into Salt Lake. I need some retail therapy.”

OceanofPDF.com

AGONY INSIDE OF ME

BECK DROVE THE LYKAN. Usually I rode in the back of a limousine, but I'd wanted to see how he handled the car. Our outing wasn't a date. He was my driver.

He knew how to drive and maneuvered the Lykan through traffic expertly. More than once I caught him watching me out of the corner of his eye. I pretended not to notice.

When we arrived at City Creek Center, I had him drop me off at the entrance. "Park the car and make sure nothing happens to it. Then text me. I'll let you know when I need your help carrying my bags."

He quickly jumped out of the car and ran around to open my door. "Very good, Miss Cavanaugh."

I didn't turn around or respond, but heard him pull away from the curb. .

As soon as I stepped inside the air-conditioned mall the aroma of cinnamon and roasted almonds filled my nose. Usually I picked up a bag. They were my favorite treat. But above the roasted cinnamon smell was that of grilled steak. And something else. It was a new smell. As I walked by people I realized the smell changed slightly with each person and that somehow I was smelling their individual scents. It was weird and it made my head hurt.

I stopped in Victoria's Secret to purchase some underthings. The scent subsided slightly because of the strong smell of the store's perfumes. It wasn't long though before I could still pick up the scent of the people again. Some actually did smell fresh while others smelled of more fat, and there were those who smelled lean and meaty, and delicious. My mouth watered and I started to freak out.

What was freaking happening to me?

I purchased a couple of different matching bras and underwear and quickly left the store. My head had started to buzz and I wondered if maybe I should see a doctor.

I took my phone from my bag and texted Beck.

On the second floor near Victoria's Secret. Please come. I realized after I'd sent the text that I'd used the word please. What the hell? But I couldn't take it back. I moved over, out of the way of those passing by and tried to hold my breath so I wouldn't smell anything - anyone. The escalator was nearby. I leaned against the balcony, checking out the people below. City Creek was busy. People bustled along doing their shopping.

I'd seen the movie Madagascar when I was little and there'd been a scene where the lion saw all the other animals as steak. I was having a similar moment. The people kept changing into different cuts of meat according to their scent. What was worse, the freaking buzzing inside my brain began to intensify. It grew louder and louder. I wanted to scream in pain, but a Cavanaugh didn't make a spectacle of herself. So I held on, wishing Beck would hurry. Out of the corner of my eye I saw his tall frame maneuvering through the crowd with ease, the same way he'd driven the Lykan.

Beck. I tried to call out, to let him know where I was. I reached out a hand, hoping I could get his attention. At that moment the buzzing exploded into a flash of white light. It was as though a dam broke behind my eyelids.

I felt pain. So much pain.

And then I was falling. Several people screamed. I prepared myself to hit the ground, thinking that at least when I died the pain in my head would stop.

But the ground never came. Instead large arms encircled me. "What happened?" It was Beck's voice. At least I thought so.

The buzzing subsided, but now there was something worse. It was even more painful than the buzzing and it seemed to attack my head and my heart at once.

Emotions. Thousands upon thousands of them. They came hard and fast, like a baseball in the stomach, over and over again.

Tears filled my eyes. I'd never cried. A Cavanaugh doesn't cry, I heard my father say. But I couldn't stop them.

The pain racked my body.

"Beatrice." Beck's voice sounded urgent.

I opened my eyes, ashamed that tears were running uncontrolled down my face.

Beck sucked in his breath.

"It hurts so bad," I whimpered, turning my body toward his, willing him to take away the pain. There was something hard under his shirt, against his chest. If I hadn't been hurting so much, I would've asked him about it.

He pulled me closer, wrapping me in his arms. I heard whispers around us. People saying things. Beck pushed through them, walking rapidly. I sensed the change in temperature when he stepped outside.

"Hang on," he whispered.

Even through the pain I couldn't help but note he wasn't out of breath. It was true I weighed less than most but I was still over a hundred pounds. That was a lot of weight for anyone to carry for long distances.

"I'm going to set you down."

I let out a moan. Standing seemed like too much effort. I was drowning in emotion. I'd heard when a person died they saw their life flash before them. In my case, I did see my life, but worse, I felt it too. All of the emotions I should've experienced when they happened. There was agony when I broke my arm, pain when I fell out of the tree house and cut my forehead open. Worse than that was the guilt, the shame, and the remorse. More often than I'd been hurt I realized how much I'd hurt other people. And I felt their pain.

“No,” I cried. “Please. No.” The words ripped from my throat. I deserved to be alone, but I didn’t want him to let me go. I thought I might die without Beck’s touch.

“Hang on, Beatrice.” Beck adjusted me in his arms and got the car door open. “I can’t get you home if I don’t drive. I’ve got to put you in the car.”

“No. Please.”

“I’m going to buckle you next to me. You can rest your head in my lap.”

That meant whole seconds without his touch.

“Otherwise I’ll need to call an ambulance. Would you rather I do that?”

“No.” It was the only word I could get out.

He grunted and slid me into the seat and then buckled me in. Then he got in on the driver’s side and the Lykan roared to life. “I’ll hurry.”

I tried to lay my head in his lap but the gearshift was in the way. Another whimper escaped my lips. Shame washed over me, burying all the other emotions momentarily. But like the ocean waves, they came back, crashing through my body, stronger than ever. I felt like I was going to be sick. My head rolled to the side.

“Don’t puke in this car, Beatrice.” His voice was strong, not hard, but forceful. He took my small hand in his large one. My emotions abated slightly.

I covered my mouth with my hand. My face was wet. I realized I was still crying.

After a while the car stopped. Beck let go of my hand. As soon as the pressure of his touch was gone, the emotions came back, fiercer than ever. It was as though each one fought the others to be the strongest. They continued to build and build.

“Beck?” I wanted him to hold my hand. For some reason all of this was easier to deal with when he did. But he didn’t come. Had he just left me in the car?

Feelings of abandonment hurled against my heart. I cried out, the ache was so strong. My fingers found the door handle and I opened it. My knees hit the ground and then the rest of me. The concrete was cool against my hot skin. It helped with the nausea.

But it didn't help abate the memories and the feelings I should've had for the past eighteen years. They kept going and going, like a TV show. Except instead of sound there were feelings. So many of them that I wanted to die if that would make the pain go away.

A distinct voice made its way inside my head. If she lives through the pain caused by the curse, there may be hope for her yet. It sounded like Fizban.

If she dies, all hope for the Vaktare dies with her. That was Greg or Fizban as Greg. It gave me a little satisfaction to realize she was talking to herself. Maybe she was crazier than me. Or maybe I was so off my rocker I just believed I was hearing two people that were actually one who didn't exist at all.

If that's what it takes, Fizban said, her voice hard, interrupting my mental ramblings. I wanted to sink my fangs into her wretched neck. Even as I had the thought I wondered where it came from. I didn't have fangs. Did I?

But one thing was becoming clear. The curse, pretend or not, had wakened emotions I'd never felt before.

"She's in -"

"Where the hell is she, boy?" That was Isaac. He sounded afraid.

"Help. Please." I called out softly.

Two sets of feet padded closer. I blinked my eyes open. Isaac squatted down. Beck lifted me into his arms from his standing position. Obviously the guy was strong.

"Take her upstairs."

"Something seems to be seriously wrong with her. Shouldn't we take her to the hospital? Let the doctors help her?" As Beck spoke he pressed my body closer to his chest.

"No, Beck. I think you know human doctors can't help her now." Isaac said those words, but I must've heard him wrong. Why couldn't they help? If I were going crazy, a special crazy person doctor might be exactly what I needed. Maybe a white jacket, some strong medication. Anything to take away this pain.

"It hurts," I sobbed.

"Fine. I'll carry her upstairs."

"I'll make her some tea." That was Mrs. Dotts. Tea was my favorite drink, but even that didn't sound good. A nice T-bone. That might be better. But as I thought about eating the nausea came back. I leaned into Beck's chest and puked.

OceanofPDF.com

SO COMPLETELY EVIL

EVERY TIME I opened my eyes, Beck was there. Several times he was shirtless. And whoa, he should always be shirtless. It was a crime for him to wear a shirt. His torso was too beautiful to be covered up. It was like hiding a Monet painting.

I think I actually told him as much once while fading in and out of consciousness. His mouth twitched. I wanted to tell him it was okay to smile, but I couldn't find the words in between all of the emotions filleting my insides.

Whenever Beck held my hand, the pain subsided. His touch was icy relief to my furnace of pain.

Isaac and Mrs. Dotts took turns sitting with me as well, but their touch did nothing, though I did find it comforting to see that they cared even after all the years I'd treated them horribly.

After what seemed like forever, the pain slowly began to shift from all-consuming to a crackling and tearing around just my heart. In certain ways having the pain localized hurt worse.

Some of the worst agony was the most recent. Watching what I'd tried to do with Greg in order to hurt Eva. The way I'd treated Will. How could I have thrown his birthday present into the pool? It was so rude, so completely evil. As I watched my memories, experienced the emotions that should've gone along with them, I wondered what my friends and Will gained by continually spending time in my presence. I'd been awful.

"It hurts," I whispered.

"I'm sorry," Beck said, lifting his head. His hair was tousled and his lids were heavy.

He must've fallen asleep while sitting in the chair next to my bed.

His hand covered mine. The pain immediately subsided.

“Thank you,” I said, hoping he could see the sincerity in my expression.

He nodded, wincing.

“Are you uncomfortable? You can lie down on the bed -” His eyebrows lifted. “If you want,” I continued, totally humiliated.

Beck climbed on the bed and lay down beside me. He was so close his breath tickled my cheek.

“Is that better?”

“Much,” he said and was about to smile but stopped short.

“Smile whenever you like,” I said, forcing myself to breathe. Even that hurt.

“How are you feeling?” Beck asked, brushing some hair off my face. His finger was like a soothing balm for every place he touched.

“Well that’s just it,” I began. “I’m feeling. Everything. All at once.” Tears sprang to my eyes. “It’s hurts so freaking bad, Beck.”

Beck’s eyes softened. “That must be difficult.”

I nodded, brushing at a wayward tear. “I’ve cried more in the past - How long have I been like this?”

Beck checked his watch. “Nearly twenty-four hours.”

“That’s all?” I searched his face. “It feels like ages.”

“What’s going on?” Beck asked.

I shook my head. “I honestly don’t know.” How could I explain that some guy who could transform into a girl with red hair had cursed me?

He smirked. “I can tell you have a lot to say.” He turned so he more fully faced me. “I’ve signed a contract that states I’m required to be your servant until you let me go.”

Guilt swallowed me.

I closed my eyes at the hurt.

His mom hadn't stolen the diamond.

He didn't deserve to be here. "I know. I'm sorry."

Tears rolled down my cheeks. "That's - "

Beck touched my face.

I opened my eyes. "It's okay. I want to help. So tell me what's going on."

I smiled, a newfound joy spreading over every inch of my face.

The act of smiling so big actually hurt. I reached up and touched one of my cheeks, marveling at the difference between a real and pretend smile.

"You wouldn't believe me if I told you." I searched his face for any indication he would run if I told him.

But I realized I wanted to tell someone.

Say the words out loud.

If I did maybe it would help me make sense of my situation.

And if Beck did leave, I would be okay with that. It was the least of what I deserved.

"Try me." Beck took my other hand.

The emotional trauma raging in my body all but stopped.

I sighed with relief. And then told him everything - well, except that I'd tried to put the moves on Greg.

All but that.

When I finished he sat up, crossing his legs.

"So, let me get this straight. Some guy who can also turn into a girl cursed you?"

"That's right."

"What did he say, exactly?" Beck asked, his eyes searching my face.

I closed my eyes. It helped me see the words. "He said, 'For your vanity, your cruelty and your cold, unfeeling heart, a curse I leave upon you."

"That's omnious," Beck said.

"There's more," I added, but didn't open my eyes.

"Sorry. Continue."

I couldn't help a small smile that pushed up my lips. "A year shall not pass before your true form will be revealed. You are Vaktare, daughter of royalty, born to deliver your people, created to save your species from the extinction they so rightly deserve. You, your father and your mother have been sentenced to die. Unless you can learn to give love unconditionally. Only then will your species have a chance.'" I opened my eyes and focused on his gorgeous blue ones.

"You are Vaktare. What is that?" He asked the question but he didn't seem surprised. His minty breath caressed my cheek.

I forced myself not to shiver. "I don't know. I've never heard the word before." I gauged his reaction. "Do you know?"

Beck stood, letting go of my hands. The pain came back in full force, making my heart ache.

"Do you mind if I use your computer?" he asked.

"No," I whispered, curious about what he was doing, but in too much pain to ask.

He suddenly seemed to notice my pain. "Oh, hey." He slid his hands into mine and pulled me off my bed. "Let's research the word Vaktare." He released one hand and sat at my desk. While he pulled up the Internet, he asked, "And up until now you haven't had any feelings, like no pain, nothing?"

"That's right." I moved to stand behind him.

Beck typed v-a-c-k-t-a-r-e and hit Enter. There were definitions and explanations in a different language. Clicking on Translate, it appeared the word, though spelled v-a-k-t-a-r-e meant security guard in Swedish. "So he cursed you to become a Swedish security guard?"

I laughed out loud. A real laugh. My body seemed to come to life at the sound and the pain squeezing my heart subsided. “Probably not.” I shook my head. Beck’s eyes sparkled. He turned back to the screen and scrolled down, searching for more information. By the third page, it was easy to see there was nothing there. Nothing of use anyway.

He swiveled the chair so he could see me.

“And up until now you haven’t ever felt anything. No emotion whatsoever.”

“Right.” My bottom lip trembled. He rose, taking my hands again.

“And then you got a message from your mom?”

“Yes.”

“But you don’t know where your parents are?”

“No.”

“Can I hear the message?”

My cell phone rested on the bedside table. I picked it up, found the message, and played it on speakerphone.

While my mom spoke I watched Beck’s face. He seemed to be taking all that I’d said very well. He didn’t seem freaked out. He wasn’t treating me differently. At least I didn’t think so.

When my dad told my mom to hang up because she’d already said too much, Beck’s eyes scrunched together, but he didn’t say anything.

“Why aren’t you freaking out?” I asked him. I appreciated that he wanted to honor his contract, but if the roles had been reversed, I would’ve run away already.

Beck shrugged. “To be honest, I think the whole thing is extraordinary.” He took my hands. “When I watched you fall from the second floor of the shopping center I thought you were possibly suicidal.”

“How did you catch me? Why didn’t you get hurt?”

He shrugged. “I don’t know. I saw you fall and I reacted. I didn’t debate, I just knew I needed to save you.”

A rush of gratitude for Beck filled my insides. “Thank you,” I breathed.

Beck stepped closer. “Of course, Miss Cavanaugh.”

“I think you’ve earned the right to call me Beatrice.”

Beck leaned back, but I held his hands tightly.

“If you want. You don’t have to.” I exhaled. “The truth is you don’t even have to stay.” With the rush of emotions came the realization that I didn’t want to hurt Beck anymore. In fact I couldn’t understand why I’d had such a hateful desire in the first place. And the fact that I’d lied about the diamond made matters worse. I was a rude, immature girl who needed to figure out what Vaktare meant. Beck certainly didn’t need to be a part of whatever was happening to me. “See, your mom, she didn’t - ”

Beck pressed a finger to my lips. “I’ve signed a contract agreeing to stay until such time as you release me. I’ll abide that.”

I smiled, knowing the right thing was to release him. “Thank you, but that’s what I’m trying to say. You don’t need to stay. I am releasing you.”

Beck stepped back. Disappointment rolled over his gorgeous face. “Already? I’ve done nothing to make up for what you believe my mom did. I researched red diamonds. They’re worth millions.”

“I know. But she - ”

Mrs. Dotts pushed open the door. She was humming. “You’re out of bed.”

“Yes,” I said.

Mrs. Dotts set a tray on the table. On it were two steaks. “I thought you might be hungry.”

I hadn’t even thought about eating.

“Thank you, Mrs. Dotts. ” I went over and cut a piece of meat. Then realized I should’ve asked Beck which he wanted first. “Sorry I didn’t let you choose, Beck,” I said when he came to stand beside me.

Mrs. Dotts dropped the napkins she'd been about to hand over. "Is there anything else you need, Miss Cavanaugh?" Her voice quaked with surprise.

"Have you heard of the word Vack-tare?"

Mrs. Dotts froze. "Um, well." She stuffed the napkins in the front pocket of her apron.

Isaac walked in. "Miss Cavanaugh. May I have a word with you?"

I glanced over mid-bite. He held a strange box in his gloved hands. Beck squeezed my shoulders. I knew he was thinking the same thing I was - that Isaac might know what the word Vaktare meant. I dropped the fork and rose.

Mrs. Dotts scurried out of the room, closing the door behind her. Isaac stepped further inside.

OceanofPDF.com

FIRST SHIFT

"WHAT IS IT, ISAAC?" My heart began to race, pushing the pain out and back in with each thump.

He cleared his throat, glancing at Beck.

"He's fine to remain here."

"Very well, Miss Cavanaugh."

"When I came to work for your father fifteen years ago, you were just a small child. And while your parents were never kind to me they were never unkind either." He coughed. "I knew I was luckier than most. Your father paid me well. Very well. I came to respect, even admire him." Isaac cleared his throat again. "On your sixteenth birthday your father and mother came to me and asked if I would be willing to keep something for them." He lifted the box in his hands. "They made me promise that if anything bizarre began to happen with you and if the two of them suddenly vanished I was to give you this box." Isaac set it on my desk.

"Do you know what's inside?" I asked, goosebumps tightening my skin.

"No, Miss Cavanaugh, I do not." He stepped back. "I've witnessed many peculiar events in my life. I know your family is different." He paused, pulling on the bottom of his vest, uncomfortable. "Have you heard anyone use the word Vaktare?" Isaac was suddenly nervous. He gave Beck a cursory glance.

I nodded, excitedly, taking a step toward him. "Do you know what that means?"

He shook his head. "I only know that I overheard your parents say the word on many occasions."

I felt my face fall. It was weird. Normally my face didn't move much.

“Miss Cavanaugh, your parents - you are different. Your parents knew I knew. Being in this house, I’ve heard things, even seen things.” He clasped his hands together. “Please know I would never do anything to betray your parents or you. I owe your parents my life. My allegiance is, and will always be, to your family.”

“Thank you, Isaac.” My eyes were misty. I wondered what my parents had done for him, but now wasn’t the time to ask. I quickly dabbed at the edges of my eyes. Crying was fast becoming annoying.

“You’re most welcome, Miss Cavanaugh. And if there is anything you need, you have only to ask.” He turned and left the room.

I scooted my chair closer to the box. It was beautiful. Not much larger than a sheet of paper. The latch had the head of a roaring lion. On the lid was carved the letter C. I guessed for Cavanaugh. Thorny vines wrapped around it and a single red rose bloomed in the center. Behind the C and the rose had been carved an intricate background. Creatures that appeared to be part man and part beast were in a forest.

“Aren’t these amazing?” I said touching one of the heads. As soon as my hand brushed the wood, the latch clicked open. I gasped, clutching my chest. And then laughed.

Beck smiled, crouching down so his head was even with mine. That must’ve been uncomfortable.

“Wait a sec.” I picked up the box and took it over to the bed. “This will be better.”

Beck seemed surprised by my actions. In truth, I was too. In the past, or even yesterday, the comfort of others hadn’t mattered to me.

I took a deep breath, eager for the answers that were sure to be inside.

“Go for it,” Beck said, noticing my hesitation.

Taking hold of the latch, I lifted it.

I didn't know what I expected to find. The inside smelled like fresh cut wood. It had been stained to match the outside.

I glanced at Beck. He rocked back, appearing to be as confused as I was. I reached in and picked up the only thing in the box: a piece of paper. It'd been torn out of a notebook. On the paper, scrawled in black ink were a name and a number.

"Is this you?" I asked.

He shook his head. "My last name is Haddox, remember?"

All of my courage deflated.

Beck squeezed my hand. "So you call the number. Your parents thought the name and number were important, right?"

"I guess." I placed the number back in the box and closed it. Exhaustion overpowered my limbs. "I'm tired, Beck. Would you mind giving me some time by myself?" I knew the pain would increase with him gone but it was becoming more bearable.

"Of course." Beck glanced at his watch. "I'll see you in the morning." He got off my bed and went to the door. "It'll work out. Everything happens for a reason.

I couldn't agree or disagree. "Thanks, Beck. For all of your help and for staying." As I said the words, a tendril of fear curled through my stomach, like a snake in search of its prey, it slithered inside. My heart raced. "You'll still be here in the morning?" I asked, timidly.

Beck opened the door. "I'm exactly where I want to be."

His words made me smile. I stared after him a few moments, thinking about how happy I was to have him in my life. I didn't have my parents, and while I missed them, which was weird and wonderful, but I had him. Beck. It seemed overly lucky that he'd come just after I was cursed. I didn't think Eva, Ashley, Cassidy or even Will would've handled the situation as well as he was.

I set the box on my nightstand, changed into some PJs and went over to the bed. I tried to sleep, but as tired as I was, I couldn't. So I climbed out of bed and walked over to the window seat, pulling open the curtains. The moon was nearly full. I curled up with a blanket and a pillow and fell asleep.

I SNIFFED THE AIR. Another hunter was nearby. It was hungry, like me. And it needed to eat. But this was my territory. I roared, shaking my head.

In response the hunter howled. A wolf?

My ears pricked as I ran. Its large paws padded the dirt softly, making its movements barely perceivable. It was heading up the mountain, same as me.

Though it was summer the air this high up was chilly, especially at night. I found the temperature enjoyable and lifted my face toward the night sky. The moon shone brightly and the stars twinkled against the blackness. It reminded me of a map, the stars plotting points, telling me where to go. I stared at the stars more intently, as though seeing them for what they truly were.

Where should I go? I thought, searching for an answer.

To the right I heard the snap of a fallen tree branch. Instinctively I turned toward the sound, crouching low, preparing for the unknown. I'd been too caught up in the stars to listen to what was going on around me.

Whatever it was moved closer. I waited, shifting my body so that I was in good position. Twin pools of blue glowed as it stepped into view.

I squinted, trying to discover what it was.

"I wondered when you would finally shift." The deep, male voice came from the area where the eyes glowed.

OceanofPDF.com

I AM A BEAST

HE STEPPED out of the trees and into the moonlight.

It was a large black cat, but bigger than any wildcat I'd seen in my mountains, or at the zoo for that matter. Thick black fur covered his body. He was on all fours, but his back legs had more of a bend at the knee, like a human rather than a wildcat.

His paws were long and shaped like human hands and feet. Thick claws extended from them. They were sharp and pointed. His face held the shape of a cat, but it somehow looked human too.

"What are you talking about?" I backed up the way I'd come, the prey I'd been hunting long forgotten.

In answer he lifted one of his front paws and a ball of light came out. It headed right at me. For a single second I froze, unsure what to do.

In the next second instinct took over and I dove out of the way.

The light hit the tree to my right. It made a sizzling and crackling sound and then the light went out. By the light of the moon, I could see the tree had been charred and there was a hole deep within the trunk.

"Found out what your ability is yet?" He growled and sent another ball of light my direction.

I dove the other way, baring my teeth and making a hissing sound. That scared me almost more than the big cat and the ball of light.

"Please, what do you want? I can get you anything." I hoped to reason with him.

"Can you?" He paused, tilting his head, as though he were mulling over my offer.

"Of course."

The male cat roared, and it felt like the whole Earth shook.

I wanted to lower my head, to cower before him, but something inside told me not to.

So, I lifted my chin. “What do you want?” I was scared, but I forced those feelings away, and stepped toward him. “Either tell me or leave.”

The male cat laughed, and his long tail flicked back and forth randomly.

“Your family no longer has the right to give orders.” He snorted and his whiskers quaked. “Your father doesn’t even have his abilities any longer. They were stripped from him.” He seemed to know more about my family than I did.

“You know who I am? What I am?” My chin started to tremble.

He laughed harder. “Of course.” Something about the way he said the words sounded familiar, but I was too scared to really think about it.

I realized for all my feigned toughness, if he attacked, I’d be dead. He probably weighed five hundred pounds.

“It’s time the Cavanaugh family is destroyed, and a new royal line takes your place.” He charged.

I stood my ground, not knowing what else to do. As he got closer, he opened his mouth. Drool dribbled from his sharp teeth. He was so close I could smell his putrid breath. At the last second, I closed my eyes, preparing for the inevitable.

But it didn’t come. There was a rush of wind and a loud thump.

I peered through my lashes and was surprised to find that the male cat had been knocked on its side. He rolled to his feet and shook his head.

Standing between the cat and me was a gigantic blond wolf. His body was a similar shape to the cat, though he was bigger. His tail was fluffier, his ears were bigger, and his face was different. He was every bit as scary, especially as he bent low, baring his teeth.

“Leave now and I’ll let you live,” the wolf said.

His voice was so deep I felt it in my bones.

“I wasn’t sure you’d come. Your fight isn’t with me. In fact, I’m on your side with the rest of your kind, Locanis. We can kill her together.” The cat tried to move around the wolf, but the wolf blocked him from passing.

“No.”

The cat growled and sent a ball of light at the wolf.

The wolf chuckled, batting the light away. “How does it feel to know you have the lamest of Vaktare abilities?” The wolf's garbled laughter grew. “I mean, it’s a ball of light. Oooh, scary.” The last part oozed with sarcasm.

“Shut up!” The cat shot another ball of light in the wolf's direction.

The wolf caught it. “Here kitty, kitty.” He threw the ball of light back.

The cat yowled, diving at the wolf.

They rammed into each other, their teeth snapping and tearing into the other’s fur. They rolled on the ground. Dirt kicked up around them, making their fight harder to see.

I watched the battle in amazement. Too stunned to do anything else. The creatures were like none I’d ever seen. Certain features made them obviously a cat or a dog, but they were much too big, their limbs too long.

Plus they spoke English, like me, which was stranger still.

It suddenly occurred to me that I was in the presence of horrid beasts, and that I should run.

The cat roared in pain and the combatants broke apart.

Panting, the cat said, “Look at her. She’s weak. Your mission is to kill her. Now’s your chance.”

The wolf barked once. “My orders are none of your business. Now either you leave, or I kill you."

The cat laughed. "You've gone soft. What happened to the fearless Locanis I heard stories about? You're supposed to be a cold-blooded killer, not a simpering pup."

The wolf was on the cat before he had a chance to defend himself.

In the distance I heard another howl and then several more. The blond wolf's nose came up. He shook his head. "Get out of here!" He yelled those words at me.

"What? I - "

The cat took off down the hill.

The wolf perked his ears. They twitched and turned, listening.

"Hey," I called after the wolf. "What - the - hell?" I was terrified and confused but curious too.

He wouldn't look at me.

"Hey," I yelled again, feeling a strong need to see his face. I knew if I did everything would be okay.

"Shut up and run away. You don't know what you're doing and you're going to get yourself killed." He took off in the opposite direction of the cat.

I was suddenly very alone and very frightened.

The wolf was right.

If he hadn't come along, I'd be dead. I reached out after him. "Thank yo - " I yelled as I glanced down at my hand but it wasn't a normal hand.

It was large and the back was covered with honey brown fur. The claws were long and pointed. I thought about what I'd been doing outside, on the mountain, before the other cat showed up. I'd been hunting.

Was I like him? Had I somehow shifted into a creature?

Feeling a strong need to find out, I dashed toward my house, past trees of pine and ash. I jumped over large bushes and wild strawberry patches. I ran through tiny trickling streams, burrowed under brush, and snapped at the heels of a family of elk I came upon. There was only one thought and it pushed me to run faster than I ever believed was possible.

I needed to see what I was even though I knew I was changed.

I would check my reflection in the pool behind our house. When I came to the border of the Cavanaugh land, I stopped. I'd forgotten about the super tall chain link fence that went all the way around the back part of our property.

How had I gotten out? I clawed my way up the fence. At the top was barbed wire. With effort I climbed over, though much of my fur snagged on the barbs.

Jumping to the ground I ran to the pool and then slid to a stop.

My pulse raced with apprehension. Peering over the edge, I saw what I'd been afraid of.

"No." I quickly stepped back, took a deep breath, and tried again.

The beast was still there, staring at me with a horrified expression. I touched a paw to my face, watching it move the way my brain told it to.

Except for my eyes, I didn't recognize myself.

Fizban had told me I was a Vaktare.

Was the hideous creature staring back a Vaktare?

"How did I get this way?" I whispered the words, feeling those blasted tears push at my eyes again. I roared. "I am a beast!" The thought made me sadder than I'd ever been.

My parents were gone, and I had no idea what was happening to me. I couldn't even call them and ask. The numbers I had for my mom and dad had been disconnected.

A pile of sadness seemed to bury me.

I walked over to one of the patio lounge chairs and tried to climb on. My claws tore through the polyester. But I didn't care. I rested my head against the part that was still whole and closed my eyes.

“It’s all a dream, Beatrice. It’s all a dream.”

I uttered those words over and over until I almost believed them.

OceanofPDF.com

NAKED AND TANGLED

WHEN I CAME BACK into consciousness and opened my eyes, I was shocked by the brightness of the room.

Seconds later I realized I wasn't even in my room.

I was outside.

Birds chirped in the trees nearby.

Squirrels prattled on at each other as they searched for nuts.

I blinked several times, convincing my eyes to adjust.

The smell of pine and chlorine immediately told me I was by the pool. Shocked, I tried to stand, but my limbs were tangled within the broken patio chair.

That's when I remembered last night.

There'd been a large cat with the blue eyes. He'd tried to kill me.

And the huge blond wolf. The cat had called him Locanis. Was that his name or his species? Whatever he was, the wolf had protected me.

And then I'd seen my reflection in the pool.

I was like the black one. A large, weird, talking cat. I shuddered in dismay. If it had been a dream, how had I ended up outside in the exact spot where I'd lay down in my dream? Before I could find an answer, I heard my name in the distance.

"Beatrice," Beck called, an edge of fear in his voice.

"Miss Cavanaugh." That was Isaac.

"I'm over here," I tried to holler, but the words got caught in my throat.

"Bea. Bea, it's me, Will. Where are you?" He sounded close.

"Here," I called. The word came out raspy like I smoked two packs a day.

A shadow passed over my face. I squinted, trying to see. “I seem to be wrapped up in -”

Will laughed. “Oh, this is glorious.” He leaned down and started to unwind the polyester material from my legs. His hands brushed my backside and I realized with a start that I was naked.

I screamed, quickly covering up as much as possible.

Will laughed harder. “Naked and tangled up. It must’ve been some party last night.”

“I - no.” I felt my whole-body blush, from the tips of my toes to the top of my head.

“Miss Cavanaugh.” Isaac found me next.

Where Will was just standing there staring, Isaac quickly took off his jacket and threw it over me.

“Thank you, Isaac.” I tried to cover myself, but I was still mostly tangled.

Beck burst through the two men and bent beside me. “What the hell?” He ripped at the stupid lounge chair until I was free. Then he picked me up, making sure I was covered and practically ran toward the house.

“Wait for me,” Will called.

“Isaac, will you make sure Will leaves?” I asked, my gaze catching the butler’s.

“Of course. If you would,” I heard Isaac say.

Beck mumbled something under his breath.

“What?” I asked, mortified but trying not to be.

“I don’t like that kid.”

“Who, Will?” I shrugged, which made Isaac’s jacket fall off my shoulder and slide down my chest, so I was exposed. I gasped.

Beck kept his eyes forward. “Don’t talk. Don’t move until I say so.”

I glanced up at his face. He was clenching his teeth, his jaw flexing and un-flexing.

“You’re kind of bossy,” I said, surprised.

At my words his bright eyes found mine. He made a point of focusing only on my face. “Shhhhh.” Then he faced forward, opening the back door, walking through the living room, down the hall, and up the stairs.

When he reached my room, he kicked open the door and basically tossed me on the bed. My limbs went flying, the jacket all but coming off.

My face burned, embarrassed.

Without a word, Beck was gone. The door slammed shut and I was alone.

“Rude.”

I thought I heard a bark of laughter from the other side of the door. “When you’re decent come find me.”

“Fine.” I jumped off the bed and ran into the bathroom, desperate to see my face. I was dirty but still me. There were no sharp teeth. There wasn’t any fur. No claws or paws. My breath shook with relief.

“Sleepwalking?” I thought aloud.

“More like shifting,” Fizban said from my cell phone.

I yelped. “How did you get in here?” I was asking my phone, which hadn’t been in the bathroom moments ago.

Fizban answered, “I can be anything. Why would you think I couldn’t move your phone?”

I took a deep breath to calm my racing heart.

Fizban popped out of my cell phone and was suddenly sitting on my toilet seat. The ends of her long red hair rested in her lap. She was dressed in fingerless gloves, a dress that’d seen better days and shoes with holes in the toes.

“Why are you dressed like Raggedy Ann?”

“Why are you not dressed at all?” She smirked when I suddenly reached for a towel and wrapped it around myself.

“I’m in the bathroom, where I should have privacy,” I sputtered.

“Uh-huh. Well get in.” The water in the shower turned on.

“Not with you in here.” The shower was a snail cove, which meant I went inside the shower and had privacy, but knowing her, she’d climb in too.

“I solemnly swear not to peek.” As she spoke, she raised her right hand.

“Fine.” The faster I finished, the faster I could find Beck. I walked into the shower, hung my towel on a nearby hook and stepped into the water.

“So, tell me how you’ve been?”

I snorted. “You probably know more than I do.”

“Perhaps, but I want to hear you tell it.”

She sounded suspiciously close.

“I was shopping yesterday when I was overwhelmed by all of these emotions. I fell from the second story. Luckily Beck caught me.” I smiled at the thought of him. It was weird that I already cared for him. Cared. Yep, that was the right word. I freaking cared. For him and Isaac and Mrs. Dotts, too.

“I see. And what have you learned about the Vaktare?”

“Nothing,” I huffed, rinsing out my hair.

“That’s not true.”

I glanced around the corner. She stood right next to the opening.

“Get back,” I hissed.

She laughed. “Tell me what you’ve learned.”

I thought about it. “I can tell you what I think I’ve learned.”

“Let’s hear it.”

“Last night I thought I was dreaming, and a big black cat tried to kill me. Then a large wolf saved me. And I - I saw my reflection.

“And?”

“There was a cat or a Vaktare staring back, which means I’m a Vaktare.” I ran a razor over my soapy armpits. “The evil Vaktare, the one who tried to kill me, he called the wolf ‘Locanis’ but I don’t know if it’s the wolf’s name or his species.”

“Wow. See. You have learned a lot.” She stuck her head around the corner.

I screamed, cutting myself with the razor. Blood immediately formed. “Ouch. Dammit. You said you wouldn’t peek.”

“I say a lot of things.” She moved her head back around the corner, out of sight.

I rinsed the blood and waited for more. But none came. “So, a Vaktare is a big hairy cat-beast. And I’m one of them?”

“Yes, that’s right,” Fizban said.

“Okay. And how did this happen? Did you turn me into one of these Vaktare when you cursed me?”

She peeked around the corner again, but this time I was prepared and splashed water in her face. She let out a yelp and moved back. “The curse isn’t really a curse. It’s more of a reverse curse.”

“What? You’re not making any sense?” I turned off the water and grabbed a clean towel.

She zipped her lips and then locked them with an invisible key.

“You aren’t going to tell me?”

She unzipped her lips. “Part of breaking the curse, or reversing the curse, is that you need to be the one to figure out what’s going on. If I help you, then you’ve really learned nothing. You need to experience what your life is truly about.”

“Oh, great. Like last night?” I exited the steamy bathroom and went into my closet. I wondered if she would follow or if she were somehow attached to my phone.

She was right behind me.

“Can I get a little privacy? Please?” I asked with extra sincerity, batting my lashes.

OceanofPDF.com

ACTING WEIRD

FIZBAN CLAPPED HER HANDS GLEEFULLY. “You’ve already changed, Beatrice. I hope it’s enough to save everyone.” She skipped out of the closet.

“Save? Who? My mom and dad?” I pulled on a lilac bra and undies.

“Sure, them and more. A lot has happened in eighteen years.”

I shimmied into a pair of dark jeans and tugged on a lilac peasant top. “I don’t understand.”

Looking back, the last eighteen years didn’t seem real now I could actually feel.

“Are you talking about my ability to experience emotions now? Why couldn’t I before?” I quickly buckled on a pair of wedge heel sandals.

Coming out of the closet, I went on, “My emotions are wonky though. I cry constantly.”

Fizban was sitting on my bed flipping through a magazine. “Last night you shifted. It means your true nature is returning much faster than we - I expected. You need to be careful.”

“No kidding.” I opened my bedroom door. “Celeste,” I called out of habit before I remembered she was gone. Beck had replaced her. I glanced down the hall. It was empty.

Isaac opened the bedroom door across from mine.

“Isaac,” I said, surprised.

“Miss Cavanaugh. I hope you don’t mind, but I took the liberty of helping Beck move into this bedroom. I think it might be wise if he were closer to you.”

I turned my head, trying to figure out if he were being honest.

That he'd done something so huge without my consent would've been grounds for dismissal in the past. He never would've tried it with my mom and dad around. Isaac grabbed the ends of his vest. "I'm sorry if I've overstepped, Miss Cavanaugh. I'm just worried."

I rolled my shoulders back. "It's okay, Isaac. I appreciate your concern." Beck appeared behind Isaac.

"It's for the best," Beck said, still bossy.

I lifted my chin. "I agree. It's like Isaac read my mind." I tried to slam the door, but Beck stuck his foot in the way.

"Allow me to do your hair, Miss Cavanaugh." He winked; his face filled with mischief.

"You're acting weird."

He chuckled as he walked into the closet. "Have a seat, Miss Cavanaugh."

I did as he asked, wondering absently where Fizban had gone.

Beck picked up the brush and started on my hair.

"My weirdness is in direct correlation to your weirdness. So, it's your fault, you know."

My cheeks burned red. How did I respond to that?

Beck bent down so that I could see his handsome face in the mirror next to mine. "I'm sorry, Miss Cavanaugh." He nudged my cheek with his.

I thought about how I would've reacted to such familiarity a few days ago. I would've had him arrested. At least fired.

But he'd saved my life. He'd stayed up the entire night making sure I was okay. He -

"I already told you to call me Beatrice," I said, pretending to study my hands. They trembled slightly.

"Yes, Beatrice." He held my gaze.

A burst of pain seared my heart. It had become almost bearable. Sometimes I forgot it was there. But at that moment, the way he looked at me, it came back with fervor. It was so strong it nearly knocked the wind out of me.

I couldn't put my finger on what the feeling was though.

Beck leaned his cheek against mine. "What is it?"

Inside the fireworks I'd felt before suddenly turned into falling rose petals. "I - I don't know," I answered honestly.

He stood up and continued working the knots out of my hair.

I tilted the mirror so that I could see his face. "Beck?" My whole body started to shake, and I realized I was scared. But I needed to tell him. He had to know what happened last night.

"What is it, Beatrice?" he asked, his eyes filled with warmth.

"What I'm about to tell you -" I railed off a moment. "Just know, if you need to freak out, it's okay. Feel free to freak out."

Beck lifted one brow in question, but his features were kind. "If the urge arises, I'll be sure to freak out."

"But don't leave," I said, worrying my hands.

"Beatrice Cavanaugh, you have my word that I will not leave." His gaze became serious. His mouth set.

I wanted to believe him. I hoped he was telling the truth. "Last night. I - had what I thought was a dream, but it wasn't."

"Go on," he said.

I told him what happened.

About the black cat and the blond wolf and about seeing myself in the pool.

When I finished, I said, "I believe a Vaktare is a cat-type thing." I couldn't hold his gaze any longer. "And I'm a Vaktare so that makes me one of those - creatures." At some point during the story, he'd paused in brushing my hair. I couldn't read the expression on his face. "Are you freaking out internally?"

He began brushing again, his touch tender. "It's quite a story, Beatrice."

“You saw the way I was tousled in the chair?”

He nodded.

“And I was naked,” I whispered.

He smiled at that.

“So, you’re like a werewolf, except a cat?” he asked, his jaw flexing.

Beck divided my hair into three thick strands and began braiding it.

“Pretty much,” I said, thinking it over. I’d seen at least one movie with a werewolf in it. In my changed form I was hairy and had large teeth. I liked to hunt. But not people. I shuddered at the thought.

“I’ve been craving red meat. And I’ve had a need to sleep under the moon.” I shrugged. “You’ve seen the changes I’ve been going through. Fizban told me I shifted, too.”

“Wait,” he wrapped the end of my hair in a tie. “Fizban? When did you talk to her?”

“While I was in the shower.”

“She was here?” Beck turned me around and started to work on my face.

“Yes.”

“So now what?” He brushed some mascara on my lashes.

“Now I need to call the number in that box and see where it leads.”

Beck finished my makeup and I stood up.

Together we walked over to the box. I opened it, since it would only respond to my touch, and took out the paper. Beck handed me my phone.

I dialed the number.

”Hello," a voice on the other end of the line answered.

“Yes, hello. My name is Beatrice Cavanaugh. I need to speak with Adam Henry.” I glanced at Beck, curious about what he thought of the whole situation.

“Well, Ms. Cavanaugh today is your lucky day. I am Adam Henry.”

I swallowed, suddenly nervous. If he didn’t have the answers I needed, I’d be lost. “Have you heard of the Vaktare?” I figured I might as well get right to the point.

The other end was silent for several long seconds. Beck mouthed, “What’s going on?”

Shrugging, I said, “Mr. Henry? Are you still there?”

“How soon can you be in Boston?”

I shook my head, confused. “I don’t know. Soon, I guess.” My father owned a private jet.

“Excellent. Do not allow your flight to land after midnight.” He paused a moment. “The sooner you get here the better.”

I didn’t know this man. He could be a total creep.

“It’s okay, your father and mother know me," Adam said, as though hearing my worry. "Their names are Fisher and Lenora, correct?”

“Yes, but anyone could know that,” I hedged.

The other line was silent again. I nearly hung up.

“Recently you began experiencing emotion -” He trailed off when I gasped.

“How did you know that?”

“Please, Beatrice, come as soon as you can. We have a lot to discuss. Call me when you land.” Adam hung up.

“What did he say?” Beck seemed nervous.

“He told me to fly to Boston.”

“Fly?” His face seemed to turn several shades of green.

“Are you afraid of flying?”

He coughed. “No, not at all.”

I went to my bedroom door. “Liar,” I said with a smirk.

Beck ran a hand through his hair. “Just a tiny bit.”

“Isaac,” I shouted for my butler.

He came up the stairs. “Yes, Miss Cavanaugh?”

“I need you to have the plane readied.”

“Oh?” he asked when he reached the landing. “Where are we flying?”

“I am flying to Boston, Massachusetts. Please schedule me a car and driver, book me suite, and have my bags packed.”

“When will you be leaving?” It was obvious he didn’t like that I was leaving him here.

I glanced at the clock next to my bed. It was ten in the morning. “How soon can the plane be ready?”

Isaac turned to head back down the stairs. “I’ll make the calls and let you know.”

“Thank you, Isaac.”

His features softened. “Of course.”

“Oh, and Isaac?”

He paused.

“Yes, miss?”

“Please make sure that I land well before midnight.” I had a feeling Mr. Henry made that recommendation because of what was happening to me. What I'd become or whatever. A Vaktare? A werecat. I’d shifted after midnight last night. Maybe he did know something about me. The prospect scared the hell out of me.

“Of course.”

OceanofPDF.com

A KISS FULL OF FEELINGS

"I'M GOING WITH YOU," Beck said for probably the tenth time.

The truth was I wanted him to go. I didn't want to do this alone, but it was so obvious he was terrified of flying and I didn't want to do that to him.

"It's fine, Beck. I'll be okay without you. There's no need for you to fly." Strangely, I meant it. All of these feelings were freaking me out.

Beck's face went pale when I said, fly.

I was in my closet trying to decide what to pack. I'd already changed out of my jeans and into a Valentino casual suit. The jacket had three-quarter sleeves with black polka dots and black piping. The skirt went to mid-thigh. I paired the outfit with simple black Jimmy Choo pumps.

I had no idea what to take or how much, but finally settled on as little as possible. If I stayed longer, or needed more clothes, I'd buy them.

Beck took the floral dress from my hand and walked it into the bedroom, laying it carefully on my bed. "Really," he said hoarsely. "It isn't a problem."

But I could hear his lie.

"Stay here. See your mom. I'll be back before you know it."

Beck growled, frustrated. "I'm supposed to take care of you. That's my job, dammit." He caught my gaze and held it. "Who will do your hair?"

I laughed out loud. "I'll find someone."

"Miss Cavanaugh?" Isaac asked as he knocked.

"Come in."

He opened the door all the way and rolled in a suitcase. "The plane will be ready in two hours. There will be a car waiting on the tarmac when you land in Salem, and I've reserved a suite for you at the Boston Plaza. Would you like me to drive you to the airport?"

"No, I'll drive her," Beck said, a strong edge to his voice.

Isaac glanced at me for confirmation.

I nodded.

Beck had given up. He wouldn't be going with me. Part of me was sad about that.

"Very well. Mrs. Dotts is on her way up to assist with the packing."

"Thank you," I said with a big sigh of relief. Just because I wanted to do more didn't mean I could. Packing was out of my league.

THE RIDE to the Salt Lake International Airport was mostly silent.

Beck drove the Lykan, his eyes focused on the road.

I tried to start a conversation with him a couple different times, but it never went anywhere. Finally, I gave up and focused on the view.

It was early summer, so wildflowers bloomed all along I-15. In the distance were the mountains. Seeing them reminded me of what I'd experienced last night.

Hunting and then seeing a werecat or Vaktare and then a werewolf. I found it odd that the Vaktare wanted to kill me while the wolf protected. It seemed like it should've been the other way around.

My phone vibrated.

It was a text from Will.

A wave of guilt washed through my body. He'd been the first to find me, but I hadn't even thanked him. And I'd thrown his present into the pool. I'd been terrible to him since the day we met.

His text read: Can I see you?

I quickly texted back: Can't. On my way to the airport.

Where to? he asked right away.

I debated whether to tell him.

“Don’t tell anyone where you’re going. Not until you’re sure who you can trust.” Beck watched me from the corner of his eye.

“How can you read my texts and drive?” I glanced away, irritated.

He tapped his eyelid with his finger. “Good eyesight.”

“Huh.” I turned the phone away from Beck’s gaze and texted back: It’s a secret. I sent the words, then decided I needed to say something more to him. I didn't want to text but it was better than nothing at all, especially since I didn’t know when I’d see him again.

Will, I began, typing his name and then pausing, debating how to put into words what I wanted to say. Finally, I went on: I wanted to apologize for the other day. I shouldn’t have thrown your gift in the pool. It was very thoughtful. Thank you, and I’m sorry. Really, really sorry.

I sent the text and waited for a response.

Finally, one came: Who is this and what have you done with my Bea?

I laughed. Then texted: She’s here. Just a little changed.

Now I really want to see you, Will texted back.

I’ll text you when I return to Salt Lake.

We arrived at the airport.

I directed Beck toward the private airstrip.

Our plane was silver and had a red rose blooming on either side. The name Cavanaugh was painted in large black letters over the top.

“Your family doesn’t do anything small, do they?” He parked and glanced over.

“Nope. Some of my dad’s business associates say his slogan should be: Go Cavanaugh or go home.” I smiled.

Beck got out of the car. I met him at the trunk where he pulled out my bags and handed them to a waiting agent.

“Take-off is in twenty minutes,” the guy said.

“Alright, I’ll be there in a moment.”

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.” He took the suitcases and went up the stairs. I watched him, nervous about turning back to Beck.

Facing him.

Saying good-bye.

I didn’t want to do that.

Part of me wanted to demand he come.

I’d promised myself when I first met him that I would make him suffer. That hadn't happened and I was glad, too.

Beck broke the awkward silence. “If you need me, call. Or text. Or send me a text anyway, just so I know you’re all right.”

I smiled, fighting back the tears. “Okay,” I whispered.

He tugged on my chin, forcing me to see him. “I’m going to do something so crazy, like freak-out crazy. So, if you need to freak out, it’s fine.”

“What?” I asked, searching his eyes, enjoying him using my words from earlier back at me.

“This.” Beck leaned down and kissed me right smack on the lips.

A surge of emotion rushed through my heart and into my throat.

Fireworks exploded over and over in my stomach.

My pulse raced.

His lips were firm but tender.

I sensed he wanted to give me only a quick kiss, but I wasn’t ready to let him go. I dropped my purse and flung my arms around his neck.

He responded by pushing my mouth open, taking our kiss deeper.

He ran his tongue over my teeth.

I met him with mine.

We kissed and kissed and kissed and kissed.

His hands grabbed my waist and pulled me against him. Then they roamed up my back to my shoulders and into my hair. I felt him remove the tie. Tenderly he undid the braid with his fingers.

In that moment or in those minutes, everything but Beck and I disappeared.

There was only us.

We were no longer on an airport runway, but in a forest, my back pressed against a tree. Wildflowers grew all around us, perfuming the air as birds sang us their love song.

All I could do was cling to him. My body was alive with so many amazing feelings and emotions that I thought I would die from the glorious pain.

The agent cleared his throat.

We reluctantly let each other go.

Beck's eyes held mine though and for a moment I felt like he was still kissing me. He touched my bottom lip with his thumb, caressing it.

I was shaking all over with needs and desires and wants I'd never had before.

"The pilot is ready to take off, Miss Cavanaugh."

"Right. I'm coming," I said, keeping my focus on Beck. "Why did you do that?" I whispered, searching Beck's beautiful eyes for answers.

For some reason I had to know. I didn't mind. In fact, I loved it so much I wanted to do it again.

A mischievous twinkle lit his eyes. "I'll tell you when you get back." He bent over and picked up my purse and phone and then took me by the arm and led me over to the stairs.

I was so glad he did. My body had forgotten how to move and needed his encouragement.

"Hold on to the rail," he said, as he handed me my stuff.

I did, climbing the steps carefully. When I reached the top, I turned back.

He was still at the bottom. “Go on. I’ll see you soon.”

I nodded. I wanted to say good-bye, but the words wouldn’t come, so I raised my hand and waved.

“Miss Cavanaugh. We need to get you buckled in. Genevieve has prepared you a steak per Isaac’s instructions and once we’re in the air she’ll bring it to you.”

I allowed the attendant to lead me inside and to my seat.

After buckling up, I peered out the window.

Beck was by the driver’s side door of the Lykan.

He waved once and then got inside and drove away.

I watched until I couldn’t see the car anymore.

Genevieve came over. “We are about to take off. Can I get you a drink?”

“No. Thank you.”

She nodded and left the main cabin, I guessed to buckle herself in.

The airplane lurched forward, and we sped down the runway.

When the plane lifted off, I had the oddest sensation that my life would never be the same again.

OceanofPDF.com

IN TOTAL DARKNESS

I CALLED Mr. Henry as soon as I landed.

He gave me an address for Salem, Massachusetts, which I shared with the driver. Then I texted Beck just to let him know I arrived.

It was a little after ten in the evening. I stared out the window at the water and the lights. Salt Lake was a booming city. It had everything, but it wasn't until I drove in a city like Boston that I realized the city of Salt Lake was still pretty small.

The partition between the driver and me was down and he asked, "Are you here for business or pleasure?"

My mind thought one thing: business. But my mouth said the other, "Pleasure."

The driver winked. "If you want the inside scoop on where all the fun places are, just let me know."

I pressed my back into the seat. "My itinerary is already capped out, but thanks for the offer."

The driver chuckled. He was a big guy with burly arms and beefy hands. His hair was black, greasy, and slicked back. "Itinerary and pleasure can't mix." He laughed again.

"They do in my world." My words came with icy finality. I was done talking.

It took nearly forty-five minutes to get from the airport to the address Mr. Henry had given me. I realized it was a residence not unlike mine as a large mansion illuminated by dozens of lights came into view.

"Nice place," the driver said when he stopped.

"I agree." He came around and opened the door. I climbed out. "I'll need you to wait here. I shouldn't be too long."

“Yes, Miss Cavanaugh.”

I climbed the steps, my heart thundering in my chest.

Adam Henry had information about the Vaktare.

He had answers.

The prospect of finding out more was both terrifying and exhilarating.

I knocked on the door.

A guy around my age, maybe a little younger answered. “You must be Beatrice?”

“Yes, may I speak with Mr. Henry?”

“Sure, he’s waiting for you in his study.” The guy was tall, had lean muscle and that just-mussed hairstyle all the guys were going for.

“I’m Troy, by the way,” he added.

I glanced up at his pretty eyes. “Nice to meet you, Troy.”

“So, you must be in some kind of trouble. I know Pops has been flitting around the house like a scatterbrained - ”

“I don’t flit.”

Troy jumped and whipped around.

I leaned around Troy so I could see who spoke.

The man standing in front of me was older. He smiled, and the skin around his eyes wrinkled. His hair was graying. Yet, he was handsome. Kind eyes. He wore khaki pants, a button-up shirt and a sweater. Across his forehead was a set of silver reading glasses. And in his hand was an ancient book.

“Go on, Troy. I need to have a conversation with Miss Beatrice.” The man winked when he said my name and I had to smile. He was personable, friendly, and I immediately liked him.

“Got it." Troy jogged past Adam Henry and slapped him on the back. “See ya, Pops.”

Mr. Henry chuckled. “My whole life has been filled with boys. It’s nice to see a female in the house again."

I nodded. "You are Adam Henry?" I asked, just to verify.

"Yes, but everyone calls me Professor Pops."

That was an odd name. "Ad - Mr. - " Professor Pops totally fit. "Professor Pops, you know what a Va - "

"Just one moment," he said interrupting. "Why don't you follow me, and we can talk in private." He started away.

"Sure." I complied and followed him through the kitchen, down a hall, to a set of stairs.

We went down until we reached the basement.

He opened a door to what appeared to be a storage room. In one corner was a furnace. Professor Pops walked up to it, pressed a button and the wall behind it swung open to reveal another set of stairs.

"We're almost there," he said when I hesitated.

I went down after him, nervous about where we were going and just how deep into the earth we were.

The air smelled like dirt and wet cement. The wall closed behind us but before we were in total darkness, lights along the walls flicked on.

When we finally made it to the bottom, there was another door.

Professor Pops took a key that hung around his neck and used it to open the door.

"It's peculiar," he said as he pushed the door opened. "I haven't been down here in years. But in the past several days I've needed to come down here twice." He gave a short laugh and flipped on a light.

Never in a million years did I expect to see what I was seeing. The door had clicked shut behind me. I had a feeling it locked automatically. But I wanted to test the theory. Because the room I'd just entered couldn't be real.

I pressed myself against the door, trying to turn the knob.

"Beatrice, it's okay. This is a museum of sorts. I once told someone it was like a Museum for the Supernatural." Professor Pops walked over and patted my arm. "Nothing in here is alive, except you and me. And every creature in here gave me permission."

I swallowed and nodded my head. I wasn't convinced though.

Was he telling me the creatures agreed to allow themselves to be slaughtered so that he could stuff them and put them down here? And for what purpose?

There were creatures big and small inside glass boxes.

Some were from fairy tales, like a fairy, a troll, and a dragon.

Others were from nightmares or scary movies.

"What is he?" I asked, walking over. It was an extremely striking man with crimson eyes.

"That, my dear, is a Hunter."

I gasped, glancing back at Professor Pops. "Is he like me?"

Professor Pops came to stand next to me. "He is nothing like you. He is a blood drinker whose sole purpose was to mark children so that the Vampire Queen might claim them."

"Vampires really are real?" I held a hand to my neck.

I knew what I heard on the news and seen online, but until I started to change, I'd always believed the reports were fake.

Just another way for the government to invade people's privacy.

It was stupid.

And I realized that even the chayot - those angelic beings whose job it was to protect humans weren't just a cosplay, but real.

"Yes, they are." Professor Pops clamped his hands behind his back.

I wanted to ask him more, but the sight of a werewolf distracted me.

He stood on two legs and was covered in black fur. He didn't have on any clothes. His teeth were yellowed and sharp. Around his neck was a pendant of some sort. His eyes were bright green.

“A werewolf,” I breathed, walking over to stand in front of him.

“That’s right.”

“Locanis,” I whispered, pressing my fingers on the glass.

“So, you’ve heard the words,” Professor Pops said coming to stand beside me.

“What?” I tapped the glass as I studied the creature.

OceanofPDF.com

A WERECAT

PROFESSOR POPS BENT over and pressed a button. A latch clicked and a drawer popped open. There was a book inside.

He withdrew the book and placed it on a wooden podium. “Come here,” he said kindly.

When I was beside him, Professor Pops said, “Chapter One.”

The pages flipped on their own until they landed on a page with Chapter One across the top.

“How did you do that?”

Professor Pops smiled. “This podium possesses a special magic. Just give it a page number or chapter heading or even a specific word and it’ll flip to the correct page.”

“Oh.” I stood beside him so that I could see what the words on the page said.

His already serious features became grave. “Beatrice, many years ago I met you and your parents for the first time. They had heard about me and thought I could help.”

Mr. Henry took his glasses off his forehead and tucked them into the breast pocket of his sweater. “Before that fateful day I’d never heard of the terms Vaktare or Locanis and I’ve been alive a very, very long time.”

Professor Pops paused and glanced around the room. “These creatures were all created by the seven magics.”

Magics? I heard the word, but it was like he was speaking gibberish.

"What are you saying?" My heart ratcheted in my throat.

“Your parents told me about the Vaktare and Locanis and that they came from another realm."

I was still confused but Professor Pops went on without missing a beat.

"Of course, I knew that the seven magics had to exist outside our realm. The Universes are too vast, too huge for me to be that small minded and I've been outside of this realm. Hell, I've even traveled back in time. But I figured after so many years, I would've at least heard of all creatures who possessed the seven magics." He shook his head, and chuckled. "Boy was I wrong."

I wrapped my arms around myself, trying to hold it together.

He'd met my parents. He'd met me. And he knew the word: Vaktare. Not only that but the Vaktare weren't from this realm. I mean, what the hell? Other realms? I was thoroughly freaked.

Instead of losing my shit, I asked: "Do you know where my parents are? Can you tell me what the words mean exactly?" I fought down the urge to grab the edges of his sweater and shake all I needed to know from him.

"I did see your parents three days ago. They asked to add something to these histories, but they didn't stay long, and they didn't tell me where they were going." He rubbed a hand over his face. "They didn't tell me they were without you. But since your phone call, I did some digging and made a few phone calls of my own. My sources haven't been able to get back to me yet, but so far no one knows anything about your parents' whereabouts."

He shook his head. "I'm sorry, Beatrice."

I gulped, fighting back more damn tears.

Professor Pops continued, "As for information on Vaktare, I can give you most of it." He moved and indicated I should stand in front of the book.

Why not all of it? He'd seen my parents three days ago? What didn't Professor Pops know and where would I find the answers?

Professor Pops waved a hand over the book. The movement sent particles of dust into the air, leaving a smell of old paper hanging around us.

“Within these pages is most of the history of the Vaktare. It isn’t as thick as histories from other magical realms or creatures, but that’s because the species are relatively new to me.”

My fingers brushed the pages. “Have you ever seen a Vaktare? A werecat?” I said the words tentatively. They were new to me, and the words felt weird on my tongue.

He glanced at his watch. “I have not, at least not in their original forms.”

For some reason that made me sad.

“It’s eleven-thirty. Are you hungry? I can prepare you a steak,” Professor Pops said.

I’d eaten on the plane. “I think I’m too nervous for food.”

Professor Pops nodded. “Very well. Go ahead and read what's in the book. You’ll be safe down here. The only person with a key is me.” He patted at the key around his neck. “If you get tired, there’s a cot in the other room.” He pointed to a smaller room without a door. “There’s a bathroom as well.”

Did he think I would be down here all night?

No way.

Just thinking about being so far underground, away from the moon and the sky made my heart race. “Professor Pops, I have my driver waiting outside. I think I’ll have him take me to the hotel where I can get some rest and then come back in the morning.”

Professor Pops came forward, his eyes softening. “I know you have a lot of questions and that everything is new to you. This must all be so odd and not at all what you’re used to, but I think if you stay, you'll get at least some of your questions answered.”

"You expect me to stay down here and sleep on a cot?" My upbringing came rushing back. I was a Cavanaugh. American royalty. I did what I wanted when I wanted. And I sure as hell didn't sleep on a cot.

“That’s right,” he said, tilting his head to one side. "I think staying down here would be for the best," he added. Then paused. “Have you changed forms yet?”

His question frightened me, and I couldn’t meet his gaze.

The sight on my reflection in the pool filled my mind.

I turned my focus to the words in the book.

The first two sentences read: Hiraken is the tenth realm of Earth. The Vaktare came first, followed by the Locanis.

I swallowed down my agitation.

So, the Locanis were a species and not the name of the wolf who’d protected me the other night.

One question answered.

I decided to come clean. “Yes, I've changed already,” I finally said.

“If you were to change in the hotel tonight, and needed to hunt, what do you think you would go after?” He pointed to a line in the book. “Read it.”

“The Vaktare and Locanis hunt and eat all flesh.”

“All flesh,” he reiterated after a moment.

I let that sink in. “Are you saying you think I would hunt people?” I was disgusted. How could he think that? I was a person too.

He rubbed a hand over his eyes. “I don’t know for sure, but are you certain you want to take the chance?”

I glared at Professor Pops. So many wicked ideas ran through my head, but I forced them down. With my emotions had come a realization. I didn't want to be a bitch anymore. “No, I don’t.” I leaned on the stand. “I’ll remain down here, but don’t leave me for too long.” I met his eyes. "Please."

“Of course not. I’ll be down first thing in the morning.” He went to the door. “And if there’s an emergency, text me. You have my number.”

I'd forgotten I could text him or call him.

“I'll have the driver leave your suitcases here and then we can reassess the situation in the morning, after you have some of your answers.”

“I'd appreciate that," I said, feeling my shoulders sag.

"I'll see you in the morning," he said at the door.

"Professor Pops?" I couldn't help staring at the werewolf behind the glass.

He turned. "Did you need something else?"

“The werewolf over there. Is he a Locanis?”

Professor Pops seemed perplexed. “I don't think so. This werewolf came from a small town in Arizona. It was believed he was the last of his kind.” He shrugged. “Anything is possible.” His eyes twinkled as he came back and pointed at the pages of the book. “This is the history of your people but it's more than that. It's the history of your realm. Read it with care.”

“Thank you, Professor Pops.”

"Or course." He used the key to unlock the door.

So, it locks from the outside and the inside, I thought, making a mental note.

Before he closed the door, he turned to me and said, “I can count on you to keep this room secret, right? My colleagues and I are in the process of opening everything up to the public, but we aren't quite ready yet.”

“Sure. I won't say anything.” Who would I tell?

Professor Pops smiled. “Excellent. It's been lovely to see you again, Beatrice.”

When Professor Pops was gone, I checked my phone. I still had bars. Beck hadn't texted from the last time, but I texted him again anyway: Hope you're good. I'm getting answers. Talk more in the morning.

Thinking about Beck sent my mind immediately to our kiss.

What a kiss it was.

I'd made out with several guys over the years, but Beck's kiss was the first that came with real feelings, so I had nothing to gauge against it.

I thought about Will and the awkward way he'd tried to feel me up when we kissed. I had a feeling Beck's kiss was better than any other guy ever.

OceanofPDF.com

RED WARRIOR

TAKING A DEEP BREATH, I forced away thoughts of Beck and began to read.

Quickly, I came to understand that the history of the Vaktare and Locanis went back thousands of years.

The book included many details including several legends.

I read the first one.

It was about a Vaktare with red fur who would be born with all abilities and talents. She would be called Unduyee, which meant Red Warrior.

The Unduyee would restore peace between the Vaktare and the Locanis.

I glided over the other legends, including one about a demon spawn that was half Vaktare and half Locanis.

It seemed many Vaktare and Locanis indulged in sexual relations over the centuries, but they could never conceive.

I didn't delve into the details.

It was getting late, and I needed to read the material that actually happened in Hiraken.

After reading about several wars, I came to a part that mentioned my father's name.

It made me wonder about the author of this history.

"Show me the title page," I said, feeling weird talking to the podium.

Pages immediately flipped back to the beginning.

When they stopped, I leaned over, reading:

A History of Hiraken and its People

The Vaktare and Locanis

By:

Fisher and Lenora Cavanaugh

“My parents wrote this.” For some reason knowing they were responsible for the words on the pages made the histories all the more interesting.

Seeing their names also saddened me.

I needed to find them.

It bothered me that they’d left just as my life was turned upside down.

Though they hadn’t shown me emotion, they’d done lots to prove they cared for me.

I couldn’t believe they’d abandoned me when I needed them most.

Around two in the morning, when I was almost at the end, I found a very interesting piece of information about my parents:

Fisher Cavanaugh was next in line to rule Hiraken. When war broke out between the Vaktare and the Locanis, all of the Cavanaughs were believed killed except Fisher, his mate Lenora and their child, Beatrice.

“That’s me,” I whispered, feeling tingles run the length of my body.

Seeing my name in the histories of my people made me more anxious to know everything.

Near the beginning of the book, they mentioned that all Vaktare were born with a magical skill.

I asked the book to go back so I could read that part again.

There were hundreds of abilities.

Sometimes an ability was passed down from one generation to the next, but often, the gift was random.

“Do I have an ability?” I pondered aloud. I didn’t think so.

I went back to the part about my mom and dad:

After going to their medicine woman, Fisher and Lenora raced up the Wananoag mountains behind their castle, toward the place where they were told they could jump realms. The medicine woman gave Fisher a pendant and instructions on how to use it to open the portal. They almost didn't make it.

Several of the strongest and vilest of the Locanis chased them. The worst Locanis went by the name Beck.

"Not my Beck," I whispered, checking my phone to see if by chance he texted. He hadn't.

I read on:

Lenora used her gift with the elements to create a storm while Fisher spoke the incantation to open the portal. After Beck and Fisher fought, Fisher was able to jump realms at the last second. Beatrice was born soon after in the human realm.

After reaching the new realm, Fisher discovered Beck had stolen the pendant. "If Beck can find a way to use it, the remaining Cavanaughs may be in danger," my father was quoted as saying.

"This is incredible."

There were words scrawled in pencil down the right side of the book.

It read:

Other Vaktare survived. From the information I collected, they have formed a truce with the Locanis. I killed a Vaktare last night in the mountain behind our house after questioning him. He wouldn't tell me what they wanted or why they were trying to kill us. But they've found us. And worse than that, I believe the Locanis who goes by the name Beck has discovered a way to use the pendant and is closing in.

"Beck," I whispered, staring at the date.

Written above the words in the margin was a date three days ago.

I read the words again, a feeling of dread climbing into my stomach.

Beck wasn't a common name.

But my Beck couldn't be the Locanis my dad spoke about. If he were, he'd had plenty of opportunities to kill me since we met.

He could've just let me fall at the shopping center.

Or smothered me in my sleep.

I remembered the way he brushed my hair, the sparkle in his eyes when we spoke about the weirdness in my life.

That would explain why he took your story so well though, I thought.

"No." I went over to the cot and lay down. Memories of his kiss filled my mind and warmed my body. "That wasn't the kiss of a man sent to commit murder."

I punched the pillow, determined to convince my brain of what my heart already knew. Beck cared about me. He wouldn't do anything to harm me. He wouldn't.

At some point, I went and lay on the cot, mulling over all I'd learned.

It was overwhelming and I'd closed my eyes.

THERE WAS A CLICK, and I heard the door to the Museum for the Supernatural open.

"What happened in here?" someone asked.

I was no longer on the cot but the floor. A quick glance at my body revealed I was naked.

"Don't come in," I shouted, grabbing a blanket off the cot.

"Beatrice?" It was Professor Pops. "Are you alright?" I heard the worry in his words.

"Um, yes." I wrapped the blanket around myself and glanced around the room.

It'd been dark and I'd been preoccupied when I climbed onto the cot last night.

Now it was easy to see it had been a weapons room. Every sword, ever kind of weapon with a sharp point had been embedded in the walls or the ceiling.

My pillow had been slashed to bits and the cot was bent at a funny angle.

I glanced down at my hands.

Had I done that?

"Jesse, get a broom, a dustpan, and a very large trashcan. Have Troy help, if you need it. Hurry"

"Right away, Pops."

The door clicked.

"Professor Pops?" I moved so that I could see into the Museum.

The room was wrecked.

Broken glass was everywhere.

The dragon's head had been ripped off and the body lay on its side.

The troll was missing his limbs.

The Hunter had been torn in half.

The werewolf had fared worst of all. His eyes had been removed, his head ripped off, and his body was in pieces. Fur was strewn everywhere.

Professor Pops bent over and carefully lifted something, cupping it in his hands.

"I'm so sorry," I said, guessing the destruction was caused by me.

Tears sprang to my eyes. Devastation caused my stomach to roll. "I don't remember doing this, but it had to be me." I tilted a unicorn upright and picked up its horn, trying to put it back in the place where I'd ripped it off. It wouldn't stay so I set it on a shelf still upright.

Professor Pops took a white creature that reminded me of a fairy and placed it carefully on a table. Thankfully, it still had its head and all of its limbs. The way Professor Pops cradled the creature, it obviously meant a great deal to him.

“Whatever it costs, I’ll gladly pay to replace everything.”

OceanofPDF.com

PROFESSOR POPS SMILED SADLY. “Beatrice, no amount of money can replenish this.”

I hung my head, a sob ripping through my throat. I’d never felt so horrible in all my life. “I know,” I whispered.

He walked over and patted my shoulder. “If anyone is to blame for this mess, it’s me. I left you down here.”

I glanced up at him. “Perhaps, but I promise to do whatever it takes to make sure your museum is filled with supernatural creatures once again.”

“Oh, my dear, how do you intend to do that? I certainly don’t want the creatures murdered. Do you?” He picked up the dragon body in one hand and its head in the other. It was then that I realized Professor Pops wasn’t just a human. I should have known. He didn’t really even have a scent, other than peppermint.

“No. No way.” I hadn’t really thought about how I would accomplish the task. “So, what kind of supernatural are you?”

His eyes flashed red. “A Hunter,” he said, cautiously.

I took a step back. “You’re a vampire?”

“More or less.” His eyes went back to their normal color.

“Wow. That’s -”

“Creepy? Scary?” Professor Pops chuckled. “Don’t worry, I won’t bite.”

I smiled. “I think I should just go.” I picked up a gremlin and stood it on its pedestal.

“I don’t think that’s wise.” Professor Pops stacked a bunch of papers that had been the history of the unicorns together. “You need to find a way to control the beast that lives inside you. Otherwise, this type of thing will happen every night." His hands flourished around the room. "I've been doing some research and - "

The door opened. A guy with dark skin, short, curly black hair, and the grayest eyes I've seen came in.

I assumed he must be Jesse.

He was followed by Troy.

They carried a large trashcan between them. Jesse had a broom and Troy held the dustpan. They both eyed me warily, and I remembered I was only wrapped in a blanket.

Professor Pops took in my appearance as though noticing it for the first time.

Determination reflected on his features. "It's going to go like this," he began. "Troy?"

"Yes, sir?"

"Beatrice gets your room. You need to change the sheets and clean up. I don't want dirty clothes cluttering up the place."

Troy let out a loud sigh. "Aw, man."

"Then you're going to clean your bathroom. Scrub it. And then clean it again," Professor Pops continued, eyeing him seriously.

"Ugh," Troy threw his hands in the air.

"On your way up, I need you to take Beatrice's suitcases to your room. Make some space in your closet. When you're finished, let me know."

"What, right now?" He threw the dustpan on the floor.

Professor Pops seemed to glide over to Troy. It was so fast I didn't see his feet move. "Yes, right now. Do you have a problem with that?" His voice was low and menacing. It sent shivers up my spine.

"No, sir." Troy strode to the door.

Professor Pops followed and unlocked it with his key. Professor Pops whispered something to Troy.

Troy nodded. “I’m sorry, Beatrice,” he said, his features schooled into an apologetic gaze.

“It’s fine.” I waved a hand at him. “Thank you for lending me your room.”

When Troy left, Jesse whistled. “That was tense.” He went over to the corner near the dragon and started sweeping the glass into a pile.

I didn’t know what to do. I wanted to help but the blanket wasn’t all that secure. “I need some clothes,” I said.

“Oh, Beatrice, my apologies.” Professor Pops walked into the room where the cot was and went over to the table that had held all the weapons.

There were drawers underneath.

He pulled one open and pulled out a black pair of pants and a black shirt. “These are workout clothes, but they should cover the essentials.”

I moved closer so I could speak without Jesse hearing. “I need underthings as well.” I lowered my head. “I’m so sorry.”

Professor Pops cleared his throat and opened another drawer. Inside were underthings. “See if there’s something in there that fits.”

“Thank you,” I said, breathing a sigh of relief.

Professor Pops walked to the opening of the weapons room and then stopped. “When you shift, your clothes disappear?”

I glanced around the room. I hadn’t thought about it before. “Yes,” I said. “The clothes I wore last night are gone.” That stunk. That suit and those shoes had been some of my favorites.

“Interesting. And then when you shift back, you’re in only your birthday suit?”

My face flushed. “Apparently.”

“Interesting, indeed.” He walked from the room, and I heard him and Jesse whispering and the swishing of broken glass.

Moving to the open drawer I found a sports bra and boxers that might fit.

Then I went into the bathroom where I did a quick wash with a wet cloth.

I slid on the underclothes and the workout attire.

The outfit was like nothing I'd ever worn before. It was loose and comfortable. I tried to comb my hair with my fingers and wiped off some of yesterday's makeup from under my eyes. I still needed shoes though.

Professor Pops was a step ahead of me.

When I came out of the bathroom there was a pair of black socks and plain black shoes in my size outside the door.

I put them on and went into the Museum of the Supernatural room.

Jesse and Professor Pops had the entire floor nearly swept up. The trashcan was filled with glass. They were working on putting a book back together.

Shame scorched my body.

"I am really sorry," I said again, feeling helpless, and wishing I could do more.

"No worries, Beatrice." The Professor gave me a small smile.

I nodded, even though I felt terrible. He was being nice but what I'd done was horrible. "I'm going to clean up the weapon's room."

"Thank you," Professor Pops said.

I went over to a mace and grabbed the handle, trying to pull it from the wall. It wouldn't budge. "Stupid thing," I cursed, placing one foot on the wall to give me extra leverage.

Professor Pops walked in and smiled. "Your strength in this form is like that of a normal human."

I grunted my acknowledgement, determined to get the freaking mace out of the freaking wall and a little irritated that I felt like he was studying me.

“But I bet you could call on your beastly strength even while in human form.” Professor Pops took a pad of paper and a pen from his back pocket. Then pulled his glasses from the pocket of his sweater, put them on, and wrote something down.

“How would I do that? I asked, releasing the mace handle, and rubbing my hands. They were red and starting to really hurt.

“Hmmmm,” he tapped the pen to his cheek. “Do you remember any specific feelings from when you’ve previously shifted?”

I tried to think back. “I believed they were dreams, until a couple of night ago.”

“Which they probably were.” He tucked his pen in his back pocket and flipped his notebook shut. “Okay, grab hold of the handle.”

I did. “Now what?”

OceanofPDF.com

“TAKE a deep breath and feel for the werecat energy.”

I closed my eyes and took a deep breath, held it, searched my insides for some kind of energy. I found nothing, but I didn’t want to tell him that.

Breathing out, I yanked on the mace - and it popped out.

“I did it,” I said, opening my eyes.

Jesse’s face was inches from mine. He wore a naughty smile.

My happiness deflated. “You pulled the mace out for me, didn’t you?”

Professor Pops shook his head, trying to hold back a smile.

Jesse tucked his hands in his pockets and twisted his mouth. “Yeah, I kinda did.”

Without thinking, I leaned over and punched him. He went flying backward, smashing into the trashcan full of glass. Shards rained down on him.

“I didn’t mean to,” I said, covering my mouth.

Both Jesse and Professor Pops started laughing. Jesse stood up and brushed off his pants. He didn’t have a scratch on him.

“Are you supernatural too?”

“Yeah, I suppose so.” Jesse walked back over.

Professor Pops clapped him on the shoulder. “Jesse is a relatively new member of our family. I adopted him just a few months ago.”

“What are you?” I asked, fascinated to meet someone different, like me.

Jesse glanced away, shoving his hands back into his pockets.

“Oh, sorry. I didn’t mean to make you uncomfortable.” I turned away, moving over to the katana jammed into the ceiling. I reached up and yanked. It wouldn't move.

"Tell her, Jesse," Professor Pops urged.

He came over and pulled out the katana. "It's okay. I'm just still trying to get comfortable with who or what I really am."

I smiled at him. "It's totally understandable. Apparently, I look human, but I'm not. I'm a Vaktare, which is some kind of werecat, and I'm from another realm."

He returned my smile with one of his own.

And I realized he was handsome, in a tough guy kind of way. He wore a snug black tank top and loose-fitting jeans that hung below his plaid boxers.

He was maybe five foot seven and bulky.

Not overweight, just completely covered in muscles.

He didn't have a six-pack but a ten pack.

"Well, I'm a gargoyle." He shrugged, walked over to the opposite wall and pulled out another sword.

"Serious," I said, coming to stand beside him. "That's so cool."

"You think?" He rubbed one of his earlobes. "I have super strength and I can turn things, including myself, to stone. That's it. Those are my powers."

"I think that's awesome." I yanked on an arrow. That one came out, so I went to another. "Oh, what about wings? I've seen gargoyles with wings? Can you fly?"

He shook his head and glanced over at Professor Pops. "I don't think so. At least not yet." He bent over and picked up something. "Is this your phone?"

"Oh, I completely forgot about it. Thanks." Somehow it had escaped the carnage unscathed. I quickly checked to see if I had any messages from Beck.

There were messages from Ashley, Eva, and Cassidy.

I guessed Will had talked to them and they wanted to know where I'd gone. But there were none from Beck. The phone's battery was at twenty percent. I'd have to charge it later.

Since I didn't have any pockets, I set it on the table next to a jagged edged knife.

"I'm going to see what's taking Troy so long. I'll be back in a while. Will you two be all right down here?" Professor Pops asked.

I glanced at Jesse. "Sure."

"I'll be back." Professor Pops left, leaving Jesse and me alone.

"So, who do you think would win in a fight? A gargoyle or a vampire?" I asked, still surprised there were things like gargoyles and vampires in the world.

Jesse tapped his fingers against his mouth, thinking.

I started to laugh.

He joined in. "A gargoyle, for sure."

"I think so too."

I climbed on the table to pry out a Chinese star. It was so far into the wall I couldn't really get a good grip. I kept yanking, but it wouldn't come, and my fingers kept sliding off it.

"Try thinking about something that makes you really happy." Jesse was trying to fix the cot.

"Why?" I asked.

"Just get a good grip on the edge of the Chinese star, think of something that really gets your heart racing in a good way and pull."

I turned back to the star, closed my eyes, and thought about Beck.

The desire in his eyes.

The determination in his voice.

His lips had been so soft, yet hungry.

With every touch I knew he wanted my lips on his.

Then I thought about the kiss, the way it made my body come alive.

After it was over, he'd caressed my bottom lip.

I shivered at the memory.

My fingers grew and extended. There was a pop.

I opened my eyes. The Chinese star was in my hand. "Oh, yeah, I did it," I shouted, doing a dance on the table.

Jesse stood and turned, putting his hands on his hips. He was laughing at me, but I didn't care. "See? It isn't so hard." He turned back to the bed, took the frame in his hands, and bent it back into alignment with a single shove.

"Show-off," I said, but I couldn't wipe the smile off my face. There was no doubt Jesse, and I would be lifelong friends.

Jesse and I spent the better part of the next hour pulling weapons out of the walls and the ceiling. Sometimes thinking happy thoughts worked and other times it didn't. Overall, I was happy with the success I had.

And Jesse was a great guy.

In a short time, I felt like we'd become friends. We'd told each other a lot. I'd told him about life in Utah, and what I'd learned from the book my parents had written. He got to hear about my party and what I'd done to Will. I'd also told him about the curse, or rather the reverse curse.

Then Jesse told me about some of his life growing up. He was a year younger than me and his parents had left him on the side of the road when he was five. He'd been in and out of foster homes for years until Professor Pops found him.

I could tell he had a lot of respect for the man. Listening to the way he spoke of Professor Pops made me like him all the more.

"Why does everyone call him Professor Pops?" I asked, setting the last knife on the table.

Jesse was shoving hooks into place to rehang the katana and some of the other swords. “He is a Professor of Religion over at Harvard though now he’s mostly retired.”

“Oh, so it’s his actual title.”

“Yep.”

“That’s cool.” I picked up my phone and casually checked for messages. There weren’t any new ones. “Should we go into the museum and see if there’s anything else we can salvage?”

“Sure.” Jesse and I tried to walk through the opening at the same time and we bumped into each other. His skin was rock solid. I wanted to ask him more about himself, but door clicked, and Professor Pops came in followed by Troy.

OceanofPDF.com

WERECAT FORM

"HOW'S IT GOING?" Troy asked. He carried several large black bags - like body bags. Professor Pops followed, carrying more.

"Fine," I said. "Are those body bags?"

Professor Pops nodded. "They are."

A rush of fear immobilized my body.

They are going to kill me, stuff me out, and put me on a pedestal, I thought.

In the next thought, I tried to calm myself, but my body began to shift.

It felt like my blood boiled and moved in fast-forward.

My eyesight changed and I felt my face morph, followed by the rest of my body.

I heard myself roar as I dropped to all fours.

Professor Pops and Jesse dropped the bags in unison.

Troy tripped into Professor Pops, who caught him.

"This is going to be good," Troy said. He seemed excited about my change.

I licked my lips, feeling my razor-sharp teeth.

My whole being focused on the over exuberant boy. His heart raced.

I expected to smell fear, but he had a strange scent, which was very prominent in my Vaktare form.

He was unlike any human I'd smelled.

Not that it mattered. He was human. I didn't eat humans.

I changed my focus from Troy to Professor Pops.

There was a hint of alarm in his scent and his features, but mostly he seemed curious.

He had his hands up.

They shook slightly.

“It’s okay. You’re fine, Beatrice. No one is going to hurt you.” The voice was Jesse’s.

He had no scent at all.

I saw he’d changed as well.

His shirt had ripped in places. Same with his pants. His dark skin was now stark white and marbled with black veins. His black hair had changed to glaring white and his gray eyes were black as coal.

Jesse touched my arm tenderly.

His fingers were rock hard and cold as ice.

A peculiar sensation crawled along my arm. It radiated from his touch. My ears flicked and my whiskers twitched, as did my tail.

A tail? That was new, and weird.

“Beatrice?” Jesse clamped down on my arm more tightly. The fur all around where he touched turned gray.

I yanked my arm from his grasp, the hair near my neck and along my back stood on end.

Jesse glanced at his fingers. “I - It’s okay. Sorry. I’m so sorry.” Jesse’s eyes went from black to gray and his hair turned from white to black. His skin returned to their normal color as well.

“The bags are for these bodies.” He indicated the supernatural creature all over the floor.

The ones I knocked over, shredded, and decapitated during the night.

He smiled. “Your werecat form is awesome, by the way.” His eyes roamed over my body. “I mean seriously, I thought the werewolf was cool, but he wasn’t even close to you.”

“Really?” I hadn’t tried to talk while in my Vaktare form yet. It was difficult. The shape of my mouth was different, and it felt odd.

I touched my face and scratched myself.

“Yes.” Jesse came toward me.

I realized I’d backed myself into a corner.

He stuck out his hand. “May I?”

I shook my head. I didn’t want him to pet me. I wasn’t an animal.

Well, actually, yes you are. You’ve got the paws to prove it, I thought.

“Come on, please.” Jese reached out a hand.

I batted it away with my paw.

He laughed. Then sat down in front of me. Was that a show of submission or at least a sign that I had nothing to fear?

Either way, it helped.

Professor Pops and Troy were quiet, but they also approached slowly.

It made me feel weird, like how an animal in a zoo might feel.

Yeah, come check out the werecat.

She’s soft and fluffy and may just purr if you pet her.

I roared and hissed, showing my teeth, feeling the hair on the back of my neck stand.

Professor Pops and Troy froze.

Jesse moved closer. “You can’t hurt me, Beatrice. If you’re angry or scared, take it out on me.” His eyes turned a darker gray.

“Who do you think would win in a fight between a werecat and a gargoyle?” I asked, timidly.

Jesse laughed. “A gargoyle, for sure.”

I chuffed, a noise that sounded like a cat.

Troy seemed to perk up at the prospect of a fight.

“Should we find out? Test your strength?” Jesse asked.

He still sat cross-legged on the floor.

Professor Pops chuckled. “I think we’ll need a bigger room.” He went over to the back wall.

The dragon had covered most of it, but with the head gone and the awkward way the rest of its body was turned, he had at least some access.

He pressed an area on the wall a little above his head and a door popped open.

“What’s in there?” Troy asked, his interest causing him to forget how close he was to me.

I batted at him with one of my paws. His skin turned a strange color for the briefest second - almost gold. Troy glanced at his arm and then me. “Sorry, Bea.” He backed away.

Professor Pops called Jesse and me over. “Let’s go.”

Jesse went first and I followed him, swishing my tail. I decided I liked it. It helped me feel the vibrations of moving objects.

Troy and Professor Pops had already disappeared through the door.

Jesse stopped at the door.

I peered inside and noticed it led to set of stairs.

More stairs, I thought, uncomfortable with the prospect of going further down.

“You want to go down there?” he asked, his voice soft and kind.

I smacked him on the back with my tail. “Might as well.”

There was room enough that Jesse and I walked down the steps side-by-side.

Jesse rested a hand on my back.

My first instinct was to attack, and my body tensed.

But then he ran his fingers through my fur. It felt amazing. I lifted my body into his hand.

“Your fur is really soft. The werewolf fur in Professor Pops’ Museum was wiry and tough. Prickly.”

“Maybe it’s a cat thing? The Locanis may have prickly fur.”

“That’s possible.”

We reached the bottom on the stairs.

There was a door, but it was propped open.

We went in.

The room was vast, like, bigger than a football field.

The ceiling was really high, probably thirty feet.

“How deep underground are we?” I asked, thinking the room must’ve been created with magic.

“I have no idea. I didn’t even know this room existed.” Jesse still stroked my fur.

It felt really, really good. I caught myself almost purring twice.

That was annoying, but I liked the way it felt too much to make him stop.

I needed him to though.

It was hard to focus on anything but his hand.

So, I stepped out of his reach.

“Awww,” Jesse said.

“I won’t have you beat me because I can’t concentrate.”

“Understood.”

The floor was a strange material. It was cool against my paws, like concrete, but it had more give. The walls were covered in paintings of supernatural creatures.

There was a large dragon, several vampires, a troll, a black unicorn, an elf, and other creatures I hadn’t ever seen, including a human-looking girl with black wings.

The ceiling appeared to be made of concrete and was covered in dozens of large fluorescent lights.

OceanofPDF.com

INSTINCT WINS

"THIS IS AMAZING," Jesse said.

"I know, right," Troy agreed. He and Professor Pops were tossing a football back and forth.

"Why didn't you tell us this was here?" Jesse asked, turning in a circle, fascinated by the vastness.

"I have my reasons," Professor Pops said, and chucked the football at Troy.

Troy caught it and tossed it back.

"A long time ago, I used this for training. No one's been down here in years." Professor Pops caught the football and tossed it to Jesse. "I think it's time to open it up again. Don't you?"

"Or at least add a space like this below the Seven Magics Academy."

"What's that?" I sat on my hind legs, curling my tail around my front paws.

"A school where those with supernatural abilities go to learn. It's in Sharra, a realm outside the human one," Troy answered, his eyes shining. "I go there too."

"That's cool." The whole idea of different realms was weirdest of all. I struggled to wrap my brain around the concept.

"I'm going to go there too, once I figure out what's happening with me," Jesse added. He held up his hands, telling Troy to throw him the ball. "This space is really awesome."

I detected a hint of worry in his voice. What was he nervous about?

Troy clapped his hands and rubbed them together. "Who's going to make the first move?" His eyes sparkled with excitement as he caught the football and tucked it under one arm.

If I hadn't known what was going on, I would've assumed Troy was talking about Jesse and me making out.

Jesse snickered, giving me a half-smile, and I knew he was thinking the same thing. "I don't think we should do this. Who knows when you'll change back and I -" He stopped, tugging on his ear.

"You are worried you'll hurt me," I finished for him.

"Yes." He lowered his gaze to the floor.

Professor Pops heard the interchange. "Hang on." He jogged over to one of the walls and pushed. A click sounded and the wall opened.

"Another room?" Jesse asked.

"It's where we kept weapons and where I found that football." Professor Pops slid the wall behind the one next to it and turned on the light.

It wasn't very big. Inside were a few swords, a couple of sticks, and some free weights.

"Darn, nothing in here will work," Professor Pops said.

"I can't hold a weapon anyway. I have paws." I stood on my back legs and stuck out my paws.

"Okay, well how about Rocky turns himself to stone and we see if Beatrice can scratch it," Troy said, frustrated that Jesse and I weren't just going at it.

Jesse shrugged. "I can do that." He obviously wanted to make Troy happy.

Before I could blink, he went from Jesse with black hair and gray eyes to Jesse with white hair and black eyes. "Go ahead, try to scratch me."

I walked over. In my werecat form I was taller than Jesse.

He whistled and gave me a once-over. "You're seriously impressive."

I tried to smile, but my lips felt weird against my giant, sharp teeth.

“Do it. As hard as you can.” Jesse dropped his arms to his sides.

I took a swipe at his arm. The ends of my sharp claws raked across his abdomen, but it was like striking rock. “Did you feel that?" I said.

He shook his head. “A tickle from a feather. Do it again and this time mean it. Who are you angry at?”

Beck’s face came into view. It seemed he held my happiest memory as well as my angriest.

I swiped at Jesse again, this time putting my legs into it.

Jesse went flying, landing on the ground. He quickly got up, unhurt.

“Nice,” Troy shouted.

Professor Pops remained quiet. Watching in earnest.

“Now, Rocky, go after her,” Troy said.

Jesse came closer. The black lines across his gargoyle face pulsed furiously. His eyes glared, pitch black.

“Rocky, huh?” I asked, trying to lighten the mood.

“Yeah.” He tapped his knuckles against his head. Smiling maliciously, he said, “My turn.” Before I realized what was happening, his fist slammed into my head.

I shook back and forth as a strange sound left my throat. His fist against my face hadn’t hurt, but it’d made me momentarily dizzy.

“Again,” Troy shouted.

Jesse punched me in the face with his other hand. This time I moved slightly. But something unexplainable happened within.

All my feelings and needs took a back seat to one thing.

Instinct.

Without thought, I jumped on Jesse, pinning his body to the ground as I went after his throat. I wasn’t prepared for how hard his skin would be and I wasn’t able to grab hold.

He punched me in the stomach and used his feet to send me flying over his head. I flipped in the air and landed on my feet with a thud, my claws scraping into the ground as I slid backward.

Jesse's features were twisted and furious.

"Control your rage," I heard Professor Pops shout.

I didn't think he was talking to me. My emotions simmered in the background, but my instinct had full control.

Jesse's eyes blinked and I knew the professor was talking to him. He got out of his fighting stance and turned, walking to the exit.

"Jesse," I called. But he disappeared up the steps. I took a deep breath, wondering if I should go after him.

Pops and Troy were talking to each other in low tones.

I ignored them, feeling my body, and trying to get used to the Vaktare form.

Within minutes, my instincts simmered and allowed my humanity to return to the forefront.

I was sad. I hadn't meant to make Jesse mad. I didn't want our friendship to end the same day it began. I noticed something else. My body was about to shift.

And then I'd be naked.

"Oh no."

I glanced at Professor Pops and then I ran. Across the field made of strange concrete, through the door, and up, up, up the stairs.

My face already felt human.

I burst through the opening to the Museum for the Supernatural, slamming the door into the dragon body, knocking it over. My body changed as I stepped into the weapon's room.

"This whole naked thing is not cool," I whispered, opening the drawers, and grabbing clothes. I'd have to replenish the workout clothes before I left.

When I was dressed, I sat on the cot.

It groaned and I remembered that I'd broken it.

"Crap." Tears stung my lashes. I knew it was because I was sad about Jesse, but I was also frustrated with Beck.

Why hadn't he texted me?

"I need some freaking food and water."

"Sorry about that, Beatrice. Sometimes I can be insensitive." Professor Pops stood in the opening to the weapons room. "You must be starving."

I nodded, swiftly wiping at the tears, and exiting the weapons room.

Troy reached the top step out of the enormous room and shut the door.

He studied the dragon body.

For the tiniest second Troy's body seemed to change from tanned skin to dragon scales that matched that of the destroyed one in front of him.

I blinked; not sure I'd seen what I thought I saw.

His skin was back to normal.

"Next time, there'll be a feast before the fight so you can keep up your energy," Troy said, patting me on the shoulder.

"Where's Jesse?" I asked.

Professor Pops said he was the only one with the key.

Professor Pops glanced around the room. "Did you check the bathroom?"

I hadn't.

Professor Pops took the key from around his neck and handed it to Troy. "Take Beatrice upstairs and make her some breakfast."

OceanofPDF.com

STEAK A LA RAW

TROY OPENED HIS MOUTH, probably ready to complain, but Professor Pops' eyes flashed red.

"Fine." Troy unlocked the door.

I followed him as he stomped up the stairs, his shoulders tense.

He didn't speak until we reached the kitchen. "I'm like the maid. Sure, I'm the hottest damn maid you've ever seen, but still a maid." He put on a masculine brown apron, went to the refrigerator, and pulled out a steak wrapped in paper. He tossed it on the counter. Next, he got a pan out of the drawer under the oven and slammed it on the stove burner.

I sat on one of the barstools and watched, working hard not to smile.

He had no idea how difficult being a maid could be. "Totally hot," I said, working to keep a straight face.

He swore and kept working but took the time to flash me a heart-stopping smile.

I decided to give him a minute to calm down.

The kitchen was homey. The appliances were stainless steel.

White curtains hung in the windows.

Climbing ivy grew all along the wall near the back door. There was a bowl of fruit in the center of the counter. The granite was tan with flecks in brown, pearl, red, and black. The cupboards were painted an off white, making the room appear huge and bright.

"At least Professor Pops is nice to you," I said when he'd stopped slamming cupboards and drawers.

"You call this nice?" Troy took a butter knife, sliced some butter, and plopped it into the pan. He opened the paper around the steak.

Between the smell of melting butter and the steak, my mouth started watering. Troy sprinkled salt and pepper on the steak, rubbed it in and then slapped it into the pan. The meat immediately began to sizzle.

“You seem like a pro, and it smells delicious.” I crossed my arms, wondering if I should tell him that I liked the meat almost raw.

After a minute, Troy picked up a pair of tongs and flipped the steak over. “Yeah, well I have to be the pro because I’m the only one who cooks. If I didn’t no one would eat anything but peanut butter and jelly sandwiches.”

He removed a plate from the cupboard next to the refrigerator, placed it on the counter then grabbed a bottle of what I guessed was olive oil and drizzled a little over the plate. When he finished, he took some fresh basil, gave it a rough chop, sprinkled it over the olive oil and finished by slapping the meat on it. “There you go, Steak a’ la Raw.”

I couldn’t hold the laugh in any longer, but I covered my mouth to stifle it.

He glared, his hands on his hips. Then he laughed too. “I really like cooking, but it’s fun to be mad at Pops.” He gave me a fork and a steak knife. “Try it, see how it tastes.”

I cut into the meat and stuck it into my mouth. “Mmmmm,” I said, chewing. Then swallowed. “It’s delicious.” I cut another bite.

“Good.” Troy went about cleaning the utensils and pan.

In between bites I watched.

He was tall and lean. He had muscle though. His biceps flexed as he scrubbed the counters. His hair was cut close to his head and nearly the same color as mine, maybe a little blonder. His eyes were brown, and he was tan.

Ashley, Eva, and Cassidy would fall all over themselves for his attention.

Every once in a while, he brushed his forehead and I wondered why. He caught me staring, so I asked.

“I just got my hair cut and I can still feel phantom strands of it hanging in my face.” He smiled big and I noticed there was a dimple in one cheek. He whipped the dishtowel over his shoulder. Basically, Troy was adorable.

“The haircut looks nice on you.”

“Thanks.” He leaned over the counter and watched me take a bite. “So, what was it like to fight Rocky? You were awesome, by the way. I didn’t think anyone could take him. Some of us want Snow to fight him. I think she could beat anyone, but of course, she won’t even hear of it.”

“Snow?” I asked, cutting another piece.

“You haven’t heard of her?”

I shook my head, intrigued. It seemed Troy had a serious crush on her.

“She’s seriously kick a - ”

“You are so whipped, Troy Boy,” Jesse said as he walked in. He’d changed and was wearing a white tank top and another pair of loose-fitting jeans. His black hair shone, wet. I guessed he showered.

“Dude, she’s awesome,” Troy said, standing straight.

Jesse chuckled. “She seems nice,” he said.

Troy made a strange noise. “I suppose you want me to fix you something too?” Troy asked, feigning irritation.

Jesse shrugged. “Nah.” He glanced at me.

I froze mid-bite, waiting to see if he was still angry. “I need to speak to Beatrice alone, if that’s okay.”

“Kicking me out?” Troy threw the dishtowel on the counter and walked out. “No respect,” he mumbled.

I smiled after him.

Jesse sat on the barstool next to mine. He clasped his hands together and was staring at them like he expected them to do a trick or fall off.

I took another bite, waiting. Apparently, he had anger issues and I didn't want to set him off.

"Sorry, Beatrice," Jesse said, his words tight.

I placed my fork on the empty plate and walked it over to the sink. It was more than I'd ever done in the kitchen. Then I turned back to him. Part of me wanted to hold a grudge. He'd hurt my feelings. But he seemed to be beating himself up more than I ever could. And I really did like him.

"I didn't mean to make you angry," I said.

Jesse shook his head. "I let down my guard." He blew out a harsh breath. "You're the first girl I've ever felt comfortable talking to." He crushed his hands together. "You can imagine how this - " he slapped his chest, "went over with the ladies."

I thought about it. If he'd been a student at my school prior to the curse, or the reverse curse, I would've been horrible to him. Just awful.

"I'm sure it wasn't easy," I admitted softly.

"It wasn't, which is why I stayed away from people. I never let anyone touch me. But in the space of an hour, we touched, laughed together, and you didn't run away or look at me with disgust - or turn to stone." His eyes were alight with wonder. "You're a special person, Beatrice."

I felt my face get hot. It was a compliment I hadn't believed I ever wanted to hear.

Jesse needed to understand I'd been the meanest person ever. "I was a total bitch in high school. I treated everyone with disrespect, but especially those who were different. I was truly beastly to them. And I never felt anything." I glanced away, ashamed.

"So, this curse has allowed you become all of who you are?"

“I guess so.” I hadn't thought about it that way. I moved closer to him. “If you’d met me a week ago, you would’ve been sickened by my behavior.”

OceanofPDF.com

A SURPRISE VISIT

JESSE PLACED A HAND OVER MINE. His was cool and hard. Certainly not repulsive. “When I’m around people I tend to bring out the worst in them. Over the years I’ve developed a really short temper.”

I tried to imagine him in high school. Had he turned someone to stone?

“Luckily,” he went on, “my abilities didn’t start to manifest until I turned sixteen.” He tugged his ear. “The first time I touched someone, and she started turning to stone, I ran away. Professor Pops found me in California. He went through all the channels to legally adopt me.” He shrugged. “That’s pretty much it.”

“Well except that in the battle between a Vaktare and a Gargoyle, the Vaktare totally won.” I did a little barstool dance and made a face.

Jesse shook his head. “Rematch?”

I laughed. “Maybe later, definitely not now. It was scary.” I had a feeling if he would’ve stayed and continued to fight, I wouldn’t be sitting on a chair dancing.

“We can wait a week, I guess. Then it’s round two.” He flashed me a brilliant smile.

“Deal.” I put my other hand over his. “I’m so glad we met, Jesse. You’re amazing.”

Jesse’s stormy eyes studied mine. “I feel the same way about you.” He leaned in as though he wanted to kiss me.

I didn’t want to anger him again, but I wasn’t ready. Gently, I put a hand on his chest. “I’m not ready for that,” I whispered.

Jesse whipped out of the chair. “Afraid I might turn you to rock? Don’t worry, it only happens when I want it to. I can control it.” He smacked the bowl of fruit off the counter. The bowl shattered and fruit went everywhere.

I stood. “No, Jesse. That isn’t it. There’s - ”

Troy walked into the kitchen. “Jesse, chill. There’s someone here to see Beatrice.”

“Really?” I wondered who it could be. No one knew I was here.

“Hello, Beatrice.”

“Beck,” I breathed his name like I needed him to survive.

He strode in confidently.

The lights from the kitchen lit him up.

My heart froze. I’d never been so eager and so petrified to see someone in my whole life.

“Hi.” Our kiss flashed through my mind, and I felt myself blush. “What - How did you get here?” I knew he hated to fly. Had he driven?

Or did he run the whole way in his Locanis form?

“I drove,” he said, coming around the counter. “It’s good to see you.” Beck’s blue eyes sparkled with happiness.

He wouldn’t look so happy if he intended to kill me, right? Or maybe he was happy because he was close enough to commit murder.

I shivered. “I’m surprised you’re here. I thought you were going to stay in Utah and wait for my return.” The speed of my heart picked up.

Beck came close and leaned in. “There’s something I need to discuss with you.”

“Do you mind, we were in the middle of a conversation,” Jesse snapped, putting his hand on Beck’s shoulder.

Beck grabbed Jesse’s hand and spun away from him.

I was surprised he could move like that. I knew Beck was strong because he’d carried me from the pool up to my room, but that was different than having fighting skills. Not to mention Jesse was hard and sturdy as a giant boulder.

He’s a werewolf, that’s why he can fight, I thought.

Jesse’s hair started to change, and I knew I needed calm him down.

“Let’s go.” I grabbed Beck’s hand and dragged him out of the kitchen toward the front door.

Troy followed us. "You need backup?"

"No, thanks." I shook my head. “Tell Professor Pops I’ll be back.”

“Yep,” he said coming around us and opening the door.

Beck went outside but I paused, worried about Jesse.

He'd stormed from the kitchen and out of sight.

“And could you tell Jesse I’ll see him soon? Please?” A loud clatter sounded from above and I flinched.

Troy patted my arm. “He’ll be fine.” He gave me his mega-watt smile. “Jesse just needs to break a few things and then he’ll be back to his mellow self.” He chuckled at his own joke, and I laughed with him.

“It was so great to meet you, Troy.”

He winked. “Maybe one day we can see who would win in a battle between a Vaktare and a dragon?”

I felt my eyes get big. Was he trying to tell me something? “Are you - ” I began, but he put a finger over his lips.

“Say no more. Even the trees have ears.” He referred to the fact that it was against the law for supernatural creatures to live in the human realm.

And I was a supernatural creature.

That meant I was against the law.

Where would I go? Was that why my parents were gone? They'd been taken to supernatural jail.

"Right. Let's talk again soon," I said, knowing Troy didn't have the answers.

"You better believe it," Troy responded.

I went down the steps. Beck was already at the car. He had driven the Lykan after all. I was glad to see he'd told the truth about that. Beck opened the passenger door.

I climbed in.

Troy waved. "See ya."

Beck closed the door. I waved through the window.

"Where are we going?" I asked.

He kept silent while the motor roared to life, and he peeled out of the driveway.

I waited, giving him a chance to say whatever he needed to say.

We got on the interstate.

He weaved in and out of traffic like the rest of the cars weren't moving. I held on for dear life and was about to demand he let me out when he pulled off the interstate into Boston.

A few minutes later he pulled the car up to the entrance of the Boston Plaza.

As soon as Beck put the car in Park a guy in a hotel uniform came up to the car and opened the door.

I got out.

He gave me a once-over and I remembered I was shoeless, had barely freshened up in two days, and still wore the black workout clothes.

"Welcome to the Boston Plaza," the guy said, a question in his voice.

"Thank you," I muttered.

Beck handed the guy his keys. "Drive it carefully. No scratches or dents, okay?"

"Yes, sir," the guy said, climbing into the car.

Even though whatever Beck needed to say was urgent, he still took the time to watch the Lykan drive out of sight.

We walked into the hotel lobby and up to the front desk.

A perky blond was behind the desk.

When I walked over, she stopped typing on her keyboard, gave me a once-over, and turned back to her computer screen. “Can I help you?”

It didn’t matter that I looked like a homeless person and probably smelled like one too. I was also Beatrice Cavanaugh.

The receptionist’s nametag said her name was Diane.

I slammed my fist against the counter, causing Diane to jump. “Yes, Diane you can. My name is Beatrice Cavanaugh. You have a reservation for me, and I’d like to check in.”

She typed some information into her computer. “I’m seeing a reservation for a Beatrice Cavanaugh checking in last night, but she never arrived, so the reservation was cancelled.” She glanced up. “The room is now gone and I'm afraid we're full.” She smirked.

OceanofPDF.com

SWEAR AN OATH

I WAS ABOUT to slam my fist again, but someone grabbed it. I gasped.

Beck patted my hand, taking it, and tucking it under his arm. “Diane, my name is Beck Haddox. I’m here to check in.”

She smiled. “Let me check.” After a few seconds, she said, “It looks like you’re in the suite.” She winked. “I’ll just need a credit card and a driver’s license.”

“Right.” He took his wallet out of his back pocket, opened it, and handed her the black American Express card I’d given him, along his driver’s license.

Diane took them, casually brushing her fingers against his hand and smiling.

If I hadn’t been in complete shock, I might’ve punched her. Instead, I clamped my mouth shut, held on to Beck’s arm and waited while Diane did whatever she had to do.

“Please sign here,” she said, placing a piece of paper on the counter in front of Beck.

He did.

She handed him a key card. “Take the elevator to the top floor. Do you have luggage?”

“Not now. Thank you.” Beck pressed his hand into my lower back and steered me toward the elevator.

Something about his behavior brought back all my worries from the previous night and I wondered again if he really was the same “Beck” mentioned in the histories my parents wrote.

The thought hit me with such paralyzing force that I stumbled, only just catching myself before I hit the highly polished floor.

Reaching out, Beck righted me, a look of apparent concern that situated on his gorgeous face. But was it genuine?

A tiny voice at the back of my mind told me to get away from Beck now.

But my thoughts were spiraling so completely out of control that I was helpless to escape.

I allowed myself to be led, barely noticing the beautiful ceramic floors or the way the sun struck the chandelier, making thousands of tiny rainbows dance everywhere. I barely knew when we entered the elevator and felt Beck guide me to the room.

When we were inside the suite, the first words out of my mouth were, “Are you going to kill me now?”

Beck walked us over to the couch. “No, Beatrice.” He shook his head. “Why would you say that?”

Relief punched through me when I heard his words, and instantly transformed to wariness. Could I really trust him? I still wasn’t sure.

I debated going into it, telling him everything I’d read. It was the perfect time. But when I opened my mouth, nothing came out. I pulled my hands from his grasp and walked over to the windows, checking out the view of the city.

“Why are you here?” I finally asked, deciding to start with that.

Beck came to stand beside me. “After you left, later that night a group of werewolves surrounded the mansion. They got in and ransacked everything. They seemed to be looking for something. Isaac, Mrs. Dotts and I tried to fend them off, but in the end, it was no use and I told them to hide.” He seemed to struggle with the words. Something still felt off.

Ask him! Ask him if he’s the Locanis who tried to kill your parents and stole your father’s medallion, I thought.

“Are Isaac and Mrs. Dotts okay? What about the other servants?”

“Yeah, they’re fine.” He leaned in and despite my fears I still wanted him to kiss me.

Except not yet. I stepped away, needing distance to keep my emotions in check. “Did the Locanis find what they were looking for?” I picked up a magazine and flipped through it before setting it back down. I hadn’t seen a word on the page.

Beck ran a hand through his hair. “I don’t know.” He sighed. “Once I knew they were gone, I sent Isaac and Mrs. Dotts to stay in a hotel and then I came after you.” He tried to grab my hand, but I pulled away.

“What’s wrong? Is it that Jesse kid? I can tell he’s different. His hand was hard as rock. And I can tell he likes you, which is completely understandable.” Beck gave me a sideways smile.

It was a new look and I realized I didn’t really know Beck at all. Probably even less than Jesse.

“No, it’s not that.” I wished I had the guts to ask him.

But if he knew I knew the truth, would he try to kill me right away?

“Tell me why you’re really here.” I swallowed my nerves and tried to remember I was a vicious werecat that could take on a gargoyle.

Beck took a deep breath. “It’s just so difficult to explain. When I first met you, it was -” He walked back over to the window. “But I’m weak.” He punched the wall, and his fist went right through it. “Shit.” He pulled his fist from the plaster, shaking his hand. That was going to cost a bunch to fix. Hotels normally didn’t take kindly to their suites getting destroyed.

Beck went on, “I thought it would be easy to - ”

A howl echoed above the honking of horns, and the buzz of the city. It reverberated off the walls and seemed to sink into my toes.

“Stinking dogs,” I hissed.

Beck froze and I suddenly felt bad. “You heard that?”

“Yes, I heard it,” I spat, a ball of anger superseding my fear. I couldn't hold in what I knew any longer. “I know why you’re here.

You're supposed to kill me." I slammed my fists into his chest and he fell to his knees.

"I bet Celeste isn't even your real mother. You didn't come to my house to pay a debt. You came to kill me." When he didn't move, I glared, shooting daggers with my eyes. "Too bad you didn't finish the job while my mom was still pregnant with me."

Angry tears fell onto my cheeks, hot and wet.

He hadn't denied my allegations and his silence spoke much louder than any words.

"If you'd succeeded you wouldn't have had to waste your precious time coming after me now, pretending to like me and kissing -" A sob ripped out of my throat.

I put my hand over my mouth.

He still hadn't tried to get up.

"It was all a lie." I fell to my knees in front of him, unable to stop myself from pressing my cheek against his chest. "I don't even know you, do I?" The last words came out as a whisper. It felt like my heart was breaking.

Beck took hold of my arms and held me back, then took my face in his hands. "Beatrice." His eyes searched mine. He was scared. "Please, believe me when I say I'm sorry. I didn't know you when I agreed to the plan."

I heard his words but didn't understand them. I was drowning in pain. "You should've killed me, you stupid, stupid -" I thought of vilest word I could call him. "Dog."

"Beatrice." He spoke my name again softly.

"Shut up. Just shut up. If you want to kill me, do it."

"I'm not going to kill you, Beatrice."

My pulse responded to his words by speeding up. My breath came out in gasps.

Beck shook me. "I swear an oath on Altuatha." His eyes dropped to my lips. I licked them. “You can trust me.”

OceanofPDF.com

DO WHAT I MUST

I WANTED to ask him who the hell Altuatha was but there were other more pressing matters.

Beck growled, pulling my face toward him.

Even on our knees he towered over me.

He tugged my chin upward and slammed his lips into mine.

I clawed at his face, but he just kissed me harder, deeper.

It only took a few moments and my own body betrayed me, and I was sighing. Freaking sighing into his kiss.

There was desperation and raw desire that flamed his movements.

I was suddenly in Beck's arms and on the bed.

His hands found their way under my shirt. I clung to him, wrapping my legs around his hips.

Beck. Beck. Beck. My mind kept repeating his name. Each letter filling up the ache in my heart. He had no intention of killing me.

I pulled his shirt from his pants so that I could feel his warm skin.

Another howl permeated the air around us.

"Okay, that one was closer." Beck quickly jumped up and ran to the window, pushing back one curtain.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Maybe nothing." Beck grabbed my hands, helping me stand.

My thighs were shaking. His eyes were hard with ferocity, and he gave me a little shake. "You can trust me," he said again, repeating his words from before.

"Trust?" I snorted. "Do you even know what that word means?"

Beck released my hands. "Yes, Beatrice I do. I trusted your father when he promised to protect my mom and my sister. But when my mother was killed by his father, Fisher did nothing." The words ripped from his throat, and his agony hung in the air like a tangible thing.

"So, I was right. Celeste wasn't your mom," I muttered softly.

Beck went back to the window. I moved closer as a strong desire to comfort him swept through me.

"I have no idea who that woman is." He brushed a hand through his hair. "It was my job to infiltrate, destroy, and bring back the pendant." He closed the curtains and moved over to the couch in the living area. "I've been studying your family for a long time, and when I saw Celeste being taken away by the police, I used the situation to my advantage."

My heart pounded in my ears. "Did you kill my mom and dad?" The words came out barely above a whisper. I hadn't wanted to ask, but I needed to know.

He crossed him arms. "No," he said, his gaze holding mine. "I would have." He paused and started to pace. "Except they'd already vanished." He glanced at me.

I felt my mouth open and close as questions rose and fell from my lips in silence.

His jaw clenched. "Fisher always was a coward."

That pissed me off. I walked over and slapped his face. "How dare you speak like that about my dad?"

A wisp of a smile played on his lips. "When Fisher used the spell to allow you to cross realms, it took away all the best parts of you. For eighteen years your parents gave you everything, but you felt nothing. You may look human but you're not. You're Vaktare and not just any Vaktare, but of royal blood. On your birthday, when you were busy being a total bitch to your friends, you should've been in Hiraken preparing for your vision quest, allowing your people to see that you would stand against the terrible things still going on in your land." He was fuming, barely able to contain his emotions.

"My what? Do what?" I was seething too, my breathing coming in ragged gasps.

“It’s a journey you take into the Fyrge desert and discover what your ability is.”

“Oh,” I said, feeling somehow right about that. “But not if your kind killed us all. I read the history. That was what the Locanis wanted. To destroy all Vaktare, to take Hiraken for themselves. I thought my kind were all dead.” I knew it wasn’t true even though I’d said the words. Obviously, there were more Vaktare alive than my parents first believed. Still, I didn’t know what to do. I watched Beck silently, my fingers gripped in fists, but the position felt awkward.

So, I walked away.

Beck swore. “Most of the Locanis wanted to kill all Vaktare, that’s true, and we nearly succeeded. But what’s also true is that most Vaktare wanted the Locanis to continue to be their slaves.” He stopped in front of me. “Slaves, Beatrice.”

I blinked and backed away. "You're lying."

Beck didn't deny my accusation but went on, “They thought of us as lesser creatures because we are born without magical abilities.”

I closed my eyes and wrapped my arms around myself. “Where did my mom and dad stand on the matter?” For some reason the answer to that question was very important to me.

“Lenora was completely against enslaving us. Fisher was next in line to be king. He’d been raised by his tyrannical father, but -” Beck sighed. “I don’t believe he wanted to treat us the way his father did. I believe he would have been a much better king.”

I opened my eyes.

Beck’s face had softened. He was watching me. “I call him a coward because he didn’t stand up to Kevoney. He didn’t stand up for what was right. He was too afraid.”

“Did you ever think he ran away not because he was afraid to stand up for what was right, but because he wanted to save his wife and daughter?" I didn't know what Beck's deal was, but I needed answers, and he was finally giving them.

"What about the pendant? My dad said you stole it from him." I moved over to the window. It was early afternoon but I thought I might still be able to see the moon.

"When Fisher jumped realms, my claws caught hold of the pendant. I took it and more." His face fell. "I took his ability as well."

So, it was Beck who stole my dad's powers. I remembered the black cat saying something about that the night he tried to kill me.

"Why would you do that?" I wanted to be angry, but I couldn't.

Beck sighed heavily. "That wasn't my intention." He came to stand beside me. "I don't know how it happened. Needless to say, being a werewolf with the ability to cast spells has made me the topic of a lot of conversation. In fact, my ability ended the war. I thought it would be a good thing. That perhaps the Vaktare and Locanis could truly become equals once again."

He laughed but it was without joy. "Some even believed I was the one your medicine woman spoke about. He shook his head. "When it became apparent I wasn't, I was reassigned to the position of glorified assassin. It seemed the new King believed that was all my powers were good for." He blew out his breath, frustrated. "After nearly ten years a few of the lower Vaktare and some Locanis formed a secret society."

"What kind of society?"

Beck smiled. "They are called the Society of Believers. They stole some of our most intelligent scientists, giving them access to Vaktare and Locanis victims with the sole desire to do what I did by accident - take abilities from the Vaktare and implant them in the Locanis?"

I gasped. "Has it worked?"

OceanofPDF.com

UNCONTROLLED ABILITY

HE SHOOK HIS HEAD. “They haven’t found a way - yet.”

“So, if you want nothing to do with this secret society and their ways, why did you agree to come here and kill my family and me?”

Beck stuffed his hands in his pockets. “The Society has my sister. She wasn’t killed during the last war, but they’ve sworn to kill her if I don’t murder the last of the Cavanaughs.”

My heart sank. That was sad. “Then do you even have a choice?”

His teeth ground together. “The first day I met you, I knew I could kill you. I wanted to. You were -” He paused, shaking his head and releasing a dark laugh. “Not the kindest person. You reminded me a lot of your grandfather.”

I hung my head. “I know. I was a total bitch. The only reason I agreed to hire you was so I could make you suffer.” I snorted bitterly. “I wanted you to become as beastly as I was.” I made a face. “Guess I’m too late. You’re quite beastly all on your own.” For some reason that made me laugh hard so hard I started to cry, which was weird, but totally what happened. “Anyway, sorry. Was it my sparkling personality that changed your mind?”

Beck pulled me to him. His eyes smoldered and kept going from my lips and back to my eyes. “That was part of it. Mostly it was your hot body.”

I held my breath, waiting to see what he would do next.

Beck chuckled. “Breathe, Beatrice.” His fingers caressed my cheeks. “When I showed up the next day, you were different. Then I found out your enchantment had somehow been removed and I was finally meeting the real you. Right away I knew you were different, special, spectacular.” He lifted my face to his. “Once upon a time there was a dog that fell in love with a cat."

My face burned and tingles raced along my skin. "Love?" I asked, releasing my breath.

Beck's lips touched mine and caressed them tenderly.

I responded, unable to deny the feelings burning along my veins.

He wrapped me in his arms, pulling me against him, deepening the kiss.

I clutched his shoulders, in too much shock to do anything more than enjoy every second. Because despite everything, I wanted him.

But the Vaktare and Locanis weren't supposed to procreate.

It was one of the laws I read about in the history my parents wrote.

According to them, any children created between the two species would be considered demon spawn.

Still, Beck and I weren't procreating, we were kissing, and the kissing was amazing.

Our kiss intensified. His hands left my waist and went into my hair. It was a mess, I knew. I hadn't brushed it in I didn't know how long, but at that moment, with his fingers twisting the strands and tugging near my scalp, it filled me with desire.

My emotions were a whirlwind of need and want and longing. As the seconds passed, a small wind began to blow around us. It lifted the edges of my hair, soft and billowing. At first. But the more passionate the kiss I became, the stronger the wind blew until Beck paused.

"Are you doing that?" he asked.

The curtains whipped and knocked a picture off the wall. Beck's eyes grew big. "It is you. It's your ability. You can control the elements."

I nodded, feeling a small surge of excitement that was immediately eclipsed by fear. "I'm not controlling anything. It's happening all on its own. How do I make it stop?"

He shook his head. "I don't know. It was your mom's ability too. If she were here, she could tell you."

My body started to shake. The wind was getting stronger, and a dark cloud began to form above us. In the room! "How do you stop your ability?" I had to shout against the noise of the storm.

He yanked me back into his arms and whispered against my ear, "Breathe in through your nose. Out through your mouth. Think calming thoughts."

A shiver ran down my spine and it started to rain.

Freaking rain, inside the hotel room.

Beck kissed my cheek. "Beatrice, you need to calm down. Use the animal part of yourself to control the ability. They are connected, one helps balance the other out."

I wanted to tell him that it was his touch, his breath in my ear, his lips on my cheek, and the way his body curled with mine, that were putting my emotions into a passionate frenzy.

I couldn't though.

All I could think about were his hands roaming my body, his lips on my neck, and more.

For the first time in my life, I wanted to go all the way, and even though I knew I shouldn't, I couldn't change the desire coursing through me.

"Beatrice." His voice was tinged with worry now. He let go of me and tried to step away, but I didn't want him to stop touching me.

As soon as I had the thought that he should put his hands back on my body, Beck obeyed.

Beck's eyes went from amused worry to serious uneasiness.

"Did you do that?" He tried to pull his hands from me, but they wouldn't budge.

My teeth chattered. I wanted to believe it wasn't me forcing him to continue to touch me.

"Maybe. I don't know." I shivered, unable to stop.

Rain soaked through my hair and my clothes and trailed down my face.

“Control it, Beatrice. Deep breaths. Calming thoughts.”

I’d never been so cold in all my life. Or scared.

I nodded and took a deep breath. Blew it out. It didn’t help.

Thunder rumbled across the cloud as though mocking me. “It isn’t working,” I said, crying, my tears mixing with the rain. “Help me, Beck. Please.”

There was a loud noise. The door to the hotel room shattered.

Wood flew everywhere, splintering against and into my skin.

“Isn’t this better than awesome?” Will walked into the room followed by three more men I’d never seen before. They all wore similar attire - black suits, white shirts, and black ties.

“Will?” The rain and wind stopped as abruptly as it started. I blinked water out of my eyes and wiped the hair off my face.

Beck’s body relaxed as the spell or whatever I’d done freed his body.

In the same second, he tensed again, growling at the men in the doorway.

“Beatrice, get out of here,” Beck said, his voice hard as steel.

One of the men standing behind Will flicked his hand and Beck’s mouth was clamped shut.

“What’s happening?” My gaze flashed between Will and Beck.

Beck rushed forward, placing me behind him.

One of the men raised a palm and moved his fingers slightly.

Thick rope coiled itself so tightly around Beck’s body he fell onto his back, smashing the coffee table in the process.

Unintelligible sounds came from Beck’s throat.

His lips tried to move, and I realized he was trying to say something.

I rushed to his side, pulling at the ropes, but they wouldn't budge.

"Stop," I shouted. "Will, what is the meaning of this?"

He appeared older somehow, and the kind face he'd always shown me was completely gone.

Will's eyes glimmered bright blue and I knew. Will was the werecat that had tried to kill me a few days ago.

"You're a Vaktare." Shock chained my feet to the floor. Now I understood why Beck hadn't liked the guy. I didn't like him either.

"Bingo." Will stepped over pieces of broken glass that had been the coffee table.

Two of the three men moved to either side of Will. The one with short black hair picked Beck up and tossed him over his shoulder. Will grabbed my arm. There was a quick rush, and we were no longer in the hotel room. We were back at the Cavanaugh Mansion, standing in the entryway.

"What the freaking hell?" How had we moved so quickly? I glanced around the room, shocked because we'd gone three thousand miles in seconds.

My house was a mess of broken furniture and scattered papers.

"How did you do that?" I asked, even though I guessed it was his ability.

OceanofPDF.com

LINGER ON THE BED

"THAT'S BETTER," Will said, ignore my question.

Still, I was grateful he'd brought Beck too.

His eyes glowed but he didn't shift.

In his werewolf form, Beck could easily break the ropes.

Will went over and punched Beck in the face. Laughed. "I bet it's killing you that you can't transform."

The three men with Will joined in the laughter.

"It's because of Rhem, you know. It's his gift. He has the power to bind not just the body, but also the ability. Pretty cool, huh?" He kicked Beck in the stomach.

Beck twisted and contorted his body, trying to get out of the ropes. His eyes were twin balls of rage. I knew if he got out of those ropes, Will was dead.

Will turned away from Beck and focused on me. "Alright, let's get down to business."

"What do you want?" My voice trembled with fright. "Is this because I threw your birthday present in the pool?" That was a stupid question.

Will's eyes burned with fury for a moment and then he laughed. Addressing the three men with him he said, "She thinks I'm angry because she's a bitch."

They joined in the laughter.

"No, Bea. That definitely isn't it." He cupped my chin in his hand. "I'm not angry. Why would I be angry? I've been your friend for years. We've been a couple for the past six months. I've put up with your shit. I've been patient, supportive, and an all-around good guy. Why the hell would I be angry?"

He leaned in and kissed me, his lips hard and unfeeling.

“Don’t,” I mumbled and tried to push him away.

He squeezed my chin, keeping me still. His mouth claiming mine as he forced my mouth open.

I held still, not responding to his kiss in anyway.

Will pushed me away. “No warmth. You are one cold-blooded bitch, aren’t you?” He didn’t wait for my reply. “I did what I did to get close to you.” He grabbed hold of my head, forcing me close as he licked my lips, our noses touching.

His breath seemed to burn my skin. “Where’s the red diamond, Bea?”

“Diamond?” I asked trying to breathe.

I kept hoping I’d shift, or that I’d be able to use my abilities.

My thoughts kept going to Jesse and what he’d said. That I needed to think about something happy, that I needed to breathe deeply.

I kept trying to recall the kiss between Beck and me, but I was too scared, and the memory was marred by questions. There were trust issues as well. He’d been sent to kill me. That was a fact.

Sure, he’d chosen not to go through with it. He’d said he changed his mind when he got to know me. But what was to say he wouldn’t change his mind again? His sister’s life was at stake. If he killed me, she’d be set free. Why wouldn’t he choose her?

Will shoved me, letting go.

My head smacked against the door as I hit the ground hard.

“Give me what I want, Bea, or the wolf pays.” He nodded at Beck and two of the three men picked him up. The third, the man Will had called Rhem held out a hand and turned it slowly.

Beck started to writhe, letting out a snarl.

“Stop,” I shouted, crawling toward him.

Will grabbed me around the waist and held me fast. “If you’re a good girl and give me the diamond, maybe I can talk to the King, put in a good word. Maybe you won't have to die, maybe he'll let you be my lover." He leaned in, running his teeth against my neck.

I spat in his face. "I'd rather die." I grabbed hold of his shirt and tried to push him off.

Will pulled my hair, making my head fall back. "Oh, that's going to happen, don't worry." He bit my shoulder with mock playfulness. "Besides, I'd tire of you before too long. I mean you did fall for a worthless dog." He shoved me face-first into a wall, my head going through the plaster before he yanked me out.

My forehead was bleeding as well as my nose. I tried to reach back and scratch his arms, but it did no good. Will had me by the back of the neck and led me over to Beck.

He was still writhing. Occasionally, he would moan.

By the faraway look in Beck's eyes, I knew whatever Rhem was doing to Beck was killing him.

Then Will kicked Beck in the stomach.

The men hooted.

"If I wasn't under orders to bring his ass back alive, he'd already be dead." He kicked Beck in the face. "But there might be an accident. Sometimes shit happens, right?"

"Stop," I yelled. "I'll take you to the diamond."

Even through the pain, Beck heard me, and he seemed confused. I'd told him Celeste stole the diamond. "Sorry, Beck." Then to Will I said, "The diamond is upstairs."

Will took me by the neck and forced me to walk up with him. I didn't fight. When we got to my bedroom, Will smiled. It was sinister.

"It's in the closet," I said, pointing.

"Go get it." He shoved me and I flew forward, falling onto my hands and knees.

I crawled into my closet and over to the section where my pants hung on hangers. I pushed them aside, clicked the secret door open, and entered the safe's combination. My hands shook as I pulled on the safe's handle.

"Figures," Will said, his voice hard.

I took the diamond and stood, handing it to him.

"Let's make sure you're telling the truth." Will lifted the red stone into the light. The diamond sparkled as he turned it back and forth. "Excellent." He pocketed the gem and grabbed my arm, dragging me out of the closet. I watched his gaze linger on the bed. He licked his lips, glancing from me. "After the hell I put up with playing your boyfriend, I deserve payment." He hauled me onto the bed.

Understanding what he intended, I tried to squirm away.

Will grabbed me by the leg and forced me onto my back, pinning my body with his.

"Stop, Will. This isn't you." I tried to knee him in the groin, but he forced my legs down.

"You have no idea what I'm like, Bea. You never cared to find out." His fingers wrapped around my neck, choking the life out of me. "You never gave me a chance." He licked the side of my face, forcing my legs apart. His hands roamed my body.

Tears leaked from my eyes. I wanted strength. I wanted to shift, to claw the smile off his awful face.

"You're so weak, Beatrice. Nothing but a mewing kitten." As he spoke, he shoved a hand down my pants.

"Stop. Stop it," I cried.

My tears only made him laugh. I didn't know how I was going to get out of the situation. I didn't think it was possible. "If you do this," I said, forcing myself not to stop fighting, "I'll kill you."

His eyes grew wide. "You th -"

Will couldn't finish because something crashed through my window and rolled onto the floor. It reminded me of a large boulder.

The boulder stood and I realized it wasn't a boulder at all, but Jesse.

“Get off her!” In one breath Jesse stood and threw Will into my fireplace.

Rock and rubble rained down around Will as he fell to the floor.

OceanofPDF.com

FRIGHTENING CREATURE

"YOU OKAY?" Jesse came over and held out his hand.

I took it as a sob ripped from my throat as relief washed over me. "I am now," I said, letting him pull me into a sitting position.

Professor Pops burst through my window in the next second.

"Stand back," Professor Pops said, keeping his back to the window and directing Jesse and me to move against the wall near my headboard.

I gave Jesse a questioning look as a massive scaly dragon rammed through my window, taking out half my wall and my window seat in the process.

I yelped, grabbing hold of Jesse's solid shoulder. "What in the - "

The dragon shook himself, his large liquid eyes gazing at me. Something about them were familiar. "I can't believe Rocky gets all the credit for knocking this guy out." The dragon faced Will, who was on the floor, moaning. "Make a move, pussy cat, I'm begging ya." The dragon glanced over and winked.

I realized the dragon was Troy.

I covered my mouth, completely surprised.

"He thinks he's the shit," Jesse shouted. One look told me Jesse thought Troy was the shit too.

Troy shoved one of his talon-shaped hands against Will. "Come on. I want to fry your insides before your outsides have a chance to feel it."

I was in shock. It was a freaking-happy-to-see-them shock, but still.

Professor Pops came over. "Are you hurt, Beatrice?"

"No," I muttered, blown away by Professor Pops. He was dressed in all black, his scholarly sweater and reading glasses replaced with a katana across his back. His eyes glowed red, like Hell fire.

“Doesn’t Pops look awesome?” Jesse said, slapping Professor Pops on the back.

The Professor grinned.

“Yes, he does,” I said, trying to smile, but only succeeding in making my lips quiver. “And Troy?” He was a very large, very wicked looking bronze dragon with silver tipped wings that were folded against either shoulder.

At the mention of his name, he turned and gave me a huge dragon smile. It took my breath away.

“I’m awesome, right?” Smoke left his nostrils as he spoke. Then he turned back to Will, heckling, and prodding his limp body.

I kind of felt sorry for Will. Okay, not really.

“With the three of you here, we might stand a chance.” I pushed myself out of Jesse’s hold. “I’m so happy to see all of you. It’s Beck -”

“Where is he?” Professor Pops asked.

“In the entryway, downstairs.”

Jesse went to my bedroom door and ripped it off its hinges, leaning it against a wall.

“They’re torturing him. Please.” Thinking about the look of Beck’s face brought tears to my eyes. “Hurry.”

Troy tossed Will onto his back and settled him between his shoulder blades.

“Be careful,” I said. “He can shoot balls of light from his hands.”

Jesse snickered. “Balls, huh?”

I rolled my eyes. “Yes.”

“Got it,” Troy said, forcing his way through the door and tearing a dragon-shaped hole in the walls. I couldn’t help but be in awe of him. “I’ll try to watch out for flying balls,” he said, hefting his large body down the hall. Either side of his body grazed the walls, causing huge gashes.

“Flying balls. Duck and cover,” Jesse said, snorting.

Troy laughed.

I couldn’t believe they were joking at a time like this.

As we made our way down the stairs, I heard two of the three men talking. They were discussing what they would do with the wealth the King promised them for bringing Beck back and for killing me.

Professor Pops, Jesse and Troy heard them as well.

Troy quit laughing. So did Jesse. His hair changed from black to white and his skin pulsed with black veins. “Allow me to clean up the mess, Beatrice,” he said.

Troy followed, trying to shove past Jesse on the stairs. His scales scraped against the metal railing. It sounded like nails on a chalkboard. “Leave some for me. Dude, you can’t always be the hero.”

If I hadn’t been so worried about Beck, I would’ve laughed at the two of them.

“How many are there?” Professor Pops asked.

“Three,” I said. “And one can bind your abilities.” That thought made me worried for them.

Jesse laughed, slapping Troy’s scaled body. “No one is going to bind our abilities, right Smoky.”

“Best two out of three cleans the other’s bathroom for a month,” Troy offered.

Professor Pops chuckled. “I debated whether to bring them.”

“How did you even know where I was? What made you decide - ”

Professor Pops patted my arm. “I have my ways, Beatrice.”

I guessed it had something to do with his vampirism. “I’m glad you’re here, but how?”

“First class ride on the Boeing Troy-Seven-Seven,” Professor Pops grinned. He was a little disconcerting with his red eyes, and I had to look away. “Troy can fly like nobody’s business,” Professor Pops went on.

Roars of pain interrupted our conversation.

I rushed down the remaining stairs.

The three Vaktare had changed into their werecat forms and were on top of the dragon and the gargoyle, snarling as they fought and trying to destroy them with their teeth and claws.

The Vaktare didn't seem to be making much headway.

Rhem kept using his abilities against them and his powers did seem to slow Jesse and Troy down, but not completely.

Will was on the floor surrounded by broken glass. He was coming to. Beck was still bound with ropes, but he no longer writhed in pain. I ran to him.

"Let me get this off you," I said, pulling on chords but to no avail.

Another roar.

Professor Pops was on top of Rhem, his teeth buried in the Vaktare's neck.

The sight sickened me, and truth be told, scared the crap out of me as well.

Professor Pops might look sweet when he wore his khaki pants and sweaters, but he was really, really terrifying.

Now, he scared me even more than Rhem.

It seemed Rhem felt the same way. The Vaktare was writhing and clawing, trying to push Professor Pops off him. It wasn't doing any good.

I watched Rhem's eyes flicker. Even Troy, Jesse and the other two Vaktare stopped momentarily, watching what Professor Pops was doing.

The Vaktare in Professor Pops' grasp looked like a kitty cat next to the menacing Hunter.

I guessed by the looks on Jesse and Troy's faces that it was their first-time seeing Professor Pops as the Hunter too.

When Rhem's eyes rolled back in his head, Professor Pops pushed the lifeless body away. His fangs dripped with blood. His eyes flashed bright blood red and he smacked his lips.

"Vaktare are delicious," he said, his voice deep and dark and unlike anything I'd ever heard.

I shuddered.

Beck scooted closer, putting himself between me and the Hunter. Even bound he was still trying to protect me.

Since Beck was still tied up and unable to speak, I realized that although Rhem looked dead, he couldn't be. Otherwise, Beck would be free.

"What have you done?" Will shouted when he was conscious enough.

He stood, looking around the room.

"What the hell are they?" he asked, pointing at Troy and Jesse.

When he saw Professor Pops, he automatically took a step back.

The vampire Hunter really was the most frightening creature in the room.

OceanofPDF.com

LET GO

WILL RECOVERED AND ROARED, running like lightning past Troy, Jesse and Professor Pops. He grabbed me by the neck and lifted me off the ground. Troy, Jesse, and Professor Pops moved as one toward Will and me.

“Do not take another step, or I’ll kill her," Will said.

“We aren’t scared of you and your balls of light, kitty cat,” Troy said, smoke curling from his lips as he spoke.

Professor Pops released his fangs again. Blood still dripped from his chin and onto his clothes.

Will pulled the diamond from his pocket. It started to pulse in his fingers. “You should be,” Will said, his eyes gleaming with an almost crazed expression.

“What is that?” Jesse asked. His hair was still white, and his black veins pulsed dangerously in his gargoyle form.

Will whispered some words that made so sense to me.

A vortex began to spin in the air directly in front of him and me. “Come any closer and I’ll send her into the abyss.”

The three of them raised their hands in surrender.

Beck let out a strangled cry.

The other two Vaktare came to and stood, shaking out their fur.

Will laughed mirthlessly. “That’s what I thought.” He eyed Rhem and then Beck.

He was still on the floor, his eyes large with fear and fury.

I wished I could do something to help.

“Time to finish this.” Will shifted into his werecat form.

His clawed fingers dug into my skin.

Blood pooled in the spots where his claws touched, and I felt it drip down my chest.

Will stared into my eyes, an eerie smile twisting his face. He glanced back at Beck. “You're going to love this next part.”

I wanted to tell Beck it would be okay. That my dying would ensure his sister received her freedom. Instead, I closed my eyes, trying not to feel, not to have any emotions, to go back to the way I was before the curse, or the damned reverse curse, as Greg and Fizban called it.

In the distance I heard a phone ring.

A female voice addressed me. “Beatrice, are you just going to give up? Allow these vile beasts to defeat you?”

I searched for the source of the voice, though I knew it was Fizban. It had to be.

“Fizban,” I whispered.

Will laughed louder. “Now she’s talking to herself. Stupid cowardly bitch.”

Rhem carefully perused the room.

Will lowered me so that we were face to face. “It was nice knowing you, Bea.” He released my neck and threw something in my face. It smacked me in the forehead before falling to the ground.

I closed my eyes briefly, trying to stop the dizziness and catch my breath. When I opened them, I caught hold of what Will had thrown at me.

It was Will's birthday present. The bee I’d thrown in the pool. He must’ve secretly come back and fished it out. It was facing down so I could read the inscription:

You’ll always be my Bea. Love, Will.

I stepped back, tripping over something and falling.

Will caught me around the neck and lifted me off my feet. He walked toward the vortex.

As I got closer to it, I felt my body being pulled inside. The tips of my feet were suddenly cold, and my body angled toward the opening.

“Don’t do this, Will. Please, don’t,” I said, trying with all my might to shift.

Will laughed. “Manners, it’s nice to know you have them, you cold, unfeeling bitch.” He bent his legs slightly, preparing to launch me.

“You are a beautiful beast, Beatrice.” Fizban’s voice sounded in my ears, loud and clear as though she were inside my mind. “You are destined to return the Locanis and the Vaktare into the allies they once were. Fight back. Become the Vaktare you are meant to be.”

I twisted my neck, ignoring the pain as Will’s claws tore into my flesh. I needed to see Professor Pops, to see Troy, to see Jesse.

I hardly knew them, but I would die for them.

They’d come to mean that much to me in such a short time.

And Beck, my gorgeous Beck. I tried to smile. My feelings for him went against the laws of our realm, yet I couldn’t stop them. They burned through me, filling me in ways I’d never imagined possible.

“You can save them all, Beatrice. You have the power. Use it,” the voice inside my mind said.

I felt Will’s claws loosen as he began to let go.

The vortex was bigger than my body.

I should be glad to be sucked away, knowing Beck's sister would live because of my death, but I selfishly wished to stay and see what kind of a relationship he and I could have.

"It's okay," I whispered.

Beck’s eyes bore into mine. I could almost hear him shouting that he loved me, and that he wanted me to live, to fight. He shook his head.

“To the end of the Cavanaughs,” Will said with a cruel laugh.

“Now, Beatrice!” Fizban shouted.

Up until the very second Fizban spoke, I had no idea if I would be able to shift, if I would be able to do anything except allow Will to kill me, or throw me into the abyss, as he called it.

But like when Jesse and I had been fighting, instinct suddenly took over.

It was stronger than anything I'd ever felt before.

At once, my human body because that of my werecat form.

I roared in fury and grabbed hold of Will's arm with my claws.

One of Will's lackeys stumbled back at my transformation, surprised.

The stand-off was broken as everyone moved at once and the fight began again.

I went after the Will, taking his neck in my mouth.

"Bind her, Rhem," Will choked.

At Will's words, pain touched my body. My instincts immediately knew what to do with the pain. I mentally boxed up the pain and formed and folded it into a sphere.

This pain must be sent back to Rhem. It must hurt Rhem, I thought viciously.

As soon as the words entered my mind, the sphere filled with pain left my body and went into Rhem.

I released Will's neck so I could focus on Rhem.

To my left, Will was bend over, and coughing, but I kept my eyes on Rhem.

Shock filled Rhem's features, and he doubled over. Roared and feel to his knees.

"Stop her!" Will screamed, a ball of white light soaring from his hand and heading right at me.

Jesse jumped in front of me. The ball of light struck him square in the chest and he fell backward toward the abyss.

The suction from the swirling began to pull him into the opening.

“Jesse!” I reached for him. My claws caught the tips of his fingers. But his skin was like rock, and he continued backward. The opening to the abyss was directly behind him. The bottom half of his body disappeared into the swirling. "No," I roared.

I dove after him, this time with both hands and grabbed his shoulders.

"It's okay, Bea. Let me go. You can't stop this. I'll be okay." Jesse's words were soft but firm. His face was filled with peace, as though he deserved what was coming.

“No!” I screamed, holding fast.

The swirling had sucked Jesse in up to his shoulders so only his neck and head were visible. My hands touched the vortex.

It was cold, seemingly leeching all warmth from my body.

"Bea, let go," Jesse urged.

It had him up to his chin.

Then his mouth and nose.

I felt my feet come off the ground as more of my arms was sucked through. The pulling became stronger and more forceful.

Professor Pops grabbed hold of my waist and pulled.

With the two of us together, more of Jesse’s body appeared.

A zing of hope raced along my spine. "We've got you," I said, getting a better grip on his arm.

Jesse's mouth twisted and there came a sound, like rock splitting. He screamed in agony.

I looked back at Pops, questioning what I should do with my eyes.

He straightened. “You have to let him go. If you don’t, he’ll die for sure.”

I shook my head. “No.”

“Beatrice,” his voice was soft, his features twisted in pain. “Let go.”

"I'm sorry," I said and let go.

"It's not your fault," Jesse said as he disappeared through the opening.

Angry sadness took over, seeming to swallow me whole but the vortex was still swirling and there was still a chance I'd be sucked in as well.

OceanofPDF.com

TALL TALE

"I'VE GOT YOU," Beck said and pulled me out of the way.

Immediately, the abyss began to close.

"I need to go after him. This is my fault." Determination had me desperate to do something, even though I had no idea where he went.

“You can’t, Beatrice. We don’t know where he went or even if you’ll end up in the same place,” Professor Pops said.

“What have I done?” I sank to my knees, burying my cat face in my cat paws.

But now wasn't the time to wallow.

There were still Vaktare, including Will angling for my destruction.

“Get her!” Will shouted.

I stood and turned, prepared to fight.

Professor Pops lunged for Will's throat, ready to take his blood the way he’d done with Rhem.

From behind I heard a loud roar and felt the heat of fire from the dragon.

I turned back and saw that despite the pain he was in, Rhem had finally succeeded in binding Troy with his rope. It tightened around his body, pushing his wings down at an awkward angle.

Troy struggled to break free, but the rope wouldn't budge.

Rhem’s body and abilities must be bound, I thought. In my mind, I watched the ropes magically unwrap from Troy and bind Rhem instead.

Just as I imagined, the ropes loosened from Troy and did as I thought and wound itself around Rhem.

"What the devil?" Rhem gasped in astonishment.

Tighter. Tighter, I thought. The ropes continued to squeeze him until Rhem cried out and then lost consciousness.

Troy stumbled, fighting to regain his balance. Then he roared and it was so full of anguish. I could tell he was devastated by what happened to Jesse.

I wanted to apologize but there was still too much happening around me.

The other two Vaktare came forward, cursing and swearing obscenities.

And then the room vanished, and I was out in a forest, hunting.

The vision was so real I smelled the mountain air, the scent of fear.

I heard the leaves rustling in the breeze.

The scene changed and I was feasting on a body, the insides torn out.

A quick look at his face told me it was Beck, his eyes open and staring blankly at nothing. His hair wet with blood.

If I hadn't had my primal instinct, I would've fallen victim and lost myself to the scene.

Instead, I took his ability, pushed it into a compact little box and sent it back.

Show him his worst fear, I said into my mind and sent the box out of myself.

Immediately, the Vaktare on the right started screaming, shifting as he crashed through the front door and out of the house. He stomped through the landscaping, tearing up flowers and trees, fighting invisible enemies that only he could see.

The other man's ability slammed into me, and I felt him try to take control of my body.

As with Rhem's and the other guy, I reversed it, compiled it in a mental box, and sent it out of myself and into the Vaktare ruining the front yard.

To the death, I thought.

Beck was at my shoulder. "Beatrice?" He took my hands, his eyes full of concern.

I shook away the mental scene and focused on him. “Are you okay?” I asked, feeling terrible about the whole situation.

“I’m fine. The bigger question is are you okay?” His features twisted with worry as he ran his hands up my arms.

I didn't answer but stook still and closed my eyes.

What was I? Not okay. Taking a deep breath, I focused on Beck. “No, actually, I’m super pissed off.” I stepped around Beck and shoved Professor Pops off Will so I could get a hold of the asshole. “Where the hell is he? Where did you send Jesse?”

I grabbed Will by the fur at his neck and shook him. Hard. He glanced away, swallowing, one hand clamped over his bleeding throat. I smelled his fear.

“You’d better tell me, Will, or I’ll take your ability, you’re little balls of light, and send you and them to the bottom of the pool.

Will laughed. “You’re a big talker, Bea. Nothing more. Just a spoiled bitch.” He opened his mouth. Whispered a word. A ball of light formed in his throat.

Will’s ability will no longer work for him, I thought, my eyes boring into him.

Immediately the small light in the back of his throat vaporized.

I smirked. Even though I didn’t comprehend how such a thing was possible, I was grateful.

“What have you done?” Will gagged. He flicked his hand, but no light appeared. He tried again with his mouth.

“It’s gone, Will. I ordered the power away and now it's gone. Apparently, that's my ability.”

Furious rage boiled over, and he roared, twisting out of my grasp.

Professor Pops was a step behind, ready to grab him if I needed his help.

Beck was on the other side of me.

Troy stood behind Professor Pops, his wings flapping irritably.

Will shook his body. He was breathing heavily. “You won’t win, Beatrice. You can’t. You lack the courage and conviction necessary to lead your people or save our realm.”

Freeze! I put an arm out as I spoke the word in my mind.

Will’s body did as I commanded.

“What the hell?” Will was truly scared now, his features contorted in anger and shock. “How are you doing this?”

I didn’t know and at that moment I didn’t care. I just wanted to stop him.

The first thought in my mind was to put him to sleep.

Will became stiff and fell onto his side with a thud. His eyes closed.

I glanced down.

It made no sense that I could make other Vaktare’s abilities do as I directed within my mind.

I moved closer to Beck and hugged him. “You’re a mess,” I said, my voice shaking.

Blood streaked his blond fur and there were wounds all over his body. A chunk of his ear was missing.

Beck gave me a once-over. “You should see yourself. You’re incredible.”

“Really?” I was thinking he was pretty freaking amazing, but I held up my paws, checking them out. My fur was no longer honey brown but a deep rusty red. “What happened?” I asked, surprised.

Beck smiled. It was one of awe.

“Yeah, why is her fur a different color?” Troy asked. His eyes were no longer brown but a deep bronze with silver rings around the outside. Professor Pops had a hand on Troy's scaly shoulder. I sensed a great sadness rolling off them both and I knew it was because of Jesse.

Did they blame me for what happened?

Beck smiled, but it was filled with sadness. "I never would've believed it if I wasn't seeing it with my own eyes."

"What?" I asked.

Beck glanced at Professor Pops. I did too. His eyes no longer glowed as red though they were still flashing.

I figured he sensed the danger was gone for the most part.

Beck wrapped an arm around my waist, keeping me close.

"There is a story told to all the Vaktare and Locanis children about the Unduyee, a great red warrior that would one day come to Hiraken. It was said that the red warrior would be the keeper of all abilities and that her humility, benevolence, and warm giving heart would return peace and equality to the land. Of course, we all believed it was a tall tale."

I remembered the story. I'd read it back in the Museum for the Supernatural. "What are you saying?"

He spun me around, allowing me to see myself in the piece of broken glass still hanging on the wall. "See. Red fur."

I stared at my reflection. That was the first time I'd truly seen myself, other than the one time in the pool water. But it'd been dark then. Seeing myself in the glass was much different.

My face was shaped like a large cat and covered in red-brown fur. My teeth were long, sharp, and white. My eyes were fully orange, like the final light just before the sun went down.

I stood back so I could see more of myself.

Beck was still taller than I was and a werewolf instead of a cat, but we made a good-looking pair. A rush of feelings sweltered through me. I turned around and hugged him with such force that I nearly knocked him to the ground. I was so happy he was okay.

OceanofPDF.com

GRAND ENTRANCE

BECK RETURNED MY HUG FEROCIOUSLY. “You shifted on purpose this time. Do you have any idea how to shift back?”

“No. My body just kind of does its own thing.” I rubbed my nose against his furry cheek.

Professor Pops cleared his throat.

I let go of Beck as guilt filled my guts. “I’m so sorry about Jesse,” I said to Professor Pops, barely able to meet his or Troy’s gaze. They’d lost so much because of me. “But I’m going to get him back.”

I walked over to Will. He was no longer in his Vaktare form, no longer the scary black werecat. Instead, he lay on his side, still asleep and totally naked. I went to the main closet, grabbed a trench coat that was my dad’s and covered the worst of his nakedness. “Wake up,” I commanded, kicking him lightly in the ass.

His eyes blinked open. “What? Where am I?”

I squatted and grabbed his neck, piercing it with my claws. “You’re still at my house, Will.” I squeezed. “And you aren’t going anywhere until you tell me how you opened that thing and where Jesse went.”

I felt the presence of the others coming in close and flanking me.

Except Professor Pops. He came to stand on the other side of Will. The Professor’s eyes were red again. “Young Vaktare, Jesse is my son, and I will find him. So, this conversation is going to go two ways.”

Will’s eyes flickered back and forth between Professor Pops and me.

“One, you can choose to tell me how to find him.” He paused and brushed some of Will’s hair out of his eyes. “Or, you can say nothing, and I will kill you.”

From behind, I heard Troy growl and felt the heat of his breath. It singed the walls over my head.

Tears leaked from Will's eyes. "Then I'm dead either way. So do what you must." He clamped his mouth shut.

Troy's large head appeared beside mine. "I can make him talk. Let me do it, Pops."

The Hunter glanced at Troy. His face changed from scary to calm.

"No, Troy. I want you to go home." Professor Pops glanced away, his eyes searching the sky outside.

I followed his gaze, wondering what he was looking for. "If your father shows up -" Professor Pops didn't finish his sentence, but I got the feeling he believed there was someone or something scarier than he was out there.

I watched Troy's face fall. "But I can't leave. Jesse - " his voice broke.

"I know, Troy. I know."

"Anyway, he can't be mad. I haven't seen him in years. You're more my dad than he is." Troy shook his head. A thick tendril of smoke escaped his nostrils.

Professor Pops reached across Will and patted Troy's shoulder; his face filled with tenderness. "Thank you, son." He gave Troy a wisp of a smile.

"Jesse is my best friend. I won't abandon him." Troy's dragon face became even more ferocious.

I watched their interaction with extreme interest.

Will continued to cry.

I didn't know what Beck was doing, but I knew he was back there, probably feeling like I was - that it was best to stay out of the way when a dragon and a vampire Hunter were arguing.

Professor Pops nodded. "I understand." He looked at Will. "We're doing this the hard way." He tilted Will's head out of the way. Then Professor Pops sank his teeth into Will's shoulder. Will screamed, trying to push him away, but Professor Pops had him in such a grip Will didn't have a chance.

A minute passed as Will's face became pale and the life started to go out of his eyes. But he started blubbering. "There are dozens of possible realms. Jesse could've gone into any one of them. I don't know which one. No one can know," he said, the words almost unrecognizable.

"What are the names of the realms? How can we get there?" Troy asked, blowing smoke in Will's face.

Will coughed. "I don't know, dammit!"

Professor Pops withdrew his fangs and wiped his mouth. He seemed surprised by what Will had just said. "It'll take time." Professor Pops paused as if thinking some things through, a bleeding Will held firmly in his grasp. Will's eyes fluttered as he tried to keep them open.

At last Professor Pops said, "I know what to do." He sounded like he was in pain, and I wondered if he was wounded. There was blood and dirt all over him. It could be his or someone else's.

Will flinched at the sound of Professor Pops' voice, though it wasn't nearly as chilling as it had been before.

Professor Pops just looked at Will as if he'd forgotten he still gripped the Vaktare. Then Professor Pops released Will and stood, rolling his shoulders back.

"We are leaving, Beatrice," Professor Pops said.

Will let out a noise and curled away from the vampire.

"My apologies for the abrupt departure, but I know you'll be in good hands." Professor Pops glanced behind me, and I knew his focus was on Beck.

"If you know where Jesse is, tell me. I want to help," I said, outraged he was leaving so abruptly.

"We both do," Beck added, coming to stand beside me.

Professor Pops gave us an understanding nod. “I know. And you will. But first I must take care something alone.” He grabbed me in a hug. “Stay safe, Beatrice. I know we’ll see each other again soon.” He released me and shook Beck’s clawed paw-hand. “Be good to her, Beck.” His eyes flashed a bright red.

“I will, sir,” Beck said, clearing his throat.

Professor Pops walked toward the door. “Say good-bye, Troy. The faster I get you home, the faster I can get this done.”

“I’m coming,” Troy said, stepping around Will, his wings and tail swishing the air. The tip of his tail found Will’s face and slapped him. Will let out a very girly, very unmanly scream.

I went to Troy. “You are freaking cool,” I said softly, touching his face. His scales seemed to ripple under my skin as though caressing my clawed hand.

Troy tried to smile. “Right back at ya.” He pressed his snout against my furry cheek.

“I can’t believe you didn’t tell me you were a dragon,” I said, wrapping my arms around his neck.

“I’m all about making grand entrances,” Troy snorted, sending smoke against my back.

I leaned away, staring into one of his big eyes. “Who do you think would win between and dragon and a werecat?”

Troy let out a snicker. It started out small and grew into a full-on belly laugh. Fiery sparks flew out of his mouth.

I joined in, as did Beck.

I could even hear Professor Pops chuckling in the yard as he waited for Troy to finish his good-byes.

“No contest. A dragon,” he said, making his way toward Professor Pops.

“When we get Jesse back, you and I will have to give it a try. Deal?”

“Oh, yeah. It’s on, Beatrice.” He smacked me in the back with one of his wings.

Professor Pops waved. Troy pushed through the doorway, ripping a giant hole in the entrance.

“Sorry,” Troy said, even though it was obvious by the snickering that followed he wasn’t.

OceanofPDF.com

A LITTLE NAKEDNESS

BECK and I followed them out.

The other two Vaktare were still fighting. Professor Pops and Troy ignored them. So did I. Professor Pops climbed on Troy's winged back as he beat his amazing wings deftly against the night air and they took flight.

"That's something you don't see every day," Beck said, wrapping an arm around my shoulders.

"Agreed." I rested my head against him.

Beck cleared his throat. "You realize when you do shift, you'll be naked?" He pulled me tighter against him.

"So will you," I said as desire coursed through my body. I glanced away, unexpectedly really, really glad for my fur.

Will ran past Beck and me, surprising us. He ran down the stone steps and toward the fighting werecats. Thankfully he quickly shifted back into his werecat form. The other two Vaktare didn't seem to notice him. Will let out a roar as he got down on all fours and took off. When he thought he was a safe distance away, he turned back toward Beck and me. "You'll pay for what you've done, Bea. You and the dirty dog!"

Don't move, I ordered Will in my mind, reinforcing the command with my thoughts, allowing my strange magic to reach through the space between us and attach to Will.

Will froze mid-stride, falling on his side. "Release me, damn you."

"You're going to have to tell me how you do that," Beck said.

"I promise, just as soon as I know," I responded. "But what about the red diamond? Will had it in his hand when he opened the abyss. Do you think he dropped it?"

Beck walked over to the place where Will had been standing before he shifted and began lifting large chunks of debris and furniture out of the way.

I kept my eyes on Will and the other two Vaktare. “What happens to things like jewelry or a wallet when we shift?”

“That’s easy. If they're magically oriented, they will drop to the ground where you shift.”

“Oh?”

He picked something up and held it out for me to see. “Got it,” he said.

“Awesome.”

Beck came back over.

“What should we do with Will?” I couldn’t kill him. We’d gone to school together. He’d been my boyfriend. Sure, he deserved to die, and I knew without a doubt Will would’ve had no problem killing me, but I wasn’t Will.

“Whatever you deem worthy, Beatrice.” Beck gave me a look that promised he would support me no matter what.

“Okay.” I knew what I’d do.

Will and the fighting Vaktare need to go back to Hiraken, I thought.

As soon as the thought passed through my mind, Will and the others were gone.

“Where did they go?” Beck asked.

“Hopefully back to Hiraken,” I said, shrugging.

“Maybe you should’ve killed them. The King will probably torture and kill them anyway for failing.” Beck flinched and I wondered if he was thinking about his sister.

“Then I guess they'll get what they deserve.”

"Very well." Beck took my clawed hand in his. “Let’s go back inside.”

I went with him. Rhem's body changed into tiny lights and dissipated, like thousands of lightning bugs.

"What happened to him?" I shivered. Death wasn't something I would ever get used to.

"In this realm, that is what happens to the corpse of a dead Vaktare," Beck said, pulling me against his side. "It's okay," Beck said.

I nodded, kicking at a portion of the ceiling that had fallen to the floor. My house was a mess. It looked like a tornado had blown through it. "Tell me about the diamond," I said, trying to take my mind off everything else that had happened.

"What do you want to know?"

"I mean, sure, it's beautiful, but why did Will want it so badly?" I asked, cupping it in my paw.

"Do you mind?" Beck took the diamond from me. "It possesses very strong magic. It's one of two diamonds in existence that can be used to jump realms. I believed there was only one - until I saw yours." He smiled sadly. "Obviously, you have no need for such trivial magic, but for most Vaktare, it's a much-desired stone that makes up a very powerful charm. I recommend keeping it close."

"I will," I said, taking it back. Then I really thought about what he said. "Where's the other diamond?" I remembered he'd said he took it and my dad's powers. That meant he still had the other one.

Beck glanced down. "It's safe," he finally said. "And that diamond? I thought Celeste stole it."

"I lied. I wanted to cause her pain." I turned away, disgusted with myself.

Beck shook his head. "So, you had it all this time?"

"Yes," I nodded.

"It's a good thing I believed your lie, otherwise I might not have had the opportunity to get to know the real you."

An electric bolt of anxiety shot down my spine at his words. There it was again, the reminder that he'd been sent to kill me.

"What next?" Beck asked.

I glanced around the entryway. Thoughts of my parents, the new king of Hiraken and those Vaktare who wanted me dead, worry over my new friend Jesse and even my friends Eva, Ashley, and Cassidy swirled through my mind.

Life was going to get even more complicated.

"I should probably have this mess cleaned up. Bring Mrs. Dotts and Isaac back, and -" I looked down at myself, at the thick fur, and my hands that were more beastly than human. "I guess first I'd better figure out how to shift out of this form. As soon as I do, I'm going to take a shower."

"Maybe you should get to your room right away just in case you shift sooner rather than later." Beck hugged me. "Not that I'd mind." He winked.

I snuggled into his shoulder.

"Your fur is so soft, Beatrice."

Heat burned my cheeks. "So is yours." I ran my hands up and down his back.

Embarrassment gave way to desire.

Sexual tension snapped the air around and between us.

But kissing in our were-forms, at least kissing the way I liked to kiss, wasn't possible.

It seemed my body understood. I felt my skin tingle and immediately I shifted.

Beck quickly turned away.

"Humiliating," I said, feeling my whole-body heat with mortification as I carefully picked my way through the debris and made my way upstairs.

FIZBAN APPEARED AS SOON as I walked into my room, or what was left of it. “That was awkward,” she said, glancing with distain around my room.

I let out a belated scream, covering my girly parts. “You scared the freaking daylights out of me.”

Fizban laughed, picking up and tossing large chucks of plaster off my bed and onto the floor. “Nothing wrong with a little nakedness.” After brushing off a portion of my bedspread, she sat, crossing one leg over the other and began to pick at one of her long nails. “You are rather jumpy though.”

I thought about everything I’d just been through. Being a little jumpy seemed appropriate, considering. Before I could express such thoughts, I heard Beck yell.

“Beatrice!” The sound of claws scraped against marble stairs and then Beck crashed through the door, teeth bared, and growling.

OceanofPDF.com

MORE BEASTLY THAN YOU

FIZBAN TUTTED Beck when he rushed into my room. “Calm down, Beck. I just surprised our Beatrice.”

I yelped. I didn’t want Beck to see me naked, even though I knew he had before, mostly, when he ran me up to the house after the first time I changed.

Fizban laughed as I jumped over broken furniture and pieces of the wall, climbing into my closet. Surprisingly, it was still intact.

I pulled a silk robe in the darkest blue off a hanger and tied it around myself.

When I came back into the room, it was to see Beck pacing, his body between Fizban and the closet, protecting me. “Beck, meet Fizban, the - What are you exactly?”

She smiled. And then Greg appeared on the bed next to her.

Beck growled again, preparing to attack.

Greg sat beside Fizban. “Relax, Locanis. No harm will come to you or Beatrice on this day.”

The hair on Beck’s back stood on end. “That does nothing to comfort me.”

Standing beside him, I stroked his fur, trying to help him relax.

Fizban and Greg exchanged a look.

“We are called the Unknowns. We are the creators of all the realms, of all magics, and of your species,” Greg said.

Fizban met my gaze. “I wasn’t too happy about how things were going, what with your grandfather turning into quite a jackass, so Greg and I decided on one last hurrah.” Fizban laughed and rocked back like she was telling a funny story. “It was either that or destroy all of you.”

I ground my teeth together, astounded. “Creators? Like Gods?”

“Something like that,” Fizban said with false modesty.

“The legend of the Unduyee was our creation and we brought you, Beatrice, in to being.” Greg smiled, his turquoise eyes dancing with happiness.

“I wasn’t sure you were going to live up to your potential, but you came through.” Fizban’s eyes locked on Beck. “Didn’t she?”

Beck - who was still in his werewolf form - growled.

“And you weren’t so bad yourself,” she went on.

Greg’s gaze never left Beck as he spoke. “We were worried when you first showed up, especially when the two of you seemed to have feelings for each other.” Greg tsked. “You know better.” Beck gave a low snarl. “Beatrice, now you know better as well.” He stood. “So, let’s put this craziness behind us and get you to Hiraken where you can become Queen and begin working on your destiny.”

I didn’t know what to say. I wasn’t ready to begin working on my destiny. I didn’t even know how control my ability to shift.

“Fizban. Greg. I really appreciate what you’ve done.” That was a large overstatement. But I was at least glad to be alive. Since they were Gods of some sort, I felt obligated to lay the graciousness on thick.

“The curse, reverse curse thing you did has helped me become a better person.” I gave Fizban a pointed glance. “I think I understand what you meant when you said sometimes those that appear the most beastly are the most beautiful.”

Fizban smiled. “Of course, you do.”

“But I’m not ready to be Queen. I don’t even know how to control the werecat part of myself, or my ability, for that matter.”

The Unknowns turned to each other. They seemed to be communicating without talking. And then their bodies started to change, to shimmer, and become like mist or ghosts.

Beck hadn't seen them change before and I was worried how he'd react. But when I glanced over, I saw he was no longer in the room. It was probably for the best. The Unknowns and I had come to know each other slightly.

"Tsk. Tsk. Tsk. How dare you question those more powerful than you?" The voice sounded like Greg even though I couldn't see his mouth anymore.

"If you wish to see your parents again, you will obey our commands and go to Hiraken and take back the kingdom that is rightfully yours." That was Fizban's voice.

The mists hovered in the air, their scent like that of a rain shower. I stepped backward, trying to keep my distance, but I'd run into what was left the wall next to my bathroom.

My parents, I thought. It sounded as though they knew where my parents were.

Beck came back. "Hold on, Fizban and Greg." He was in his human form and dressed in jeans and a short-sleeved black tee shirt. "The curse -" He paused, shaking his head. "Or the reverse curse you put on Beatrice gave her a year, right?"

The mists both changed direction and headed toward Beck.

"Perhaps." Fizban said, floating around him.

"What business is it of yours?" Greg hissed.

"Well, right now she's way ahead of schedule. So, what if you allowed her to train?" Beck glanced at me. I nodded. I liked the idea. "I will teach her to control her werecat form and assist her in learning how to use all of the abilities she's been given. Then, when the year's up, she'll be more prepared to fulfill her destiny."

Fizban and Greg's misty forms gathered. I heard whispering in a language I couldn't comprehend.

Beck came to stand beside me. He took my hand and squeezed it.

After several seconds, the mists reassembled into Greg and Fizban.

Fizban came forward and held out her hand, indicating I should take it.

Hesitant, I reached out and grabbed hold. She grinned. “We will give you the remainder of your year. We’ve decided you’ve earned it.”

“Thank you,” I said, pulling her close and hugging her. She returned my hug carefully.

“There are conditions,” Greg added.

I nodded. “I’m listening.”

Fizban locked her hands behind her back and began to pace. “Number one: You will keep away from Adam Henry and the dragon child. Their destiny and yours is no longer meant to cross paths.”

"But, why? I want to help them find Jesse."

"That is one of our conditions. Either you agree or you don't. The choice is yours," he snapped.

“Agreed,” I said, gritting my teeth together. I didn't like being told what to do.

"Good," Fizban said, glancing at Greg.

As I watched the Unknowns, the way the moved, the secret smiles they gave each other, the strangest feeling came over me. Was my life even my own? Even though I believed I controlled my own fate, the Unknowns seemed to create problems and then demand I fix them while they just sat back and watched. Like a character in a TV show doing what the directors ordered.

“Number two: You will train with Beck and learn to control your beast and your abilities,” Greg said.

So far, the conditions were easy. “I understand,” I said, solemnly.

“Number three: You will memorize the laws of your species, including no cross-species procreating.” Fizban’s scrutiny roamed between Beck and me.

My heart fell. It wasn’t like I wanted to do that now, but I did like Beck. Like a whole freaking lot.

“Did you hear me?” Fizban asked.

“Yes.” I picked at some dead skin on my hand.

“Beck?”

He growled, low. “I understand.”

“Excellent,” Greg said.

“The final condition: You must go to Hiraken and rescue Beck’s sister.”

I heard Beck suck in a breath.

“This last is of the utmost urgency. The vicious Vaktare king ruling the land has been torturing her.” Fizban’s features softened. “She’ll be dead within the month.”

I took hold of Beck’s arm. “We’ll go immediately.”

He nodded.

“The sooner the better, Beatrice, but make sure you have a plan. Beck is an enemy to those in control now, just as you are. Remember that.”

“I will.”

“You’d better,” Fizban and Greg said together. Their bodies started to shimmer and I knew they would evaporate shortly.

“Wait,” I said. There was one more thing I needed to know.

“Yes,” they said together.

“My parents? Do you know where they are?”

“Of course, we do, Beatrice. We’re the ones who took them.”

It was hard to tell if the Unknowns were good or bad.

Maybe they were neither. Maybe they were both. Or maybe those words, good and bad, meant nothing to such creatures.

“What? Why? To keep them safe?” I hoped that had been the reason, but the look on Fizban’s iridescent face told me otherwise.

“We took them to keep them away from you.” Their forms were almost transparent and I could barely make them out.

I knew they'd vanish any second. "Wait."

"We grow weary of you, Beatrice. Ask your question so that we may go."

I swallowed. "Did you - kill my parents?"

The Unknowns laughed. The sound echoed off the walls.

"They are alive. Perhaps you'll see them again," Greg said.

"If you do as we say," Fizban added and they were gone.

"Of course, I will, just bring them back." I spoke the words to empty air. Devastated, I let out a shuddering breath. "Why would those things take my parents?" I asked, relieved they were gone but still upset by what they'd done.

Beck's shoulders sagged. He sank onto my bed.

I knew his heart was as heavy as mine.

I sat beside him. At least I knew my parents were alive. Beck's sister was being tortured.

"We will get her out. We have to."

Beck ran a hand over my cheek, causing my whole body to quiver. It was great to have him close. I wrapped my hand over his, pressing my face into his touch.

"Beck." My emotions were overflowing with need.

"I'm here." Beck scooted closer. His lips were inches from mine.

I sighed. "You heard what the Unknowns said." I felt I should at least state the obvious, even though I wanted him to kiss me with every ounce of my being.

Beck's lips tilted in a smile, and he leaned in, kissing my cheek. "I did hear what they said." He kissed my other cheek.

My breathing increased, and the fireworks that lit up every time he was near exploded into the softest rose petals.

There was much we had to do, but first, I wanted Beck.

The Unknowns be damned.

Need fluttered around inside my lower belly. “And?” I couldn’t even think. Every nerve was sparking with desire for the man in front of me.

Beck kissed my forehead. “They said we couldn’t procreate.” His lips kissed the tip of my nose. “There are ways to ensure we don’t make any babies.”

“You’re right,” I whispered. Hope beat through my heart.

Beck’s lips claimed mine. He lay back on the bed, pulling me with him.

Beck and I had a lot to think about, a lot to deal with. My parents. His sister. Training. But for right now, it was just the two of us.

“You’re bad, Beck Haddox. So, so bad,” I said against his mouth.

Beck smiled, nibbling on my lower lip. “What can I say, you accomplished your goal.” He growled, rolling on top of me.

“I did?” I asked, breathlessly. I had no idea what he meant.

“I am more beastly than you are.” With those words, he covered my mouth with his, pushing my mouth open and kissing me so passionately, I felt it down to my toes.

YOUR INPUT MATTERS. If you enjoyed A Beauty so Beastly, please email me. I’m working on book 2 but need to verify reader interest. If there isn’t enough, I won’t be continuing Beatrice’s story.

OceanofPDF.com

HIDDEN PRINCESS

OceanofPDF.com

PROLOGUE

WHO AM I

WHEN I THINK BACK to the days before the crap hit the fan, I can't help but see all I missed. My innocence or naivety. That girl—past me had no idea what her life was to become. Days spent worrying about a first kiss and a high school boy. It seems sweet, but also trivial. As I look back and think about my life before fairies and magic, my heart softens, and part of me longs for the ease of that time once again. But what's the point? My life has wholly shifted. I'm no longer just a girl with a crush. Honestly, I'm still trying to figure out who I am.

OceanofPDF.com

"TELL ME YOU LOVE ME." Carson holds my face in his hands. His green eyes search mine waiting, as his minty breath caresses my cheek.

I shiver, forgetting about the lights or the fact that there are people in the audience watching us, and promise myself I won't faint. As I study his mouth, an image of my Auntie Macey comes to mind. Not very romantic, but it's true. Since I can remember, Macey has shared motivational quotes like giving out candy on Halloween. Though it's more what she said to me before I left for school than it is her that's on my mind. She said something like, "You have to think it to achieve it."

A moment similar to this one has played over and over in my daydreams for a long time. Now, here I am, with Carson's hands on my face, as he gazes at me longingly. I can't help thinking my Auntie Macey isn't as crazy as I thought. She is right. I'm living proof. I thought it and now I'm about to achieve it.

My heart skips several beats.

A line from the movie, Dirty Dancing comes to mind. The main character says something like: "I'm scared of leaving this room and never feeling the rest of my whole life the way I feel when I'm with you." And that's why I'm here in our high school theater, up on stage, standing in front of Carson Hayes, batting my eyelashes.

"Juliet?" One eyebrow goes up questioningly. "Tell me you love me," he says again.

My mouth curves into an O as I work to live in the moment. Even though his words aren't meant for me, but for the character I'm playing, I want to believe them anyway.

We are acting out a scene for our school's interpretation of Romeo and Juliet. I'm just the stand in while the real actress is busy doing something else. Still, I'm going to pretend anyway. My line enters my head. "You know I do. More than anything," I say and mean it. I put my small hands over his and step closer. The kiss is coming.

In seconds his mouth will cover mine.

I will not faint.

I will not faint.

I will not faint.

"Say it then, Juliet. Say the words my soul longs to hear." His lips nearly touch mine as he speaks.

I swallow. Feel my knees buckle. My heart is pounding in my ears. "Romeo. Sweet, Romeo. I love nothing in the world as much as I love you. Despite our family's differences, my love is only true."

"My Juliet." His lips touch mine. They're soft and move slowly. At the caress, my chest tightens, and fiery warmth spreads through my body. It's my first kiss. With each passing moment of bliss, I sense a change come over me. The feeling is unexplainable, but something within my belly flutters to life, and I return the kiss with fervor, hoping he won't stop.

Too soon he pulls back and smiles. "Say you'll go to the dance with me."

The play takes place in modern day and the dance is the turning point. Carson and I are standing in what looks like a contemporary living room, next to a sleek couch. He takes a heart-shaped box from one of the end tables and hands it to me. "For you."

"Thank you." Following the stage direction written in the script, I take the box, and open it. There are actually chocolates inside. They smell tasty and my stomach growls. Embarrassed by the sound, I glance up at Carson, but he doesn't seem to notice.

The stick of gum and juice I had for lunch did nothing to fill my tummy. "Well it depends," I say pretending to pick up a piece of chocolate and pop it into my mouth. As much as I want to eat the chocolates, they are part of the set, and I'm not allowed.

"On what?" he asks, watching me fake chew, a glimmer of a smile on his lips.

I pick up another imaginary piece. Pause before I put it into my mouth and watch him from under my lashes. Then phony swallow. "Whether or not these are yummy enough." I smile, showing him I'm joking because of course they are delicious and so is he.

"And?" He crosses his arms playfully.

I step in closer to him, allowing myself to be overwhelmed by the heady scent of his cologne. It's clean and manly. I close my eyes, leaning my face up toward him. "My answer is… yes."

He lifts me off the ground in a big hug, and I laugh, placing my hands on his shoulders, my eyes on him as he swings me around, before setting me back down. Breathless, I wish the moment will never end.

"Okay, that's a wrap," Mrs. Barrows, our theater teacher says, bursting my happy bubble.

I sigh internally. Dang! I should've pretended I forgot some of my lines, so we would have to practice the scene more than once.

"Did you get the lighting done?" Mrs. Barrows shouts up to the booth as Carson and I watch each other. He's smiling and I think I am too, but who knows. I'm sort of an awkward girl.

"Yeah, we're good for now," Justin, the lighting designer responds.

"Great." Mrs. Barrows stands, her focus on me. "Rory, get that dress off right away, please."

And the fairy tale is over, I think. "Yes, ma'am." I look up at Carson and smile shyly. "You're going to be great as Romeo. Hope I helped."

"You did, thanks. You're actually a really good actress, too," Carson says sounding only slightly surprised.

I feel my face heat up. "Thanks." I know his words were just meant to be nice. Acting isn't my thing. Painting the sets, doing the rigging, organizing costumes, and touching up makeup are what I enjoy. “I’m sure the scene will be much better with Kelly.” I start to walk off stage, but he grabs my arm.

“Hang on.” He pulls me close. “Hey, Rory.” One side of his lips raises in a half smirk.

“Carson.” My heart hasn’t stopped racing since our kiss. I want to go home and document what’s happened in my journal. The first line will read: He kissed me! And my journal will totally know who he is because I’ve been talking about Carson Hayes since Junior High. But I’m also trying to do a better job of living in the moment. “What’s up?” I ask lightly, thinking it doesn’t matter that he didn’t kiss me because he likes me. He. Still. Kissed. Me. In real life, not just my dreams.

“Why haven’t you and I gone out before?” Carson’s gaze flits from my eyes to my lips and lingers there.

“Because,” I begin, pulling out of his grasp. “You don’t like me.” Which is true. He’s the most popular guy in school, and the star of the soccer team. With flawless blond hair, green eyes, rippling muscles, and a killer smile, all the girls want him. Including me. No point denying the truth. And he can do whatever he wants. Whether it’s star as the male lead in the school play, drawing, or participating in the photography club, the normal rules don’t apply to him.

And no one questions him.

But while he’s untouchable, I’m not. Like not even close.

When I reach the wings of the stage, I peek back at him. He hasn’t moved and is still watching me. I never said he was a smart guy, just hot. Okay, I happen to know he’s taking Calculus, but whatever. I smile. “If you ever want to practice your lines again, I’d be happy to.”

“Cool.” He tucks his hands into his pockets before heading downstage, probably to get notes from Mrs. Barrows.

I run into the dressing room and remove the short, pale pink Grecian gown, hang it up with the rest of the costumes, and change back into my regular clothes.

OceanofPDF.com

"YOU READY?" Tiana asks. She and Merida walk in while I'm tying my shoes.

I stand. Grab my backpack and my jacket. "Yeah. You?"

"We've been ready," Merida says, rolling her eyes. She's sucking on a lollipop and hands one to me.

I take it and unwrap it, throwing the incriminating evidence into my backpack since there's no food allowed back here. "Thanks," I say linking one arm around hers and the other around Tiana's. The three of us leave the dressing room, giggling as we walk down the hall and out one of the theater's side doors.

Tiana and Merida seem extra quiet as we cross the courtyard to where my car is parked. I think maybe they weren't in the theater when Carson and I kissed, but by the time we reach my old VW Rabbit, I'm sure I lucked out. I'm a little bummed. I want to talk to them about the kiss, but don't want to sound like I'm bragging. They're my best friends. They need to know.

I put my car in drive and open my mouth to tell them the awesome news when they burst out laughing. They do know, I realize, but were waiting until we had some privacy.

"What?" I ask innocently, slamming my mouth shut.

From the backseat, Merida speaks first. "We want a play-by-play of that kiss." She pauses a second. "Is he amazing?"

"Are his lips soft?" Tiana chimes in. She has her backpack on her lap and pulls out some lip-gloss, puts it on and then puckers.

"Firm?" Merida asks.

"Did he use his tongue?" Tiana wriggles her eyebrows.

I smack her on the arm, but giggle. "No." The feel of his lips on mine, and the confident way they moved makes me smile and my body melts.

“Look at her. She’s smiling and sighing. Double proof that Carson is a good kisser.”

“Rory has all the luck,” Tiana grumbles, crossing her arms.

I sit up straight. “We were acting.”

“Maybe he was, but you weren’t,” Merida says, looking at me like I can’t fool her.

And she’s right. Tiana, Merida, and I have been friends since childhood. We’ve lived by each other and grown into more than friends. “Fine. He was acting, so the kiss didn’t mean anything.” I say wishing it wasn’t true.

“That’s a bunch of bull. You’re practically glowing.” Tiana turns in her seat and leans her elbows on her backpack.

“Yeah,” I say with a smile. “It was wonderful.”

“Right? I mean you kissed Carson Hayes.”

“Give us details. Come on. He’s the hottest guy in school. We want to live vicariously through you,” Merida adds. Her curly red hair bounces as she talks.

“Fine. Okay.” I roll my eyes and laugh as I pull into my driveway. “He’s a very good kisser.”

They squeal enthusiastically as they pile out. I check my reflection in the rearview mirror, hoping to see a changed woman. Someone more mature. All I see are slightly swollen lips and my face heats. Carson kissed me!

“I knew it,” Merida says wistfully. She bites down on the lollipop, chewing the candy in her teeth. “He needs to practice on me next.” She salutes with the stick and heads across the street toward her house, walking backward so Tiana and I can still see her face. She pretend kisses her arm.

“You’re crazy, Mer,” Tiana shouts.

I laugh. “Since he kissed me, don’t I have dibs?” That seems like the fair way to treat the situation.

Merida frowns. “No calling dibs.” At her front door she unlocks it, turns back, and waves. “Homework later?”

“Definitely. I need your help with Calculus. It’s kicking my butt.” I look over at Tiana who just smiles.

“You got it.” Merida disappears inside her twentieth century brick Tudor that’s the same style as mine.

I turn to Tiana. “I suppose you want dibs too?”

She shakes her head. “I’m holding out for Charles Michael Davis, but I’m no fool. If Carson asks, I’ll go ahead and kiss him.” She knocks her hip into mine lightly.

“Isn’t that the guy from The Originals?”

“Shut your mouth. He isn’t just that guy. He’s the guy. The whole reason I binge watch the show, and he’s beautiful.” She clasps her hands together, pretending to look into Charles Davis’ dreamy eyes.

I can’t help laughing. “Isn’t he also thirty?” I lock my car and head up the walk to my front door.

Tiana glares playfully. “I’m eighteen. That’s only…” she pauses a moment. “A twelve year age difference.” She shakes her head, making her curly black hair wiggle. “When it’s true love, age means nothing,” she says dramatically, moving across my lawn. It crunches under her boots.

“Okay,” I say. There’s no arguing with Tiana about her serious crush. “I’ll text you later.”

“Yep.” She turns and jogs the rest of the way past my lawn and into hers before I hear her front door slam.

OceanofPDF.com

"Ooh, what if he asks you to the dance?" Tiana chews on the eraser end of her pencil.

"He won't. If he takes anyone, he'll take Kelly." I work through the problem, wishing I could pull my hair out. Math makes my head hurt.

Merida glances at my paper. "Nope, you've got to take the ln of the equation before you solve for k."

I yowl in frustration. "I see the words coming out of your mouth. I even hear them, but I don't understand. It's like you're speaking a different language."

Merida laughs. "Well Calculus is kind of like a different language. So you just need to learn it and then the math will be easy."

Tiana slams her book shut. "I'm switching out of this class. It's obnoxious."

"No," I say, shaking her arm. "I need someone to not understand with me."

She rolls her eyes. "Life is too short. I don't have time for this crap."

Merida runs her fingers through the loose curls in her red hair. "It's really not that bad."

"You're right. Calculus is worse." I snap my gum and close my book. "I'm done for tonight. My brain hurts."

"Fine." Merida closes her book and shoves it in her bag.

"I want someone to ask me to the dance. I don't care if that seems cliché. I want to have a cute boy dressed in a black tux come to my door with a bracelet corsage. I want him to look at me in my emerald green dress and tell me how gorgeous I am. Then I want him to open my doors and hold my hand all night." Tiana clasps her hands together like she's praying.

“Is that all?” I ask, shutting my book and stuffing it into my backpack.

Merida takes a sip of her soda. “That sounds about right. Except the dress will be turquoise instead of emerald green.

Tiana drinks her water. “Humph. No. At the dance he’ll only have eyes for me. There will be dozens of other beautiful girls, but he won’t even notice them.” Her dark brown eyes get dreamy and I realize she’s imagining herself at the dance. I want that for her. She deserves to have her dreams come true.

“Awwww, you’re such a romantic,” I say, sipping my hot chocolate. “Would you show him how to do one of our dances?”

Tiana laughs. “You mean this one?” She turns on the song we made up our latest dance to, stands, pushes in her chair, and pulls Merida and me out of our chairs.

For the next three minutes we do our dance. And then we fall on the floor laughing.

When the clock chimes ten, Tiana stands. “I have to go. Curfew.”

I get up and help Merida to her feet.

“I suppose I should go too,” Merida says, raking her hands through her hair.

I sip my cocoa. The chocolaty goodness is no longer hot, and the marshmallows are melted, but I can’t waste cocoa. “Hey, T. Does this guy that asks you to the dance look like a certain actor from The Originals?”

She shakes her head. “I haven’t met him yet, but when I do, I’ll feel it in my bones.”

From somewhere outside comes the sound of a loud growl. I know Tiana and Merida hear it too. I’m guessing the whole neighborhood did.

“Oh, no, not again, that stupid spe—” She stops and glances first at Tiana and then me. “I’m frazzled.” She shakes her hands through her long curly hair before tucking it behind her ears. “Gotta go.” Merida grabs her backpack off the table, knocking it against the wall. It rattles the china.

“Oh, no,” I hear one of my aunties say.

“That poor dear,” another auntie says.

“Perhaps we should help her—”

“No,” the other two respond at the same time.

The three of them proceed to whisper a conversation I can’t understand.

Merida shakes her head and we all look at each other and shrug.

“Sorry,” Merida says.

“No worries,” I respond as Fae walks in carrying a tray.

“Hey, Auntie Fae.”

“Hi dear. I brought you girls some cookies.”

“Thanks,” I say as she sets them on the table. “But they have to go.”

My aunties are super sweet, but they’re also a little flitty, easily agitated, and incredibly nosy. Mostly though, they’re quick to love. They are all the family I have and I’m grateful for them.

“Want a cookie, Merida?” Auntie Fae’s azure eyes, almost exactly like mine, dart around the room, looking for broken glass, I guess.

Merida shakes her head. “I need to get going, but thanks for the offer.” She heads out of the room.

“Everything alright, dear?” Fae asks her.

“Yeah, I—” She glances at the cookies. They don’t look that great. In fact, they’re a mess, but Merida says. “What the heck?” She takes a cookie. “See you girls tomorrow.”

Auntie Fae sighs after Merida is gone. “Her poor mother. Hopefully one of these days she’ll get herself under control.” She heads back into the kitchen. Under her breath she says, “If the boys have changed too, our trash will be everywhere in the morning."

Tiana and I look at each other and laugh.

"Your aunts are kind of nuts."

"Yeah, but that's just part of their charm." I take a cookie and so does Tiana. "I'll try it if you will," I say. "On the count of three."

"One," Tiana starts, sniffing the one in her hand.

They look like blueberry chocolate chip cookies.

"Two," I say.

"Three," Tiana says.

We each take a bite of our cookie at the same time. I shake my head.

"Are they done?" Tiana asks, setting hers back on the tray.

I put my down too. "I don't think so," I reply, spitting the contents in my mouth out into a napkin before throwing it away. Tiana has better manners than me and swallows as she organizes her books and papers. Her face says it all though. The cookie is gross.

"I'll teach him a dance that's just for me and him," Tiana says slowly, her features thoughtful.

At first, I don't understand what she means, but quickly recover. She's talking about my previous comment on teaching the guy she falls for one of our dances. I wrap an arm around Tiana's shoulders. "He'd like that, for sure."

OceanofPDF.com

"SOMEDAY YOU'LL GET your happily ever after. I know it," I continue.

Tiana nods, her gaze serious. "So will you." She hefts her pack onto her shoulder.

I shrug. "Maybe."

My cell phone pings. I pick it up and gasp.

"What?" Tiana asks, glancing over.

"The text is from Carson." I'm stunned and fall into a chair, rereading his text multiple times.

"No way. Serious?" She grabs my phone. "Sweet bees on honey, it is his number."

Is it sad that even though Carson has never called me I know his number? I think every girl at Hellgate High has his number memorized.

I take back my phone. "What should I say?"

Tiana sits back down as well. "I'd start with returning his "hi" with one of your own." She sets down her bag, rubbing her arm.

"Right." I text back: Hi.

Do you know who this is?

"He has no idea about the girls at this school, does he?" Tiana says, chuckling, scooting her chair beside mine so she can read while I type.

"Nope." I text him: Yes. I hit send. Then add: Do you know who this is?

LOL. Of course I do. You're my acting partner. My Juliet.

I think of his kiss and shiver.

"He's sweet," Tiana says, sounding surprised. Then studies my face. "Oh, you have it soooooo, soooooo bad." Tiana knocks her shoulder into mine.

“No, I don’t,” I lie because I can’t stop staring at my phone. He called me his Juliet. I never figured Carson for a romantic, but he kind of is.

“Better text back, something.” She rests her head on my shoulder.

“Right.” I click the letters as fast as my fingers will go. Did you need something? More practice?

“That isn’t very romantic,” she says and I can practically hear her eyes roll inside her head.

Well, yeah. But, I also wanted to know if you had a date to the dance next Friday?”

Tiana and I squeal at the same time.

“Oh my gosh. Oh my gosh. Oh my gosh.” She claps her hands. “I’m always right.”

No, I quickly text back, swallowing. My heart races.

I know this is a terrible, horrible way to ask a girl to a dance, but since it’s next week, I hope you’ll forgive me and let me make it up to you.

Tiana and I read the text.

“Is that his way of asking you? He’s right, that’s terrible and horrible.” Tiana crosses her arms, irritated. “Where’s the grandeur?”

“It’s fine.” I watch her shake her head and my heart stops beating a minute. Is she really telling me not to go to the dance with him? He didn’t specifically ask, but still.

My phone chimes.

I’m an idiot. Rory, would you do me the honor of going to the dance with me?

“Much better,” Tiana says when she sees the text.

“It works.” I’m dying inside unable to believe this is really happening.

“Hurry and text that boy yes.” She giggles and I join in.

I type my response but stop. “Why would he ask me to the dance? I thought him and Kelly were going out.” I see them together a lot at school.

“They might date, but that doesn’t mean they are exclusive.” She shrugs. “They’re part of the same group. Besides, he can ask whoever he wants.” She leans over and gives me a hug. “Say yes,” she whispers in my ear. “I’ve got to go. I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Yep. Bright and early.” I stare at my phone.

Rory? Carson texts along with a bunch of smiling faces. Do you already have a date for the dance?

No, I text back, hoping he isn’t changing his mind.

Are you interested in going to the dance with me?

Well… Are you sure you want to go with me?

I wouldn’t have asked if I weren’t.

I leave my backpack in the dining room and walk out. “Night, aunties. I’m going to bed,” I say, heading to my room.

“Night.”

“Sleep good.”

“See you in the morning.”

I close my bedroom door and fall onto my queen-sized bed.

Rory, please say the words my soul longs to hear.

He’s using words from the play. It’s sweet and dorky and even though I probably shouldn’t think it’s wonderful, I do. Yes. I would love to go to the dance with you, I text back.

Cool. See you at school tomorrow.

Not if I see you first.

LOL. Nice. Goodnight.

Night. =D

OceanofPDF.com

SCHOOL the next day is slow going. I'm antsy. Excited to see Carson, but nervous as well. What if last night was a joke? During lunch I go to the library again. I want to get my English homework done so I have plenty of time to spend in the theater. Near Carson. Gah, I hate that I'm acting like one of those girls and not like the feminist I believe myself to be.

"Focus, Rory." I write down some notes.

"Talking to yourself?" Carson sits in the chair opposite me at the table.

I feel my face get hot. "Um, no. Just speaking out loud." My throat constricts and my heart pumps loudly.

"Isn't that the same thing?" He picks up one of my books, flipping through the pages.

My face gets hotter. "I guess so." I'm so focused on my paper I think I might melt a hole in it.

"Hey?" Carson asks softly.

I glance up.

"I'm just teasing," he says, pulling out his phone. "I actually have a few questions."

Crap, I think, swallowing down a whole bunch of nerves. I brush my hair off one shoulder and onto the other. "Okay?"

"What's your favorite food?"

The question surprises me and I have to think about my answer. "Probably fried chicken and waffles." I shrug, considering where he's going with the questions. My aunties aren't the greatest cooks, but they always take me out to eat for my birthday and I order the same thing—chicken and waffles.

"Mmmmm, that sounds good." He makes notes in his phone. "I know I just asked you to the dance last night, but have you thought about the color of your dress?"

So the questions are about the dance, I think, finally understanding. He is serious! I glance down at my clothes. They aren't anything special, old skinny jeans, a white tank and a bright pink sweater, but pink is my favorite color. "Probably pink," I say.

He makes a note. "Last question." His green eyes shine with joy.

"I'm ready," I say crossing my legs, relaxing a little.

"Your favorite flower?"

That's easy. "Dahlias."

"Dahlias?" Carson repeats, raising an eyebrow.

"Yes, they're beautiful." I unlock my phone and show him a picture. "See?"

"Oh, yeah. Pretty." He makes a note. Then puts his phone in his backpack.

I can't help but watch him move. His broad shoulders flex and shift under his tight white tee shirt.

When he sits up, he catches me watching him and smiles. "I brought you something." He slides a single piece of chocolate sitting in a small pink wrapper across the table, toward me.

"What's this?" I ask. The smell of milk chocolate and cherry fills my nose. My mouth waters.

"I saw how much you wanted to eat the chocolate yesterday while we were rehearsing and thought I'd bring one that's new and hasn't been handled."

I'm blown away. Before a few days ago Carson and never had a real conversation and now he's bringing me chocolate. The gesture is thoughtful, and I realize he isn't at all what I expected.

"Go ahead," he says, indicating the chocolate in his fingers. I pick it up and put it in my mouth. As soon as the chocolate hits my tongue I close my eyes. The chocolate is delicious. I push the flavors around in my mouth a moment, allowing the incredible taste to linger. A sweet burst of cherry mixes with the chocolate and I sigh.

From across the table I hear Carson laugh. I open my eyes. “You didn’t like it,” he says with a smirk.

I try not to smile and shake my head. “Totally gross.” For some reason I’m embarrassed and look down at my paper.

Carson slides another chocolate across the table. “Will you run through my lines with me again tonight after school?”

I glance at the chocolate and then him. “Are you trying to buy my help with chocolates?” I pick it up and take a bite. This one has an orange filling. My favorite.

“Are they working?”

“Yes,” I admit, pressing my lips together to get the chocolate off.

“Good.” He stands, pulls an entire heart shaped box from his backpack and set it on the table.

I feel my eyes get wide.

He winks, and I’m smitten. No one should be allowed to be so amazingly good looking and nice. The combination seems unfair to the rest of the world. “Meet me at my house around four.”

“Wait, we aren’t practicing in the theater?” I turn to watch him walk away.

He pauses and glances back. “We can’t tonight. The lighting crew is using the stage to do a last run through before we start final rehearsals.”

I remember Mrs. Barrows saying that. “Okay, but Carson?”

He adjusts his backpack and lifts an eyebrow, waiting.

“What about Kelly?” I whisper, worried someone might overhear.

He walks back to my table and leans over. The smell of his cologne fills my nose. “Kelly is a friend. We went on a few dates, but she and I aren’t a couple.” He takes my hand. “I can hang out with whoever I like and so can she.” He laces our fingers together. “But it’s cool you were worried. Says a lot about you."

"Oh." My pulse pounds, making me jittery like I drank too much coffee. "All right." I'm embarrassed again. "Uh, Carson?"

"Rory." He gives me a cheeky grin.

I like the way my strange name sounds when it leaves his mouth. "I don't know where you live."

He squeezes my hand before letting go. "I'll text you." He heads back to the door. "Anything else?" He flashes me a huge smile.

"Nope. I'm—Oh wait. Thanks for the chocolates." I hold up the box.

"You're welcome." He leaves and I lean back in my chair. I'm shocked. And a little confused. A strange thought keeps running through my mind. What if I'm the brunt of some kind of joke?

"What do you think you're doing talking to my man?" Kelly slinks into the same chair Carson was sitting in. Her dark hair is up in a tight ponytail and she's wearing thick eyeliner, making her brown eyes look like a cat's. She's wearing black skinny jeans, a purple top, and a black shrug.

"Hi, Kelly." I try to sound nonchalant.

She ignores me. "You and Carson?" Kelly gives me a look that says she doesn't believe what she saw. "You know the only reason he's spending time with you is to make me jealous." She lifts the lid off the chocolates and takes one, chews a second, and then spits it into the trash. "That's disgusting." She laughs. "Cheap chocolate for a cheap date." She walks away and I glare after her.

OceanofPDF.com

I DRIVE ACROSS THE BRIDGE, following the directions Carson texted me. Missoula is a sprawling city with a population of more than seventy thousand people. The city sits along Clark Fork River and is surrounded by thick woodlands. The local news usually includes stories about bear poachers along with gun control, but there is also a vast art community, and the University of Montana. Missoula is a great city for anyone who loves the outdoors.

I head toward the University. In the distance are the Rocky Mountains. They're topped with snow. Usually at this time of year there's a lot more, but Missoula has had a mild winter.

I turn onto Carson's street and park in front of a small white house. There's a chain link fence around the front yard with a gate. The lawn is covered in snow and overgrown shrubs line the rickety porch.

After locking my car, I open the gate and walk up the broken concrete path toward the door. Before I see the dog, I hear it running from somewhere in the back. I debate what to do, either try to make a break for the fence or freeze and hope the dog doesn't eat me. The Rottweiler has a face bigger than mine. He dashes around the corner.

When he sees me, he skids to a stop.

"Hi, boy," I say tentatively, holding out my hands.

He growls deep in his chest. Takes a step forward. Then another. I keep wishing Carson will show up and save me.

"Easy, puppy," I say.

His nose presses against the palm of one of my hands. He sniffs and then licks my fingers.

"Oh, you act tough, but you're actually a big softie, aren't you?" I speak quietly but still don't move.

After a few minutes, the dog sits. I reach out and pet him. He lets out a whine and lies down. I squat next to him and scratch his back. He rolls, showing me his tummy.

“You’re such a good boy. Yes you are. A very good boy.” My voice has taken on the baby-talk tone.

The front door opens. Carson comes out. I glance up. “Hey. Your dog and I were just getting acquainted.”

Carson’s mouth is hanging open.

“What?” I say, standing.

The dog follows and nudges my hand.

“That’s Butch.” Carson walks down the steps and meets me. “The dog usually doesn’t like people.”

“Oh?” I look at Butch “Are you a big, scary dog who doesn’t like people? I don’t think so. No, I don’t,” I say, scratching his head.

Carson snorts. “No. Serious. My friends hate coming over because Butch tries to attack them.”

“Huh.” I shrug and pat Butch’s dark brown head. “I guess I didn’t know better, so neither did he.” Butch rubs his head against my hip.

Carson laughs. “I have an even ornerier cat inside. Maybe you can work your magic on him too.”

“I can try,” I say following Carson up the creaky wooden steps. One side of the porch is falling down and the screens on both windows are torn.

When I get inside, I’m surprised to see the living room is small but clean. Beyond, there a kitchen with a two-seat dining table to the right. The cupboards are a light oak and the appliances are orange. The kitchen looks like it came from the seventies. A wall with an opening separates the living from the rest of the house. I think it used to have glass in it, but no more. Now there’s a giant hole with a dead potted plant resting on the sill.

A dark opening is toward the back of the living room. I’m guessing the bedrooms and bathrooms are back there.

The walls of the house are covered in dark wood paneling and the ceiling is low and appears to be covered in white popcorn. The living room is decorated with brown carpet, two windows, a couch, a coffee table, a reclining chair, and an old TV, the kind with rabbit ears, sitting on a stand. It's cozy though.

OceanofPDF.com

"WELCOME TO THE CAVE," Carson says.

"Cave?" I ask, touching the stack of books on the TV stand.

"It's always dark in here—even when the curtains are open, and all the lights are on.

"I think the room is nice," I respond, picking up a book from off a counter. The Old Man And The Sea. "Doing some light reading?" I wave the spine of the book at him.

"Not me," Carson says, but he takes the book from my hands and sets it back on the TV stand. "Come on. Let's go to my room."

I follow him down the hall, past a bathroom and a closed door. When he opens the second door, I ask, "Where's your parents?"

Carson shakes his head. "It's just me and my dad and he's at work."

"What happened to your mom?" I ask, checking out his room. There's a bed, dresser, a desk with an old laptop sitting on top, and a bookshelf. It's filled with books and soccer trophies. The walls are covered in a mishmash of posters including soccer balls, cool photos, a signed poster of Chris Evans as Captain America, and other random stuff.

"She left when I was five. Couldn't take marriage to my dad or being my mom." He pauses and looks away, uncomfortable.

I want to tell him that can't be true. How could anyone not love Carson? "I'm so sorry," I say, studying him. "I didn't mean to pry. I have no idea who my parents are so it's always on my mind. Sorry." All the years I saw him at school I never guessed he didn't have a mom or that he lived in a tiny house. I judged him. Believed he was another one of the rich kids from the popular crowd who have everything and look down on the rest of us. I was so wrong. "That must've been hard as a kid." And probably still is, I think.

"Are you adopted?" He sits on his bed and picks up the script.

I sit next to him. "It's just me and my three aunties. They've taken care of me since I was a baby. I haven't met my parents even though they're supposed to be alive somewhere."

Carson faces me. "I may have misjudged you." He hands me his script.

"There's a lot of that going around." I glance at the page and recognize the same scene we worked on yesterday. My heart jumps. The kissing scene. I clear my throat and stand. We're alone in his house and in his room. Kissing can lead to more stuff and I'm not even close to ready for that. The kiss yesterday was my first. I'm still reeling from that experience. "Where'd you get this?" I ask, tapping on a Broncos poster signed by John Elway.

He shrugs. "My dad."

"Oh." I move on to the next one. A poster of—

"The posters are stupid. Can we just work on the script?" Carson asks.

I sense his distain and hurry back over to his bed and sit. "Sure. Where do you want to start?"

"Let's take the scene we worked on yesterday from the top." He takes a pack of gum from his computer desk and offers me a piece. "Want one?"

"Definitely." I remove the wrapper and put the red stick in my mouth. Carson does the same with his piece.

"Ready?"

"Yeah, give me a sec." I read over the first few sentences in my mind, clear my throat. "I'm good."

Carson faces me. Our knees touch and I pretend my body isn't jittery with excitement.

His face softens and gets serious. "Tell me you love me." Carson takes my face in his hands.

Just like yesterday, my body shudders. “You know I do. More than anything.” I search his eyes, begging him to see the truth, even though I realize I’ve loved the idea of him and not the actual him. I didn’t actually know Carson, but I’m happy that’s changing.

“Say it then, Juliet. Say the words my soul longs to hear.” He’s so close I can smell his gum.

My eyes fall to his lips, remembering the feel of them and I crave them against mine again. “Romeo. Sweet, Romeo. I love you. Despite our family’s differences.”

“My Juliet.” His mouth covers mine.

And I’m lost. Adrift in the feel of his lips caressing mine, the way he deepens our kiss without being forceful. I wait for his tongue to find mine and Carson doesn’t disappoint.

Like before, something strange stirs in my chest, a tightening and a burst of golden fire. I’m panting.

Carson scoots closer, moving his hands to my neck and down my back.

In the other room a door slams.

Carson jumps back and I swear his face pales.

“Who parked their car in front of our house?” The voice is deep and filled with anger.

“That’s my dad.” He climbs off the bed, takes my hand, and adjusts my hair.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHAT'S GOING ON IN HERE?" Carson's bedroom door opens, and Carson's dad hovers in the doorway. He looks me over and sneers. "Aren't you a looker."

He turns his attention to Carson, and I'm relieved, until he starts talking again.

"You're so lucky you're still young. A hot new girl every night." He chuckles spitefully. "Remember one day they'll realize what a waste of air you are and leave, just like your mom."

I feel Carson's body tense.

And I don't want to be here anymore. "I should get going," I say.

Carson's dad blocks the door with his tall figure. He has thinning dark hair and wears a plaid shirt and dusty old jeans.

"Let her leave, dad," Carson says.

I notice Carson's usually bright eyes turn dull and his confident posture is sunk in.

From where I stand, I can smell the whiskey on his father's breath, and my pulse spikes with worry for Carson.

"Why, Cary? She doesn't need to go. I didn't mean to interrupt." The words seem like an apology, but his tone is laced with sarcasm. "Just do what you do best." Carson's father starts to walk away, then he changes his mind, comes back into the room, and punches Carson's wall so hard his fist goes through the plaster. He pulls his hand out and laughs. I can see there's blood on his knuckles. "My name's Bud. If you ever get tired of the boy—" He glances at his son.

Carson shoves his dad out of his room. "Get out. Don't disrespect Rory like that." Carson is furious. I feel the anger radiating off him.

His dad laughs harder and stumbles down the hall.

Carson closes his door and locks it. He walks over to the dresser, opens one of the drawers and pulls out another soccer poster. Takes some tape and hangs the poster over the area where his dad punched the wall. When he's finished, he puts the tape back in the drawer and sits on his bed. "I'm really sorry about that," he says putting his face in his hands.

Now I understand why there are random posters all over the room. They don't represent what Carson loves, only what he wants covered up. I kneel in front of him and grab his face, so that I can see his bright green eyes. "It's okay," I say. "Carson, really."

He searches my eyes. "Rory." His gaze falls to my lips. He kneels on the floor in front of me, grabs my shoulders and kisses me. Really kisses me. There's no tenderness, just need and hunger and desire.

I take his shirt in my fists and bring him close and then run my fingers along his back and down to his hips. His body is taut, chiseled. He tastes like cinnamon, and his body smells like clean laundry.

After several long minutes his lips release mine. He smiles. "We may need to practice this scene a lot until the final performance."

My lips feel swollen, but in a way that makes me want more. "I'd like that."

WHEN I'M IN BED, Carson texts: Thanks again for practicing with me.

I text back: Anytime.

You got home kind of late. Where were you? The text is from Tiana.

Nothing gets past my best friend. She probably somehow knows exactly what I've been up to. I was at Carson's.

OMGeeeeee!!!!! Tell me there was kissing involved.

Maybe.

You're evil. Then she texts: How was it?

Isn't there a rule about kissing and telling?

That's only between guys. Girls are supposed to kiss and tell.

LOL. He is a great kisser. My lips feel bruised.

Nice. You know Merida is going to freak when she finds out, right?

Yeah. I'll give you both the play-by-play tomorrow. Night.

Night, she says. And then, Oh, wait a sec. Are we going dress shopping this weekend?

I hadn't thought about buying a dress, but I need one. I'll have to talk to my aunties about the dance first. Don't know yet. I'll tell you tomorrow.

OceanofPDF.com

THE NEXT MORNING I take extra time getting ready. I put on a gray and pink striped sweater, a pink skirt, and gray tights with matching heels. I even try to curl my long blond hair. But after burning my forehead once and my ear a second time I give up and stick my hair in a ponytail.

“Rory, hurry up. You’re going to be late for school,” one of my aunties hollers.

“Coming,” I apply some light pink lip-gloss and brown mascara. Grab my backpack and my phone and head into the kitchen. Our house is a rambler with the bedrooms and bathrooms on one side separated by the front entry and then the living areas, including the kitchen, dining room and family room on the other.

“Morning,” I say, setting my pack on the small kitchen table. “What’s for breakfast?” None of them are very good cooks, but they all try.

“Apple pancakes,” Auntie Vera says. She has flour on her cheek and the tip of her nose.

“Thank you,” I say as she sets a plate of what looks like a jumbled mash with sliced apples on top.

“Don’t forget the whipped cream,” Auntie Fae says, spraying the cream high.

The three of them stand in front of the small table waiting for me to take a bite.

“Oh, and she needs milk.” Auntie Vera pours some into a glass, slopping some on the granite countertop. She ignores the milk droplets and brings the cup over. “Here you go, Rory.”

I cut into the pancakes. They’re a little gooey in the center, but I chew focusing on the apples and the cream. Swallow. Take a drink of milk. “Delicious,” I say, smiling.

“See, you thought they weren’t cooked,” Auntie Fae whispers to the other two.

“Pish posh. I think she’s just being nice, like usual. She’d probably eat dirt to please you,” Auntie Macey says.

I hide a laugh behind a bite of apple and cream and decide to change the subject. “I was invited to the school dance.”

“Oh my word.” Auntie Fae claps.

The other two do a do-si-do, linking elbows.

“When is it?” Vera asks.

“A week from today.” I take another sip of milk and then get up. Tiana and Merida are probably outside waiting for a ride to school.

“That’s wonderful.”

“Who’s the boy?”

“I’ll tell you all about him when I get home tonight, but I wondered if I could go shopping for a dress this weekend?” I have no idea where my aunties get their money, but I know we don’t have a lot. I don’t want to put a strain on the budget.

“I think that’s a great idea,” Auntie Vera says, after glancing at her sisters.

It’s funny. They call themselves sisters, but physically they look nothing alike. Vera is tall with dark brown skin and long black hair. Macey is short with creamy skin and red and gray hair. And Auntie Fae is covered in light brown freckles the same color as her hair. The love they have for each other is apparent though and they’ve always loved me as their own. I don’t know if they’re actually related or not. They never come out and answer my questions.

“Okay. Thanks. See you later.” I blow them kisses and run outside.

Tiana and Merida lean against my car, talking. Merida has her curly red hair up in a messy bun. She wears ripped faded jeans, a long-sleeved tee shirt, and boots that go to the knee.

Tiana has on sea foam green jeans, matching shoes, and a white blouse. Her black hair is shiny and lies against her head with two clips on one side. On me, the fashion would look silly. On her, it looks amazing.

“Hey girls,” I say.

“Told you,” Tiana says when she sees me. “Look at her outfit.” She flicks my skirt.

“And her hair,” Merida adds, touching my hair.

I push her out of the way and get inside my car. Merida and Tiana do the same.

As soon as I pull out of the driveway, Tiana starts, “I told Merida that you were at Carson’s house last night. She guessed that kissing was involved. Now we both want the deets.”

“Yes, like how did the kiss happen? Where did he put his hands? Where were yours? What did he say afterward?” Merida watches me as she speaks.

I spend the next ten minutes giving them the particulars about last night, except the personal stuff Carson shared about his mom.

“You are too lucky,” Merida says when I park, and we head into the school.

I can’t stop looking for Carson, even though I should. It isn’t cool.

“Gotta get to class, I’ll see you both at lunch.” Tiana waves as she takes off.

“See ya, T.”

Merida and I have our first class together, but I need to go to my locker. “I’ll see you in English Lit.”

“Sure.” She takes off toward the girl’s bathroom.

I walk down the hall, determined to steer clear of students, and search for Carson. I’ve seen him many times before in this hallway with his friends. Today is no different. He’s leaning against a locker. Three of his friends surround him. They’re talking and laughing. Kelly is there too. She sees me first, smirks, and leans into Carson, taking up his attention. She puts a hand on his neck and pulls him toward her, kissing him. On the flippin' lips.

Ugh. My heart falls into my stomach. Was I just another girl to him? I see him look up just as I walk by. He seems surprised and quickly pushes Kelly away.

She laughs.

Tears fill my eyes and that makes me angry. I focus on my feet, putting one foot in front of the other. Out of the corner of my eye I see a flicker, like the soft beating of butterfly wings. There's a sparkle. I blink, clearing the tears, and look over, but there's nothing there.

"Weird." I walk into class.

OceanofPDF.com

THE REST of the day is similar. Carson ignores me. Tiana and Merida can tell something is wrong, but I can't tell them. I don't want to break their hearts the way mine is broken. And part of me can't believe the way Carson is behaving is for real. He shared personal stuff about his life, his family. We made out. That has to mean something. It does to me.

By the end of school I can't deny it any longer. He really is avoiding me.

And I'm devastated.

At play practice Kelly is there. She and Carson run through their lines. Juliet tells Romeo she loves him. They kiss. They leave and I'm stuck hanging up costumes and tidying up the dressing room. Since it's Friday night I take my time. When I get home, I know my aunties will want to ask questions about Carson and I don't want to answer them. Tiana and Merida text me too. They want to make plans about shopping for a dress tomorrow.

I finish my work and sigh. My phone chimes and I take it out, reading the texts. What do I say to them? Do I share what's bothered me today? Tell them that Carson has a cruel streak? "I can't."

"There you go again, talking to yourself."

I see Carson's reflection in the mirror. He smiles, but there's no joy. When he comes closer, I notice the bruise under his eye. I didn't see it during play practice.

"What happened?" I ask, trying not to care.

He gives me a questioning look.

"Your eye?"

"Oh?" He touches the area that's the most swollen. I can tell its sore. But he shrugs. "It's nothing."

I can't help but think about his dad and the way he punched a hole in Carson's bedroom wall last night. Carson covered up the hole, pretending nothing happened. This scenario feels the same. If he doesn't want to talk about what's wrong, who am I to pressure him? No one, that's who, I think, woefully.

"Did you need something?" I ask, standing. When I'm upset, I clean, and now is no different. I grab a disinfectant towel and wipe down the counters like I'm being timed and failure isn't an option.

"I don't know. Just thought I'd say hello." He tucks his hands into his front pockets.

I glance at his reflection.

Jerk. "Really? Or do you want another make out session and think you can use me because you're the hot and popular Carson Hayes?"

"You think I'm hot?" He smiles and I feel a spark.

"Ugh, you're infuriating." I chuck the towel into the trash, grab my phone and my backpack and push past him.

He grabs my arm. "Hey?"

"What?" I stomp my foot. "What do you want, Carson? Because if you're just after someone to kiss, I'm not that kind of girl." I wipe an angry tear streaking down my cheek. "I thought…" I pause and stare at my gray heels. I believed he liked me. That we might date and become a couple. Stupid ideas!

Carson chuckles. "You thought what? You were something special?"

I gasp. Try to pull away, but he holds me tight and grabs my other arm. "Because you are, Rory." He leans in to kiss me, but I turn my face away.

"I don't believe you." I push against him, trying to escape his grasp. "You completely ignored me today. Didn't even acknowledge me and you let Kelly kiss you."

Carson releases my arms and rolls his shoulders. "I know." He turns away. “I’m sorry about the way I acted today. It was unfair to you, but I didn’t know how to handle my feelings.” He stops and faces me. “If my friends knew how I’m feeling, what I feel—” He shakes his head. “They wouldn’t be kind. To you. Or to me. They would take what I feel and use it to hurt you, to hurt your friends.” He reaches out. “They can be so cruel.” His hands open in supplication as though he’s pleading with me to understand. “Everyone thinks I hold the power, that I’m this popular, untouchable guy, but the truth is, I’m nothing. Just like my father said.” He turns away again. “I’m sorry, Rory. Truly. It hurts me to know I hurt you. I just didn’t know what else to do.”

I watch him walk away and I’m torn. Should I believe him? He’s seems sincere, but I barely know him. Still, there’s that piece of golden fire within my chest that tells me he isn’t lying. Throwing caution to the wind, I chase after him. I still have one question.

He’s on the stairs.

“Carson.”

He turns, smiles hopefully. “Rory.”

“What about the dance? You asked me to go. People will see us there. If you’re big problem is your friends using your feeling against you, us, whatever, then why ask me?” I realize when I’m done talking, I’m breathless.

He nods, walks toward me. “I really do want to go to the dance with you. When I asked, I thought I could be strong, deal with the consequences, but when I saw what Kelly did, I knew I had no idea how they would treat you.” He runs a hand through his hair. “I don’t want to be selfish.”

He’s worried about me. That’s sweet. “You think I’m weak? That I can’t take care of myself? Or that I even care what they say or think about me?” I shake my head. “I don’t. I haven’t cared since Junior High and I still don’t care now. I’m tougher than I look.”

“I’m starting to see that.” He’s close, so close I can feel his breath on my cheek. “But I don’t know if I am.”

The truth. It’s ugly, but I can’t belittle his honesty.

“So, we aren’t going to the dance then?” My voice quivers with emotion. Because I really want to go.

“I want to.” He swallows, tucking his hands in his pockets. “Yes. We are definitely doing this. If you don’t care, then neither do I.”

“You’re sure?” I don’t know what he means about “doing this.” My heart is beating fast. Is he asking me out? Like to be his girlfriend? Or does he just mean the dance? I know nothing about dating protocol or even if it’s called protocol. It probably isn’t. I’m a dork.

“Definitely!” He walks backward, pulling my hand with him. “I’m going to walk my girlfriend to her car.” He says the words like it’s a statement, but his features question whether he’s right or not.

“Cool,” I say in response as a bubble of happiness fills my insides.

OceanofPDF.com

OVER THE NEXT week Carson and I walk the halls of Hellgate High. We hold hands, eat lunch together, and occasionally yield to personal displays of affection—my favorite part of the day. Kelly and Carson's other friends seem to take our dating better than expected. In fact, they barely say anything at all.

Merida and Tiana worry his friends are planning something, but I hope they're more mature than that.

"We need to have a plan just in case Carson's friends decide to try something," Tiana says, the night of the dance.

We're in the bathroom at my house. Merida is nearly done curling my hair.

"I've heard they want to do a prank along the lines of Carrie, with a bucket full of pig's blood," Tiana adds.

"No way. That's so cliché," I say. My eyes are closed because Tiana is working on my makeup. She says she's going for smoky, whatever that means, but she has skills, so I trust her.

I'm nearly done curling your hair," Merida says. "And then we can discuss back up plans."

"I don't need a backup plan. Nothing's going to happen, except Carson and I are going to dance."

"Finished," Tiana says.

"Good." I open my eyes. "They aren't going to do anything." But I wonder if I'm just naïve. It wouldn't be the first time. Carson's group has been extra quiet lately. I brush that aside. "Carson is going to be here soon. I need to get dressed."

"K, we'll be in the kitchen if you need us." Merida fluffs one more piece of hair and then they both leave.

I check my reflection in the mirror. My makeup looks amazing.

Tiana nailed smoky eyes. My hair rocks, too. Merida curled it and pinned it up in a loose bun, showing off my slim neck.

Slipping out of my robe, I put on the rose pink dress the girl's and I picked out last weekend. It's a vintage inspired sleeveless dress with heavy pleating from pin-tuck shoulders and an uneven ruffled hem. A thin belt made of the same material as the dress ties at the waist. The dress is short, the hem rests mid thighs. My shoes are gorgeous. They're nude in color and tie in front with a thick ribbon. Knot drop earrings, the same color as my dress, and a heart shaped necklace complete my outfit.

When I'm finished, I check out my reflection and admit to myself that I look good. My hair and makeup go well with the dress. In the living room Tiana squeals with delight when she sees me, and Merida jumps up and down.

"I don't care what the jerks have planned. Regardless, you look amazing." Merida brushes my bangs above my brows and hugs me. "I hope we're wrong," she whispers.

Tiana joins in the hug. "We're going to the dance. We'll see you there. Good or bad, we're your back up, got it?"

I nod, holding back tears, so grateful I have such amazing friends.

OceanofPDF.com

TIANA AND MERIDA are gone by the time Carson arrives at the house.

"You look nice," I say, admiring the way his black tuxedo skims across his broad shoulders and fits his muscled body flawlessly. In one hand he holds a bracelet corsage.

"Thanks." He takes my appearance in, paying special attention to my dress. "You look amazing. Wow." He smiles, opening the plastic container that holds my flowers. "You want them on the left or right hand?"

I hold out my left and Carson steps close. His clean scent along with a hint of cinnamon gum tickles my nose. As he slides the bracelet over my hand, his fingers brush against my skin. The flowers are dahlias—two pink and one that's white. They're beautiful. I lift them to my nose and breathe in, enjoying the scent. "They smell amazing."

He lifts my wrist and the corsage to his nose, breathing in. After a few seconds, he raises an eyebrow. "I can't smell anything."

Surprised, I smell them again. The scent is distinct, like nutmeg and cinnamon with a hint of another spice I can't place. "Really?"

He takes my hand and laces his fingers with mine. "Rory, I'm—"

At that moment my aunties decide to make an appearance. They flit around us like giant-sized hummingbirds, commenting on my dress, my shoes, my hair, and my makeup. Then they do the same with Carson. I immediately feel the air get chillier.

"Introduce us to your friend," Auntie Vera says. Her green dress and white apron looks fresh and her black hair is up.

Auntie Macey is in a purple dress and white apron and Auntie Fae wears a blue dress, also with a white apron. They've spruced themselves up nicely.

"Aunties, this is Carson Hayes. He's playing Romeo in the play I'm helping out with at school."

Carson holds out a hand. "Hi," he says, shaking first Vera's hand, then Macey's, followed by Fae's.

Macey and Fae are easily smitten. I watch Fae's cheeks brighten when Carson takes her hand.

Vera isn't as taken by him. "What are your plans tonight?" Vera asks, eyeing him.

He smiles. "We're going to have dinner at Lofty's." He glances at me. "I hear Rory likes chicken and waffles."

"I do," I mouth, excited.

"Once we're finished eating, we'll go to the dance. When it's over I'll bring her home."

"And that will be?" Auntie Macey asks, glancing at the watch on her wrist.

"I'll have her back no later than midnight, if that's okay."

"Hmmmm," Vera says.

Auntie Fae produces a camera. "That sounds wonderful." She turns to me. "Can we get a picture?"

"Sure." I roll back my shoulders and smile.

Auntie Fae clicks the camera. "K, now the two of you together."

Carson wraps a hand around my waist, and I lean into him.

Vera glares.

I try hard not to laugh as Fae clicks the picture.

"We'd better get going," Carson says. "I know the restaurant is going to be busy." He walks me to the door and holds it open for me.

"Bye aunties."

Auntie Vera comes close. "Be safe."

"I will."

CARSON HAS a table reserved at Lofty's so we get right in. The restaurant is busy, but I don't see anyone else from school. Most of the patrons consist of older couples and a few families.

The waitress takes our order, which is chicken and waffles. Of course. Once she brings our drinks and rolls with strawberry butter, Carson says, "You really look amazing tonight."

"Thanks," I say, taking a sip of water. "Merida and Tiana did my hair and makeup." I shrug. "They know a lot more about that stuff than I do."

"They did good, but I think you're beautiful even without all the makeup and fancy hair." He smiles and puts a chunk of roll in his mouth.

I study his face, hoping to verify he's telling the truth. There doesn't seem to be any dishonesty in his gaze. "Thank you."

Carson swallows. "And your aunts?" He shakes his head. "They seem nice, except Vera, she's kind of scary."

I take another drink of water. Try to relax and quit being nervous about spending time with him, but I can't. "They are over-protective, but very sweet."

"Want a roll?" He polishes off his first one and goes for another.

"No, I've got to save room for the chicken and waffles."

"But you are going to eat?"

"Oh yeah, I'm telling you, I love, love, love chicken and waffles. Just wait."

"We'll see." He chuckles and takes another bite of roll.

The waitress finally shows up with our food and my mouth waters. The plate holds four waffle quarters and two crispy pieces of chicken. There's a dab of butter on each waffle and underneath is maple syrup. The food is also served with the best honey mustard I've ever had.

Carson stares at his plate and then mine. "Tell me how to eat this."

I pick up my fork and knife and move the chicken to the side. "The first thing I do is butter the waffles." He does the same. "There's syrup under the waffle, so you don't need anymore, unless you like it really sweet.

"I do." He puts a little over the top of his waffles.

"Now, put the chicken on top." I use my knife and fork and place the chicken.

Carson copies.

"Now eat like this." I cut through the juicy chicken and down into the waffle with the knife. With my fork I pick up the bite, dip the chicken in the honey mustard sauce, and shove the whole thing in my mouth. "Mmmmmm."

Carson laughs but duplicates what I did.

"What do you think?" I ask after a few bites.

He nods. Cuts another bite. "That's amazing." He shoves the food in his mouth and smiles.

"See," I say and do the same.

"I do. While everyone else is eating weird food I can't pronounce, we're eating breakfast and dinner put together." Carson seems beyond happy which makes me happy too.

"Yeah, this is way better." I smile, keeping my mouth closed while I chew.

When he's about halfway done, he says, "You're a senior, right?"

"Yep. My final year," I respond, knowing he's a senior too.

"It's crazy, right?" He shakes his head.

"It so is." I say the words but don't mean them. What to do after high school is a mystery to me. "Are you going to go to college?"

"I want to. I've submitted several college applications but haven't heard back yet."

"What do you want to study?" I take a drink of water. There's still another piece of chicken and two pieces of waffle left, but I'm getting really full. Usually I take the other half home, but that isn't going to work since we're going to the dance afterward.

Carson finishes his bite and takes a drink. “I’m not sure. I want to play soccer wherever I go. And the only way I can go to college is if I get a scholarship. So, we’ll see if a school wants me.” He keeps eating, and I watch, mesmerized by his mouth.

I nod my head. “I’ve seen you play soccer, you’re amazing. No doubt you’ll get multiple offers.”

“Thanks. What about you? You know what you want to major in?”

“Probably business with a minor in accounting. I love theater, but that’s not really a career and I need to be practical.” I sound like my aunties and shrug. It’s weird, whenever I try to think about my life after I turn eighteen and graduate from high school, my mind goes blank. My aunties say it’s because I’m scared, but I get the feeling there’s more to it than that. Something they aren’t telling me. Each time I ask them about it, they brush my questions away like they aren’t important. The more they do that, the more I know they are keeping secrets.

It’s the same with current events. There’s the issue with the discovery of supernaturals. The politicians and local governments passed laws against them. On the news, people protest outside city hall with their signs championing equality for all. Plus, I’ve heard the debates for and against locking up, killing, or sending the supernaturals away. They never mention where they will be sent and that concerns me. People for and against the supernaturals voice their opinions everywhere, including bumper stickers and social media.

As for me, I think as long as the supernaturals want to live and work among us. As long as they agree to follow the laws and uphold them the same as the rest of us. As long as they don’t use their powers against us, then they should be allowed to stay. But my aunties tell me not to worry. That their issues have nothing to do with me. Somehow, I don’t believe that’s true.

“Accounting huh?” he asks, interrupting my thoughts. “That sounds exciting.” He wrinkles his nose. “I would’ve thought with your looks and your talent, you'd major in theater or move to Hollywood and get an agent." He pauses. "That would be sick."

"Thanks. You're sick."

We laugh and my heart soars. He says I'm pretty and talented. Can't beat that.

OceanofPDF.com

CARSON PARKS his old Mustang in the Hellgate high school parking lot. “Let me get the door for you,” he says when I start to open my side.

“Okay.” He’s a gentleman. My aunties will be pleased to learn that piece of information.

I take his hand after he opens my door and I step out. Walking in four inch heels isn’t easy, but I make it work and lean into Carson when I need to. He opens the front door to the school. Immediately, loud music pummels my ears. A top forty song, I think. Couples roam the halls. They are loud, but it’s awesome they are having fun.

My heart lurches. I want to enjoy myself too, but I’m nervous. Once I see Merida and Tiana, I think I’ll feel better.

Carson gives the girl at the dance entrance our tickets. She stamps our hands. Carson takes mine and pulls me inside. “Come on.”

The music is loud, but the gym is decorated way prettier than I thought was possible. The theme is: Love Is Sweet.

Giant lollipops stand on either side of the entrance. There are large, sugared gumdrops along the stage where the DJ works. Lights twirl to the music, changing color and pulsing to the beat. To the right is a refreshments table.

“Did you want a drink?” Carson asks, his eyes searching the gymnasium.

“No, I’m good.”

On the left is a photo booth. Couples are lined up outside and wait for their turn.

Only about twenty couples dance.

“Shall we?” he asks, holding out his hand.

“Sure.” I take it and he spins me.

We make our way toward the center of the floor. The song is slow, so I stand in front of him, nervous. He takes the lead, placing his hands on my hips.

I wrap my arms around his neck. Our bodies brush against each other.

“You’re a lot taller in those heels,” he says, looking down at my feet.

“Four inches can do that to a girl,” I say and then feel like a dork.

Carson smiles and pulls me more tightly against him. “The height just means your lips are closer to mine.” He leans down and pecks me on the lips. “I like it.”

My face gets hot. “Me too.”

“Hey Rory.” Merida and Tiana are next to each other, waving. Merida is in a short white dress. Her flaming red hair is down and is a stark contrast to the white of her dress. Tiana’s dress is short in the front and longer in the back. It’s a deep purple with black lace overlay. They both look gorgeous.

I wave back. “Hi,” I mouth. Then give them both thumbs up.

Carson turns so that he can see them too. “Ladies,” he says when they come closer.

The slow song ends, and a fast song starts. Tiana and Merida come over to us.

“You came,” I say turning toward them.

Carson keeps hold of one of my hands and I melt a little inside. He’s a sweet guy.

Tiana’s mouth tightens. “Give it to me straight, Hayes. Why are you suddenly all over Rory when you haven’t talked to her once in six years?”

I’m horrified, but the question is a good one.

Carson doesn’t get upset though. He just smiles. “I’ve been hanging out with the same crowd for a long time. Years. Some since Kindergarten. A while ago I realized I couldn't stand most of them. Graduation is in a few months and I decided it was time to make new friends with people I'm actually interested in getting to know." He turns to me. "I've wanted to get to know you for years."

I smile. "Really?"

He nods. "Super really."

"Awwww," Merida says, patting Carson awkwardly on the shoulder.

Tiana crosses her arms. She squints shrewdly. "I think Kelly and some of your other friends plan to do something mean to Rory tonight. What do you know about that?"

He shakes his head. "I don't know anything about it, but no one better mess with my Rory." His features turn fierce.

Tiana's face relaxes. "All right. I guess I believe you."

"Good. Now if you don't mind, Rory and I are going to dance."

Merida takes Tiana by the arm and starts to pull her off the dance floor, but the song ends, and another song comes on. And not just any song either. It's our song. The one Merida, Tiana, and I made up our dance to.

"No way. Did you plan this?" I ask, horrified.

"Maybe," Merida says, winking.

"Shall we?" Tiana asks.

At the thought of dancing in front of so many people, I shake my head.

"Wait, what did I miss?" Carson asks, confusion furrowing his brows.

I shake my head. The idea of dancing with my friends in front of him isn't something I want to do.

Merida and Tiana come forward, each take one of my arms, and pull me toward them.

"No, guys. I'm not doing it. Forget it," I hiss, trying to pull away.

“You know a dance?” Carson’s eyes are alight with excitement. “This I have to see.”

Merida puts me in my spot, then takes hers. Tiana stands in the middle.

“And five, six, seven, eight.” As one, they start dancing.

I just watch, shocked they’re actually going through the steps.

“Don’t you know the moves?” Carson asks, a surprised smile on his lips. “Show me,” he says.

“Oh, she does, better than the two of us,” Tiana says. She kicks, spins and does a squat turn like a pro.

He looks at me with new eyes. “Rory, I have to see you do this dance.”

I blush red hot. “I’m really not that good.” I cross my arms, nervous.

“Liar,” Merida says. “She’s the best of the three of us.”

“Please,” Carson pleads. His smile fills his whole beautiful face.

Several of the couples stop and come over to watch. Merida and Tiana keep going. They’re really good. The moves show off their flexibility, precise and quick movement, and that they have rhythm. I’m in awe of them.

“Rory, serious. You’ve got to finish the dance with us. Get in here,” Tiana says.

I’m about to give in, just as Kelly walks over. She and another girl appear in their gorgeous gowns. There are a few guys with them too. What’s weird is they’ve all got their hands behind their backs.

My smile fades.

Kelly glares at Carson. “We have a present for you, Rory.” Her right arm starts to come around.

Carson jumps into action, flinging himself in front of me just as several containers of something red splatter him. Carson flinches and takes a few steps back, nearly falling into me, but I steady him, pressing my hands into his back. Then move around to see what's happened.

The red stuff looks like blood.

Kelly's eyes get wide with fear when she realizes what she's done. Then she shrugs. "Maybe it's for the best," she says, turning to her friends. "Look at Carson. What an idiot."

Her friends, that are also supposed to be Carson's friends, laugh and point.

A few teachers rush over.

"What happened here?" the English teacher asks.

"You six come with me," the principle says. Then he looks at Kelly. "I'm disappointed in you." He searches the crowd. "All of you. This is ridiculous."

Some of the kids snicker.

Others whisper not so nice comments I wish I didn't hear.

The driver's ed teacher adds, "I'm calling your parents right this minute." He gets out his phone.

The vice-principle takes the microphone. "Everyone please stand back a few minutes while we get this cleaned up."

The principle points. "My office. Now!" He escorts her and the other five from the room.

"Carson, are you okay?" I ask quietly. He hasn't said a word, and I'm worried about him.

His face is covered in red, but what I can see is a mask of unreadable emotion. "I'm so sorry about them, about all of this," he finally says. "I never realized just how awful those jerks were."

"I don't care about them, just you." I look at him through my lashes, take his hand and lead him toward the door. He needs to get cleaned up. "Merida. Tiana. I'll text you guys later, K."

They each give me a hug.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN WE PULL up to Carson's house, I don't realize where we are at first. Carson drove down an alleyway and all I see are fenced backyards.

"We're here," he says and puts his car in park.

"Oh." I'm not sure what to say. I'm nervous about seeing his dad again.

Carson gets out, comes around, and opens my door. We walk through his back gate. He unlocks the door and I follow him inside.

"My dad will be gone all night. He's never around on the weekends," Carson says when he sees me search the small house.

He acts like I should know what that means. I don't, but I'm relieved. Glad I won't have to deal with his dad and his creepy, wandering eyes and crude comments. Butch is there, in his dog bed that's nearly the size of a love seat. His ears perk up when he sees me. "Hey boy." His tail and the entire back portion of his body wags with excitement. He pushes his head into my hand, and I scratch between his ears. "That's a good boy. Yes, you are. Such a good, good boy."

Carson chuckles, but glares playfully at the dog. "Who feeds you?"

Butch tilts his head and trots over to Carson, jumping up. The dog's front paws reach Carson's shoulders. "That's what I'm talking about." Carson scratches Butch's back. The dog licks Carson's face a moment before sniffing his shirt. Then he starts to lick that. "Okay, that's gross." He stands and pats Butch on the head. Butch barks and whines. "We'll play later." Carson says before he heads into the bathroom.

I follow, and so does Butch.

"You'd better close that," Carson says.

I do. "Didn't you mention a cat?" I say, helping him get his jacket off. The bathroom is tiny.

“Yeah, he’s been gone a few days. He does that sometimes. Probably found himself a new girlfriend.”

“Really?” I laugh.

“Hey, my cat’s a player.” He winks.

“Is your tux rented?” I help him get out of his shirt.

“Yeah, I don’t think I’m getting my deposit back.” He smirks.

“You’re probably right.” I drop the shirt on top of the jacket in the sink. Turn back and wipe at the red stuff with my fingers. His chest and stomach are covered. Still, there’s no denying he has a great body and that’s when I realize what I’m doing. Touching his taut abs and well defined chest. Holy buckets!

Carson’s eyes darken and I know he enjoys my touch as much as I enjoy touching him. He takes the towel from the rack and wipes off his exposed skin and then throws the towel in the hamper. “Stay here.” He dashes down the hall.

I remain in the bathroom, my fingers still covered in the red. What is it, I think, bringing my hand to my nose? The red stuff has a strange smell. It isn’t sticky like syrup. And that’s when I realize it must be real blood. I don’t know what kind, but Kelly and her friends really did try to Carrie me. The thought freaks me out and I quickly wash my hands to get it off.

When I’m done with my hands, I check my reflection. My makeup still looks great, but the pinned up curls are starting to fall slightly. I adjust them, but my handiwork doesn’t do any good.

“Aurora. Aurora.”

I hear my name being said and realize it isn’t Carson. The voice is too small, too high to be his. I freeze, my fingers still caught in my hair. “Who’s there?”

“Aurora, his kiss awakened your curse.” Turning, I search for the source. Behind me, next to the door are some shelves and built in drawers. I step closer, looking for anything that might possibly have spoken. There's a small figurine of a fairy in a golden yellow dress standing on the middle shelf. She has amber hair and gauzy wings flecked with gold.

The figurine is out of place amongst the man shampoo, conditioner, shaving cream, and deodorant. "What are you doing up there?" I reach out to pick it up, and she comes to life. "Aurora, our hidden princess, you've been away from Isluria for too long. It's time you come home." Her wings flutter and she whooshes past me, flying out the door.

I blink several times, rubbing my eyes. That's impossible, I think getting ready to follow after her, but also surprised by her words. "What is Isluria?"

Carson comes back in the bathroom. "Hey." Carson's handsome frame blocks the door. He's wearing a gray tee shirt and navy sweatpants. "What's wrong?" He searches my face. "You look like you've seen a ghost."

I'm not going to tell him I thought I saw a fairy. That's ridiculous. Not even I believe, and I saw her with my own eyes. Heard her voice. Instead, I focus on the other disturbing thing that happened tonight. "It was real blood," I say, pointing to his shirt and jacket still sitting on the edge of the tub.

"I figured as much." He wraps me in a hug, holding me close. "I'm so sorry, Rory. So sorry." I lean my head against his chest, snuggling against him.

The moment is intimate and I don't want it to end. "I'm not the one who's covered in blood. It's me who should apologize."

He lifts my chin and tenderly kisses me. "Don't even think about it." He runs his nose along my cheek. "Thank you for taking a chance on me." His lips find mine as he speaks.

I smile against them enjoying the feel.

"And thanks for agreeing to practice my scene for the play. I'm the luckiest guy at Hellgate high, and probably the world." He winks. "Your kisses are amazing."

I wrap my hands around his neck and pull him close. "So are yours," I say and then go back to exploring his mouth.

OceanofPDF.com

I WAIT for a few days after the dance to bring up what I think I saw in Carson's bathroom with my aunties. We all sit down to dinner and as I put more salad onto my plate, I hit them with my question. "Is it possible fairies could be real?" I'm too embarrassed to look at anything except the half-eaten tofu burger on my plate.

Auntie Macey gasps.

"Where did that question come from?" I detect distress in Auntie Fae's voice.

Steeling myself, I meet her gaze, but shrug, trying to play it off as a silly question. "I—I don't know. Just curious." I take a bite of the burger and wish I hadn't. It sticks in my throat, so I sip some juice, which causes me to choke.

My aunties flutter around me in a mish mash of panic and high-pitched chatter.

"Breathe, Rory," Fae says.

"She's choking, you nitwit," Vera retorts. "That's why she coughing."

"Don't call me a nitwit, you beetle bum."

I swear the scent of fresh cut flowers swirls around them as they argue. "I'm fine. Really guys. Chill."

"We're chill," Vera says, adjusting her apron, but her face is red.

"Yes, totally," Macey adds, her eyebrows up practically into her hair.

Once they're calm, Fae looks at me. "I suppose it's time you know the truth."

A wisp of panic winds through my stomach. The truth? It sounds so ominous. "What about?"

"Where you come from, dear." Fae bites into her toast.

“Wha—” I set down my fork and put my hands in my lap. Part of me wants to tease them. Tell them I already know about the birds and the bees, but I hold my tongue. I have a feeling about what’s coming, and it isn’t a good one. They intend to tell me about the gigantic elephant in the room. The secret my aunties have kept from me. About my parents and the reason I don’t live with them.

I’m afraid this conversation is going to be worse than the birds and the bees talk. Because as much as I want to know what happened to my parents, I also don’t want to know why they gave me up. Something tells me that whatever happened to them, it has to do with fairies. Had I not seen the other supernatural creatures, like vampires and elves on TV, I might be a little more freaked. Mostly, I remain calm. “Are you sure it’s time?”

Auntie Vera clucks her tongue. “Since you went and kissed a boy, we really don’t have a choice.”

“Vera.” Fae playfully smacks her sister on the arm, but I notice there’s a blush creeping up her neck and onto her cheeks.

For the first time in my surprisingly selfish life I wonder where they came from and what their lives were like before they met me.

“Pass the peas,” Macey says when they’re calm.

Vera thumps the bowl down in front of her. “I’ll start from the beginning.”

“The beginning?” I pick at the lettuce leaves on my plate.

“Yes, Rory. The time has come.” Fae pats my hand maternally.

I glance at each of them, preparing myself.

Vera steeples her fingers and starts. “Nineteen years ago King Stefan and Queen Danina were married. It was the cheeriest of occasions. The entire realm celebrated their union.”

“Yes, we were all thrilled at the marriage, excluding—”

“Well, right,” Auntie Macey interrupts. “Danina’s sister, Lucretia wasn’t pleased in the least.” Auntie Macey sips her tea.

“It’s true. She wasn’t happy at all.”

“Why not?” I push my plate away. No point pretending to be hungry anymore.

“Well,” Auntie Macey begins, before pausing to take another sip of tea, “Lucretia was originally promised to Stefan.”

“She was?”

“Yes, but on the night of the engagement ball, Stefan met Lucretia’s little sister, Danina and they instantly fell in love.”

My heart clenches for Lucretia and how she must have felt. That would’ve been awful.

“Stefan told his father of his desire to marry Danina, so on the night that was to be Lucretia’s happiest, it became her most humiliating.”

“Eesh, I remember her that night. How angry she became when Stefan called Danina to his side instead of her.” Fae wipes her mouth with her napkin and takes her plate to the sink.

“So who are these people and why are they important?” I follow Fae and rinse off my plate.

Vera scoops more peas out of the bowl. “Well, they’re your parents, of course.” She chews. Swallows. Wipes her mouth. “Lucretia ran away that night and no one saw her again for many years.”

“Until the night of your introduction to the realm, Aurora,” Fae says, carrying in a pie. Steam rises from it, sending the amazing scent of baked apples and cinnamon into the air.

Macey follows her with dessert plates. “That night was to be special. Filled with magic, hope, and love. You, Aurora dear looked adorable. The queen dressed you in a long, light pink gown. The neck and sleeves were covered in tiny blue rosettes the same color as your eyes. Even at a month old we all knew you would be the most beautiful fairy in the realm. Everyone came and all who met you were instantly smitten.”

“Except Lucretia,” Fae finishes.

“Right. She didn’t receive an invitation. But you can’t blame the king and queen, not really. They didn’t know where to find her and having her there would’ve made an event meant to be joyous most uncomfortable.”

“They should have tried harder. Had they made the simple gesture; we might not be in this situation.” Vera laughs harshly, but I can see truth in her words. Perhaps she’s right.

“The party still would’ve been a disaster,” Auntie Fae snaps.

Vera doesn’t respond, but it’s obvious she has a lot more to say on the subject.

“Lucretia showed anyway, and she was filled with self-righteous anger and indignation,” Fae continues.

“And her powers.” Macey shudders and hands me a piece of pie.

“Yes, there wasn’t another at the party strong enough to stop her.” Fae waves away the pie.

“Don’t start that again, Fae. No one would’ve believed Lucretia would stoop so low to become so powerful.” Macey set the pie on the table in front of Fae. “Eat. It’s your favorite.”

“What did she do?” I stab a warm apple and bring it to my lips, then blow on it.

“She killed for it,” Vera says in her matter of fact tone, taking a plate and putting a dainty bite in her mouth.

Someone gasps. It takes a second to realize the sound came from me. “Who did she kill?”

Vera leans forward. Opens her mouth. “T—”

“Hush, Vera,” Macey says. “We will not speak of it.”

Fae nods. “It doesn’t matter.”

“They may be right,” Vera says. “But know this. Lucretia stripped you of your fairy magic and cursed you.”

“Cursed?” I don’t want to believe such a thing exists, but that’s what the fairy in Carson's bathroom said too. "What's the curse?"

My aunties glance nervously at each other without a word for what feels like an eternity.

Finally Vera sighs. "She touched your wings and said, By day's end on her eighteenth birthday, she will be stabbed through the heart and die."

Her words cause my heart rate to speed up and a line of perspiration forms along my hairline. I'll be eighteen in a few months.

"Then she kissed each of your cheeks and vanished, taking with her your magic and your beautiful wings."

I feel a loss for a part of myself I didn't know I missed, until this moment. "I saw a fairy in Carson's bathroom. How did she find me? What did she want? Am I supposed to be that small too?" I have sixty-five more questions, but I stop with those.

"We have magic, Rory," Vera says. "With the right spell, we can be any size we want to be." She sips her creamed coffee, but it shakes slightly and a little spills onto her white apron. She struggles to keep herself composed, but I notice the way her fingers tighten around the handle. "As for how she found you, I'm guessing that when you kissed that boy it created a fissure in the cloaking spell Fae, Macey, and I placed on you as a baby."

The way Vera says that boy causes my cheeks to warm.

"That's probably exactly what happened, dear," Fae adds.

"And if she found you so quickly that means Lucretia knows where you are now too." Macey clasps her hands and rubs them together, fretfully.

"But it doesn't matter whether she knows or not. She can't do a blasted thing about it," Vera says.

"What about my parents? Why did they send me away? They are still alive, aren't they?" I set my fork on my plate as a slew of confusion and worry overwhelms me in a way I've never felt before.

"Good grief, girl. You need to slow down." Vera takes her dirty dishes to the kitchen.

Fae whispers, “The king and queen are still alive. Of course they are. I’m guessing the fairy that found you was a Realm Guard, like we are.”

I sit back in shock. My adorable and flitty aunties are guards. What else don’t I know? Probably a lot. “The three of you are Realm Guards?” I study each of them with new eyes and notice that while they look old, there is strength in the straightness of their posture and conviction in their gazes.

“Yes, dear. For many, many years.” She adjusts her apron, straightening a wrinkle. I realize, not for the first time, how odd it is that they constantly wear their aprons. “And while we believe you’re safe, your curfew will be adjusted as will other rules as we see fit.”

A ball of fear forms in my stomach. I don’t want to die. I don’t want to believe. If I hadn’t seen the fairy the other night, I wouldn’t. “Can you do magic now?” I ask, gazing at each of them, my hands squeezing the life out of each other in my lap.

“Of course.” Macey shakes her head like she can’t believe I even asked.

“But we won’t because doing so will draw attention to us and we don’t want that,” Fae adds.

I really want to see what they can do, but they have a point. “I get it.” The whole night has taken a turn I never expected, and my new reality hits me. I’m cursed to die in a few months, and I don’t even belong here. I’m not human, but a freaking fairy. A supernatural like those mentioned on the news. My life will be normal ever again.

I’m overwhelmed, to say the least. How didn’t I know? I put my face in my hands. The information seems crazy and completely right at the same time.

“It’s okay, Rory. Really. Lucretia may know where you are, but at least she can’t do anything about it. We’re here to protect you. Her powers can’t reach past the fairy realm.” Fae pats my arm.

“At least we hope not,” Macey adds, eyeing her sisters.

That news provides me with little comfort. “Why can’t her powers reach me? What’s to stop her from coming to get me now?”

Macey and Fae give each other a knowing look.

“We found out later that when Lucretia cursed you and took your powers, she also cursed herself.” Fae pulls one of my hands from my face. “There must always be balance. So while Lucretia is powerful, she is also bound to the fairy’s under kingdom for as long as she lives. You’re safe here.”

I see confidence in her expression, but there’s also a hint of fear too. I glance at Macey and see the same look on her face as well as Vera’s.

“At least that’s what we believe. Since she cursed you, she’s remained in the under kingdom,” Vera adds.

A wisp of a premonition flutters through my bones. They knew a lot, but not everything.

“So she’s stuck in Isluria?” It’s weird to say the name. Like learning a foreign language, the word fumbles in my mouth.

“Actually, the under kingdom of Isluria. She’s trapped down there with all the unmentionables.” Vera comes in and sits in her regular spot at the head of the table.

Macey nods. “That’s right.”

I want to ask what the unmentionables are but decide that’s a question for another time. “I guess I have to take your word for it.” I try not to pout as I finish my juice.

“We’re sorry, dear,” Fae says.

I don’t respond but stack the dirty dishes still on the table and take them over to the sink, grab a cloth, get it wet, and wipe down the table while my aunties put away the leftover food. Cleaning soothes my insides. My aunties still whisper words I can’t hear to each other. I catch a term or two, but they don’t make sense. “What about those who work for Lucretia? Can they use magic? Can they find me?" The question is out before I can filter it.

Macey titters nervously.

"They can try, but the enchantments we placed over you will make their magic useless." Vera sounds so sure; I can't help but feel a little less frightened.

"So when can I see my parents?"

Macey freezes, her soapy hands dripping into the sink. The kitchen has a dishwasher, but my aunties never use it. I do, when it's my turn.

Fae is drying a plate and she stops as well.

"Not until after your eighteenth birthday, dear," Vera begins.

"When the curse is broken." Fae finishes drying the plate and sets it on the counter. "With the way the realm is now and all the hoopla around supernaturals, your parents can't come. And you going there?" Fae shakes her head. "Lucretia might be locked in the under kingdom, but her minions aren't. And from what I hear, they continue to grow. It's not safe for you in Isluria until the day after you turn eighteen. Then your wings and your powers will return, and the minions and Lucretia will know the house of Royal cannot be defeated."

"But I want to see them—to know them." I sound whiny, but my heart aches to meet my Mom and Dad.

"The King and Queen made us promise we would keep you in the human realm until you beat the curse, which is a minute past midnight on the day after your birthday," Macey says.

"Right. If we take you to Isluria before then, your parents will have us killed," Fae adds solemnly.

Vera puts the box of tea bags in the cupboard. "We know this is hard. We are sorry, Rory dear."

"You should be." I sound immature, but it hurts to know I can't see my parents. I don't even know what they look like. Does my dad have blond hair like me? Do I have my mother's nose? These are questions every child should have the answers to. I've never even seen a picture.

"I'm sorry, Aurora. It must be difficult to process, but please trust me when I say all that your parents have done, all that we've done, is because of our love for you." Fae's eyes get misty as do the other's.

I reach over and hug her. "I know. Thanks, Auntie Fae." Vera and Macey join in and despite everything I've learned, I'm thankful for them.

OceanofPDF.com

ANY DREAM IS attainable with the right people around you. That's Auntie Macey's most recent quotable quote. I like it and the reason is simple. I went after my dream and got it. Or, more specifically, him.

Carson Hayes. I think he's a dreamboat. That's right. I know dreamboat is a word from the forties, at least according to my aunties, but in the case of Carson, my incredibly hot and sweet boyfriend, the word fits.

It's been a few weeks since my aunties and I had our discussion. I only eighty percent ignore what my aunties told me about my life. It's easy not to think about it when I'm with my friends and especially my boyfriend.

At the moment Carson is sitting next to me in the noisy lunchroom of Hellgate high school caressing my knee. His pungent chicken and mashed potatoes is getting cold. I reach out to wipe an eyelash off his cheek and jump when a piece of crumpled paper hits Carson in the head. He catches it as it bounces off and squishes it tightly in his fist.

I glance around, searching for the culprit, as does Carson. It's one of his friends from the soccer team. His name is Ethan. He waves. "Hey Rory."

"Ethan." I wave back, grateful things mellowed a bit since Kelly and the other girls doused Carson in pig's blood.

Carson chucks the paper back at him. "Dude."

Merida and Tiana sit across the table from Carson and me. Merida giggles. She gawks at Ethan. It's adorable how badly she's crushing on him.

"Hey, I have to work until nine. Want to go to a party after?" Carson brushes some of my hair off my shoulder. His touch sends tingles along my skin.

“There’s a party?” I lean in, pressing my forehead against his.

He kisses the tip of my nose and pulls me into a hug. “Yep. Out at Beaver Lake.”

I close my eyes and take a deep breath, reveling in the scent of him. Of course I want to go with him to a party. Heck, I’ll go anywhere with him. He’s a good guy and he cares about me. There isn’t an ounce of doubt about that in my body. But since the talk with my aunties, they’ve put me on serious lockdown. Kind of. I can still do what I want, except at night.

My curfew used to be… whenever I wanted as long as I called. Now, it’s ten o’clock! Which is crazy during the week, but especially on the weekends. I try to be understanding. I know they want to protect me, and I want to be safe as well. But it’s been weeks and nothing happened.

I haven’t mentioned my fairy heritage or the fact that my parents are the King and Queen of another realm, and that makes me a princess. How would I bring it up anyway. It all sounds too unreal, even to me.

“Hey, Rory?” Merida pulls me out of my thoughts.

I sit up. “Yeah?” I tear off a slice of orange and pop it in my mouth.

Tiana shakes her head. “You going to the party tonight or not?” She lifts her eyebrows. She and Merida know about the curfew change, even though they don’t know the real reasons behind the change.

I put another slice of orange in my mouth. Chew. Swallow. I need to stall. If I say yes, then I’m going against my aunties. Rebelling is what they’d say. But if I don’t go, well I really want to go. I mean, it’s a party and it’s my senior year. It’s what I’m supposed to do. Right? “Sure. Yes, of course. I’m going.”

“You think your aunts will let you?” Merida doesn’t look convinced.

“I think so.” The five-minute bell rings. “I’ve got to get to class.” Pushing my tray back, I stand, and heft my backpack onto my shoulder.

“Me too.” Carson kisses me softly on the mouth. “I’ll pick you up after work, around nine thirty.”

“Sure,” I say. “Actually, text me the address and I’ll meet you there.”

Carson looks at me, confused. “You sure?”

“Um, yeah.” I feel like an idiot, but I don’t want to explain that I’m going to have to sneak out.

Tiana stands. “It’s my fault. I want her to go with me,” she says, saving me from an awkward conversation.

“Yeah, and me too.” Merida links her arm through Tiana’s. “It’s a girl thing.”

I smile internally, grateful for my friends. “If that’s okay,” I add, batting my lashes.

Carson laughs. “Of course it’s okay.” He takes my hand and kisses my cheek. “I’ll see you tonight.”

“Kay, see ya.” I watch him walk away, admiring his very handsome rear view. Inside I freak out. I never disobey my aunties.

“You’ve got it so bad,” Tiana says, patting my arm. “Not that I blame you.” She hoists her backpack onto her shoulder. “See you tonight.”

Merida watches Ethan maneuver his soccer ball from one knee to the other.

Tiana snaps her fingers in front of Merida’s face. “Earth to Mer, come in, Mer.”

“Hey. What?” Her creamy skin reddens. She swats Tiana’s hand away.

“You gonna sneak out of your house tonight, right?” Tiana tugs on one of Merida’s thick red curls though she asks me the question.

“Want us to meet you at your window?” Merida glares at Tiana, a second before turning her attention to me.

I tuck my hands in my pockets. “You two are acting like I sneak out on a regular basis.” I kick the underside of the chair to distract myself from my worry.

“Well, there’s a first time for everything and we want to be there for the momentous event.” Tiana swings her hip into mine, and I fall off balance.

It’s my turn to blush. “Fine. Be at my window at nine thirty.”

Merida claps excitedly. “My baby is growing up.”

I smack her on the arm. “I can’t be tardy. See you crazies tonight.” I blow kisses and run in the direction of my class. It doesn’t help that I’m wearing lacy black heels, but I make it just as the bell rings.

“Take your seat, so we can begin,” Mrs. Crowler says, eyeing my shoes in distain, probably because she wears the same frumpy brown shoes every day. They’re practical. Functional, but not the least bit exciting.

I walk down the aisle toward my chair. Kelly, the girl who tried to Carrie me at the dance last month, sneers. She’s been way too quiet since that night and I’d be a liar if I said I wasn’t worried.

When I’m seated, I take out my World History book, a pencil, and my notes. During Mrs. Crowler’s lecture I try to listen, but I can’t help thinking about sneaking out tonight. Or more specifically, the reasons I find myself in such a predicament. I close my eyes as I consider my life.

Suddenly, I’m standing on the edge of a rocky cliff. Far below is an angry ocean. The wind whips against my hair, and brings with it the briny scent of the ocean. Against the horizon the sun sets, and I have the distinct desire to spread my wings and fly.

Fly!

I don’t fly. But even as I deny it, there’s an itch between my shoulder blades and I feel wings burst from my back. They extend. My feet leave the ground, and—

"Rory Louise Carrington, it's time to wake up." I jump at the sound of Mrs. Crowler's voice so close to my ear.

"Oh." I wipe my mouth, and hope I wasn't drooling. I didn't feel any, thank daisies.

"Why don't you have a chat with Mr. Leiberman." She walks back to her desk, sits and scribbles something down.

Everyone is snickering around me.

"Have a nice nap?" Kelly asks as I pick up my books and bag.

"Yep," I snap back, going to the teacher's desk.

Mrs. Crowley holds up a piece of paper. "Take it."

"Sorry," I say, quietly, and leave the room.

As I walk the halls of Hellgate High I think about my dream. Wonder what it would be like to really fly. It doesn't seem possible, but according to my aunties, I am a fairy. Psssh!

Windows line the right side of the hall. I look over and try to imagine myself with wings.

It's been weeks since I found out, and I still can't believe it's true.

When I reach the office, I hand the paper to the receptionist.

Mrs. Neering reads what Mrs. Crowley wrote, looks up at me, and then shakes her head. "Sleeping in class?"

"Yeah, sorry about that." I glance down at the desk with a piece of glass over the top. Mashed between the two are dried flowers.

She picks up the phone. "Rory Carrington is here to see you." She pauses a moment to listen. "I'll let her know." After she hangs up, she indicates a row of chairs outside the principal's office. "Have a seat. He'll be with you in a few."

"Okay." I sit and wait and concentrate on what it would mean to fly.

OceanofPDF.com

FRIDAY NIGHT, I pretend I have a headache. Say goodnight to my aunties at eight-thirty, and go to my room. I've never been to a party at the lake. I'd be lying if I didn't admit to feeling guilty. But I'm also excited.

I decide on dark jeans, brown boots with a low heel, and a long-sleeved top. In my bedroom mirror, I apply some gloss, more mascara, and run a brush through my hair.

At nine-thirty I get a text from Merida saying that she and T are outside. I push open the window, pop out the screen, set it on the floor and climb out. T agreed to drive tonight. So we skulk over to her car and drive away.

Easy peasy.

Tiana and Merida are wearing outfits similar to mine—jeans, shirts, and boots. I'm glad I picked appropriate attire. It's takes twenty minutes to get to the road leading out to the lake and another ten to get there.

Tiana parks her Jeep next to an old white truck. We climb out and head over to the fire. It's huge and the heat is extreme. Wood crackles and sparks singe the night sky.

I immediately search for Carson. It's nearly ten, so he should be here. Music blares from the speakers of a large, black truck. People are on the beach, around the fire, and lined up in front of a picnic table.

Tiana moves her body, getting into the music. "Let's get a drink." She smacks Merida and I.

We follow her and get in line. I recognize nearly everyone. Those I don't must not go to Hellgate High. The rest of us have been going to school together our whole lives. Other than Tiana and Merida and Carson, I'm not close with anyone else. Although since the dance last month, more people have made a point to talk to me.

I spot Kelly and Ethan dancing extra close and hope Merida doesn't see them. When I glance over at her, I see her eyes are locked on them. Shoot!

"Hey, Mer. How did you do on your Calc test?" I'm positive she nailed it. She gets that stuff, while T and I struggle. But I want her attention somewhere other than on Kelly and Ethan. "Mer?"

It works. She pulls her eyes from them and meets my gaze. "Fine. What about you?" She grits her teeth.

I shrug, glad she's trying, at least, but realize she won't let go of what she saw. "Better than the last one, I think."

"Pretty sure I failed," T chimes in.

Merida wraps an arm around her shoulder and squeezes. "Really? I thought you were finally getting it."

"I was. Up until Mr. Jamison moved on to the next section. Now I'm lost again."

"Want some gum?" I ask, taking the package from my bag. Gum is a treat I always keep in my bag. I find it refreshing and delicious, especially now that Carson and I are doing a lot of kissing.

"Nah, I'm good." T moves forward in the line.

"What about you, Mer?" I hold it out for her.

"You have anything in there that freshens breath? Something besides the spearmint crap." She opens my bag and peers inside even though it's too dark for her to see.

"Nope. I only have the spearmint crap." I toss the package back in my bag.

Someone throws an enormous log onto the bonfire. Girls squeal as flames and ash go everywhere. Kelly and Ethan are no longer dancing. Kelly's moved on and is with Caleb. He's got an arm around her waist. She has her fingers in his hair. I kind of want to gag.

It's our turn to get drinks. There's a keg and several drink coolers. I tried beer once when I was fourteen. It was the nastiest liquid I ever tasted. So I know I don't want that. "What's in the coolers?" I ask the random guy standing next to them. He's built like a football player—thick neck, biceps, and thighs. He's got ruddy hair and freckled skin. I think his name is Jesse, but I'm not sure.

"Strawberry, grape, and orange," he says tapping his fingers on the top of each lid as he speaks. "Which would you prefer? They'll all get you properly hammered," he says with a wink.

"I'll take the orange," I say, plastering on a smile.

He grabs a cup and fills it up. "Here you go, gorgeous. Enjoy."

"Thanks."

He lifts his plastic cup off the table. "Cheers."

I'm about to clink it when someone runs into me, spilling some of the drink.

"Watch it, dude." The guy I think is Jesse shoves the other guy to the ground.

"Sorry, Rory." When he stands up, I realize its Ethan. He chuckles and straightens out my shirt.

"It's fine."

"Good." Ethan punches Jesse in the arm good-naturedly.

I take the opportunity to glance at Merida. She's no longer gritting her teeth but beaming.

Ethan looks over. "Hey Mer. You look nice." He wraps an arm around her shoulders.

Merida giggles. The mathlete, feminist, brainiac girl I know, and love is gone. It's like she tossed those parts of herself out the window and replaced them with silly, giggly, and senseless. "Thanks," she says, looking away nervously.

"Glad you could make it. Wanna dance?"

"Sure." She hands me her cup, giving T and I her wide eyes of excited nervousness as Ethan pulls her closer to the music.

Tiana laughs. “Come on, let’s get closer to the fire.

It isn’t too chilly, but a cool wind is blowing.

“Have you seen Carson yet?” Tiana asks, sipping her drink.

I shake my head. “Not yet. You?”

She nods to someone she knows. I think she and the girl are in a cooking class together. “Nope. I’m sure he’s around.”

Tiana takes another drink, making a face as she swallows. “You going to drink it or stare at it?”

I sniff the contents. It smells like oranges, but I’m pretty sure it’s spiked with more than flavoring and sugar. No doubt there’s some kind of alcohol mixed in. The thought of drinking makes me ill. It isn’t even my aunties rules that come to mind. My body is physically rejecting the idea. Making a quick decision, I toss the liquid toward the fire. It ignites the flames and I jump back a little. “I’m good. If I get thirsty, I brought some water.”

Tiana shakes her head. “Even when you’re rebelling, you still can’t really do anything wrong, can you?”

I shrug. “I guess not.”

She squeezes my arm.

“See anyone cute?” I ask her, knowing she’s very particular.

“Not yet. Why don’t you help me look?” We scan the crowd for several seconds.

“What type am I looking for?”

“Tall. Dark. And hot.” Tiana winks and I laugh.

“Got it.” There are plenty of guys at the party and many of them are good-looking. But one in particular stands out and I think he’s perfect for Tiana. “What about—” I stop, my eyes flitting toward a guy. It’s Carson. He’s on the beach side of the bonfire talking with some of his friends from the soccer team. One of them hands him a plastic cup. He takes it and chugs whatever is in it down. The guy I picked for Tiana joins Carson’s group.

Tiana sees him too. “Who’s that standing next to Carson?”

“I don’t know. Maybe we should go find out.” I link arms with her.

“Let’s go.”

When we’re nearly around the fire, Kelly walks over to Carson. She hands him a fresh cup. He smiles his beautiful smile and drinks the contents all at once. When he’s done, he crushes the cup in his fist, spreads his arms, and lifts his face toward the dark sky and howls. His friends laugh and clap him on the back. Kelly grabs him and kisses him.

“That girl is such a skank.” T pats my arm. “Don’t even let her get to you.”

“I’m not,” I say, but it does get to me.

Carson pushes her away. Kelly laughs. She’s like an octopus, her legs and hands seem to be all over him.

A prickly anger spreads through me, along with sorrow and doubt. I watched the two of them perform in our school performance of Romeo and Juliet. Their chemistry on stage was easy to see. But Merida and Tiana denied it at the time and they still do. They believe I read too much into their performance. I want to believe them…

Aurora.

I hear my name, but it’s like a whisper made by the wind. I stop, pulling Tiana to a halt.

“What is it?” She releases my arm and faces me. “I’ll go over and rip Kelly a new one if you want.”

“It’s…” I shake my head. It’s probably nothing. I laugh. “Will you?” I say, thinking Tiana must be joking.

Her smiling face turns serious. She tosses her empty cup into the fire. “Wait here.” She stomps over to Kelly and shoves her.

“Crap.” I debate going after her. She yells at Kelly. Even though I can’t hear what she says, I can tell by the way she moves her hands that it’s loud and mean. Merida and I always joke that Tiana talks with her hands louder than she does with her mouth.

“Aurora. I must speak with you.”

I hear the words clearly this time. It’s a male voice. I glance around, positive whoever spoke is right beside me. But there’s no one there.

The loud music stops. Everyone is focused on Kelly and Tiana, who are fighting about me.

“… You need to keep your slutty lips off Rory’s boyfriend!”

“You can’t tell me what to do!” Kelly crosses her arms.

“Yeah, I can.”

“Meet me in the woods. Hurry.” The male voice speaks urgently, and I’m distracted from the fight.

I search the edge of the forest, along the tree line for the owner of the voice. And that’s when I see… something. It shines in the moonlight and then is gone.

I glance back at Tiana and Kelly, but I can’t see them any longer. They’ve been surrounded by dozens of partygoers. Tiana and Kelly still scream at each other though. I scan the crowd for Merida, Ethan, or Carson, but don’t see them either.

“Aurora.” The voice seems to caress the inside of my mind, and I realize I’m not hearing his words with my ears but feeling them.

Who are you, I think. My feet take off and I reach the edge of the forest before I realize I’ve moved. “Hello?” I whisper.

OceanofPDF.com

"HEY, AURORA." The guy I think is Jesse steps around the large tree trunk closest to me. It's dark this far away from the bonfire, but I can still make out who he is and that his eyes travel over the length of my body.

"Um, hi. Was that you calling me before?" I don't think so. His voice doesn't sound the same.

He regards me with a strange expression on his face. "Sure, if that's what you want to believe." He licks his lips hungrily.

"Okay, well I better get back." I step away, but Jesse's hands come out like the strike of a snake. He pushes me against the trunk of the tree. My head bangs against the hard bark. "Ouch." Tears sting my eyes. "Let me go, Jesse."

He presses his body hard against mine causing the bark to dig into my skin. "I will. After. Now stay quiet."

"After what?" My insides quake with fear, but I force myself to keep my face calm.

"This." He leans down and tries to kiss me.

I push against him, but I might as well be pushing a freight train. At the last second, I turn my head, and his clammy lips land on my cheek.

He growls. "Hold still." He rips the bag from my arm, throws it, then grabs my hands and crosses them in front of me, pressing his body against mine.

"Let go," I shout, struggling against him.

He locks my arms together with one hand and slaps me with the other. Pain shoots through my eye and jaw. I see stars and my head lolls to one side. "The only sounds I want to hear from you are your moans of pleasure." He grips my chin and forces me to look at him.

“You know you want it.”

“No.” I tighten my lips and try to shake out of his grasp. His breath smells strongly of beer. It’s obvious he drank too much. “Let me go. You don’t want to do this.”

“Oh, but I do. If Carson can have you, then so can I.” His body tightens against mine. He kisses my neck, rips my shirt and trails slobbery kisses along my collarbone to my shoulder.

I wiggle, trying to get away. “Help!” Tears stream down my face as his hands roam under my shirt. “Please. Stop!” I close my eyes. This can’t happen, I think.

Abruptly the weight of him is gone. I open my eyes in time to see him sailing through the air before landing with a thud. Jesse yelps, gets up, and looks around before stumbling away.

I sink to my knees, letting out a sob of relief. Beyond thankful the drunken jerk is gone.

“Aurora.”

I freeze. It’s the voice I heard before Jesse tried to force himself… I can’t even think the rest, and shudder.

“You’re safe, Aurora.”

I glance up, preparing myself to run if I have to. I will not let what Jesse did to me happen again. A guy stands not more than ten feet away. Dressed from head to toe in black. His face and hands are exposed and seem to glow. I don’t recognize him, yet he knows me. Or, he knows my name, at least.

“Who are you?” I roll onto my knees. Decipher if I hurt anywhere other than my face and back.

“I’m Paxton.” He rushes forward, his hands out to catch me if I fall. “Are you injured?”

I shake my head. “Not really.”

He takes hold of my elbow. At his touch, my chest tightens and the golden fire I feel whenever Carson kisses me seems to expand until I feel like it'll burst. I begin to tremble.

"Let me help you." He lifts me as though I weigh nothing.

"Thanks." He doesn't seem to notice my internal struggles, and I'm grateful. And as soon as he lets go, the feeling scatters. Dried leaves and pine needles cling to my pants. I take a moment to collect myself as I brush them off. "Are you here for the party?" I look up and notice his dark hair has fallen over one eye. In the dim light his appearance is much more dangerous than Jesse's, and I realize I'm still not completely safe. This guy could be anyone. He looks my age, but he gives off an older vibe.

"No. I'm here for you, Aurora. Will you come with me? I have something to show you." He expression tells me he's serious before he glances toward the forest.

Maybe too serious. "Next you'll offer me candy, right?" I mean it as a joke since he's a stranger and he's asking me to go somewhere with him. Like I would ever be that stupid.

"Candy? Would that help," he asks, a look of perplexed dismay crossing his face. There's something odd about this guy.

"You're funny," I say, edging around him slowly. "I better get back to the party. My friends will be looking for me."

Paxton reaches out. "Please don't go. What I must show you is of the highest importance."

I sense his urgency, but there is no way I'm going anywhere with him. "I can't. Not tonight. Maybe tomorrow." I'm anxious to find Tiana and Merida and go home. My stomach is sick, and I'm nervous Jesse might come back with friends.

Paxton places a fisted hand over his heart. "Until then, Aurora."

"Uh-huh." I wave and jog back toward the party.

OceanofPDF.com

THE PARTY IS in full swing. At least fifty more people have shown. It's crowded, but I push through and search for my friends. I might as well be searching for a needle in a haystack. Discouraged and on the verge of tears, I reach for my bag. My cell phone is inside. Then I remember I don't have it. Jesse threw it.

"Ugh." I climb on top of the picnic table. Several people look up, but I ignore them. I need my friends.

"Our first stripper," someone shouts.

"Take it off!"

Others cheer and send out catcalls.

"Merida! Tiana!" I shout, even though I can't see them and it's highly unlikely anyone can hear me. Plus, the smoke from the bonfire shifts and blows in my face. "Tiana!" I cough. "Mer—" Her name catches in my throat. My eyes sting too, and tears cloud my vision. This is useless. I rub my eyes, hoping to clear my vision so that I can see to get down. But as I step off, someone bumps the table and I feel myself fall. When I land though, it isn't on the ground but in someone's strong arms.

"Rory, what were you doing up there?"

This voice I know. It's Carson. I sag against him, turn my face into his shoulder and let out all the anguish I've been holding in.

"Shhh, it's all right. I've got you." He picks me up and starts walking. "I'll take you home."

"Wait," I say. "I need to get my bag. Will you help me?" I force my eyes open. don't burn quite so much anymore.

"Sure. Where is it?" He carefully sets me on my feet.

I take his hand. "It's over there, beyond the tree line."

"How'd that happen?"

I don't want to give him details, so I shrug. "Do you have your phone? We may need some light."

"Sure." After a few seconds a light appears. Carson cranks it up as bright as it will go and hands it to me. "Lead the way."

Even though I'm sure my makeup is smeared, and my hair is a wreck, I give him a quick kiss. He smells a little like beer and that sends my heart racing. A dull pain reminds me that Jesse slapped me, but I ignore it. "You're awesome."

He gives me a lopsided grin. "You're sweet." He helps me search the forest for the next half hour, but we can't find it. "Hey," he finally says, pulling me to him. I can't see his features very well, but I hear the concern in his voice. "We'll come back and look again when it's light out."

I sigh, frustrated. "My entire life is in that bag."

"Really?" He brushes some hair off of my face and tucks it behind my ear. "I thought I was part of your life and I'm still here."

"True." I hug him, enjoying the light scent of cologne on his long-sleeved gray shirt. After a deep breath, I step out of his arms. "Sorry I pulled you away from the party."

"Anytime." We walk hand in hand back to the party. I see Merida with Ethan. His arm is around her while they talk. Merida laughs, pulling her long red hair over one shoulder and twists it nervously in her hands. I try to get her attention, but she only has eyes for him.

"Have you seen Tiana?" I ask Carson.

Carson shakes his head. "Not since her fight with Kelly. That was intense. Did you see it?"

"Some of it." I weave through the crowd. "She was okay when you saw her though, right?"

"Oh, yeah. Better than okay. The girl is a rock star. She was ready to beat Kelly down, but Kelly backed off and left. After that, a guy named Lance from Loyola High hogged all of her attention and the last I saw them, they went down to the lake."

I smile. "Sounds like she and Merida are having a great time."

Carson reaches around my waist from behind and hugs me against his chest. "I want you to have a good time too. Are you sure you need to go?"

My brain screams that I should. But I glance up at Carson's gorgeous face and say, "Maybe not just yet."

"Awesome." The song blaring from the speakers is a slow one. Carson nuzzles against my neck. My body conforms into his, and we sway to the beat for a while. It's nice, wrapped in his arms. I allow myself to relax against him. "Hey, what happened to your shirt?" He straightens and tugs on the ripped piece.

The panic I felt before Carson found me comes back in a rush and knocks me in the gut. When I don't answer, he spins me around so that the firelight shines directly in my eyes.

"It's fine. I'm fine." I don't want to explain my foolishness by leaving the party alone at night. I broke cardinal rule number one and am embarrassed to admit it.

He looks like he doesn't believe me as he studies my face closely.

"Really, Carson. It's nothing."

He touches my lip, the side that Jesse slapped. I'm sure it's swollen. "Is that blood?"

I shake my head, figuring it's probably dry by now.

"It is, isn't it?" Anger changes his features and for the briefest moment he reminds me of his dad. "Who did this to you? I swear I'll kill them."

"It doesn't matter. Nothing happened." I take his hands in mine.

"That's bull. Your eye is bruised, and your lip is swollen. Did he? Tell me who did this."

I appreciate that he cares, but there are probably two hundred people here and I don't want to start a scene. Plus, he's been drinking, and Jesse has a lot of friends. I don't want Carson to get in a fight. He might get hurt. "Please, Carson. Let's talk about it tomorrow. Right now I just want to dance." I rest my hands on his hips, tugging on his belt loops. "Please."

He leans down and gently kisses my sore lips. "Did he—" He pauses, closes his eyes, but not before I see pain shoot through them.

I cup his face in my hands. "No. He tried, but he didn't finish."

"You stopped him?"

I don't know how to answer. Shock and fear were my biggest emotions while it happened. And then it was over. Jesse was thrown off me and through the air. It's possible some of my fairy magic returned. Aunties' Fae and Macey believe it might happen. Auntie Vera disagrees. She's sure Lucretia sealed away all of my magic when she cursed me. Vera believes the only way my magic will return is if I somehow survive the curse. I'm not sure what to believe. I don't know enough about the land I come from or the rules tied to fairy magic.

Then again, it could have been Paxton.

"He was stopped," I finally say.

He eyes me incredulously. "Good," he finally says, hugging me fiercely. "I don't know what I'd do if something bad happened to you."

I smile against his shoulder. "Thanks, Carson."

OceanofPDF.com

MONDAY MORNING COMES TOO QUICKLY. Merida can't stop talking about Ethan and Tiana has a permanent smile on her face since she met Lance. I'm so happy for them. It's like we always planned. Senior year. We all have boyfriends. Heck, we might all get to go to prom.

On Saturday afternoon, I told Carson about Jesse. He wanted to go over to Jesse's right then and there, but I explained that I thought he was drunk and not to bother. I left out the part about Paxton. It seems like the right thing to do. I don't know how to explain him anyway, and I don't want Carson to worry.

We went back to the party site and searched the forest for my purse but didn't find it. I'm beyond sick it's gone. I don't want to tell my aunties because then I'll have to tell them how I lost it and where. It was bad enough trying to explain my bruised eye and swollen lip to them.

They believe I fell out of bed during a bad dream. One little lie is horrible enough, but it's turned into many, and I feel terrible about them. It goes against everything I believe is right. Yet I'm not sure how to fix the situation. At some point I'm going to have to come clean though, like when they realize I don't have my phone any longer.

I pull into a parking spot at Hellgate High, turn off my car, and give my reflection a quick check. "See you girls at lunch?" We get out of the car together.

"Yeah, I can't wait to introduce you guys to Lance." Tiana speaks with dreaminess in her eyes.

Merida and I laugh.

"Doesn't he go to a different school," Merida asks.

"Yes, but I'm sneaking him in. Tell no one." She pouts when I gasp, but it's only because I'm surprised. My friends are acting crazy and it's all because of high school boys. "You want to meet him, don't you?" she asks, looking worried.

"Definitely," Merida says.

"Of course," I add.

Tiana hugs Mer and I. "See you later."

I wave. Merida does too, but her attention is elsewhere. I follow the direction of her eyes and see Ethan, smiling at her like she hung the sun and the moon. It's sweet, but also creepy. I get an off vibe about that guy, so I push it away. "Awwwww, the two of you are so cute."

Merida blushes. "I need to talk to you about last night."

I swallow, suddenly nervous. Did they do more than kiss? "After school?"

She gives me a quick look. "Maybe. Depends on what Ethan is doing."

I'm about to laugh, thinking my independent and feminist friend is joking, but she takes off in Ethan's direction. She's like a bee with honey. The handsome honey-man puts an arm around Merida's waist and kisses her. And sweetest of all? He takes her books and carries them.

After stopping at my locker, I go to Carson's. It's our morning ritual. But he isn't there. I think about texting him until I remember I don't have my phone. Totally sucks!

I wait for him a few minutes, trying to ignore the worry tightening my chest. What if something happened to him? Or, what if he decided I'm too high maintenance and is avoiding me? When the tardy bell rings I sigh and head to class.

"Aurora."

I jump at the sound of my name spoken in my ear.

Paxton appears out of thin air.

A half-crazy scream bursts from my throat.

He's in the middle of the empty hall wearing a white button up shirt and ripped jeans tucked into untied black boots. His black hair hangs in his face. As my heart calms to a more normal speed, I notice a deep blue sheen to the color. At the lake on Friday it was too dark to see.

"How did you do that," I ask as he strolls toward me.

His hands are behind his back, making his shirt tight against his very well sculpted abs.

"Magic." He grins.

"So, I was right. It was you who got that jerk off me Friday night. Are you a fairy? Do you have magic?"

"Obviously, Aurora." His grin grows. "I am Paxton, son of Dementes, a royal in the court of Airies and Amourity. I have come from Isluria at the request of the king and queen." He glances around before continuing. "They would have me give you a message and show you something. Can you come with me?"

At hearing he's a messenger from my parents, I am immediately excited and equally apprehensive. Why wouldn't my parents give the message to my aunties? They've cared for me since birth. Surely, they would trust my aunties over this guy.

Paxton unexpectedly stands too close, invading my personal space. A delicious aroma fills the air around us. It's like cinnamon or nutmeg or chai tea with a hefty helping of whipped cream on top. The smell is so yummy, my mouth waters. "I have a gift for you," he adds.

"Oh?" I put my hands up as a reaction to his sudden nearness. He leans into my hands and I feel how solid he is. From behind his back he brings my bag. The one I took with me to the party on Friday night.

"You found it?" I take it from him and open it. Everything is still there, including my phone, wallet, and water bottle. Even my spearmint gum and the book I'm reading are still inside. "This is amazing." Relief washes over me and without thinking, I throw my arms around his neck. "Thank you." Tears sting my eyes, which is probably stupid, but I'm just so happy.

His arms circle my waist and the tightening in my chest returns stronger than ever. This time I'm sure whatever is happening will explode. I can't help wondering what the feeling is but believe it might be my magic trying to break free. That maybe Lucretia didn't take it from me but bound it inside of me. If that's the case, releasing it might be possible.

"It is my pleasure, Aurora." He smiles and I feel my heart melt.

I clear my throat, slightly embarrassed, and move out of his arms. "So, what's the message?"

Paxton glances around the hall again. "I need to take you somewhere and show you."

The hall is empty, but I understand what he means. "Where do you need to take me?" He's so vague. Why can't he just tell me now?

He shakes his head. "I must not say for I fear others might hear and this must be kept secret."

I still think he's much too elusive, but it might be the truth. "I can't right now. In fact I'm already late for class. If my teacher marks me absent my aunties will receive an email and then I'll get in trouble." As I speak, Paxton's features fall with disappointment. "What about after school? Can you come to my house?"

"Perhaps, but there is a strong protection spell around your house. It may be difficult for me to enter."

I pat his arm. "How about using the front door? Just knock when you get there. I'll let you in."

One of his eyebrows rises. "If the fairies protecting you discover I'm from Isluria, there might be chaos."

"Then I guess I'll have to keep you a secret." I put a finger over my lips.

He smiles, giving me a quick nod. “How do you intend to do that?”

“Well, if you must know, my aunties play Bridge with their friends at the community center on Monday’s until late, so we’ll have the house to ourselves.” I’m shocked I told him that. Not even Carson knows about my free night.

“Bridge?”

He’s obviously confused, and I laugh. “It’s a game. Anyway, come by around four.”

“Very well. You can expect me at four o’clock.”

“So formal,” I say, sounding flirty, and wondering what the daisies is wrong with me.

Paxton gives me a quick once over. “By the way, you look much better than you did on Friday night.”

I glance down, trying to remember what I put on today. Since the day my aunties told me about where I came from, Lucretia, and the curse, fashion is less important to me.

But I chose coral skinny jeans today and combined them with a heather gray fitted tee shirt and added matching gray heels. I air dried my hair and put some product in it to give big, natural curls. “Well, in my defense, when you saw me, I was crying, so there’s that.” I make a face.

Paxton’s features become angry. “With one word, I will make the human boy wish he never touched you in such a disrespectful and rough fashion.”

“No, that’s okay.” I pause. “But, what would you do to him?” I’m curious anyway.

His anger subsides slightly. “Any number of things. Cover him in warts. Give him a million ant bites or a tapeworm or both. I could also make it rain only on him, no matter where he goes or send a tornado to his house.” I watch as he speaks and it’s obvious the more he talks, the more he gets into the idea of torturing Jesse. “Or better yet—”

“I get it,” I say, cutting him off. “You could make his life miserable.”

His blue eyes twinkle. “In so many ways, Aurora. By the time I finish with him he won’t know which way is up.”

I force myself not to laugh. “He probably deserves each and every one of those things and then some, but maybe you should hold off.” I thought about the news and the latest prison built not to far from here. It was basically a supermax for supernaturals. The official opening was today. Paxton wants to say something, but I continue quickly. “For now,” I add, clutching my bag. “But I may change my mind.”

“As you command.” He bows slightly.

I can’t help but smile. “See you later, Pax.” I take off running and hope I’m not too late for class.

OceanofPDF.com

AT LUNCH I look for Carson. I also text him and tell him I have my phone, but he doesn't respond. Merida and Tiana bring their guys over to our table and introduce me to them. Both seem nice and very smitten with my friends, which makes me happy, though I still can't shake that something is off about Lance and Ethan. Neither of them eat or drink anything. It's weird. Usually guys wolf down their own food and then any leftovers.

"Where's Carson?" Tiana asks.

"I went by his locker this morning but haven't seen him." I glance at my phone. "Hopefully he's all right." We spent most of Saturday together, but I didn't see him on Sunday.

"I'm sure he's fine," Merida chimes in.

"You're probably right." But I can't stop stressing.

It's that way for the rest of the day. No Carson and he doesn't respond to any of my texts. After school, I drive Merida home. Tiana gets a ride with Lance.

"Did Carson ever show up?" Merida asks.

"No. And he didn't text me back either." I think about going over to his house, but since I told Paxton I'd meet him at four, I don't have time. It's a warm day and we have our windows down. The air smells like snow and I inhale deeply.

"I know you're worried about Carson, but did you want to hear about my weekend with Ethan?" She practically bursts with excitement.

"Definitely." I stop at a light and look over, smiling.

She turns in her seat, so she faces me. "Well I told you about what happened at the party. He said he's liked me for a long time, but didn't have the guts to ask me out, right?"

“Yes,” I say with a nod. Part of me wonders if that’s true. Ethan is a very outgoing guy and he’s always with a girl. I just hope he isn’t using Merida.

“Okay, well Saturday he asked me to go with him on a hike at Trail Head. He packed us a lunch and we stopped at this beautiful spot off the trail.”

Merida pauses and I quickly glance over. “Was it fun?”

Her fingers twist into knots. She’s nervous about whatever happened.

“Mer?”

“He’s incredible.” Her voice is a whisper. “I-I never knew kissing and… stuff could be so… earth shattering.”

All Carson and I have done is kiss. Admittedly it was heated and passionate kissing, but that’s it. So Merida’s use of the word ‘stuff’ has me interested. “What kind of stuff?”

Merida’s freckled face turns bright red. “Let’s just say if the Motion Picture Association reviewed our lunch date, they would give it an R rating.” She giggles.

“Oh my gosh. Are you serious? Merida, you just met him?” I’m floored. Shocked. Completely confused.

“I know. But I’ve never felt this way about a guy.” She looks out the window, her expression far away. Finally, she continues, “I think I love him.”

I want to slam on the breaks and shake some sense into her. I want to ask her how she can possibly love a person she’s known two freaking days? Instead I just smile. “That’s nice.”

She looks over at me, her eyes sharp. “Rory, I’m serious. For the first time in my life I think I understand the way Romeo and Juliet felt. I would die for him.”

I pull into my driveway and put my car in park. Take a deep breath. “Romeo and Juliet aren’t real. The story is fiction.”

Merida is angry. I see it on her face. She pushes open the passenger door. “Maybe that’s true, but their love is real. It exists. And it’s how I feel.” She slams the door and walks quickly across the street to her house.

I’m immediately sorry I wasn’t more supportive. I climb out. “Sorry, Merida. Really,” I shout.

She doesn’t turn around, just waves.

“Smooth move.” I take my backpack from the back seat and go inside my house. “Hello?” I shout, on my way to my room.

Vera appears first in a hunter green dress under her white apron. “Hello, dear. How was school?”

I shrug. “Fine. I guess.”

“Hungry?” Fae asks, holding out a plate of cookies.

I am hungry, but the cookies look dry. I take one anyway. “Thank you.”

Macey comes from the living room carrying a book. It’s one I don’t know. The cover is weathered, and the binding is loose at the edges. There’s a seven-point star imprinted on the front. I can only read part of the title, which is fairy magic. “Any homework,” she asks, but keeps her eyes focused on the page.

I’m curious about the book, especially because it’s about fairy magic, but not enough to check it out right now. I need to get ready for Paxton. At his name, my stomach does a strange flutter. “Yes, and I’m having a friend over so I can help him out. He’ll be here at four.” I take a bite of the cookie. It’s orange chocolate chip. The recipe is one I created and when I make them, they’re really good. Somehow when Auntie Fae makes them, she seems to add too much flour or not enough sugar, or she adds flower instead of sugar. Like I said before, my aunties are flitty.

The secret to my recipe is to use freshly squeezed orange juice in place of the vanilla, and bittersweet chocolate chips instead of milk chocolate. The combination is… well, magical.

“He?” Auntie Macey asks. “Is it Carson?”

I shake my head while I’m chewing. Quickly swallow and wish I had a drink of juice. “His name is Paxton. He needs help in Geography.” It’s another lie, one I took the time to rehearse in my head. At this point I figure I’ve said so many, one more can’t hurt.

“How nice, dear.” Fae holds the plate out and I take another cookie. There’s a little too much flour and not enough orange, but she did pretty good on this batch. “Will you be working in the dining room? I have my dried flowers spread out everywhere, but I can clean them up quickly if you need the table.”

“Don’t worry about the table. We’ll study in my room.” I give each of them a hug.

Macey pats my back. “Have fun.” She goes back into the living room.

Fae sighs with relief. “Are you sure?”

“Absolutely.”

“Very good. Enjoy yourself and share the cookies.” Fae returns to the kitchen.

“Thanks, Auntie Fae. I will.”

Vera has her hands on her hips. “Studying only, correct?”

I give her my best how-dare-you-accuse-me-of-such-atrocities expression. “Of course.”

“All right. Well you remember we have Bridge today?”

“Yes, but don’t worry. We’ll be fine.”

“I trust you will be.” She gives me one of her rare smiles before heading back into the kitchen with Fae.

I go into my room and close the door. There isn’t a lot to do to clean up, but I do need to make my bed and hang up some clothes. That’s what I’m doing when I hear my aunties leave. Relief washes over me. And I still have time before Paxton shows up. For some reason, instead of working on my English paper or my math I go into my bathroom and brush my teeth, run a brush through my hair, and put on some lip gloss. Then I smell my pits and add an extra layer of deodorant. It surprises me I'm going to all this trouble for a guy I barely know.

But he's a fairy from Isluria.

And that means something to me.

At four o'clock on the dot, there's a knock on my door. I open it, expecting Paxton.

"Carson," I say, more than a little surprised. "What are you doing here?"

He has a bouquet of dahlias in one hand and a box of chocolates in the other. And he looks astonishingly handsome in dark jeans and a black tee shirt. "Thought I'd surprise you. Looks like I succeeded. Can I come in?"

I quickly glance around the yard for Paxton. "Sure." I stand away from the door.

He walks in and looks around. "Where are your aunts?"

"They're out for a little while." I take the flowers and head into the kitchen. "I can't believe you bought me these. They smell so good but must've cost you a fortune."

Carson shrugs, following me. "You're worth it." He also hands me the chocolates.

I place both on the kitchen island. Carson sits on one of the barstools. He seems slightly on edge.

I tear the plastic wrapping off the chocolates and open the box. The most delicious aroma fills my nose. "Mmmmmmm." I take a chocolate and feed it to Carson.

After he's done chewing, he says, "They're all orange cream since those are your favorites."

I put one in my mouth, savoring it. "So where were you today?" I locate the pruning shears, unwrap the flowers and clip off the ends at a forty-five degree angle, the way my aunties showed me.

"Just had some stuff to do, so I couldn't make it."

I hear the dishonesty in his voice. "Oh? What was that?" I take a large, glass vase from the cupboard under the sink and fill it with tepid water.

"Just stuff," Carson says sharply.

I pick up a dahlia and bring the soft, pink petals to my nose. The scent is amazing. I close my eyes, inhale deeply, and decide what to do. It's obvious he doesn't want to tell me where he was and I decide not to pressure him. Opening my eyes, I say, "Well, I'm glad I get to see you." After I've arranged the flowers, I throw the wrapping and clipped flower stems in the garbage.

He comes around the island and pulls me into a hug. "Your eye is looking better. And your lip is less swollen. Do they still hurt?"

"No." It's another lie, and I recognize I'm getting too good at saying what others want to hear instead of the truth.

"Rory." He presses his mouth softly against mine.

I respond hungrily, despite the slight pain, opening my mouth to him. All thoughts of Paxton and Isluria and fairies and the curse disappear while his lips caress mine. He explores my mouth while his hands find my hips and under my shirt. My skin tingles at his touch.

"When will your aunts be home," he asks between kisses.

"I don't know, why?" Yet another lie. I know why. He wants to take our kisses further, but I'm not ready for that.

At least not with him. I'm surprised by the thought, but it's true. He's amazing and his lips should be illegal they are so naughty, but whenever I think of going further with him, I can't see anything.

He smiles against my lips. "You know why?" His fingers brush the edge of my bra. "I want to be close to you."

I push his hands down. "You are close to me, Car," I say searching his eyes to gauge his state of mind.

“Come on, Rory. We’ve been together over a month. Don’t you want to take our relationship to the next level?”

“Carson—” I shake my head. “I love kissing you. It’s better than anything I’ve ever experienced, even better than chocolate, and you know how I feel about chocolate, but I’m not ready for more than that.”

He steps back, his face blank of emotion.

I continue, “I just need more time. That’s all. You can understand that, right, especially after what happened Friday night?”

Carson’s jaw moves in frustration. “You’re seventeen, Rory. A woman. And I’m a man. With needs.” He rubs the back of his neck in frustration.

I straighten, irritated with him, with Jesse, with all guys in general. “Well, I certainly don’t want to keep you from your needs, but I’m telling you, I won’t be going any further than kissing for quite some time so if you can’t handle that, please tell me now, and we can call this quits.”

I watch a myriad of emotions cross Carson’s face until it settles on what appears to be regret. The tension leaves his shoulders and he takes a deep breath. “I’m sorry. So sorry, Rory. I don’t know what I was thinking. Of course I can handle it. In fact, I’ll love it. As long as I’m with you, kissing is all I need.” He comes over and buries his face in the crook of my neck.

I sigh contentedly, desperate to believe him, even though there’s an itty, bitty, tiny doubt hanging out in the dark recesses of my brain. When Carson begins to trail kisses along my collarbones, I ignore the doubts. As he trails his hot kisses along my jaw, I shove harder against my uncertainties until there’s only a pinch of disbelief left, which I then completely squash when his lips find mine and he presses my mouth open.

I grab hold of the belt loops on his pants and pull him closer.

Kissing rocks. That is all.

OceanofPDF.com

A BLUE SKY is prettiest when you know it's your last. At least that's what I think as I lay on my back staring up at the ceiling of my bedroom. My glow-in-the-dark stars shine in the darkness. It's nearly midnight and I should be asleep. School is tomorrow and my alarm will go off in six hours. But I'm not tired. In fact I never felt more awake and my mind spins with thoughts I can't seem to let go of. Like this Yiddish Proverb: A half-truth is a whole lie. I've lied a lot lately and it's eating me up inside. But I'm not sure how to stop.

My life is like a bad movie. Growing up, I never felt normal and now I know why. I'm not supposed to be. Normal is something humans strive for, like being one of the cool kids, but I'm not human, I'm a fairy. Like Tinker Bell or the freaking tooth fairy or… my aunties Fae, Macey, and Vera.

Knowing that should give me peace. But it doesn't. Because instead of finally fitting in, I realize I would also be an oddball in the fairy world. Fairies have magic so I should have magic. Except I don't. It appears I'm destined to be a dork, at least until I turn eighteen. Then, according to the curse Lucretia placed on me, I'll be dead. Stabbed through the heart. It doesn't sound like a good way to die. Plus, there's the obvious issue. I want to live. Long enough to fall in love. Marry. Have children. I stop myself. Can fairies even have children? I have all the parts a human has. In theory it seems like they can, if they want.

And then there's Paxton. He was supposed to come over, but Carson showed up. I was happy to see my boyfriend. More than happy, really, but after he left, I kept hoping Paxton would stop by. He didn't. That worries me for some reason.

So I'm tallying stars and wondering where he is and what he might be doing. I have so many questions, about him, Isluria, and my mom and dad. And the more I think about it, the more my questions build until I feel like I might explode if I don't get some answers.

"Aurora? May I come in?" I hear his voice outside my window.

"Paxton?" I sit and pull the covers under my chin even though I know he can't see me because the curtains are closed.

"Can you invite me in? I can't enter without your permission because of the wards protecting the house." His deep voice is soft, but easy to hear.

I don't hesitate. "Hang on." I forget I'm wearing only a spaghetti strap tank and boy short pajama bottoms and rush to the window. Carefully, I move the curtain aside and slide the window open. "Can you help me get the screen off?" Since I snuck out the other night, it's slightly bent and tricky.

He lifts the screen from the track and sets it on the ground behind one of the bushes. "Sorry I'm late." He jumps up and lifts one leg over the opening as I step back. When both feet are inside my room, he pushes off and seems to hover for longer than seems possible before landing with a soft thud on my carpeted floor. Can he fly without wings?

I glance at the clock on my nightstand. "Only by eight hours is all," I say with a tiny bit of scorn.

Pax places a fisted hand over his heart and bows slightly. He's wearing all black. "Highness, you had company. I didn't want to interrupt." He scans the room and I'm suddenly embarrassed by its childishness.

I flip on the lamp beside my bed. "Yeah, Carson stopped by."

His eyes scan my attire before he clears his throat. "Your boyfriend seems to care a great deal about you."

I take a blanket from the end of my bed and wrap myself in it, trying to act like I'm fine and not self-conscious. "You said you had a message from my parents?" I study him, admiring his lips and the shape of his eyes. His lashes are dark and long, enhancing his face. His square jaw is tanned and rugged as is the rest of him. He doesn't look like what I imagine a fairy should look like. Not at all. He's beyond hot.

"Yes, well…" He pauses. A myriad of emotions cross his ruthlessly beautiful face. For a moment I get a sense of great pain and anguish from him followed by anger.

"What is it?" I step closer. "What's wrong?" The blanket falls from my shoulders, dangling over my arms.

He takes them, his warm fingers heating me even through the blanket. "This is difficult." He pulls me against his chest, hugging me. "I—" His muscles are tense, and I realize whatever it is he has to say isn't good.

"Yes?" He smells like nutmeg with a hint of cinnamon and I breathe him in.

"It's—" Paxton lifts my face so I have to focus on his vivid blue eyes that match the sheen of blue in his black hair.

The strange heat within lights up and burns. Again I wonder if my magic still exists and that Lucretia only bound it.

"Do you smell that?" One side of his lips lifts in a smile at the question.

It's exotic, like dahlias. "Yes, is it your cologne?" It seems a little feminine for a guy, but he is a fairy after all.

"No, it's you," he whispers and his head dips like he intends to kiss me.

"Get your grubby mitts off her!" The whisper-shout comes from the direction of my window and I jump back, my gaze falling on the guy coming through my window.

"How dare you?" I tighten the blanket closer around my body, leaning a little closer to Paxton. "Get out!"

A dagger appears in Paxton's hands. "You have no business here. Do as the princess commands and leave," Paxton seethes. He shifts his weight, preparing for a fight and I back away from them both, my legs smacking the edge of my bed.

The new guy barely acknowledges me, his golden eyes filled with fury. A piece of blond hair falls into his eyes and he promptly swipes it out of the way. He's taller even than Paxton or Carson and built like a quarterback—lean and muscled. The way he stands, like he's ready to pounce, reminds me of a lion. "See, I can't do that. I've made it my priority to protect her from supernatural jerks like you." He rolls his shoulders back. "Now do as I say and get away from her."

I don't know what to do, whether I should scream out for my aunties or run away. Something tells me the situation is so much bigger than me.

The guy shakes his mane of blond hair and for the briefest moment I think I see his eyes change, like those of a snake or a lizard.

I gasp, falling back on my bed. "Both of you need to leave. Right. This. Minute." My voice trembles with fear and I clamp my teeth together to keep from screaming.

Paxton glances down at his hands. His eyes are full of regret. "Aurora—" he begins, shakes his head, and vanishes. Just pops out of my room like he was never there.

"Good riddance," the other guy says, brushing his hands together like he's getting rid of cookie crumbs.

I'm terrified, but angry as well. "You need to get out too," I squish out. Paxton and my aunties said my house was protected by spells, yet this guy came in without a problem.

He seems less confident now that Paxton is gone and crosses his arms. "Look, my father and I are in the business of helping people, especially supernaturals. We recently found out about you and thought you might need some help." He kicks at the dresser beside my window. "Looks like we were right."

"I was fine." I shake my head. "I am fine. Now get out." I sit up, studying the guy. He looks to be my age but seems so much more mature than most guys in high school and I wonder what he's been through or what he does. He said he and his father protect supernaturals.

"You may be fine now." He pushes back one of my curtains. "But that fairy isn't here to help you. He's here to…" He growls in frustration.

"To what?"

He faces me. "I know about your curse. I know what's supposed to happen on your eighteenth birthday, Aurora. I know—"

I stand, but don't move. "How do you know? Are you a fairy too?" I cross my arms, searching for something on his body that screams fairy. Though Paxton doesn't have any telltale signs either. "Are you?"

"I'm most definitely not a fairy." He drops his arms, rolling his shoulders back.

"Hey, I'm a fairy." I give him my coldest glare, hoping he'll take the hint and go, though I want to know what he knows. And who he is. How he found me. And what he wants.

He sits on the sill. "Look, you know about the fairy realm, but there's so much more to it than that. There are vampires, witches, werewolves, and—"

I snort. "I know. I watch the news. Duh!" It sounds so nerdy. I should be embarrassed, but I don't care. "Look, uh, whatever your name is, I'd appreciate it if you'd get out of my room and leave me alone. If you have something to tell me, do it in the light of day." And in public, I thought.

"My name is Troy." He smirks. "And I'm half dragon."

I gasp and his face lights up with a giant smile.

"Yep, we exist too."

I don't know whether to laugh or freak out. The news never mentioned dragons. "Cool." I cross my arms. "Really?" It seems like such a strange reality I'm living in.

His eyes change. They remind me of liquid gold. And his face changes so that his skin appears almost scaly. “Yep. As I said, my father and I have made it our job to find those supernaturals who need help and…” He pauses and tucks his hands into his back pocket.

“Help them,” I finish for him, raising an eyebrow.

“Exactly.” He grimaces.

“Is this your first time?”

He gives me a bizarre look, one that says I guessed right.

“Helping people, I mean.”

“How did you know?” He turns away, peeking outside my window.

I shrug and laugh. “Several things, but that’s okay.” I pull the blanket further over my shoulders. “So what are you saving me from? What did you think Paxton was going to do to me?” Besides kiss me, I think.

He walks over and picks up one of the dozen ceramic fairies on my dresser. It’s funny. My whole life I thought they were beautiful. I dressed up as Tinker Bell for more than one Halloween. Everything about them, the wings, the cute little shoes with the fluffy pom poms, the way she wears her hair, and especially her magic delighted me as a child, and into my tween years. The whole idea of her felt right. It still does. So when my aunties told me who I was, that I was born a fairy, it was like the world made sense for the first time.

“Here’s what I know. That guy, Paxton, he wasn’t sent by your parents. He works for the fairy who cursed you to die.”

“You mean my mother’s sister. Lucretia.” I sit on my bed suddenly exhausted. It made sense, though. That would explain why he didn’t want to see my aunties.

Troy came over. “Do you mind if I sit too?”

“No, of course not. Go ahead.” What little fight I have left wilts like the dead dahlias Carson gave me weeks ago.

At the thought of my boyfriend I instantly stress. A line of perspiration trickles down my spine. Carson Hayes. Not that many weeks ago he became my world, the only guy I ever had a thing for, the only guy for me. That's what I believed.

If I'm honest with myself, I can admit he was the guy I dreamed of marrying, having children with. Now…

Not any longer.

I still find him handsome, of course. My heart still flutters when I think of him. He's definitely one of the good guys, better than good. Amazing. But since meeting Paxton, since my aunties told me the truth, I've found myself holding back. Because he isn't like me. We aren't the same. Where I grew up believing in the human happily ever after: marrying the man of my dreams, having children of my own, and a job I loved, I now know those dreams are no longer possible. Not for me. I'm not human, not even a little bit. And more than that, I can't see a future past a few months from now. By then it's likely I'll be dead.

"Aurora? You don't need to be scared." Troy's taut shoulder brushes against mine, interrupting my thoughts.

"I'm not." Which is true. Though I have no reason to trust him, there's something about him that immediately makes me feel calm. I don't trust him, but it won't hurt to hear what he has to say. Obviously, he isn't malevolent.

OceanofPDF.com

"YOU KNOW ABOUT LUCRETIA THEN?" He leans back, resting his hands behind him, his eyes focused on me.

It's a little disconcerting, but I fight the feeling. "Some. My aunties told me the story. My mom married the man Lucretia was betrothed to. The betrayal flipped her out. She went crazy, killing fairies for their power until she became a monster. When I was born, she cursed me to die on my eighteenth birthday. Doing that trapped her in the fairy realm's underworld." I turn to him. "Does that sound like what you've heard?"

"Yes, it does." He smiles. "What else do you know?"

I shrug. "I know my magic is gone…" I let the sentence die on my lips because I don't think that's true.

A look of surprise crosses his face. "It's still there, Aurora. I can see it within you, clear as day, but it's been bound," he says, confirming what I already know. He reaches out and touches the spot where my heart thuds erratically. "It's strong too."

How can this guy know more than my aunties? How can he see my magic? "Do you know how to release it?"

Troy turns away. It seems as though he's self-conscious or nervous about the answer.

"Troy?"

"How many fairy tales have you read?" He walks over to my dresser. This time he doesn't touch the fairies but picks up one of the many princess figurines lining the back edge.

"All of them," I say, coming to stand beside him. As a child, I loved them. "Why?" I take the porcelain statue of Aurora from his hand and look at it. She's wearing a pink dress. A beautiful crown adorns her head. My aunties say she looks like me. They aren't wrong.

“Let me tell you a different story.” He smiles then and my heart skips a beat. Not because I’m smitten with him, although admittedly he’s incredibly handsome, but it’s because there’s a look in his eyes that tells me he knows more about me than anyone.

“Okay.” I replace the porcelain figurine.

“Once upon a time a little fairy was born. She was loved immediately by her parents. They named her Aurora because it means morning.”

“How do you know all of this?” I ask, interrupting him. I cross my arms, desperate to know the answers, but afraid too.

He moves over to the window but doesn’t answer my question. Instead he continues. “She was a beautiful child. The most beautiful in the land.”

“I know this part,” I say, moving over to my bed where I sit. “Lucretia is mad and shows up, cursing her… I mean me.”

Troy nods.

I go on. “To protect me, my parents send me into the human realm with three of their most trusted of the Royal Guards.” I smile. “Right?”

“Yep.” He moves so he’s in front of me.

“My question is, how do you know all of this?” I cross one leg over the other, tucking my feet under the bed.

“It doesn’t matter.” He sits beside me. “What does, is that Paxton is a bad guy and you need your magic back.”

“I do? That’s what Paxton says he wants for me too. How is that a bad thing then?” It did matter how he got the information about me. I guessed it was through supernatural means, but I still want to know the details.

“It’s bad if your magic returns from the kiss of an evil person versus the kiss of a person with a pure heart, specifically when it’s true love’s kiss.” He runs a hand through his hair.

I turn so we face each other. “Wrong. If I understand my fairytale lore, and I believe I do, then true love's kiss can only come from your true love." I want to add, duh, but keep it to myself.

"If only that were true." He stands, taking the chair from under my desk and rolling it over so he can sit in front of me.

"You're saying there can be more than one true love?" I'm so confused. "Or are you hitting on me?"

"No. Not even. I swear." He rolls away, bumping into the wall where the window is still open as he laughs nervously.

"Okay, so let me see if I got this straight. Paxton came in here tonight to kiss me. He's supposed to be my evil true love so if he kisses me, my magic will return, but it will be evil." Troy opens his mouth to say something, but I hold up a finger to stop him. "So, if I kiss my good guy true love, then my magic will come back and it'll be good?"

He nods. "Pretty much, yeah. That's impressive." He crosses his arms, leaning back.

"It's stupid is what it is." I spit the words out like they taste nasty. "I am who I am. Good or bad, it's the choices I make, not because of magic." I huff out a breath, wishing I could go to sleep, wake up, and have forgotten all of this.

"Not really, not if you think about it. Since we all have good and evil inside us, it makes sense there would be a good and bad true love as well. And our choices lead us toward one or the other." His golden eyes fade into a more hazel color.

"Your eyes are kinda cool. They change color," I say as I ponder his words. There might be truth to it, but it doesn't feel right.

"Yeah, well I'm awesome. That shows everywhere, including my eyes." His confidence is renewed as straightens.

"Okay, Mr. Awesome, does Paxton know this farfetched piece of information. Does he know he's my evil true love?"

"Oh, he knows alright. Except…" Troy leans forward, resting his elbows on his thighs.

“What?” I can’t help but angle forward as well.

“He doesn’t believe he’s your evil true love. He thinks he’s your only true love,” he says, sitting up once again.

The comment makes me blush as I copy him, returning to an upright position. “But I don’t even know him.” I glance over and notice Troy is smirking. “Besides how do you know all of this?” I ask again.

He looks away. Locks his hands behind his head. “I’ve read your story, Aurora.”

I stare at him in disbelief. “You mean you’ve read it up until now since obviously you can’t know how my story ends. It hasn’t happened yet.”

Troy stands and goes over to the window. “All of it,” he says, his eyes wide with worry.

“Not possible. Because there isn’t a book in existence that can tell any of us how our lives end. What about free will?”

He stands and walks over to the window.

I rush over to him, grabbing hold of his gray shirt. It makes no sense that he would leave now, but I can’t take the chance either. “Troy? Tell me the truth.”

His eyes lock on mine. “Professor, uh my father and I found a book during our travels. Inside are the stories of every life ever created in all the realms.”

“Whoa, that’s got to be an enormous book.”

He laughs, showing me all of his straight, white teeth. “It’s a magical book that is basically endless, but I can’t stop reading it. While searching through one night, I read your story, which is why I’m here. My father and I believe we can change your story. We hope to anyway.”

I shudder at the thought. “You want to save me from dying?”

“Yes, that and more. I want to save you from yourself.” He sits on the windowsill.

“Who’s my good prince charming?” I ask, watching him.

“I could tell you, but then I’d have to kill you,” he says, quoting a line from my Auntie Fae’s favorite eighties movie.

I gasp. “You would?”

He jumps down into the bushes along my house and picks up the screen. I help him adjust it back into place. It’s going to rain soon; I can smell it. “No. I’m joking, but I have to go. One of your aunts is awake.”

“Oh?” My heart picks up speed.

He runs out of the bushes. “I’ll see you tomorrow, Aurora.”

“You will?” I stand.

“Oh yeah. You’re looking at the newest student at Hellgate High.”

“Great, then you should know, my name is Rory.”

He laughs, waving before running out of my view.

I quickly jump back into bed just as my door swings open. I hear her come in and close my curtains before leaving and shutting the door behind her.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN MY ALARM GOES OFF, for the briefest moment I wonder if last night was a dream. Is it possible I didn't almost kiss my supposed evil true love, a fairy named Paxton? But then again, was it possible I met the half dragon named Troy, the guy who believes he's going to save me.

I check my phone. There are a couple of texts from Carson. They're sweet. Hey, I start to type, then stop. Read his texts again. The first is just a good morning with a heart and a kissy face emoji. In the second he asks if we can hang out after school. After school works, I continue, but stop again. I can't finish. "Ugh." I lock my phone, toss it on the bed, and tell myself I don't have the energy to respond.

At my closet, I quickly dress in jeans, a light pink tee shirt, a matching sweater, and pink ballet flats.

When I sit down to breakfast, my aunties comment on my outfit.

"Don't you look pretty," Auntie Macey says, placing a plate of undercooked pancakes on the table.

Vera hands me a glass of orange juice.

"Thank you." I take a sip, grateful for something edible or in this case, drinkable.

Fae pats my shoulder. "Pink looks so beautiful with your complexion." Her cheery smile fades. "How are you doing?"

I grimace and try to choke down a bite of raw pancake. "I'm, you know, good and I've got to get to school." I kiss her on the cheek.

"You sure?" She's still holding the pan and a spatula in her hands.

I get the feeling she can sense my lie. Am I good? "Course."

Auntie Macey takes my plate and Vera opens the front door. "See you later."

Once I'm inside my car, I buckle up and back out of the driveway.

Tiana waves as I drive by her house. She looks adorable in her sky blue pants, white poplin shirt and her black hair styled in loose waves. I wave and watch as she climbs into Lance's Mercedes. Merida was getting a ride with Ethan, which means I'm driving myself to school. Again. I miss my friends. Sure, I'm glad they're happy, but it would be nice to hang out with them. Not that I can tell them anything. They would freak if they knew I'm a fairy.

Hellgate High buzzes with activity. I pull into the parking spot, grab my backpack and get out.

"Hey Mer." I wave as she and Ethan walk past hand in hand.

"Rory. Hi!" Her curly red hair bounces around her like a fiery cotton ball.

Ethan gives me a nod. "What's up?"

"Not much," I lie as I walk inside the school and dash up the stairs. At my locker, I remove my books from my bag, and get what I need for my first class. My phone pings. I have a feeling it's from Carson. Before I can look at it, someone calls my name.

"Aurora."

I shut my locker. It's Paxton. His eyes smolder with irritation. "What did the mongrel want?" He's wearing perfectly faded jeans, his black boots, and a white tee shirt. His black hair is pulled back in a man bun. I can't stand man buns. But on Pax, it somehow makes him sexier.

"Huh?" I raise an eyebrow even though I know he's talking about Troy.

"The dragon boy. What did he want?" Each word is laced with incredible distain. It's obvious he doesn't like Troy.

"Nothing. Just to talk." The lie slips from my lips easily. I start down the hall toward my first class.

Pax grabs my arm. "Don't you want to know what your mom and dad have to say?"

“Oh, sure.” I pause and let the swarm of students pass us by. “Go ahead.” According to Troy, this guy is a liar. Whatever he’s here for, it isn’t because of my parents. At least that’s what the dragon boy said. I’m not sure what to believe.

Paxton clears his throat. “Aurora, I am supposed to…” He steps close. So close, he’s in my space. His gaze falls to my lips.

Kiss me, my mind whispers. I clear my throat. “So you want to kiss me? Right?” I say the words louder than expected and a couple of girls giggle as they pass by.

Paxton doesn’t seem to notice. “I’m supposed to tell you they love you.” He shakes his head, glancing briefly into my eyes.

“Really? Anything else?” I grit my teeth, waiting to hear what else he will lie about.

He moves in closer. “I need to kiss you. Doing so will release your magic. It’s the first step.”

I glare as a need to punch him in the face wells up. Along with my anger comes the pressure from within. I now believe the energy I feel is actually my repressed magic. And I realize it wants to get out, be free, and it should be. For the briefest moment I think about taking Pax up on his offer and just laying one on him. I even rise up on my tiptoes, but falter. “First step in what? Surrendering to the curse? Dying? Is that what you want? Because if it is, why didn’t you just let that guy hurt me the other night? Why be nice to me?” Tears fill my eyes as I meet his stare. He’s shocked. Surprised. He doesn’t want me hurt, I can tell that the moment I say the words.

“Aurora, no.” He takes my arms and pulls me over to the side of the lockers. “I should’ve known that mongrel would lie, would tell you things that aren’t true.”

“So if I kiss you, my magic won’t come back dark? I won’t be evil?” I repeat what Troy told me, and hope Pax will be genuine. I’m so confused.

His hands fall to his sides. “I—It isn’t like that. No at all. You and I are meant to be together. Our magic, our destinies… I am your true love. My kiss will prove that for it is only true love's kiss that can free your magic. Not good or evil, just full and fulfilled, as you rightfully deserve." It sounds like he's repeating words that have been rehearsed.

I shake my head. "I can't believe anything you say. You're lying about who you work for, too. It isn't my parents, but Lucretia." I say the words with bite. "She cursed me to die. So why would she want me to have my magic then? Why would she want me to have any kind of edge?"

"It's not true. Yes, she cursed you…" he pauses. "But that was a long time ago. Now, it's so much more than that."

"She wants me to suffer, too. Is that it?" I don't wait for an answer but take off running until I hit the stairs. I climb them, until I reach the fifth floor. There's a roof access and I push open the door.

"Aurora, wait," I hear Pax call. He doesn't follow me and I'm equal parts disappointed and grateful.

I don't stop until I'm out in the fresh air. As soon as the door clicks shut, my heart sinks. "Crap!" I locked myself out. It's the cardinal rule when going out on the roof. I've heard other kids talk about it. A roll of duct tape hangs on a large nail sticking out of the brick. Below, on the graveled floor, is a pile of wadded up duct tape. It's to be used to stop the lock from latching. "Crap!" I go to the door and pull on the handle. It doesn't budge. "Ugh." I might be out here a while. Days even, unless a stoner comes out.

"If only you had your magic."

The words sail into my mind as a black mist swirls like a tornado before landing on two feet and becoming the most striking woman I've ever seen. Where my aunties have become soft edges and squishy devotion, this woman is sharp lines and sleek cuts.

"Who are you?" My back presses against the red steel door and my pulse quickens. I take a deep breath, because I know who she is without having seen her before. “Lucretia,” I say, answering my own question.

“Impressive.” She casually moves toward me. “But more specifically, I’m your aunt Lucretia.”

I swallow, nervous. She isn’t bound to the under kingdom of the fairies after all. There are a dozen questions I can ask, but the most emotional comes out. “Why did you curse me? I was a baby. I did nothing to you.”

“Oh, sweet thing. Not yet. But you are the child of my betrayer and my sister. It’s inevitable you will do a lot to me.” Her lips lift into a smile and keep going. It’s eerie. She’s eerie. Almost like she isn’t all here, but a phantom or a ghost.

“So you’re a cup half full kind of fairy,” I say sarcastically.

She cackles. “You have your mother’s sharp wit. It’s one of her best traits. Well that, and her beautiful eyes.”

I know I shouldn’t be excited to learn about my mom, not from Lucretia, but I am. Plus, there’s no way down. At least not right now. I drop my bag, my notebook, and books, and move closer. “Do you still love your sister?”

Her dress is blood red. There’s a strange sheen, like a wetsuit look to the fabric. The neckline comes down into a low V. It stops at her waist where a thin belt encircles her slim waist. Sleek black hair is wrapped up in a braided bun at the nape of her neck. Her skin is creamy white, which makes her ruby red eyes stand out. From her back protrudes a glittering set of enormous red wings. They are magnificent. In her left hand is a long staff. At the top sits a red orb.

“Love is such a misunderstood emotion, but to answer your question, of course I love her.” She waves her hand and a throne appears. It’s deep red and lined with dozens of sparkling rubies. Her wings disappear as she sits, propping her staff across her legs. “My sister is family, after all. How could I not? But that doesn’t change the fact that she betrayed me, as did Stefan, and you are the product of their treachery."

I can see Lucretia's point. She's like a wounded dog, grizzly and striking, and furious. If she hadn't cursed me, I might feel sorry for her, even take her side. But she did curse me and because of that I'm supposed to die in a few months. Not an easy death either. Stabbed through the heart. That's what the curse says. "So why are you here? Did you come to kill me early?" There's nothing to stop her. I have no power.

"Don't be silly. Of course not. Your death is scheduled for your birthday. Right now, I only wish to talk." She speaks like I'm ridiculous.

"Oh goodie," I say, but a bizarre feeling overtakes me. Why wouldn't she just kill me now? If I'm the product of their duplicity, why not end me? Unless she can't. Unless she isn't really on the rooftop with me but is in fact still in the under kingdom. That would explain her wish to talk. She's only a shade and has no real power here. I decide to rattle her. "The evil fairy wants to chat." I lay the sarcasm on thick, but the truth is I do want to talk to her. I'm interested in learning what she has to say. As she said, we are family. "I wonder why?" Determined to know if I'm right, I rush her, and swipe a hand through her head. It's as I suspected. She's only a mirage.

She doesn't seem fazed. "See, you have no reason to fear. Ask your questions. I'll answer them truthfully." She gives me a sweet smile laced with a tendril of malice. A chair exactly like hers appears behind me. I glance at it and then at her. "Go on. Have a seat."

The bell rings, which means I'm late for class. The school will send my aunties an email for every class I miss. That'll send them into a flurry of stress. I almost feel bad about how upset they'll be. I've seen it before. At the time I believed them to be way overprotective. Now I understand why. They were afraid for me.

If they knew why I missed class, they might die of a heart attack…

if fairies could have heart attacks. The questions pour out of my mouth before I have the chance to filter them. “What do fairies do all day? Do they sleep? Do they dream? Grow old? What about their jobs? I know my aunties were Royal Guards before they brought me into the human realm so does that mean there are other types of jobs, like gardeners? Or fairy doctors? Or maybe fairies don’t ever get sick.”

“Wow, you really know nothing about who you are, do you?” She rests her head against the back of the chair. “But those are stupid questions, Aurora. Fairies do what people do. They live their lives. Is that all you’re interested in?” The disappointment is evident in her features.

I swallow, but don’t care what she thinks. “This is all new to me,” I admit.

“Such triviality. I know you’ve been in hiding, but I thought the Royal Guards would share some of their secrets. I know they have one of Isluria’s twelve books of magic.” She glances up at the sky as though she senses something I can’t. Lucretia places her staff on the ground and uses it to stand. Her wings reappear like the opening of a sail. In the same moment, the chair is gone. “Perhaps it’s better if you never learn anything about what you could’ve been, especially since you won’t live long enough to really enjoy it anyway.” She shakes her head and her wings flutter like a butterfly’s behind her.

That makes my heart hurt. “Can’t you remove—?”

A gust of wind fills the air, blowing back my hair, followed by a rush of heat. It’s odd in the midst of the cold January morning.

“I cannot eliminate the curse, but I’m a reasonable woman. If you…” She pauses, looking around. It’s apparent something has her spooked. “Bother. A dirty mongrel is coming.”

Before I can comment my chair vanishes and I’m on the ground. “Ouch.” I quickly stand, forcing down the pain in my butt and my heart. “What do you mean, you’re reasonable?”

“Sadly, we cannot talk more, at least not now.” She tilts her head and studies me.

“Tell me what you were going to say,” I plead, unable to see what has her ready to bolt.

She pauses, her red eyes sparkle with miserable mischief. “You like the boy.” It’s a statement, not a question.

“Paxton?” I ask to clarify. Then continue. “Not even. I just owe him.”

“Oooooh, even better.” She walks to the edge of the roof. “You know Montana is a beautiful state, almost as lovely as Isluria. If I had to compare our realm to this one, I would use this lovely state.”

“Wait,” I shout before I can stop myself. My heart is beating fast, so fast it feels like it’ll come out of my chest. A strange smell, like rotten eggs fills the air. Something is coming. “Tell me!”

Lucretia gives me a once over and steps off the roof so that she’s floating, her wings beating behind her. “Very well,” she laughs. “If you leave the human realm behind and attend the Fairy Academy in my under kingdom for the next few months, maybe I’ll remove your curse.”

A glimmer of hope charges through my chest. “Fairy Academy?”

“That’s right. You’ll be given the opportunity to learn about your heritage. Best of all, you’ll no longer have to be stuck in this awful human existence.” She breathes in, making a face. “Disgusting.”

I get the feeling there is more to her offer. What Troy said about good and evil, about what can happen with my magic comes to mind. And a school for fairies in the under kingdom? The notion sounds sketchy, and I know without doubt there’s a catch. But what if she did allow me to live? If she removed the curse? Those thoughts make me want to take her up on her offer. Say yes! “I can’t leave. I don’t have magic. I don’t have wings.” I think of abandoning my aunties and Carson as well as my best friends, Merida and Tiana.

She smiles. “I can give it all back.” Her wings close onto her back and she drops from view.

I suck in my breath, even though I know she didn't fall. She's a fairy for goodness sake. Still, I peek over the edge. Of course she's gone just as I knew she would be. "Magic," I whisper.

In that moment, I know what I want to do. My heart cries out that I should attend the Academy. But what about Carson? And Tiana and Merida? I'm worried about them both. Plus, my aunties. They will be saddened by my choice. Not to mention Troy. I don't know him, but I sense his urgency to do the right thing. And then there's my parents. What will they think if I take Lucretia up on her offer? I'm sure the answer is they wouldn't approve, but none of that matters. They can't reverse the curse. True love's kiss is ridiculous. I want to live, and my best chance is by attending the Fairy Academy.

As I stare out at the city, the memory of play practice fills my mind. Carson gave me my first kiss that night. It was sweet, but the whole idea of loving someone so much you would die for them the way Romeo and Juliet did seems silly. And I know I don't love Carson. He's a great guy, but if there is such a thing as a true love, he isn't the one.

OceanofPDF.com

BROKEN CURSE

OceanofPDF.com

IT ISN'T every day I get invited to attend a fairy academy and decide my boyfriend isn't the one for me. In fact, before a few weeks ago, I never had a boyfriend. Lucretia's summons is weird too. And also terrifying. I want to talk to Merida and Tiana about what happened. Ask their opinions. But if I do, then I have to tell them what I am… and I'm not sure they can handle my truth. Especially since I barely can.

Lucretia is gone, but her words echo through my mind as I stare out at the city beyond the roof of Hellgate High. It doesn't matter that I'm trapped up here. I can't stop thinking about what she said. Leave the human realm behind and attend the Fairy Academy in the under kingdom and maybe I'll remove your curse.

Why maybe? I should've asked her to clarify. Will she let me live? What exactly does she mean when she says she'll remove my curse? I think about shouting her name in the hopes she'll return so we can talk more, but the wind picks up and a sulfurous odor fills the air. "Gross." I wrinkle my nose and step back. An enormous bronze and gold dragon comes into view, blocking out the sun.

A strangled noise escapes my throat as I turn to run, but I slip on the gravel and fall. Rocks dig into my hands and pain radiates through my arms. The moisture dissipates from the air as the beast gets closer and I struggle to breathe. "Leave me alone." I cough as I roll onto my knees but in my urgency, I slip again, collapsing on my elbows. More pain. Probably blood too, but I don't have time to worry. I need to escape.

A part of my mind knows who the dragon is. Sure, he's enormous, but he lands with hardly a noise. I watch in awe, hopeful I'm right and this is Troy, the boy I spoke to the night before. I call his name, but he doesn't respond. Just beats his wings several times before folding them onto his back. They remind me of a bat's.

I get to my feet. Brush off my hands and elbows and decide what to do. The door is locked. I'm trapped up here with no way out.

"Aurora. Wait. It's me."

At the sound of his voice, I take a deep breath and calm my nerves. "Troy?"

"That's right."

"Are you decent?" I ask, my back still to him.

"Decent?" There's laughter in the word.

"Yeah, do you look like you instead of a dragon?" My hand is on the doorknob and I shake it, wishing it would open.

In response, he laughs. "I'm still in my dragon form. But there's no need to be afraid. I won't eat you." He pauses. "Fairies are tasteless."

"Rude." I slowly turn. He's sitting on his hind legs, like a dog waiting for a treat, his long tail curled around him. "Aren't you worried you'll be seen? The government has spies, you know. People on the lookout for supernaturals."

"That's why I've come for you." He shakes his head, like he's trying to get his hair out of his face. In dragon form, it looks funny. "But to alleviate your fears, my magic cloaks me from everyone except those I want to see me." There's a rumble in his throat like a raging fire.

I shudder. "Got it. And my name is Rory not Aurora."

He crouches down so his head is nearly parallel with mine. "Fine. Rory." He clears his throat, sending smoke from his mouth. "Do you know who that was you were talking to moments ago?" His voice quivers with emotion.

I nod. "Lucretia, the fairy who cursed me."

He snorts. Shakes his body and morphs from his impressive dragon form into his human self.

As I watch an image of a dragon mating with a human comes to mind. Yuck. Troy said he was half dragon. By the look of him, he's all dragon. It doesn't seem possible that a dragon and human could be together in a romantic way, but what do I know. Until a few weeks ago, I wasn't a fairy either.

"I don't even want to know where your mind went just now," he says, only slightly sarcastic.

I chuckle and look down at my shoes. They have gravel dust on them. "No, you don't." My phone pings before I can be too embarrassed. It's a text from Carson.

You okay? I waited by your locker but didn't see you.

"Boyfriend?" Troy asks, knowingly.

"Yes."

"Which one?" He winks.

"Ha-ha. I only have one," I say, trying to figure the dragon-guy out. He acts like he wants to be my friend, but I don't get why.

"So it's the human, then?" He steps close and I swear I can feel heat rolling off him.

"Carson," I say as I step back.

Troy rolls his eyes. "Popular guy." He pauses. "By the way, you look really nice," he says, appraising me. "I like your skirt."

I didn't expect a compliment and it startles me. "Thank you?" I clear my throat. "You look like you just finished basic training." He's wearing camo pants, dark boots, and a black shirt. His dirty blond hair is long, though not as long as Pax's. It looks good on him.

"Yeah, well I did." He runs his hands through his hair and laughs. "What did Lucretia want?" He crosses his arms, leaning back on his heels.

"First, what did you mean when you said you came for me?" If he wants me to answer questions, he needs to answer mine first.

"Touché." He tucks his hands in his pockets. "You want the long story or the short one?"

"Short, I guess." It's chilly out here. I want to go inside and get warm, though thankfully dragon-boy radiates heat. I shift closer.

He grunts. “Eleven years ago, the vampire queen was defeated and a new one took her place. When that happened, she freed all supernaturals trapped in Sharra. Many came to the human realm and that’s when the problems started.” He pauses. “You remember that time?”

I shake my head. “I do, but only slightly. My aunties didn’t let me watch much news.”

“Yes, well, once the governments banned all magical creatures from this realm, several supernaturals, including Pops—I mean my father, took it upon themselves to search for those still here and help them, if possible.” He moves a little closer. “You are a supernatural, Rory.”

I let the truth of his statement sink in. “Holy daisies, you’re right.” I turn away as the full weight of what I am fills me. The light within my chest pushes against my ribs, as though desperate to escape, but I push back. My aunties are supernaturals as well. We are in danger. When they brought me here, they weren’t breaking any laws, but now we all are. “How can you help me?”

Troy studies me intently a moment. “I liked what you said about no one knowing how our story ends.” A shadow crosses his face and I wonder if he’s read his story too. “I talked to my dad about it and he suggested we invite you to attend the Seven Magics Academy.” He pauses. “It’s a school for all supernatural students.”

“Another academy?” I shake my head.

“What do you mean?” He is so close I can smell his cologne, like clean laundry and a hint of vanilla.

“Lucretia said she would lift my curse if I attend an academy in the under kingdom.” I pause and glance up at him.

He’s shaking his head, suddenly furious. “You can’t,” he growls. “Attend the Seven Magics Academy instead. At least there you won’t be taught dark magic.”

“I didn’t say yes.” I don’t add that I want to. Instead I squeeze my hands into fists. “But even if I did, the whole dark and light, good and bad.” I shake my head. “It’s ridiculous. My choices determine what I am, not my magic.” I don’t know a thing about magic, yet I speak like I’m a pro.

“I appreciate your point of view, but with respect, how do you know?” He rolls his shoulders like he’s waiting for a fight.

“It’s just… I feel it in my bones.” I throw my hands in the air, frustrated.

“If only I could help you find your good true love.” He crosses his arms, his biceps bulging beneath his shirt.

“Are you saying that’s you?” I chuckle. “Because I get the feeling dragons and fairies don’t usually get along.”

He snorts. “We get along fine, when we need to.”

“But you aren’t friends with any fairies?” I walk over to the door and pull on the handle again. It still doesn’t budge.

“We’re friends. Doesn’t that count?” He stands beside me.

I laugh and glance at my phone. “I hardly know you.”

“True, but we’re going to change that.” He tries to look at my phone. “You going to text him? He could come unlock the door for you.” Quicker than I think a person can move, he grabs my phone and pretends to type. “Dear Carson. Please come and rescue me from the tall tower and the scary fire-breathing dragon.” His voice is high and pretend girly.

I stomp my foot and reach out to grab my phone, but he lifts it above his head. “Give me back my phone.”

“Sure. Or, I could just fly you down.”

I feel my eyes get big. “Really?” The idea terrifies and excites me.

“Sure.” He touches his nose and clears his throat. “But it might be hard to explain, especially if someone sees you floating off the roof like Dumbo holding a feather.”

“Is that a crack?” He better not be commenting on my weight. That’s just not cool.

Understanding dawns on him. “No, sorry. It’s just Dumbo can’t fly without help, and neither can you. Bad comparison.” He shakes his head.

“Ouch,” I say, adjusting my shirt.

He hands me back my phone. “Text Carson. Have him come and get you.”

I take it and pull up Carson’s name but can’t find the words. I shake my head. “I… it’s… Ugh, I don’t know how to talk to him anymore.”

“Fine.” A smile lights up Troy’s face. “I’ll just let you in then.” He yanks on the handle. It breaks and he pulls the door open.

“How’d you do that?” I step inside, grateful for the warmth, and blink my eyes to help them adjust to the sudden gloom. There are lights in the stairwell, but they aren’t very bright.

“Big, strong muscles,” Troy says, flexing like a body builder in a competition.

“Funny.” I raise my eyebrows, waiting for him to continue.

“Hello? I’m a dragon.” He lightly tickles my side and I laugh as the door slams behind us.

“Right.” I decide to change the subject. “Is it official? Did you sign up for classes?” Last night, he said he had.

He shrugs, following me down the steps. “More or less.”

“How many times have you infiltrated a school to help—” The word supernatural comes to mind, but I can’t say it. “People like me.”

“Once or twice.” He is on the step beside me.

“It’s too dark,” I whisper, searching for the flashlight app on my phone. But before I can click on it, a ball of yellow light appears on Troy’s palm.

“Dude, you are kind of a showoff, aren’t you?” I can’t help but smile, especially at the look on his face.

“What? No,” he says casually. The light continues until we get closer to the bottom and he extinguishes his magic. Then he pulls a paper from his pocket. It’s his class schedule. “You think you can help me get to the office? I’ll tell them I got lost and you were helping me out.”

“Since you rescued me from being stranded for hours on the roof in the cold, why not?”

OceanofPDF.com

“THAT’S two dollars and fifteen cents,” the elderly lunch lady says.

I hand her my money and head over to our usual table. Merida and Ethan are there as is Carson.

When he sees me, he waves. Stands. Walks over and takes my tray. “Let me get that.”

Guilt punches me in the stomach. Carson really is a good guy. How can I be over him? I’m stupid. A stupid fairy. “Thanks,” I say, following behind him.

Once he places the tray on the table, he turns to me. “Are you alright?” His eyes flick over my outfit and he nods approvingly.

“Fine. Why?” I take a seat, pushing some hair behind my ear and pick up a fry.

“Hey,” Merida says, glancing at Carson, who sits beside me.

“Hi.” I feel bad we haven’t talked in a while.

Ethan nods a hello and I nod back. Guilt nips at me. I still need to talk to Merida about Ethan.

“Can you do something after school? I was thinking we could see a movie, maybe get some ice cream.” Carson’s face is hopeful.

“Oh, um, I…” I smile, my guts twisting.

“What?” His features fall, like he can sense the change in me. “Hey, can I talk to you?” He glances at Merida and Ethan. “Alone.”

“Sure.” I stand and collect my things.

Carson takes my hand. “Come on.” He leads me down the hall and over to the stairwell that goes up to the roof.

Not again. The door is still busted, and he pushes it open before making his way over to the edge of the roof. There’s a dozen kids out here with us this time. A group of them are smoking and they aren’t cigarettes. Kelly is with them. I watch as she breathes in the smoke, holds it, and then lets it out before passing the butt on to the next person in the circle.

"You brought me up here to get high?" I tease, not ready for the conversation we're about to have. I know it has to happen though. The sooner the better.

He turns up his nose at the group and walks us to the opposite side of the roof. "No, I really just want to talk."

My shoes crunch under the gravel. It's a lot warmer now than it was this morning. "About what?"

He sighs heavily. "What's the matter? With us." He shakes his head. "It feels like something's off between us, but what I can't understand is why. Have I done something? I was a little pushy yesterday…" He pauses. "But I can wait. I will wait as long as you want to."

He was more than pushy. Carson has a little of his father in him, but he's fighting it, which makes him a good guy. Just not my guy. "I appreciate that." I take his face in my hands. "I really do. You're the most amazing person." I stand on my tiptoes and press my lips softly to his.

"Then what is it? I just don't understand." He wraps his arms around my waist, holding me close.

"It's crazy and convoluted." How do I explain all that's going on with me lately without really explaining? "But—"

"If you give me the 'it's not you, it's me' speech, I might lose it." He pushes me away, a glimmer of anger in his eyes and rolls his shoulders. His hands are balled into fists as though he's bracing himself for what's coming.

"Carson, please understand, there's a lot going on with me. It has to do with my aunties and my birthday and…" I feel terrible for hurting him, but I don't want to give him false hope or say something that isn't true. I've been doing too much lying lately. "It is me. Believe me when I say it." In that moment, I think about telling him all of it. The whole truth. That I'm a fairy and that I'm cursed to die. "If you want—"

His eyes narrow and his face turns red. "We are so over. I don't have time for your drama." His jaw clenches. "It's bad enough you won't put out, but now this whiny crap." He shakes his head. "I don't know what I even saw in you." He's yelling and several of the stoner group, including Kelly, glances over. She smiles like the cat that just ate the whole canary.

I can't speak. His words have slashed at my heart. It's for the best, but it hurts so much. All I can do is nod.

Carson blows out a breath and I get the sense he didn't mean the words—that he's lashing out because I've hurt him. "What a waste." With a final glare, he stomps over to the exit.

"Carson." It's Kelly. She's extricated herself from the others and is standing to the side.

"Not now, Kelly." He whips open the door and disappears behind it.

Kelly looks over at me and sneers. "I knew it wouldn't last between you two." She follows after Carson. "Wait," she calls as the door slams behind her.

Part of me is devastated I hurt Carson and that we just broke up, but a bigger part is relieved. Strangely comforted, even. Now he can move on, so if I do die, then it won't hurt him so much. "Sorry," I whisper, feeling dejected as I yank open the door. I spot Troy on the stairs, coming up. "What do you want?" I snap, not in the mood to talk to him.

He holds out a pack of gum. "Thought you might need something to chew on." He raises an eyebrow, making a face.

I glance at him and at his hand holding the gum. Even in the low light I can see it's spearmint flavored. My favorite. "You're the strangest— What the heck is—" I take a piece. Open the wrapper, put the gum in my mouth, and force myself not to sigh. The gum is yummy. Small victories, right? “Thanks.” I move past him.

He follows me down, his steps bouncing lightly beside me. “It’s better this way.”

When we reach the bottom, Carson in there. And he’s kissing Kelly. Okay, not just kissing. Making out. I know it’s for my benefit. Meant to hurt me. It’s working.

“That’s cold, bro,” Troy says, shoving his shoulder into Carson’s.

Carson pulls out of Kelly’s arms and walks away without looking at me or Troy.

I don’t want to cry, but the tears come anyway.

“Sorry, Rory,” Troy whispers, putting an arm around my shoulders. “But at least now you can totally focus on what’s important.”

“Oh, and what’s that?” I snap, using anger to mask my pain.

“Finding your true love—the one with the pure heart. Stopping Lucretia from killing you. Any of this ringing a bell?” He pulls me into his side, a large genuine smile lighting up his face. “Or we can leave now, and you can go to school at the Seven Magics Academy. You’ll like it there, I promise. That’s where I go when I’m not in the human realm.” He glances at a group of giggling girls. “This place isn’t for me and it definitely isn’t for you either.”

Despite my hurting heart, I consider his words. “You like it there?” I don’t know where “there” is, but based on how he said it, I’m guessing its outside the human realm.

“The Academy? Yeah, it’s seriously so much better than regular school.”

“I’ll think about it,” I say.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER MY LAST CLASS, I head to my car, feeling like six hundred-pound weights are strapped to my back. It's hard to move, even harder to breathe. My brain knows I did the right thing with Carson, but the rest of my body struggles to catch up.

"Rory, wait," Merida shouts, running to toward me. Her red hair floats behind her like a beautiful fire.

I unlock my door and wait for her to catch up. By the sad puppy-dog look on her face she heard about my breakup. And I don't want to talk about it. When she's within earshot, I take a deep breath. "Merida, I need to go. I've got a bunch of homework." It's not a total lie. I do have calculus.

"Yeah, but you can wait a sec." She comes around the car and throws her arms around my neck, hugging me tight. The way only a best friend can hug. "Carson isn't worth it," she says and I hear the emotion in her voice.

I gently extricate myself from her grasp. "He's a good guy." I pause to get control of my emotions. "I hurt him. It's my fault." As I talk, Carson and Kelly walk out of the school, hand in hand. Was it only earlier today he held my hand like that?

"Still think he's a good guy?" she asks, glaring in their direction.

I quickly get in my car and start the engine. "Call you later, 'kay." I pull my door closed and back out, barely watching where I'm going.

As I drive, I don't think. I turn up the radio until it's so loud nothing else has a chance of getting in. When I reach my neighborhood, I relax and turn the music down. This is my home with its well-kept lawns, white picket fences, and stark trees. They become a blurry painting as tears distort my vision. Even though it's my fault and I have no reason to be upset, I can't stop. The pain is real. It's like saying good-bye to a dream. I touched it, tasted it briefly, and then it was snatched away. And it's all Lucretia's fault. If she hadn't cursed me, I never would've come to this realm. Then I never would have met Carson.

"Stupid fairy." I pull into my driveway, turn off the car, grab my bag, and slam the door before locking it.

"Dang, girl. Be nice to your car." Tiana is standing in the center of my lawn, her arms crossed. When I pulled in, she wasn't there. Or I totally missed her.

"I am being nice, Tiana," I grumble, throwing my bag strap onto my shoulder.

She puts her hands on her hips. "I'd hate to see you pissed, then."

"It's just…" I drop my bag and fall onto the grass. Going any farther seems like too much trouble.

Tiana waves at Lance as he drives away, and sinks down in the grass beside me. "Carson can't handle a girl like you." She crosses her arms behind her head, staring up at the clear blue sky.

"I guess." I close my eyes and take a deep breath. It's too cold to be out here, but I'm not ready to go inside. "Tell me about Lance," I say, desperate to take my mind off my problems.

"Well, you've seen him. He's hot. His dark skin and light brown eyes. I swear I get lost in them," she begins.

"He is hot," I agree, nodding.

"And he's so sweet too. Plus," she pauses and I look over at her.

"Yeah?" My senses kick into high gear. What is it about him that has her so over-the-top gaga.

She rolls onto her stomach, bumping her shoulder into mine. "I need to tell you something." There's a hint of worry in her soft voice.

"Okay." I study her intently, my nerve endings buzzing.

"He's a vampire," she whispers, glancing around as though someone might hear her.

I knew something was off about him, but the confession doesn't surprise me. In fact, it makes complete sense. What is it about her and Merida getting into trouble? Not that I'm any better off. I sigh. "Vampires aren't supposed to be in the human realm," I say quietly.

"It's an uptight law based in fear." She huffs and rests her chin on her hands. "Besides, when he drinks my blood…" Her voice trails off a moment. "It's like the best feeling ever. I can't get enough." She pushes down her collar, revealing twin marks in her neck. Puncture holes from his teeth. My heart stops. This isn't pretend. My best friend is seriously letting a vampire drink her freaking blood. "Better than a hickey, right?" She smiles until she sees my face. "What?"

There are so many things I want to say, but I don't want to upset her like I did Merida. "If the police find out about him, they'll arrest him and probably have him killed."

"If they find out," she says, eyeing me nervously. "You won't tell, will you?"

"No, Tiana. No. I promise I'll keep your secret, if you can keep mine." I push myself onto my knees and sit on my butt, crossing my legs in front of me.

"Swear you won't tell," she says leaning in close.

"T, I swear." There's so much more I want to say.

She's immediately relieved. "I want him to turn me," she continues, and her face lights up with excitement.

"No!" I shout.

Mr. Beazley is walking his little chihuahua and scowls as he hurries past us.

"Why would you do that?" I ask, taking her hand.

"I want to be like him. I love him and want to live forever with him." Her eyes get dreamy. "Eternal love is possible," she says.

"But what about your parents? And your little brother?" I'm flailing inside. "You'll have to leave the human realm."

"No we won't. We just have to be careful." She leans in close.

“There are still a lot of supernaturals in this realm. If they wanted to, they could take over and imprison the humans. Supernaturals are much more powerful than humans anyway.” Her face gets hard. “It isn’t right what’s happening to the supernaturals.”

“But T? You’ll have to drink blood. No more real food. And don’t forget the chayot. Those angel beings. You’ve seen them. They are terrifying.” I try to think of anything I can to talk her out of this, but I can see she’s already decided. Whatever I say won’t make a difference.

“They’re disgusting is what they are. The chayot should be on the side of the supernaturals. That’s what they are, after all.” She stands and begins pacing. “Rory, I get it’s hard for you to understand because you haven’t met your true love, but when it’s real, you’ll do anything to be with that person.” She sticks out her hand and pulls me up with her, giving me a hug. “After I graduate, I’m going away with him. There’s a big group of vampires living in New York.”

“I don’t want you to go.” All the change happening to me and around me is making me sick.

“Come with us. I’m sure Lance would turn you too, if you want.” She lifts a brow. “You know I adore you. We really could be friends forever.” She gives me a big smile.

“I appreciate the offer. Thanks.” I pick up my bag and decide it’s better if I don’t tell her what I really am. “I need to get on my homework. Calculus is still kicking my butt.”

“Mine too. But hey, what secret were you going to tell me?” She already has her phone out and is checking it. Probably a text from Lance.

“Just that I’m not that sad Carson and I broke up.” It’s a truth, even though it isn’t what I was going to tell her.

She runs back over and hugs me again. “You’ll find your true love. Believe it.” She winks. “Bye.”

I wave as I watch her jog across our lawns. Sadness like I’ve never felt overwhelms me and I sink to my knees because I might not ever see her again. My eyes shut and I'm suddenly swept away.

Dark clouds roll in. The wind picks up, and heavy droplets of rain fall against my skin. I open my eyes. "Tiana, I—" I glance around as I speak, but nothing is where it's supposed to be. The land is stark, with sparse weeds among rocky dirt. The scent of brine fills the air. I work to stand, trying not to blow away in the wind. In the distance is a ruby castle. It glitters like a million gemstones in the light. "Tiana!" I call out. But the sound smacks me in the face. I place my arm across my forehead and make my way forward.

It's difficult to walk, especially with the wind and the rain. I'm instantly drenched and start to shiver. My pink ballet flats squish with every step and my teeth chatter.

"So. Cold."

"Use your magic, Aurora."

The voice feels like it's inside my head. "I don't have it," I say, choking.

A loud cackle skims across the landscape. "Join the Fairy Academy. It's the only way."

"Will I still die? Will I get my magic back? My wings?"

"You'll get it all back and more. You know what to do. Just say yes!"

I gasp and jerk awake, sitting up.

"Rory?" Merida stands on the sidewalk, a strange look on her face. "You all right? You were talking to yourself."

"I was?" I laugh nervously, unsure how I ended up back on the ground. Legs shaky, I manage to stand. "I guess I fell asleep and had a bad dream." I pick up my bag. "What did I say?"

"You said, 'yes.'" She tilts her head as though she wants to figure out what I meant.

"I did?" Cold leeches all warmth from my skin. Did I agree to attend the academy? Did Lucretia trick me? "Hey, Mer. Are you okay?" It's like I really see her for the first time in a while. Her face is pale, and her clothes look too big.

“Fine,” she says, but it’s a lie. I’ve done a lot of lying myself lately, so it’s easy to spot. “Get some rest. Everything will work out. Promise,” she says, but I hear sadness in her words.

How did we get to this place? I want to weep at our separation. “You can talk to me about anything,” I say, my voice hoarse with emotion.

“Thanks.” She lowers her eyes before turning away. Without a backward glance, she crosses the street and disappears inside her house.

A sob hitches from my throat and I cover my mouth with the back of my hand, wondering when I lost all control over my life.

OceanofPDF.com

I DROP my bag in the entry. “Aunties?”

“In the kitchen, dear,” Fae calls out.

I glance at my reflection in the mirror. The girl staring back looks tired, yet there’s a glimmer of hope in her eyes. “I need to ask you about a book I saw the other day. I’m told it’s one of twelve books of magic. It looked old and there was a weird star on the front.”

When I enter the kitchen, I see all three of my aunties are frozen in various stages of shock.

“Who told you about the book?” Auntie Vera asks, placing the kitchen towel on the counter.

“Lucretia,” I answer, too tired to come up with a subtle answer. “She told me about it and said it contains information about my fairy heritage.” If I’m going to the Fairy Academy, I better learn what I can about myself.

Usually it’s Vera who states the hard facts, but this time Fae comes forward. “You saw her?” she asks, her face lined with fear. So are Vera and Macey’s. “When? Where? Are you okay?” She looks me over. They all do.

“I’m fine. It was only a projection of herself that found me. I think physically she is still in the under kingdom.” I open the refrigerator to get some orange juice.

“Well, that’s something, I guess,” Fae says, and pulls a wand from one of the pockets in her apron. She swirls it around a few times like it’s been a while since she used it.

I stop and watch a moment. They really are from another realm. “Do you all have wings?” I pour juice into a glass and take a drink.

“We do.” Macey looks like she wants to reveal them, but Vera puts a hand on her arm and shakes her head. Macey sighs. “Of course we do. We're fairies, dear. Same as you." She shakes her head. "Well, not exactly the same as you. We aren't royalty, but you get the idea."

I smile at her, beyond thankful for these sweet women. Leaving them will be hard, but my decision is made. Soon, I'm going to the Fairy Academy.

"What did Lucretia want to talk about?" Vera asks, pulling me from my thoughts. She takes some chocolate chips from the pantry.

I debate what to tell them. They won't want me to go to the fairy realm. They already said so. If I tell them about my decision to attend the academy in the under kingdom, they will flip. They might even risk using their magic.

But that's another reason I should go. Without me here, Fae, Macey, and Vera will have no reason to stay in the human realm. They shouldn't be here anyway. It's against the law.

I gulp down the rest of the juice. "She was there to gloat. Said she was excited to watch me die." I take the glass to the sink and rinse it out.

"Well isn't that great," Fae says, angry, as she swings the wand around again. This time a bit of sparkling light flicks from the tip. She pulls at each end of her wand, shaping it into a rectangle. As she continues, it grows to the size and shape of a door.

"What are you doing?"

Macey rests a hand on Fae's shoulder. Pats it warmly. "Most of our magic is hidden away."

"Yes," Vera says, moving to stand on the other side of Fae. "It's on the other side of this door." A knob appears as she speaks.

I watch in awe, surprised. "Oh." I move to stand beside Fae.

Vera turns the handle and the door is abruptly solid and brown, the same color as the wand. She pulls it open. A rush of wind blows back my hair. Swirls of light cling to the air around us.

"We'll be gone an hour, maybe two, but no more," Macey says, stepping through the door.

“Wait.” They can’t leave me.

“Please stay in the house. Don’t go anywhere until we get back,” Fae adds, patting me on the back.

“And for the love of Winter, don’t do anything… rash,” Vera says, smiling lightly.

I nod. “Can’t I come with you?” I don’t want them to go. There are still so many questions that need answers.

“No.” Vera shakes her head before going to the door and stepping through. “The place we are going was created to only allow the three of us.”

“Okay.” That makes me sad. I’ll miss them when I go to the academy, but it’s what I need to do. “Hurry back,” I say, thinking maybe I can see them one last time before I leave.

“We will, dear.” Vera kisses my cheek. “See you in a bit.”

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN THEY'RE ALL INSIDE, the door automatically closes behind them. They said not to follow, but I can't help trying to open it. The knob shocks me and I jump back, rubbing my hand. "Sheesh. Fine. Goodbye, aunties." I grab my bag and head to my room, looking around as a well of nostalgia and sadness rolls over me. As I remove all my books and papers from my bag, I wonder what I should take with me to the Fairy Academy. Pencils? Paper? Clothes, at least.

I open my drawers and pull out underthings and socks.

"What are you doing?" Paxton appears in my room.

"What the— Get out!" My heart thumps in my throat. "How did you get in here? I thought the house was warded against evil." I say the words half-heartedly because I don't mean them. Not really. He did save me from Jesse and he's done nothing to convince me he's malicious.

"I'm not evil, Aurora. You have to feel that." He tucks his hands behind his back. Dressed in a black tee shirt and dark jeans, he looks like a hot rebel ninja. All the black makes his eyes pop. They study me, begging me to see the truth. Which is that he isn't all bad.

"Maybe, but that doesn't change the fact that you lied to me. You work for Lucretia and she is evil." I toss some socks into my bag as it occurs to me that while Lucretia is willing to bargain, Paxton didn't. I watch him a moment. "What do you want from me?"

"Aurora." There's pain in his features and he raises his hands toward me.

I have a choice. I can listen to his lies or do what I think I should. "A half-truth is a whole lie, Pax." I say the words softly, listening to my heart. Remembering what Troy told me. Paxton thinks he's my only true love. Along with that, there's more. I sense it. "Tell me why you're here."

He shakes his head and tears fill his eyes. “You are my true love,” he blurts.

I roll my eyes. “How do you know that?”

“I was told—”

“By who? Lucretia? Because I’m pretty sure she’s well versed in the art of lying.”

He nods. “It’s more than that. If I don’t convince you to come to the Fairy Academy—if I don’t kiss you, she will kill my sister.” He punches the wall, putting his fist right through it, causing the window to rattle.

I swallow, debating what I should say to him. “Kiss me, Pax.”

Surprise replaces his anguish. “Are you sure?”

“Without a doubt,” I say, moving to him and standing up my tiptoes.

He pulls me into his arms, locking them behind my waist. Immediately the scent of cinnamon fills the air between us. “Why now?” he asks, his eyes searching mine.

Instead of answering, I touch my lips to his. The cinnamon and vanilla scent increases and seems to cocoon us as he kisses me back, his warm lips pressing my mouth open. Kissing him isn’t like anything I’ve experienced. It’s heady and wonderful. Colors swim behind my eyes and a shiver of need courses through my body. I feel my magic stir beneath my chest and swirl and mix with my hunger for him.

I press into him and run my fingers through his thick hair as his hands gently caress my back and shoulders before cupping my face.

He pauses and searches my eyes. “Are you feeling what I’m feeling?” He kisses each of my cheeks, his warm breath causing my skin to tingle. “I knew we were meant to be together, but I didn’t know our connection would be this potent.” He is as surprised as I am and that makes me happy.

“I don’t want to stop,” I say, tugging his head down so he will kiss me again. His lips crash into mine, and it's all hunger and desire. I yearn for him in a way I never craved Carson. Images of Pax and me together fill my mind. Along with those images are colors coursing along my veins, bringing with them my magic. The power bursts from my chest and zings voraciously until every nerve is buzzing. It's amazing. For the first time I'm grateful for my heritage. Kissing Carson was fine. It was even wonderful, but that was before I got to experience kissing Pax.

When we break apart, we are both breathing heavily. Not only that, but we're in the air. Hovering a couple of feet off the floor. I gasp. "Put me down," I say, as terror fills my chest.

"Course. Sorry." The words come out gravelly and full of emotion.

"It's okay," I say when my feet are firmly planted on the ground once again. His wings are out. Though I'm petrified, I peek around him to study them. They are black like the night and matte, with a sheen of blue, the same as his hair. They remind me of shadows. Masculine and severe, the tops run horizontal at his shoulder blades and almost look like an extension of his hair. "May I touch them?" His eyes are hooded, but he nods once and tucks them against his back. Tentative, determined not to be afraid, I stroke the top of one.

They are different than Troy's, which are gold and shaped like a bat's wings. Pax's are velvety in texture. At the thought, the fear I keep down, travels up to my throat. When I release his wing, I check my fingers to see if there's dust on them, the way it happens with a moth or a butterfly. There isn't. "Did that hurt?" I ask, searching his face for the truth.

He pulls me into a hug, his face buried in the crook of my neck as he kisses it softly. "Do it again," he says.

My body shakes with worry, but also with desire. "Okay." I reach back with both hands and stroke them as he trails kisses up my neck and along my jaw to my lips. This time there is no softness as he growls low in his throat and presses my mouth open, kissing me in a way I've only ever imagined or read about.

When we separate, my lips are bruised, but in a good way. "Your wings will return soon," he says, his eyes full of lust. "I can't wait to show you what that feels like."

I swallow as my worries bubble over. "I don't want them," I say.

"What?" A smirk dances on his lips, as if he doesn't believe me. "Everyone wants wings or at least to fly."

"Not me." I turn away, crossing my arms. My fear of winged creatures started when I was ten. There are many reasons, but it all started after a small, yellow butterfly landed on my hand while I was playing in the sandbox in my backyard. Its beautiful wings brushed against my skin with the weirdest sensation, one I didn't understand, or like.

After that, my fears increased, probably because my interactions with butterflies did as well. If my aunties took me to the park, groups of the flying bugs would flutter around me like I was sugar water. It's mostly the wings that freak me out. They seem to be made of powder and paper. Yet they fly with such beauty and abandon, as though they have nothing to fear. My auntie Macey says they fly like that because they love it so much.

Pax wraps his arms around me, his body tucked against mine. "What's going on?"

I share my irrational fears. He turns me to face him. "They were drawn to your power. Though you didn't know what you were, those butterflies did. I have a feeling your fears will vanish once the curse is lifted." He speaks with such confidence.

I don't know if I believe him. "I hope so," I say, though I'm not convinced. "What about your sister? Is she alright?"

At my change in conversation, his brows furrow. "She is alive but imprisoned. Lucretia swore to release her once you are in the under kingdom."

"I'm sorry Lucretia is making you do this." I touch my lips, thinking I'm not really sorry. Not if all of our kisses will feel like that.

"Don't be. I agreed to come for you." He grits his teeth. "She took my sister as insurance. Worried I would back out." He laughs but there is no joy in it. "She wasn't wrong."

"I don't understand." I start to feel self-conscious. Did he change his mind about me?

A noise comes from the kitchen. It sounds like my aunties are back. Pax hears them too.

"I should go," he says, but presses a warm kiss to my lips. I'm immediately on fire. He feels it too and cups my face in his hands.

"Rory," Fae calls.

"I'll be back to get you soon." He pauses and tilts his head. "Are you sure you want to go?"

"To the Fairy Academy?" I whisper. "Yes."

Pax presses his lips to my fingers one moment and is gone the next.

Fae knocks once and opens the door. She's smiling, but it vanishes when she sees me. "Anything the matter, dear?" She goes to the window and looks out. After several moments, she closes my curtains and turns.

"Nope," I lie, crossing my arms and sitting on the edge of my bed. "How was your trip? Did you get your magic back?"

She sniffs the air. "We sure did, and it feels so good."

I had to agree. My magic hummed through me like a car on a racetrack. I keep thinking she'll notice, but she doesn't. "Come into the kitchen. We need to talk."

OceanofPDF.com

I'm riding on the back of a unicorn. His coat is sleek and black as are his mane and tail. They glisten in the light coming from the large round moon that hangs overhead. His horn is large and white. His name is Hex.

The two of us are deep within in a thick forest following along a barely distinguishable path. Leaves from the low-hanging branches of giant trees tangle in my hair. The sounds of night birds and crickets fill the air as does the scent of roses.

Hex nickers softly and comes to a stop.

"What is it?"

He stomps a hoof onto the damp ground as a set of red eyes appear on the path in front of us.

"Is that a—" I don't get to finish because whatever it is let's out a wail that isn't like any animal I've heard before.

Hex rears and whinnies.

I cling to his mane and squeeze my thighs around his body so I won't fall off.

He turns and runs like the devil is chasing us back the way we came.

It's then, as the humid wind whips against my face I realize I have no idea why I'm here with Hex or even how I know the unicorn's name. I turn back, trying to see what it is chasing us.

It isn't one, but three enormous creatures, their mouths filled with sharp teeth and frothing at the mouth, running madly. And they're gaining.

"What do they want?" Even though I shout, my words are sucked away and I doubt Hex heard me.

You. The answer flies on the wind alongside the unicorn and me.

Hex runs and it almost feels like we're flying. If I wasn't terrified of falling off, I'd scream. Instead I lean over so my head rests against his neck.

“Why?” The question comes out before I realize I’ve said it.

It’s your magic, Aurora. The demon hounds hunger for the goodness within you. If they catch us, they’ll extract from you all that is pure and leave only the evil.

“But I don’t want to be evil.” I press my thighs more tightly against the unicorn’s body. “Faster.” I use my legs to urge him on.

I feel him pick up speed, but I also smell the overwhelming stench of rotting flesh coming from behind. It won’t be long until they catch us. Catch me.

Then I’ll be evil, like Lucretia. The thought shocks me. I glance back as a hound leaps forward, its claws digging into Hex’s flank. The unicorn rears, whining in pain.

Another jumps and as he lands, his jaws sink into the flesh on my shoulder. Pain radiates through my body as the third hound’s teeth find my arm and I feel my flesh split and tear away.

Hex goes down, his shrill cries of agony filling my ears. “No! No! No! No! No!” I scream the words over and over but sense it’s too late.

The unicorn looks back, his bright violet eyes wild. I reach out to him, but more hounds tear at us. I can no longer see Hex, nor can I make out the night sky. Complete darkness surrounds us. The coppery scent of blood reaches my nose as the gruesome sound of flesh tearing from bone fills my ears.

And then she appears. Dressed in deep red, like the blood oozing from my body. “Lucretia.”

The demon hounds vanish, but I’m not sure this new development is any better.

“It’s time to die, young princess. Your magic will be mine.” A blade appears in her hand. It’s long and has a menacing shape. Thick in the center it slopes to a long, pointed tip.

“Don’t kill me.”

Lucretia laughs. It’s high and maniacal. “I’m not going to kill you. I’m going to let him do it."

Paxton appears at Lucretia's side. His hands are crossed over his chest and a sly smile sits on his face.

"Pax? Paxton? You wouldn't!" I'm in shock. We'd kissed earlier that night. He helped my magic return. How could he choose her over me?

"It isn't personal, Aurora." He takes the knife from Lucretia. "Well, I guess it is." His smile grows big.

"Go on, Paxton. Make her suffer."

He grabs me by the hair and yanks my head back, exposing my neck. "I'm going to enjoy this." He angles the knife and slices down…

"Aurora, wake up. Aurora!"

The words cut through my dream. I open my eyes. Pax is leaning over me, smiling. Without thinking, my terror takes over, and I put my hands out to shove him away. Instead of moving, Paxton's shirt catches fire and my handprints are blackened silhouettes against his chest. He cries out in pain as he falls back, ripping off his shirt before snuffing out the fire.

"Oh, crap. Sorry." I flick on the bedside light and look at my hands, trying to figure out what happened. It's obvious the power came from my magic. "I can't believe I did that." I jump out of bed and run over to him. "Are you okay?"

Pax holds out his hands. "Stay back," he growls. Taking the glass of water from my nightstand, he pours it over his burning flesh and says some words. The water sizzles and turns bright blue before disappearing into his skin. "Better." He takes a deep breath and sighs with relief.

I wait a moment, afraid of what I did and terrified by what I saw in my dream. As I watch him, I try to wrap my head around it all. Was the dream from a moment ago a vision given to me by my magic? I didn't want to believe it. Pax and I shared a very sensual and enjoyable moment when we kissed. I want to believe that was real and pure and not just him playing me for his own selfish purposes. I want to believe he cares.

But does he? My heart says one thing and my head says another. I cross my arms and swallow down my fear. “Are you okay?” The black marks have mellowed to an ashen color.

“I’m fine.” He grinds his teeth together, but his shoulders relax. “Remind me never to startle you again.”

“What are you doing here?” I turn, taking a deep breath and try to calm my frayed nerves.

“You gave me your consent.”

I look at him, confused.

“You said I could enter your room.” His features turn worried. “It was your magic that called to me. Shouted, actually. As soon as I heard it, I came over.”

“It did?” I sit on my bed, tugging a pillow onto my lap. “I didn’t know.” Images of the dream fill my mind and I shudder. I still can’t believe my magic is back and I am shocked by what it showed me. Would my magic call for my supposed killer?

“It was more a loud feeling, not like your magic said any words, but I sensed your distress.” He moves close and helps me stand. “I couldn’t stop thinking about earlier tonight, either.” His arms encircle me.

At his touch, I’m immediately warm. My face gets hot. “I wasn’t thinking about our kiss.” I push against his stomach, unable to help but feel his taut abs. “I was having a nightmare.”

“Want to talk about it?” His eyes flick back and forth in earnest. It’s obvious he’s concerned.

In my mind I see the way he looked at me just before the knife in his hand came down. “It doesn’t matter,” I whisper, shaking my head. I want those images to go away.

“Of course it does. I can sense it.” He sits on the bed, pulling me with him, and wraps a blanket around my shoulders. “Tell me. It’s obvious you're shaken."

"It's…" I pause and check my gut. He doesn't seem anything like the Paxton I saw in my dream. "You were going to kill me," I blurt, staring at my hands as they cling to the edges of the blanket.

"That's terrible." I sense the tension growing in him.

I swallow as I debate how to continue. "Troy told me you're my evil true love." It's embarrassing saying the words aloud, but I figure I don't have anything to lose. Might as well be open with him.

He seems taken aback, but not because I said he was my true love. "I'm not evil, Aurora."

I want to believe that. He may be working for Lucretia, but only because she has his sister. He believes he doesn't have a choice. "Okay." I nod but can't look at him.

From the corner of my eye, I notice him smile. "What else happened in the nightmare?"

I tell him about the demon hounds, Lucretia, and Hex. When I finish it's obvious he's as stunned as I am. "That was quite the dream." He takes my hand. "I'm so sorry you had to experience something so horrible."

"Thanks," I say, but pull my hand from his. Speaking the words aloud make them feel even more real and I don't want to trust Pax.

"I swear on my life I will never hurt you, let alone kill you." Pax speaks with pleading in his voice.

"I believe you," I say, even though it isn't his life he should be swearing on, but that of his sister. Surely, he'll go to any length to protect her. "I'd better get some sleep. I have school tomorrow." It's a lame excuse, but I need him gone. After the dream, I'm not ready to go to the under kingdom, though that's why he's come. "Can you give me a little more time?"

"Right." He walks over to the window and opens it even though he doesn't need to go through it. Because he can just pop in and out of wherever he wants without the need of a window. I'm guessing he's doing it as a courtesy for me.

After he gets one leg over the sill, he stops. "But you know, Hellgate High School is for humans and you aren't a human. You're a fairy."

What was he getting at? "Okay."

"Now that you know who and what you really are, you shouldn't put off the inevitable." He pauses, eyeing me with irritation. "You belong at the Fairy Academy. The sooner you let me take you there, the sooner Lucretia will remove your curse and you can learn what being a fairy really means."

"I guess," I acquiesce. The words Troy said the last time we spoke haunt me. What will I be learning exactly? How to be evil? It sounds silly, but I will be going to school in the under kingdom. "But I need a little more time."

He shakes his head in disappointment.

"Look, it wasn't long ago that I had plans to graduate high school and get a summer job before heading off to college with T and Mer." I clear my throat. "That's changed, but…" I shake my head. "It's a lot to give up. All I've ever known." That sounds dramatic, but it's true. Especially since T already told me she's going with Lance. Once I leave with Pax, I don't know when or if I'll be back.

He sits on the windowsill, propping one leg up so he can rest his elbow on his thigh. "Aurora?"

"You must understand. Surely, if the roles were reversed you would ask for time as well?"

He shrugs, giving me a look that says he wants to kiss me, but I can't, not with my dream of him still hovering on the fringes of my mind. "I'll be back tomorrow." With a light pop, he vanishes.

I sigh as I climb back into bed. Without him near, I don't feel whole, but when he's around, I'm a jittery, nervous mess.

OceanofPDF.com

MY ALARM GOES off and I snap awake, remembering last night's nightmare and my conversation with Pax. I climb out of bed and head to the bathroom where I shower and get ready.

I dress in jeans, a white shirt with navy horizontal stripes, and tan wedge heels, leaving my long hair down. After applying mascara and pink gloss, I grab my bag and head into the kitchen. Usually my aunties are in there making me some kind of amazingly sweet although gross breakfast, but today they aren't anywhere in sight.

"Auntie Vera?" I leave the kitchen and head toward their bedrooms. "Auntie Macey?" I knock on her door and wait. But there's no answer. I go to Fae's room and knock. "Hello? Auntie Fae?"

When there's no response there either, I start to panic. I should've known something was up when I let out that blood-curdling scream after my nightmare. Had they been home, they would've come running. They didn't.

The last time I saw the three of them, they explained what they did to retrieve their magic and shared that they wanted to perform a stronger protection spell. Fae mentioned they needed ingredients, but I didn't think they would go during the night, while I slept. That seemed counterproductive, especially since they were so bent on shielding me.

Several times last night I thought of telling them my plan to attend the Fairy Academy, but the timing never felt right. Or I was a coward.

I make my way back to the kitchen as a horrible feeling comes over me. Something is wrong. My aunties wouldn't leave without telling me. If nothing else, they would leave a note. "Aunties." I study the area where Fae created the door the day before. "Aunties!"

"They're gone."

I whirl around at the sound of Troy's voice, and clutch one hand to my chest. It bothers me he just appears inside my house, but it seems he has answers, so I let the infraction slide. "How do you know? Where are they?" I cross my arms over my chest, trying to hold myself together, but tears fill my eyes.

"Lucretia must've known they went for their magic and trapped them somewhere, probably in the fairy realm." He growls, irritated. "I'm sorry this happened. We need to get you out of here. Come with me to Sharra." When I raise my eyebrows in question, he clarifies. "It's the realm where the Seven Magics Academy resides."

"I need to go after my aunties," I say. "I know a way to save them."

His eyes become twin slits. "What do you mean?"

I tell him what I intend to do.

He rests his hands on his hips, frustrated, and I swear a puff of smoke exits his nose. "You've made up your mind, then? You're going to the school in the under kingdom?"

"More or less." Now that my aunties are gone, I need to get down there so Lucretia can set them free.

He tilts his head and takes a deep breath. "Your magic has been unleashed." His face turns pale. "I can smell it." He makes a face. "You kissed him? That filthy, no good—"

"Stop!" I don't know how he knows, whether it's a dragon thing or what, but I don't care. He can't talk about Paxton that way in front of me.

"I told you what would happen if you kissed him." His voice is low and irritated. Troy shakes his head. "I can't believe you." He's disappointed in me. It seems everyone is.

"So what. You don't even know me." I grab a dishtowel and cover my face with it. I have no idea why.

Troy starts laughing, the tension in the room easing. "What are you doing?"

"What are you doing?" I repeat, flustered, wadding the towel into a ball.

"There's darkness in you now. It's smoldering and growing because you kissed him first. Dark magic will be what's most prevalent. You'll have to fight hard to keep it at bay." He pauses. "Unless you don't care."

My heart rate speeds up. "I'm not evil. Paxton isn't evil. He's only doing what he has to because Lucretia has his sister. He has no choice. And of course I care!" My breathing turns heavy. Pain. Anxiety. Fear. It's all on the surface. "What would you do? If someone took the one person you cared for most in the world."

He eyes me warily. "Rory, it's okay. Calm down."

But I don't want to calm down. I can't. Inside I am in turmoil. I've lost my aunties. There are all these changes happening between my friends and me. Plus I still need to find out what I am and what I need to do. It just keeps building. More and more is piled on. My breath is coming in ragged gasps and I grab at my chest. It hurts and I wonder if I'm having a heart attack. "I— Can't— Breathe—."

Troy backs up. Is that fear I see in his eyes? "Let me get you a drink," he says, going to the fridge and getting me a bottle of water.

I bend over, resting my hands on my knees as stars shine in front of my eyes. There's a halo around the edges of my vision. I feel like I'm going to pass out.

Troy hands me the water, but I bat it away, sending it flying across the kitchen, where it rolls under the table. An uncontrollable fire is raging inside of me and I wonder if it is going to consume me.

"Have I told you about Cole?" he asks so quietly I wonder if I really heard him.

I shake my head and work to calm myself.

A stool scrapes across the tile floor and he sits. "Even though we aren't related by blood, Cole is like a brother to me." He snorts. "We did everything together, including tracking and helping supernaturals with our father." He pauses and I hold my breath. The fury in my chest calms as I wait for him to go on. "A few years ago," he continues. "Cole was with me on a job. Before I could save him, he was sucked into a vortex and I have no idea where he is or even if he's still alive." He stops and I look up. His eyes are on me. "Every day he's gone, I die a little more. I would do anything to get him back." He sits up straight. "Except go evil. I won't do that, because Cole would never forgive me."

I swallow back the bile in my throat and cross my arms. "I guess you're better than me."

"No. It isn't too late. Let's go after your Au—"

"Dragon mutt, you shouldn't be here." Pax appears in the kitchen beside me.

Troy stands. His skin ripples, flashing his scales. "Paxton, you don't want to mess with me right now. Not after what you've done."

Paxton's skin shudders and his wings appear.

"You sure you want to do this?" Half of Troy's body is now covered in gold and bronze scales.

The tension in the room is so thick I can feel it. "Both of you need to settle down." I do something stupid and place myself between them, slapping a hand on each of their chests. Like I can do anything to stop a fight if that's what they want.

Paxton breaks away first, heading toward the living room.

"Pax?" I follow him, as does Troy.

"Did he tell you who his parents are?" Troy asks, all of his calm gone.

Paxton spins and moves faster than I believe possible, striking Troy in the face with the bottom of his booted foot. Troy doesn't move. "I kill demons on a regular basis. What makes you think you have any chance of hurting me, fairy boy?"

Paxton's face becomes furious. I step between them again, putting my hands up. This time I feel a surge of magical energy pulse through my arms and extend outward. Troy and Paxton fly backward in opposite directions.

"Sorry, but the two of you need to chill." I'm surprised my voice sounds so calm and confident. Inside I'm a frightened wreck. I help Paxton to his feet first. "Troy is a good guy," I whisper. "He can stay. If you aren't okay with that, then you shouldn't be here. I'm still not ready."

"Fine, but if he stays, then so will I." Pax flops on the couch, propping his elbows on his knees.

When I reach Troy he's already standing. "I'll try to remain calm, but Paxton needs to tell you the whole truth and we need to find your aunts." He glares at Paxton. "I have a feeling fairy boy knows where they are."

I sigh and drop onto the wood coffee table between the guys. "Is this true, Pax? Do you know where my aunties are?"

"Yes, but only just. That's why I came back. I wanted to tell you and help you save them." He crosses his arms, leaning back.

Troy snorts like he doesn't believe him.

It's hard to know what to do or who to trust, but I do want to know who Pax's parents are. Obviously, that's important. At least Troy thinks so. "Why don't you tell me who your parents are?" I clasp my hands together, steeling myself for whatever he's going to share.

Pax shakes his head. "Don't you want to get your aunts first?"

At his question, my heart lurches with panic. I do want to save them, but I need to hear whatever it is about his parents. Especially since it's obvious he doesn't want to tell me. "I want to save my aunties, but talk first."

"As you wish," he concedes darkly. "My father is an air fairy and my mom is a fire fairy." He claps his hands together. "There, now let's rescue your aunts."

I glance at Troy, trying to figure out why that's a big deal. Troy rolls his eyes. "Uh-huh. Now tell her the rest."

"This is stupid. Who they are doesn't matter," Pax growls.

"Oh, but it does matter, at least according to the fairy laws that have been around since the dawn of freaking time." Troy glares and I can practically feel the hate rolling off him.

"Will you two please tell me what is going on?" The ball of yuck is building in my chest again and I don't want it to. Distraction worked the first time. I need it to work again.

"It's a stupid rule, and it shouldn't be an issue. Love is love, regardless of the magic you were born into."

My frustration with the situation is close to bubbling over. If I don't get answers soon, I'm going to explode.

Troy's face turns almost sympathetic. Almost. "Hey, man. I hear you. My pedigree isn't pretty either. Still, that doesn't change the fact that she's the princess of Isluria, born to rule the realm. Ending up with the likes of you isn't how her story should end. You know that and she needs to know too." Troy's words cut through the air along with a puff of smoke.

OceanofPDF.com

"SHUT UP!" My words rattle the 1950's lamps sitting on the end tables on either side of the couch. "Paxton, just tell me whatever it is Troy thinks I need to hear so we can get a move on." I glare at Troy, unexpectedly ticked at him and his nagging interference. His words about killing demons pester at my heart too. Could he slay the demon hounds? Something tells me he could.

"All right. I'll tell you, but first you need a history lesson." Pax leans forward and our eyes lock.

"Oh, please. Let's do that. It isn't like we have someplace else to be," Troy snaps, rolling his eyes.

"Troy." I give him a warning look. "Pax, continue," I say, facing him.

"Thank you." He clears his throat. "There are five kingdoms in the fairy realm of Isluria: Earthies. They are the lowest of the kingdoms since they have earth magic. Airies have air magic. Wateries have—"

"With water magic and the Fireies are born with fire magic," Troy interrupts with the snap of his jaws. "We get it."

"Dude," I crack, annoyed, though it does seem like Pax is stalling.

Troy lets out a ragged breath. "This is killing me," he mutters, standing. He shoves his hands in his pockets and starts to pace.

I ignore him. "What's the fifth?" I ask Pax.

"They're the Hierarch fairies." He glances at Troy as though waiting for him to interrupt again. When the half dragon stays quiet, he continues, "This court is the highest of all fairies because they possess more than one magic."

"Okay." I give him a tentative smile. "How many magics do you have?" I straighten up, wondering if I have more than one magic too.

"Yes, Paxy, do tell." Troy has a book in his hands and flips the pages loudly.

“Two,” he says, then sighs. “I have two magics. Air and earth.”

“Which makes you a Hierarch?” I ask, thinking I understand the basics.

“No, I’m not welcome there because as Troy is alluding to, my parents broke the rules by having me.” He shakes his head.

I’m totally confused again.

Pax goes on. “My father is an air fairy and my mother is a fire fairy. Fairies from different magics aren’t supposed to… um, procreate. Doing so is against the law. Those who break the law are cast out. And in some cases, their disloyalty results in their deaths.”

“My… parents created this law?” I don’t understand what the big deal is. So what if they have different magics. They’re all still fairies. Not like Troy’s parentage. He’s the product of two entirely different species. Half dragon and half human. I shudder at the thought.

Troy rolls his eyes. “Yeah, I know. My ancestry isn’t any better than his, but I’m not after the fairy throne either.” He shakes his head. “Nor am I pretending to be your true love.”

He’s worried about the power struggle of my people. I don’t think it matters. Plus, beyond his willingness to help supernaturals, why does he care so much about the fairy realm? “My parents might think intermagic coupling is serious, but I don’t.” I huff, eying Troy with irritation.

“Great. Super,” Troy says sarcastically. “Neither do I, but your people do. They have for thousands of years. And you can imagine how they will treat a princess who comes in and changes everything.” He raises a brow. “I can promise you, it won’t go over well.”

“Fine.” It’s my turn to roll my eyes. “How are some fairies born with more than one magic, then, if not for intercoupling?” I pause and try to clarify. “How do fairies become Hierarchs?”

“It’s an anomaly. When it happens, those fairies are considered very special, which is why the class became relevant." Pax clears his throat like he wants to say more, but Troy interrupts.

"In the fairy realm, it's imperative you marry one of your own kind." He sets the book back on the shelf with finality.

I blow out my breath. "Surely, you can hear how stupid that sounds."

"It isn't my law." Troy raises his hands in front of him and shakes them. "I'm all for inter-whatever as long as its consensual." He comes over to me and leans in. "By the way, my father wasn't in his dragon form when he and my mom created me. He was in the same form as her." He snorts and steps back. "Just thought I'd clear that up now, before you let your imagination run wild."

"Good to know." My irritation vanishes and I smile at him. Dragon magic must be very powerful.

Troy leans against a wall and winks. "Anyway, that's why I'm so irritated with this guy." He points at Paxton. "Fairy boy knows the laws and he knows that if the two of you are together, you will be cast out or killed." I sense the frustration building in him again. "He can't want that." He looks at Pax. "Please tell me you don't want that."

"I don't. I swear. It isn't like I planned this." Paxton looks away. "I was with someone else—someone who actually loved me as much as I loved her. But Lucretia showed me the truth. I feel it, too." He looks at me. "Don't you?"

I don't know what I feel. Our kisses flash across my mind, heating up my cheeks.

"And now he's kissed you, which between fairies is powerful magic. You're connected on a physical and emotional level." Troy blows out his breath, sending a smoke ring into the air. He kneels in front of me and takes my hands. "It may not seem like a big deal right now, but the truth is the fate of your realm lies in the next several choices you will make."

I'm surprised by his close proximity and the intensity of his words.

I can't deny the strength of emotions between Pax and me. "But I still don't get why you're freaking out. I haven't agreed to be with Paxton. We kissed." I look at Paxton. "I do feel something, but it isn't true love," I say softly.

Troy leans back on his heels, about to say more, but I stop him. "I appreciate what you're trying to do, but you don't know anything about me. I'm not frivolous and while I don't agree with the laws of my realm, I'm not going to break them." At least not until I change them.

Troy growls and stands. "I know more about you than you do!" He slams a fist into his open palm. "Lucretia has coerced Paxton into believing he is your true love—probably even put a spell on him. The sick part is, he thinks that's supposed to mean it's his destiny to kill you." Troy grits his teeth. "Surely you hear how stupid that sounds."

My heart is racing. It hurts to hear his words, but I get it. "It doesn't sound right, that's for sure." But I know about his sister. That's why Paxton is doing this. Right?

"Please listen to me," Troy pleads. "When you die, Lucretia has promised fairy boy he'll be next in line to take over all of the upper kingdom of Isluria and since Lucretia has him under her thumb, that means she'll rule the entire fairy kingdom."

And there it is. The whole reason Troy is freaking out.

Paxton glances up at me, his eyes wide with sadness. "It's true. Everything he said." He stands, his fists clenched at his sides. "But I don't care about the throne and I would rather die than allow Lucretia to rule. The only things I care about are rescuing my sister and saving you. I swear."

"You say that, but it's probably because of the spell." Troy crosses one foot over the other, leaning against the couch. He's seething now. Smoke comes from his nose like the puff of a steam engine. "Here's why I can't believe your lies. I've read the Tome of Fates and I've seen what happens." A wave of pain crosses his features.

My stomach jumps into my throat. He already knows whether I live or die. He knows whether Lucretia rules. Part of me is desperate to make him tell me what happens, but mostly it makes me sick with fear.

“If you’ve read my destiny, then you know I would never betray—”

Before Paxton can finish his sentence, a loud cracking noise, like thunder during a lightning storm, shakes the house, causing books to tumble from the shelves and a family portrait to fall off the wall.

Troy moves to protect me, lifting me out of the way just as a bolt of indigo light strikes the spot where I was sitting. There’s no time to thank him before bolts of blue and green light hit the couch and floor, charring the areas. They smoke and sizzle like fires recently put out.

Paxton is on his feet, his shadow wings beating at his back, a blade in one hand. It looks similar to the one I saw him hold right before he was about to kill me in my dream.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHAT'S HAPPENING?" I shout, not expecting an answer.

"I don't know," Troy says just as the roof vanishes and my aunties fly through, their blue, green, and purple magic trailing behind them. In the same instant, the house is restored like nothing happened. The only telltale sign is the swaying semi-dead potted plant dangling from a macramé plant holder attached to the popcorn ceiling.

My mouth falls open as I take them in. Their dresses and aprons are frayed, the edges singed. Soot covers most of their bodies and their hair is in disarray. But strangest of all are their wings. They're shaped like bees' wings. Fae's are royal, sky, and baby blue, the most prominent color being the royal, same as the dress color she always wears. Vera's are emerald, seafoam, and mint green. While Macey's are violet, amethyst, and periwinkle.

"Aunties." I run to Vera since she's closest and gingerly, so as to avoid touching her wings, pull her into a hug. She smells of ash and her body is freezing. A slight breeze pushes back my hair and I see her wings are beating softly before she closes them. They vanish. "Where have you been? I thought you were taken." I glance at Troy who shrugs like he can't believe they are here either.

Vera hugs me back. "We were, but we escaped." She holds up a hand when I start to ask another question. "We cannot focus on that now."

"Yes, dear. Suffice it to say, Lucretia has no clue who she's dealing with," Fae adds in a huff, coming over to me and resting her head on my shoulder.

"That's right, but never you mind. They will be here for you soon and you must be ready." Macey and Fae hug me tight for the briefest moment.

Before I can respond, all three of them have their wands out and are waving them as they move in a circle around me.

I spin the opposite direction, unable to do anything but watch as dazzling lavender, fern, and blueberry magic encircles me. Like a heavy rain, I am soaked in colorful sparkles. Instead of fictional lightness, the magic lands on my skin with a weightiness I don't understand. Each tiny glint enters my body until I'm sure I'll become a kaleidoscope of colors. "What are you doing?" I finally whisper. Pax and Troy are forgotten. I don't even know that my aunties know they are here. The guys stand in the background, watching without saying a word. Troy's sarcasm is gone, replaced with fierce worry and a hint of wonder. Paxton's expression is blank, as though he's doing all he can to keep his true emotions hidden.

Fae gives me a tired smile, stepping back and tucking her wand into her apron. "We should've known Lucretia would find a way. Despite our best efforts, the woman is relentless and your destiny is set."

"Once we saw your magic had awakened, we knew time was running out," Macey continues, putting her wand away too.

"This spell is our last gift to you, dearest daughter." Tears leak onto Vera's hollow cheeks. The others are crying too.

It sounds like they're saying goodbye. It sounds like they know. "I'm sorry." There's so much more I want to say. I want to tell them how much I love them. How grateful I am for them. That I couldn't have asked for better parents. As I look at each of them, tears dampen my face. In their expressions, I see what I'm feeling reflected back to me. Our time together was a gift. One I will cherish for as long as I live.

"There is nothing to be sorry for." Fae squeezes my hand.

My eyes begin to feel heavy, but I keep them open. In that moment, I also think of Tiana and Merida. "Make sure my friends are okay," I say, though there isn't any reason to. They've already figured out their lives after graduation, though I can't help but worry.

“We will, dear.”

Troy looks like he’s ready to punch something. His skin changes from tan to golden and bronze. I try to thank him. Let him know I appreciate his efforts.

Before my eyes close, Paxton steps forward.

Is it my imagination or do my aunties wilt as he nears them?

“If you possess a single decent bone in your body, you will keep her safe.” I’m not sure which of my aunties says the words. They sound so far away. As though I’m seeing them through a dirty lens.

Paxton wraps an arm around my waist and touches my shoulder. Cinnamon fills the air.

There’s a blur or a wash of colors and we are no longer in my living room, but at the school. Hellgate, my human high school. Lockers line the walls. The bell rings. Students hurry to class. Some ignore the bell and continue talking. “Why are we here?” Of all the places I imagine he would take me, school in the human realm isn’t one of them.

“Can you feel it?” Pax repeats.

“What?” Everything still feels out of focus and far away.

His low voice is in my ear. “Take a deep breath, close your eyes, and use your magic to search the surroundings.”

I do as he says and try to listen. At first, all I hear are the sounds of school. Talking. Shouting. Lockers slamming. The pitter-pat of running feet. After a few moments though, I do hear and sense something. It’s below us. Deep, deep down.

Without knowing how, my magic travels toward it. Through the floor and the concrete. The insulation and the wood. Then it goes even deeper, past the basement and dirt and the writhing worms. Until I see menacing red eyes. Several sets peer from the darkness. There is growling and sharp, pointy teeth attached to squirming bodies in shapes my mind can’t comprehend. One leaps out and I gasp, pulling my magic back.

I focus on Paxton. He looks at me with deep concern. “Can you sense what I’m talking about it?”

“There are dozens of… beasts below the school.” My knees start to shake.

“It’s okay. The demon hounds cannot hurt you. They are protecting the entrance to the fairy realm’s under kingdom.”

My vision clears, but only slightly. I feel like I’m drugged. “We have to go through my high school to get there?” That seems odd, but at this point I should know better than to question any of it. I want to giggle. It’s silly, but I can’t make myself laugh.

“More or less.” There’s a hint of humor as well as nervousness in his voice.

We are suddenly in the basement. There’s a click and the furnace roars to life. Pax releases me and I feel cold, as though his absence leeched away all of my warmth. A haunting light glows in the distance as the ferociousness of the demon hounds seeps into my veins. They are close. “Pax.” I cling to him, though I shouldn’t. Not if what I saw in my dreams is meant to be my fate.

“It’s alright. I’m here.” His arm is around my waist again. “Close your eyes, Aurora. I will keep you safe.”

Despite what I see, I have no choice but to trust him. My eyes shut before I can stop them. My feet leave the ground. There is a pop and a whoosh.

“We’re here,” he says. “Sleep now.” His voice is right next to my ear and I shiver at his closeness just before I drift into unconsciousness.

OceanofPDF.com

AS I COME INTO CONSCIOUSNESS, several things about my surroundings unsettle me. The first is that I can hear Pax and Lucretia talking.

"I have released your sister. You are no longer in debt to me and I promise not to use your family against you again. But you are to obey my instructions to the letter."

"She is my true love," Pax says.

"You think that only because that is what I led you to believe." She cackles lightly. "Though how you believed me, I'll never know. The spell I cast wasn't that strong. It should wear off."

So Troy was right.

"What do you mean?" I hear the bite in Pax's voice.

"You are the son of banished parents. As such, you will never be allowed to marry the only heir to the throne. A pariah and a princess?" She snorts. "Your union will never be. I'm sure even my treacherous sister would agree it would be better the girl die than she marry the likes of you."

"But you said—"

"Quiet, you insolent boy. You have served your purpose. Be grateful I allowed you and your sister to live and that I've given you both places in the Academy. Now away with you." Her words are final.

I sit up in time to meet Pax's eyes. There is pain in them, but defiance as well. He turns and leaves through an open door, slamming it behind him.

Lucretia faces me. She is wearing a red power suit, complete with a ruby red tie. Her hair is up high on top of her head and her wings are settled at her back, so they almost look like a cape. "You are to avoid all meetings with Paxton unless they are professional in nature. Do you understand?" She stares intently, as though she can will me to agree.

"I guess," I say, carefully. The more I witness, the more the dream of her and Paxton together worries me. "I'm here. Ready to attend your Fairy Academy. Are you going to remove the curse and let me live?" I ask the question carefully.

She presses her lips together into a tight line. Pulls out her wand, which is also a rust red in color, and comes toward me. "Hold still."

I think of running, but where I would go? Toe to toe, I see she is taller than me, but she also has on four-inch heels. I guess we are probably close to the same height.

She taps the wand to my forehead, closes her eyes, and speaks some words under her breath.

Various shades of red ooze from her wand and shimmer as they cover me. My insides clench and I forget to breathe, but still get a hint of burnt vanilla. At first, I don't feel any change. That only lasts a moment before Lucretia lifts her wand into the air. Like tearing off dead skin, something dark follows. At once, I am lighter and my magic springs to life in my chest. There's a pop behind me. I glance back and gasp as my wings flutter, lifting me off the ground. "Help," I say, knowing my fear is unwarranted. The feeling of my wings beating is altogether new. I can sense them, sort of. It's like they were always there, and I was feeling them all along. It's just now I can see them too.

Lucretia laughs. This time it's soft and very un-maniacal. Almost friendly, which in some ways is creepier. "I still can't believe you're afraid of heights. And wings, too. Your fear is an unexpected side effect of my curse. But it's gone now." When she speaks, there's a shift in the sound of her voice, like she's lying, but she continues. "Your fears should fade away too. I mean, just look at them." She waves her wand and a mirror appears, giving me unobstructed access to a view of my wings.

I peek at them sideways, nervous about what I'll see.

"They were exquisite when you were a baby, but now?" She shakes her head. "You will be the talk of the school."

My wings are big and bold, like a newly bloomed peony. Outlined in black, the interior is mostly magenta with hints of bubblegum and amethyst. I admire them. They beat like a butterflies wings and my heart lurches. "Can I touch them?"

"Or course you can." She watches me intently, tilting her head in a way that reminds me of myself.

I reach back and gently stroke one of the bottom wings. Softer than kitten fur, I worry I'll rub off the color or tear them, but the wing itself is pliable and strong. When I look at my fingers, I'm relieved there is no dust on them either.

"Now," Lucretia says. "The dirty details."

I cross my arms. It isn't a surprise. "I'm listening."

"Good." She waves her wand. Red magic swirls around me. "Those obnoxious fairies." She grits her teeth before taking a deep breath.

I wonder which fairies she means. My first guess is my aunties.

"Fine. Whatever." She taps her foot. "They think they can play that way, well they have another thing coming."

Now I'm positive she's talking about my aunties and the final spell they cast over me before Paxton brought me here. "I'm guessing I'm in the under kingdom of the fairy realm?" I ask to hopefully distract her from her anger.

"Of course you are." She rings a bell and a bent old man enters. "Is Aurora's room ready?" she asks without looking at him.

"Yes, my liege." He glances at me without lifting his head as he rubs his hands together. "All is ready for the pretty princess."

"And her classes?"

"Her classes, her room, and the other business." He smiles, sticking his tongue through the place where his missing top teeth should be.

“Excellent. And what of the other student?” Her eyes form twin slits and I wonder how she can see.

“He is settled in.”

“That is all, then.” Lucretia waits for the man to hobble out. She turns to me and smiles, though it’s anything but joyful. Wicked is the word that comes to mind. “You are to start school tomorrow. Your uniforms, class schedule, and a map of the academy are all in your room.” As she speaks, she walks around the room, straightening a throw pillow or adjusting the placement of an item. As though she’s sharing information about the weather.

The room is an enormous office and so much more. There’s a shiny black desk on one side. Behind it are black bookshelves. Hosts of books are stored there. They look old and give off an eerie vibe. On the other side of the desk sit two chairs. They look to be covered in red and white leather. On the other side is a living area set up in a square with two couches, two coffee tables, end tables, a love seat and two oversized chairs. The color scheme everywhere is red, black, and white. Even the chandeliers above the desk and in the middle of the living room are black. The light shining from them is a peculiar color. Every once in a while, I see what I think are shadows fluttering around them, though they very well could be moths.

“What will I be learning?” A nervous twitter flits through my stomach as my wings shoot me forward into one of the coffee tables. My shin cracks against it and I suck in a breath at the pain.

She rolls her eyes. “How to use your wings, how to use your magic as well as how to fight.”

“Why would I need to know how to fight?” I don’t like the sound of that.

“It is always better to know how to fight and never use it then to be in a predicament and have no way of defending yourself.” Her smile widens. “Ask your aunties. I’m sure they would agree with me.”

She smacks her wand against her hand. A zing of red magic shoots from it. “The brownie will take you to your room. I’ve left you some food. Eat well and be ready to leave your room by eight in the morning. Not a moment later.”

“Very well.” I carefully step around the coffee tables and head to the door.

“And, Aurora?”

“Yes.” Not for the first time, it dawns on me Lucretia is my actual aunt, unlike Fae, Vera, and Macey. She and I share the same blood. Yet unlike with my aunties I only feel nervous contempt for the woman in front of me.

“Remember what I said. Stay away from Paxton. I know what he told you, but it’s a lie. He wants nothing more than to have you. Understand?”

I force a swallow to hide my shudder. “Of course.” She’s the queen of lies. Why would I ever believe her? Still, I can pretend for as long as I need to.

“Off you go, then.” She waves her wand and the door opens on its own.

I can’t leave yet. I still have one more question. “The curse has been lifted. So I won’t be stabbed through the heart and die on my eighteenth birthday, right?”

She studies me a moment, considering my words. “If you die, it will not be because of my curse.”

“How long do I have to stay?” I know it shouldn’t matter, but it does. Because I miss my friends already.

The question surprises her. “This is your home now. You will remain for as long as is required,” she snaps. “Now go. I no longer want you in my presence.”

Talk about vague.

OceanofPDF.com

THE fiRST THING I teach myself after leaving Lucretia and shutting myself in my room is how to make my wings go away. I practice several times until the act is as easy as breathing. Paxton and Lucretia both said my fears would vanish when my wings returned. They weren't wrong. I'm not afraid any longer, but I'm not thrilled with them either.

I think about that as I check out my room and get ready for bed.

Surprisingly, sleep comes easily in this realm. In a way, the room reminds me of my room in the human realm. There's a bed, chest of drawers, closet, table and chair for homework, lamps, and an area rug. Off my bedroom is an en suite bathroom, complete with all the necessary items, including makeup and hair care products.

Though all the furniture looks relatively normal, it feels slightly off. For instance, everything is black. Black bed frame. Black chest of drawers, bathroom sink, and toilet. Even the area rug partially under my bed is black. Fine. I get I'm in the under kingdom. Seems like overkill, but whatever.

When I touch the items, I get a surprise. Because they all feel the same. For instance the bathroom sink. It looks porcelain and I expect it to be sleek and smooth. When I touch the bowl, it is smooth, but instead of cool and glass-like, it feels warm and rubbery… almost like it's alive. It's slightly unnerving.

After handling necessities in the bathroom, I dress in my new uniform. A pleated skirt, white shirt with slits for my wings, though I don't bring them out, and a hot pink sweater. I'm surprised by how normal my clothes are, like something a human kid would wear, aside from the slits in the backs of them for my wings. My socks are white, and I pull them up to my knees. The black boots, while they look normal, feel the same as my bedroom furniture. Rubber stretched thin.

When I finish doing up the last button on my sweater, someone knocks on the door. “Coming.” I glance over at the desk wondering again why there aren’t any books or paper or writing utensils, or something. Shrugging, I open the door.

The girl in front of me is obviously a student. She’s dressed the same as me, except for her sweater. It’s purple and she has orange wings, though not just any orange, but sunrise, amber, and ginger. She’s taller than me, with brown skin, black hair and candlelight yellow eyes. “Ready, your Highness?” she asks, looking me over and sniffing.

“Yep.” I close my door. “But it’s just Rory.”

“Sure, whatever, Rory.” She says my name like it’s a bad word.

I sigh internally. “What’s your name?”

“Samantha.” She takes off like there’s a fire and she needs to get away from it. Actually, it’s me she doesn’t want to be near, but I jog to catch up.

“Do you go by Sam?” I ask lightly, hoping if I show her how nice I am, she’ll warm up.

“With my friends.”

Got it. We aren’t friends.

The hall we walk is covered in black—black walls, black floor, black ceiling. It’s like I’m traversing through a shadow. Thankfully there are lights next to each door, illuminating our way. I notice there are no light switches. Makes me wonder how they work.

“Where are we going?” Seems like a logical question. Up ahead I hear the sounds of talking and laughing, and my stomach flip flops with nervousness.

“To pick up the stuff you need for classes.” She rolls her eyes as we enter the main common area. Dozens of students are there, loitering, chatting, and flying around. It’s like a kaleidoscope of colors. And wings! The ceiling goes on and on and doesn’t seem to have an end.

It's dizzying and I have to close my eyes a moment to adjust.

When I open them again, a sliver of fear sluices through my stomach. There are so many fairies. Samantha is already farther ahead, but I can't move. "Samantha, I—" My breathing starts coming in ragged gasps.

Samantha looks over her shoulder, sees me and comes back. "Knock it off." She grabs one of my arms and forces me forward. Thankfully, she keeps to the edges of the room. I hug the wall, wishing I was anywhere else. "What's your problem?" she hisses. "Stop acting like a fool. You're embarrassing me."

"Okay," I eke out, wondering how my legs are working. It doesn't feel like I'm moving. When I look down, I notice I'm not walking, but flying. I gasp in surprise, as an uncontrollable urge to run away overpowers me. Before I know it, I pull away from her grasp and head toward the closest escape.

It's not an exit, but a closet where brooms and other oddities are stashed. But no one else is inside so I dive in. I think about my wings disappearing, and trip over a broom handle on the way down. I bend over and take several deep breaths. The air is different in the under kingdom. Thicker. Full of moisture.

"Aurora?"

It's Pax. I gulp down my relief but don't respond. We're supposed to stay away from each other.

The door cracks open and he pokes his head through. Then he comes all the way inside, closing the door behind him. "The uniform looks good."

"You think?" I'm self-conscious as I search his cobalt blue eyes for a tell, a sign to convince me he's serious. Because I feel like a dork. I swore I would never attend a school where a uniform was involved. Yet here I am. Ready to start my first day at an academy for fairies. It's too much. "You look nice too," I say. It's weird to see him in clothes that aren't his usual black. I shift from one leg to the other. At the movement, my newly returned wings appear and flutter and I hover a foot off the ground without meaning too. As soon as I understand what I'm doing, my wings close and I drop, falling into him.

He catches me and wraps his arms around my waist. A light scent of spice fills the air as he whips his hair out of his eyes.

I should pull away. Tell him to leave me alone. Now that I'm here, I'm to have nothing to do with him. It's part of the deal. "What do you want?" My breath catches in my throat. He's gorgeous, like painfully so, but it's more than that. I feel more alive at his touch and I find myself relaxing into him.

"You," he says, his voice warm and dark as melted chocolate.

"But we can't," I begin, and search his face for a hint that he's kidding. "Lucretia made us promise to stay away from each other."

He gives me a mischievous smile. "A secret romance. Clandestine encounters. Stolen kisses. You know you want to." He tightens his grip on me. Our lips are so close, I can smell the cinnamon on his breath, practically feel the pressure of his lips on mine.

"No," I lie, my voice shaky. Because I do, without a doubt, want to, but I don't want to get kicked out of the academy. Not on my first day. There's so much about myself I don't know.

"Right." He loosens his grip and his fingers caress my waist where my top has come untucked from my skirt. Electric heat races along my skin at his touch. "Meet me in the garden shed at midnight." He turns and opens the door. Then looks back, his eyes meeting mine. A force stronger than reason exists between us. Dangerous or not, I'll be there.

I nod.

His smile says it all. I'm his and he knows it. "I'll see you later." He exits the closet and it's like he took part of me with him.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER SEVERAL MINUTES, I roll my shoulders back and step out. The fairies nearest me snicker, but I don't care. Samantha is talking with a group of friends a ways off. I want to believe it isn't about me, but who am I kidding? Of course she is. I cross my arms and head her direction, accidently bumping into someone.

"Sorry," I say, keeping my gaze on Samantha. She's close enough to hear and looks up just as I run into someone.

"Watch it." He turns, a mild glare on his features until he really sees me. "Rory." He smiles.

"Uh, hi." I'm surprised he knows my nickname. Though strangely, he does look familiar. His wings are several shades of gold and bronze and his eyes are a deep golden color with flecks of bronze along the edges. His hair is blond and longish, though here most of the guys have hair longer than his. He whips his bangs out of his eyes. "Troy?" I squint, trying to figure out how it's possible. He's a dragon, not a fairy.

"You know the new guy?" Samantha asks, coming over, her disdain softening slightly.

"I-uh think so." I step closer to him. "It is you, right?"

Troy winks. "Surprise." He glares back at his wings a moment.

I can't help but smile since I know how he feels about fairies. Having him here is so great though and I immediately relax. "How?"

He leans in. "I have my ways." His cheek touches mine briefly. "Plus, I couldn't let you come down here alone."

"Thank you," I say, and mean it.

He stands straighter. It's then I notice the flock of fairies surrounding us. Like bees to honey, they are drawn to him.

I smile. If they only knew how he feels about them. "Seems you've already made friends."

He clears his throat. "I suppose."

"Well introduce me then, Rory," Samantha says, pushing in front of me so she and Troy are face to face. "I'm Sam." Her voice has taken on a sultry tone.

"Troy." He looks around her at me. "It's so good of you to befriend Rory. She's such a great fairy."

"How do you know her?" Sam asks, glancing over her shoulder at me.

"We went to the same high school together in the human realm." He shrugs like it's no big deal.

I cover my mouth, thinking we only went to school together there for one day. But sure, we go way back.

"You're so lucky," Sam said, turning so she can talk to Troy and me.

"Yeah." I don't know what else he's said about us, so I keep quiet.

"It's funny though because I didn't even know she was a fairy until a couple of days ago. It was all a big secret." He shrugs. "When she said she was coming here, I had to come too. The human realm is so boring anyway." He pats her on the shoulder as the group behind him surrounds us. "Everyone, this is Rory. Rory, this is everyone," he says.

A long chime sounds, like that of an old bell, though it isn't loud.

"We better get to class," one of the girls says, taking Troy by the arm. Her wings are various shades of green, though not as pretty as Auntie Vera's.

At the thought of her, a pang of sadness pushes against my heart. I cross my arms.

Troy shrugs. "See you later." Then he pats the girl's hand, causing her wings to flutter as they walk away.

"Come on, Rory, let's get your schedule." Sam walks me over to a room that looks a lot like a small store. At the counter, she speaks with the white-haired fairy with cotton candy wings.

“This is Aurora.” Sam pauses and lowers her voice. “The king and queen of the upper kingdom’s daughter.

“Oh, good gladiolas.” The woman behind the counter pushes her half-moon glasses up onto her nose and studies me. “Bless my soul, you’re the exact image of your mother.”

“I am?” My pulse quickens.

She blinks several times. “Well, of course you are.”

Before I can respond, she turns away and shuffles through some papers. “Let me see. Ah, yes. Here it is.” She produces what looks like a dried flower petal about the size of a sticky note. It’s hot pink in color with black writing on it. “You have Magic 101, Wand Wielding, Potions, Combat Training and Introduction to Flying.” She glances at me and titters. “I’m afraid you’ll be the oldest in your flying class.” Then her brows furrow. “Oh, actually not. You’ll be taking the class after school in the rose garden. It says your teacher is Master Narcissus.” She glances at me over her glasses. “I didn’t realize that boy was teaching.” She presses her lips together. “Good luck with that.”

“Thanks?” I want to ask her who this Master Narcissus is, but she continues before I have the chance.

“Sam, you’ll help her collect what she needs and get her to her first class?”

“Yes, Mum.”

“Very good.” The fairy, whose name plaque says Madame Begonia, hands my class schedule and the list of needed books and items over to Samantha. “Welcome to the Fairy Academy, your Highness.” She curtsies.

“It’s Rory,” I say and smile, but the woman doesn’t return it. Instead she turns away, busying herself.

“Come on, Rory.”

I follow Sam around the counter.

From the common room, the store appears as nothing more than a small classroom. Once inside, I expect our excursion would be quick, but as we go up and down the aisles collecting items, it's easy to see the store is deceptively large.

When we're nearly finished, my arms are full of books, papers, and vials filled with liquids, including unicorn tears. Plus writing utensils that sort of look like pencils, except they're black and have the same texture as the book covers and my bedroom furniture.

"One last thing," Sam says, and picks out a black bag similar in look and size to a backpack, only I think it's more like a satchel.

"You're going to fit all of this in there?" I don't believe it.

"Look, Rory, I get that you're new, but if we're going to be friends, then you've got to stop saying idiotic things." She pulls her wand from her sweater pocket. It's a burnt orange color. Without saying a word, she waves her wand, taps the items in my arms one by one in my arms then the few she's holding. As she does, they shrink in size and disappear inside my bag. "See."

"Cool." My pulse flutters. "But when I need something, what do I do?" I peek inside the bag and retrieve a book. As soon as it's no longer within the confines of the satchel, it grows back to its original size. "Oh, okay." Samantha must've used a spell. I appreciate her willingness to help, even if she is a bit begrudging.

"Then when you want to put something back, you simply place it in the bag, and the item will automatically shrink down so it fits."

"Really cool!" I can't help smiling.

"Sure." Sam tucks her wand back into her pocket.

"Do I get a wand?"

"Of course you do. We're heading there next."

We say goodbye to Madame Begonia and leave, crossing the common room, which is mostly empty, and enter another store.

Inside, it’s pitch black.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHERE'S THE LIGHTS?"

"No light in here." The man's voice is directly in front of me and I jump.

"Then how?" I ask, my bottom lip trembling.

"Close your eyes, child."

I do as he says, grateful Sam is nearby.

"Now, think about your magic. That pushing and pulling you feel inside your chest." His voice is deep and raspy and reminds me of what a talking cheetah might sound like. "Concentrate!"

"Okay." I heave a deep breath and turn my thoughts inward. My magic is waiting there, like my favorite pet, and seems to swirl with joy when I notice it. Along the edges is a darkness that hovers nearby as though it's waiting for something. I try to gather it in with the rest of my magic, but it won't come.

"Very good," the voice says.

Though he's still super close, I am no longer afraid. My magic swirls around in various shades of magenta, amethyst, and orchid. The same color as my wings. In my mind, I watch my magic come together and form a wand. It's mostly magenta, but the other colors swirl within until it appears to be solid. As I watch the wand form, I suddenly feel it in my hands.

"Impressive," he says. "It took the new boy several tries before his wand was created."

I know he's talking about Troy and I smile. "Thank you."

He grumbles and I feel him move away. "You're done," he snaps. "Now get!"

I yelp as I turn back toward the door, which has a small window in the top of it, allowing a little light in. "Thank you," I say at the door, looking back.

With the tiny bit of light, I see the outline of the creature I was speaking to. It's squat, almost like a giant pile of mud, dressed in mustard pants and a rust colored shirt. He has no hair to speak of—at least none visible. A few feet away, he stops and looks back. Yellow eyes like those of a pit viper study me and I think he's trying to imagine me as dinner. Finally, he smiles, showing off his pointy yellow teeth. "You see me." I can tell he's surprised. "Only those about to die see the Wand Caller." He laughs. It's high and guttural at the same time. Like fingernails on a chalk board.

I open the door and hurry out, slamming it behind me. It's then I remember Sam is still in there, but before I can go back for her, I see she's actually sitting at a black table, drumming her fingers on its surface.

"Finally." She stands and focuses on my wand. "Better tuck that away."

I don't ask her why, but sense there's something wrong with mine. Which doesn't surprise me. It all feels wrong. "What was that thing?" I ask as we start back across the common room.

"The Wand Caller. He's an invisible being, which is kind of freaky, right?" She starts across the common room again.

"He looks like a pile of mud in clothes," I say, hoping we'll bond over making fun of the creature.

She gasps. "You saw him?"

I nod, throwing the satchel strap over my shoulder. "That's bad, isn't it?" I reach out and touch the wall. Just as I suspected, it has the same texture as everything else. Everything here is so weird.

"It definitely isn't good." Sam shrugs and keeps going. I rush to catch up.

"What's all this stuff made of?" I ask when I reach her. "It's everywhere."

She looks down at the bag I'm holding and wrinkles her nose. "I don't know if you're ready to know." She turns a corner and disappears.

I hurry to catch up as a sick feeling washes over me. I know I'm in the under kingdom and that this is the place where fairy dark magic is taught. I saw the demons guarding the entrance when Paxton took me through the basement of Hellgate High. This isn't an enchanted place filled with rainbows and fluffy bunnies. It's the opposite. Maybe Sam is right. Maybe I'm not ready. Even as I think it, I have to know. "Tell me," I say, touching her arm. "I need to know."

She pulls from my grasp and crosses her arms. "Everything you see, everything you use, from that bag to your bed to the desks in the classrooms, consists in some way of the demons that make their home down here."

I immediately take my hand from where it rests on my bag. "What do you mean?"

She shakes her head. "Fairies who are cast out of the upper kingdom are sent down here. Those sentenced to live down here tend to wither and become different kinds of demons rather quickly."

I look around at the hallway.

"Yep, it's all made of demon dust. Skin. Sinews. It's better than having their bodies just piling up." She shrugs like she's telling me the menu at a restaurant.

"That's disgusting."

She makes a face. "That's life in the under kingdom. Get used to it."

I don't think I can touch anything ever again. "And the lights?" I ask, though I'm worried about what they will be. The souls of the damned? I hope not.

"Pixies," she says matter-of-factly.

"Living creatures?" I ask to verify.

She looks down at me. “Yes, Rory. Pixies are alive and it’s their job to keep the academy lit up. Otherwise we would have to dwell in complete darkness and I’m sure you wouldn’t like that.” She stops at a doorway, so I’m unable to respond. Not that I have anything good to say about the situation. I’m beyond grossed out. Walking on, sleeping on, writing on, and constantly touching demon dust. Fairy dust, basically.

I glance inside the room and see it’s filled with students. The teacher flutters back and forth across the front. Her wings are various shades of violet and she’s wearing a matching robe.

“Are you in this class?” I ask, swallowing.

“Of course not.” Sam doesn’t give me more but walks inside and says something to the teacher.

“Thank you, Samantha. Close the door on your way out.” The teacher watches, her lilac eyes like a weight on my shoulders.

When the door is closed, her kind, wrinkled face becomes hard. I know from my class schedule her name is Madame Carnation. “Have a seat there, your Highness.” As she speaks, a desk and chair are conjured out of thin air and drop against the same wall as the door, near the front of the class. “As princess of all of the fairy realm, it’s best you sit where you can see all of your subjects.” She clucks her tongue and turns. “Don’t you think students?”

They all laugh and holler.

My magic churns darkly. I hadn’t planned to be friends with everyone, but I hoped to make a friend or two. The way the class reacts, it doesn’t seem likely. Lifting my chin, I walk over to the desk, wishing I didn’t know what it was made of and wondering whether the demons were killed the instant the teacher used her magic to create the desk and chair. At the thought I shudder, dropping my bag to the floor beside me. Just before I sit, I catch sight of Troy. He winks and I feel immediately better.

OceanofPDF.com

"Now, before we were interrupted, we were discussing the distinctions between the magics." She taps her wand. "As I was saying, black represents which magic?"

Several students raise their hands. They are much younger than I am.

"Mr. Henry," the teacher calls.

"Black represents the Hierarchs," Troy says.

"Correct. And what is the reason?"

"Because those fairies were born with more than one magic."

"Precisely."

Over the course of the class, Madame Carnation talks about how the color blue represents water fairies. Green is for earth fairies. Purple is for air. And red is for fire fairies. As I listen, I check out the students. Their sweaters reveal what kind of fairy they are. Troy's sweater is black. No one's sweater is hot pink. There again I've been singled out. It's embarrassing. No doubt Lucretia did it to make me uncomfortable. She said I could attend. She didn't say she would make it easy on me.

I also find my mind wandering. Troy said his father wasn't in dragon form when Troy was created, but he didn't specifically say he was in human form either. Is Troy half fairy and half dragon? It would explain so much. Like why he's so adamant he help me. I decide to ask him when we get a moment alone.

"Your Highness, has our class bored you already?" Madame Carnation asks sarcastically.

My face gets hot. "No, mum."

"Well good." She turns to the rest of the class. "Thanks to your future queen, there will be a five-page essay on why the different classes matter."

A long chime sounds just as several of the students groan.

"You are excused." Madame Carnation flashes me a glare before returning to her seat.

I wait until most of the class is gone. Troy is with a couple of fawning female fairies. They are whispering.

He is kind and flirty as they make their way up the aisle.

I quickly gather my things and drape my satchel over my shoulder. Then walk out of the class and wait.

A girl whose wings are various shades of red stomps over. "I hear you're already making trouble."

I blink several times. "What? No."

She puts her hands on her hips. "So you aren't the reason my little sister has a five-page paper due tomorrow?"

"Oh, that." I press against the wall. It seems to caress and hold me to it. At the feeling, I quickly jump forward and accidently smack the girl in the face. "Sorry," I say, but it's too late.

The girl has a fiery ball of magic dancing in her hand and is about to throw it at me. Blood dribbles from her nose. "You'll pay for that, princess or not." She cocks back her arm.

Before she can throw it at me, Troy appears and jumps in front of me. "Hey, it's Millicent, right?"

"Maleficent," she corrects, but I see her features softening.

"Got it. Listen, Maleficent, as a favor to me, can you please not kill my friend? She isn't from around here and doesn't know the rules or how to behave." He glances over his shoulder, giving me a sad look. "She's like a child when it comes to our ways."

"She hit me," Maleficent says, her ruby, rust, and orange-red wings beating violently.

I move around Troy. "I'm really sorry. I didn't mean to."

"Bull." The fire in her palm grows.

Troy caresses her arm. “Mal, hey.”

I hear his voice change. It’s low and soft.

“Will you have lunch with me?”

Her face changes. No longer furious but excited. One of her friends gives her something to wipe her nose. She quickly handles the blood. Then smiles. “Sure. I’ll save you a seat.”

“Sweet.” He leans in and whispers something in her ear.

She giggles. I sense the danger is gone. Maleficent flips her hair, giving me the stink eye before walking away.

“Seriously, Rory.” Troy faces me. “You won’t last the day if you keep this up.”

I shake my head, looking at my hands. “I know, but I swear it was an accident.”

“Uh-huh.” He takes me by the elbow. “We better stick together the rest of the day.”

“Except at lunch. You have a date.”

A flirty smile lifts his lips. “Right.”

“Are you taking Wand Wielding for Beginners next?” I ask, after checking my schedule.

He peers over my shoulder. “It looks like we are in all of the same classes, except flying.” His brows crunch together. “Master Narcissus is lucky to have you in his class.”

“Yeah, sure.” I bump into him and remember my question. “So which magics did you convince the Fairy Academy you possess?”

He notices I’m eyeing his black sweater. There aren’t very many Hierarchs in wandering the halls. “All of them,” he says.

“You said you have all four and they believed you?” I’m still confused about how he convinced them he was a fairy, let alone a Hierarch.”

“Well, no. I had to prove it, but that wasn’t hard.” He pulls on my sweater. “Hot pink is the color of the king and queen. Lucretia really isn’t going to let you blend in, is she?”

I shake my head. “I guess not.”

“Since they haven’t already, I’m sure later today you’ll be called into the office and asked to reveal your magic. Maybe once they see which magics you possess, they’ll change your sweater color?” He doesn’t sound convinced and I can’t blame him.

His words don’t ease my mind. I don’t know how to show my magic. Even as I think about it, my magic stirs as though telling me it won’t let me down. I sigh and steel myself as we enter Wand Wielding.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER WAND WIELDING and Potions is lunch. Troy walks me to the cafeteria but doesn't stick around. He intends to keep his promise to Maleficent and I don't blame him. The fire fairy is intimidating, to say the least.

As soon as she sees him though, her fierce posture relaxes and she smiles, immediately softening. I watch Maleficent go from Xena: Warrior Princess to Strawberry Shortcake in a matter of seconds.

I get my lunch, which is a big salad filled with all kinds of interesting looking vegetables with a side of equally interesting looking fruit. Once I'm through the line, I spot Sam, but there isn't a spot available near her, so I go to a small, empty table and sit by myself.

"Mind if we join you, princess." A guy with short, curly black hair slides into the seat across from me as two other fairies sit on either side of him.

He's tall and muscled, like he pumps iron every second he isn't at school. His eyes are a deep brown as is his skin. The other two fairies are female. The plump one sports green streaks in her straight black hair. The other's hair is dirty blond and cropped short. She's the epitome of what I imagined fairies looked like before I found out I was one.

Mid bite, I pause, concerned I'm going to have another fight on my hands. But the guy smiles and it seems genuine. From their sweaters, I know they are earth fairies. Their wings are various shades of greens and browns as are their eyes.

"Of course," I say, sticking the salad still on my fork in my mouth and chewing. It's good. Refreshing. Unlike anything I've tried, but my taste buds are happy none the less.

"I'm Thrun. This is Flora and Holly." He points to the girls and they smile.

“Nice to meet you. My name is Rory.” I stab a piece of fruit and gingerly put it in my mouth.

“I thought it was Aurora,” Holly says, eyeing me anxiously before biting into her roll.

The fruit tastes like a cross between a banana and a grape. It’s good though and I stab another of the same kind. “It is, but I go by Rory,” I say after I swallow.

“Oh.” She looks at the others. “Why don’t you have your wings out?”

I shrug and decide to be honest. “I’m still getting used to them.”

She looks away and takes a drink.

“How are you liking your first day?” Flora asks, clearing her throat. She picks out a vegetable from her salad and sticks it in her mouth.

“It’s better now,” I say and mean it. “Thank you for sitting with me.”

“We had to,” Holly says, and then her eyes get big. “I mean, we wanted to.”

It’s obviously a lie and uneasiness fills my stomach. “Why did you have to sit with me?” I don’t care that I’m putting them on the spot or that the atmosphere around us has turned awkward. I want to know the truth.

Thrun, grunts. “We didn’t have to, but Master Narcissus asked that we make sure you have company.” He glares at Holly. “That’s all she meant.”

“What, like for extra credit?” I’m no longer hungry and push away my food. Tears form behind my eyes and I feel like crying. I miss my friends and my aunties. I even miss Carson and Kelly. Sort of. At least with them I knew what to expect and how to act. Here, I’m completely lost.

But I have to be strong. I said yes to coming to this school and as tough as it is, at least my curse is lifted. At least I won't die when I turn eighteen. I'm committed. I blink several times and force myself to live in the moment.

The three of them are eyeing each other as though unsure whether to tell me the truth. It isn't my wish to make them uncomfortable. "You don't have to answer that, but I promise I won't bite." I look at Holly. "And if you don't want to be here, then leave. I'll tell the teacher you did your part." I pull my tray back over and take a bite like I'm all good. The food in my mouth is a combination of pineapple and cherry flavors. "I certainly don't want to ruin your lunch," I add before taking another bite.

Flora shakes her head. "I'm happy to stay. Everyone says you're awful, but I think you're nice. Nicer, probably, than anyone else here."

"This is the Fairy Academy for the under kingdom. Were here to learn dark magic so we can defeat the upper kingdom. Nice doesn't really apply." Holly crosses her arms, giving Flora an irritated scowl.

"Wait. What?" My pretend ease is suddenly gone.

Holly's face turns red. "Nothing, your Highness."

"Hey, it's fine. You can tell me." I place my hands in my lap and grip them tightly together, forcing myself to remain calm. "I'm in the under kingdom too, so I'm one hundred and ten percent in support of all that's going on down here." Inside I'm freaking out. Is this why these students are here? Have they chosen to go against the upper kingdom and my parents? To fight them? That's what it sounds like.

"Right," Thrun says, shoving a piece of what looks like meat into his mouth. My stomach rolls because I'm almost positive that meat is from the demons. "See, she's fine. She's one of us. Right, Rory?"

I force myself to smile. "Definitely."

During the rest of lunch, I learn that Thrun, Flora, and Holly are on their final year at the academy before they graduate and are obliged to serve in the under kingdom army for three years as payment for their schooling.

When the bell chimes, I throw away my lunch and head to combat training. A changing room is off the indoor/outdoor gymnasium. Madame Colin assigns me a locker and shows me where it's located before leaving me to change. The lockers are similar in size to those in Hellgate high, but these don't have combinations or a place to put a lock. Inside are clothes. They smell clean and are folded precisely. After hanging my bag on the hook, I change into black shorts that feel like a second skin when on. I take several deep breaths and convince myself that it isn't because they are actually made of demon skin. Then I put on a hot pink shirt. It has the Fairy Academy crest on the chest, same as the sweaters.

Sitting on a bench, I tug on white socks and white shoes. They're different from tennis shoes. These grip my feet like a glove.

Dressed, I fiddle with my satchel while waiting for the water fairy next to me to be done. She closes her locker and glances at me before saying, "Eoni." She smirks and takes off.

"Eoni?" I whisper the word, hoping it's a spell to lock the locker. It sounds weird on my lips, but nothing happens. The bell chimes, telling me I should be in class. With a sigh, I follow the girl out of the changing room and onto the field.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN TROY SEES ME, he smiles and jogs over. He's holding a long stick in each hand and gives me one. "Hey, I got you a staff."

"Thanks," I say, moving so my legs are hips width apart, same as the rest of the students.

The rest of the students spread out and are waiting. For me, I'm guessing, and my face gets hot.

Madame Colin is hovering off the ground a few inches, her shades-of-blue wings beating rhythmically behind her. Wearing tight all-black pants and a long-sleeved shirt, they look like the same material as my shorts. Her white hair is twisted on top of her head. "Now that everyone is here, let's begin with warmups."

We spend ten minutes warming up before Madame Colin breaks us into groups of two. Troy and I are paired together.

"I want you to run through the moves we learned yesterday. Each person will take a turn playing the assailant and the defender. You may begin."

Immediately, the sound of staff striking staff and grunts can be heard.

Troy and I look at each other.

"Should we tell her we weren't here yesterday?" he whispers, eyeing the others.

"Probably." I face him as I watch the groups on either side of us.

Troy's hands move while he watches them run through the sequence once. "Seems pretty simple. Pops… I mean, my Dad taught me something similar." He lowers his stance and smacks my staff lightly before he twists and smacks it again in another spot, barely missing my fingers.

"Careful."

He grins. Spins and strikes. Does another move and attacks. The whole time his wings beat and flutter as though to music I can't hear.

I continue to stand there, unsure what else to do except watch him. "See," he says, when he's finished.

"Very nice, Master Henry." Madame Colin made her way over to our group and is standing just a few feet away.

It's then I notice the rest of the class stopped to watch him as well. I clear my throat and look at my shoes.

"Now it's your turn to play the assailant, your Highness," the teacher says with only a hint of sarcasm in her voice.

"I-uh," I glance at Troy for help, but he isn't sure what to do either. "I wasn't here yesterday," I finally say.

"Well neither was Master Henry but look at him." She pats Troy on the arm, admiring him openly before tearing her eyes away so they can rest on me. "He obviously did the homework and even improved it, I dare say." She lifts her chin and looks down on me.

"I'm sorry, Madame." I fold my hands together.

"That'll be fifty demerits." She snaps her fingers and though I can't see what she's done, I'm aware I've just lost fifty. "Master Henry, will you please help the defunct princess?"

He works to keep his face serious. "Of course, Madame."

"Very good." She lifts a seductive brow. "Come see me after class. There's something I'd like to discuss with you."

"Sure."

When she's gone, he comes over to me. "I have to admit I'm a little nervous about what that something is. You saw the way she ogled me, right?"

I giggled lightly. "Yeah. Either they don't have the same teacher/student policies, or she doesn't care."

"Good thing she's hot," he says, tapping my staff with his.

I shake my head. "Seriously, is that all you see? It doesn't matter that she's way older than you?"

"Not even. She looks amazing and in case you didn't know, fairies live a really long time. In the scheme of things, she's probably still considered a teen." He wiggles his brows.

"Whatever floats your boat, lover boy." I step back, retreating from our little bubble. Troy's charisma can be a bit overwhelming. Not sure if it's the heat from the dragon in him or what?

He shows me the different positions and moves until the bell chimes. "See you at dinner," he says and heads over to Madame Colin.

"Yep, thanks for your help." In the changing room, I debate whether or not to change. I still have flying lessons with Master Narcissus, but I want to get my bag. Relief rushes through me when I see it's still there.

The girl beside me whose name is Strata pulls on her boots and looks over at me. She's the same girl I tried to copy before class. She said "Eoni", which I thought was for a spell, but it didn't work for me. "The spell didn't work because you don't have the same magic I do."

"That makes sense," I say with a light laugh. "Thanks."

"Sure." She takes her bag and starts to leave.

"Hey, can you tell me how to get to the rose garden?" I ask, only half expecting her to help as I catch up with her.

"This way." She waves me on as she starts out of the changing room and down the hall. We cross the entire academy. At least it feels that way.

When she turns down a hall without any lights, I start to worry. "Are you positive this is the way?" I ask, hesitant to follow her.

"Don't be a pansy." She gives me an innocent look. "Would I steer you wrong?"

"I don't know," I admit truthfully, planting my feet.

She crosses her arms then turns to leave. "The rose garden is through that door. Go or don't go. It doesn't matter to me."

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN STRATA IS GONE, I debate what to do. I decide to ask someone else, just to verify, but each time I try, I get ignored like I'm invisible. Taking a deep breath, I carefully walk down the hall and pull open the door. Immediately the stench of swamp hits my face. "Master Narcissus?" There's a flicker of light a ways down the cobbled path. Without going in, I can tell this isn't the rose garden. Unless this is the under kingdom's version. I take a tentative step inside, just past the doorway, and the door slams shut behind me.

"No!" I search for a handle to get out, but there isn't one. "Help!" I pound on the door, working to keep myself from freaking out. "Strata," I yell."

"You smell delectable." The voice is oily and low, each syllable ringing in my ears like he's right beside me.

I spin in a circle, unable to see anything. "Hello?" My teeth chatter.

"I'm right here," a voice says in my other ear. This time it sounds female.

"I-I can't see you," I say, opening my satchel and searching for my wand. I don't know what I'll do with it, but at least it's a weapon. Except I can't find it.

When I look up, there's the form of a man in front of me. "Yummy." He's shirtless and stark white. And when he opens his mouth, I can see pointy teeth. Then, before my eyes, he shifts into a woman with long red hair covered in daisies. Her lips are blood red. "Come closer, dear. Let me have a look at you."

"No thank you." I take off running. Anywhere is better than here. I pass into trees with low hanging branches. The tiny leaves brush against my hair and face. I bend lower as I hurry forward, but each step grows more and more difficult. A quick look up reveals the branches are like fingers. They cling to me, wrapping around my neck and chest.

Squeezing.

Squeezing.

I can't breathe.

Stars dot my vision.

The shirtless man is in front of me. He leans in and sniffs. "The hidden princess." A shudder runs through his body and suddenly he's the red-headed woman. "We aren't supposed to touch you but she will understand." A clawed finger runs down my cheek and to my bottom lip. I want to cry out but I am still struggling for breath. She pushes in, piercing my lip so it bleeds. "The poison will do its work quickly," she says. Then she lifts her finger to her lips. A forked tongue slithers out for a taste.

At once, her features become furious. She cries out and shrinks away as the branches strangling me slacken slightly. "What is it? It hurts." She spits, putting her face in her hands.

I take a quick breath and then another. My arms are pinned to my sides, but I move from side to side, working myself loose while keeping my focus on her. Or it. Every second or two, it shifts from male to female, cycling back and forth between the first two figures and then to other faces and bodies. Some of them don't look like fairies at all.

When I'm free, I start to run back the way I came, hoping there might be another door. But after several long seconds, the landscape changes. In the distance is a castle. At once, I recognize it as the one from my dream. "No," I whisper and run to the right until I'm under the cover of trees once again.

The scent of death and decay is heavy. I have to breathe through my mouth so I won't gag. But that's bad too. Every few seconds at least one bug flies into my mouth and I have to spit it out. The ground shifts and I slide forward into thick water, falling to my knees.

My face goes under briefly, but I quickly pull myself out and gasp. In that moment, I know my life is over. There's no escaping this place. I wonder why it's in an academy, but this is the under kingdom. Why not?

Tears of frustration run down my cheeks as I stumble through the water. I think I turn back, but feel the water getting deeper.

An eerie song slowly reaches my ears. Like smoke from a fire, it floats over until I'm enveloped.

The bog's Agog. Agog. Agog.

Your flesh a feast. A feast. A feast.

Suckle on your bones. Your bones. Your bones.

A tasty treat. A treat. A treat.

The chanting is all around, as though the swamp itself is serenading me. A whole choir singing what sounds like a nursery rhyme, though the words are terrifying. Inside I'm screaming. With all my might, I try to stop, to turn around, but my body continues to move deeper until it's up to my chest in the murky water.

The bog's Agog. Agog. Agog.

Must snack on your toes. Your toes. Your toes.

Extract the meat. The meat. The meat.

Delicious and sweet. And sweet. And sweet.

The water is up to my neck and smells like rotting fish. It laps against my chin and some gets in my mouth. I press my lips together, turning them in, wishing I could cry, but I don't have control over my body.

"Aurora!"

My name comes from far away and I'm not sure who it is. "I'm here." I say the words calmly and wonder if this is what lobsters feel like as they're boiled alive. Terrified, but unable to save themselves. Makes me want to stop eating meat. At that, I laugh. The sound hits my ears and I'm surprised.

“I’m coming. Hang on.” In the distance, I see a shadow. It sails on the air, getting closer and closer and I don’t know whether it’s nefarious or benevolent. Not that it matters, because I’m about to die.

The water covers my mouth and I hold my breath.

It passes my nose. My eyes.

I’m underwater, but I keep my eyes open, thinking it is better to see death when it comes. My murderer is close. Waiting for just the right moment.

A face appears in the distance. Pointy ears. Red eyes with long lashes. It seems young and old at once. Chilling and brutal.

Death is coming and it looks like the scariest mermaid creature ever imagined. It reaches out, it’s long, white claws so close…

In that same moment, two strong hands yank me from my watery grave. As my feet break the surface of the water, it grabs hold. I look down in time to see the creature. It isn’t a mermaid but is half elvish and half alligator, though the skin is pasty white and silver. The weird feeling it had over me evaporates and I kick at it, pulling my legs away. It crashes down into the water and vanishes within the muddy depths.

“Hold on, Aurora.”

“Pax?” I say, knowing it’s him by the sound of his voice.

“That’s right. It’s me.” His arms turn me to face him while we’re still flying.

Though whatever the thing did to poison me still weighs on my limbs, I force myself to see him. I need to make sure. “It is you.” Relief echoes through my body as I try to wrap my legs around his hips, but I don’t have the strength and sigh, dangling like helpless a rag doll. All I can do is stare at his face. Watch the furious determination in the line of his lips and the angle of his brow. His dark hair whips around his head.

After a few more minutes, he comes to a stop and lands so our bodies are flush. He crushes me against his chest, holding me tightly. “I thought I lost you.” His voice is heavy with emotions.

I bury my head in his neck and cry, unable to be strong a second longer.

“Shhhh, it’s okay. I’m going to get you out of here.”

There’s a strange sound behind me before Paxton picks me up. I wrap my arms around his neck, hoping that’ll stop my shaking, but it doesn’t.

Moments later we are out of that horrible place and inside a bedroom.

It’s masculine with a heady, spicy scent. “Is this yours?” I ask quietly.

“Yes.” he says, smiling seriously as he sets me down.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHAT WAS THAT PLACE?" I ask through chattering teeth, crossing my arms.

He leads me into the bathroom. It's similar to mine, only much more masculine. "That's the Olclag," he says as he turns on the shower. "Can you take care of yourself or do you need help?"

I'm still shaken, but there's no way he's helping me. "I can do it," I say, gritting my teeth to make them stop.

He snorts. "I figured. Let me get you some clothes." He leaves and I hear drawers open before he's back with a pair of shorts and a white shirt. "Here." He goes to hand them over, then looks at me and shudders. "Better yet, I'll just put them here and you can touch them once you're cleaned up."

"Thanks," I respond, giving him a once over. He's been holding me and has some of the Olclag on him too. "What does Olclag mean?" I slide off my shoes, feeling bad when some of the muddiness gets on his pristine white floor.

"Sorry," I say. "Do you have something you don't mind throwing away that I can use to clean up when I'm done in here?"

He looks up at the ceiling, debating. "Hang on."

The room is starting to get steamy and I'm anxious to get the gunk off. When he comes back, he's holding a ratty looking cloth. "Use this," he says, tossing it on the floor.

"Great. Thank you."

He nods and goes to close the door but pauses. "Olclag is fairy for wicked."

Before I can respond, the door shuts. I strip and throw the disgusting clothing into his waste bin. There's no way I'm ever wearing it again. As I shower, I think about what Pax said. Of course fairies have their own language, but I hadn't noticed anyone using it. When fairies speak to me, they sound like they're speaking English and apparently when I speak to them, it must sound like fairy because they understand me. I'll ask Pax about it when I'm finished.

I climb out of the shower, feeling wholly better. After dressing, I use the cloth to clean up any remnants of the Olclag before tossing it into the trash as well. Wiping the steam off the mirror, I study my reflection. I look paler than usual and long for the sun. With a sigh, I run my fingers through my long hair and twist it into a knot on top of my head before opening the door.

Pax is standing there in solid black, his shadow wings gone. It looks like he cleaned up some other way. Probably magic, I guess.

"Hey," I say, crossing my arms. He saved my life and I'm beyond grateful, but I don't want to give Lucretia an excuse to return my curse.

"You seem better." He gives me a once over and my face heats.

"I am." It's not a total lie. "So why does a place like the Olclag exist?"

He snorts. "We're in the under kingdom, Aurora. Most of us learn quickly where is safe and where isn't." He clenches his jaws in frustration. "Why did you go in there?"

"I asked for help to find the rose garden because I was supposed to meet Master Narcissus for my Intro to Flying lesson, and that's where she led me." It's my turn to be frustrated. "I only went in there because she told me that's where it was, but, apparently, she wanted to kill me." I shake my head as I speak, unable to get a grasp on that truth. She sent me in there to die. I don't doubt that for a second. In the human realm, I dealt with plenty of bullies, including Kelly. Here it's different. Worse. A place like the Olclag is right inside the school.

"Who was it? Tell me her name and I'll be sure to punish her." Fury changes his features and for a moment he looks older than high school age.

I could tell him her name, but I don't want him to get in trouble either. "It doesn't matter." I cross over to his dresser. On top is a book. It smells old. As I lift it and turn it over, Pax is suddenly there, his body pressing against mine. At his nearness, my body heats. The scent of spice lures me in and I want nothing more than to kiss him.

"You don't want to touch this," he says, his voice hoarse with emotion.

"Okay." I turn and look into his eyes. He's watching me. A burst of cinnamon fills the air, and I know he wants to kiss me too. He said he was my true love. In that moment, I don't doubt it. Whether it's because he saved me from certain death or something else, I don't care. "Pax," I whisper, placing my hands on his shoulders.

Confusion fills his eyes before he clears his throat. "Aurora." He puts me at arm's length and I immediately miss his nearness.

"How did you know where to find me?" I ask, watching the different emotions change his features.

"You were supposed to meet me for class. When you didn't show, I asked Samantha where you might be. She said she saw a student walking you across the academy in the direction of the Olclag. When I couldn't find you nearby, I knew I needed to check in there." He blows out a breath in frustration and rubs the back of his neck. "The student who led you there is in serious trouble. What was her name?"

I have no loyalty to the girl, but for some reason I don't tell him. I protect her. "I don't remember."

"Fine," he growls.

Something else he said hits me. "Wait, you're in my flying class too?"

"Yes, Aurora. I'm Master Narcissus."

"Wait, you're the teacher?" I'm confused. Why would Lucretia tell me to stay away from Paxton and then have me take a class from him? Unless—

“What? You don’t think I can show you how to use your wings?”

“It’s not that.” I swallow. “I’m just surprised. I mean, I thought we were the same age.”

“Not quite,” he admits, a wry smile splayed on his lips.

For some reason, the fact that he’s my teacher makes him even hotter. “But you think we’re still meant to be together?”

He glances down at his black shoes. “Look, Aurora.” The tone of voice I heard when he spoke to Lucretia is back. “I know what I know. And I want you.” As he speaks, he’s suddenly in my bubble, his arms on my waist. His hunger for me is so strong I can feel it. “Do you care that I’m older?”

“No,” I say, my eyes on his lips. “It doesn’t matter at all.”

“Good.” His mouth is so close to mine.

“Pax,” I whisper, my lips brushing his. No one will know…

“Master Narcissus, did you find her?” someone shouts from the other side of the door as she knocks loudly.

I jerk away from him nervously.

“Stay quiet.” He puts a finger to his mouth and goes to the door. Clears his throat. “Not yet.” He cracks his door open. “I’m sure she’ll turn up,” he adds. “Thank you, Samantha. Have a good night.”

“Mind if I come in?” Sam asks, her voice sultry. “I want to talk to you about that new move you showed us yesterday in class. The one where we dip—”

“Not tonight.” He closes the door.

I watch him, seeing him like it’s the first time. Using his wings, he flies over to me and scoops me into his arms.

I gasp, clinging to him breathlessly.

“Let’s get out of here.” He pulls his wand from his back pocket. Turns it in a circle. Then he steps into the swirling colors.

Moments later, we’re in a garden. He releases me and I grab my head. “Where are we?”

“The rose garden.” He tucks his wand into his back pocket and flies backward, extending his hands. “This is where we were supposed to meet. If anyone asks, you got lost but finally found your way here,” he says.

“What about the girl who led me to the Olclag? She can tell a different story.” I purse my lips into a straight line at the memory of what I went through.

He taps the side of his nose and points. “Remember her name yet?”

“No.”

“Fine.” He shakes his head. “She tried to have you killed. I don’t think she’ll be blabbing because despite the fact that we’re in the under kingdom, killing a fellow student is against the rules.”

“I guess you’re right,” I say, thinking about flying. My wings pop out. Without a second thought I’m in the air.

“Impressive,” Pax says, watching me. “Flying is second nature to you, I see.”

“Is it?” At the thought, I feel myself falter and touch down again.

“Come on, let me show you around the Under Kingdom.” He whips his head in the direction behind him.

“Sure, but first, let me get my bearings.” I search behind him and the sky, checking out the scenery. We are outside, but everything is different. Darker. The sky is not quite black, but a dark gray. There are stars twinkling above, but they aren’t the same color as the stars in the human realm. Instead they are red, like rubies with light behind them, causing them to sparkle and shine. There isn’t a sun or moon, at least not that I can see. “Are we really beneath the fairy realm? Like underground?”

“Basically,” he says, looking up.

“Are we in, like, a cave?” I’m confused, which is obvious.

“No. The under kingdom is a shadow image of the upper kingdom. Everything you see down here has an exact equivalent above.” He spins around and I do the same. Behind me is a tall building, black in color and enormous. All around us are rose bushes. They are also black, but with hints of their original color. I bend to smell one of them. They're sweet, almost overly so. Yet they are still beautiful in a creepy way. "It's still beautiful. Come on. I want to show you."

"But what if someone sees us?" My heart flutters into my throat. Tomorrow is my eighteenth birthday. According to the curse, that is the day I will die. Even though I'm away from my friends and my aunties, I'm grateful that won't happen. Unless someone sends me into another Olclag.

"I'm your teacher. It'll be fine." He waves me up.

"Right." I flutter my wings and am flying beside him instantly.

Pax grins. "Seriously, you're a natural."

OceanofPDF.com

WE SPEND the next hour exploring the under kingdom. Paxton is right. Though it consists fully of darkness and shade, the landscape is still beautiful in a peculiar, almost eerie sort of way. Parts of it even feel familiar.

The scenery leading away from the building is filled with roses. Farther on is a stream and beyond that is the forest. Colorful fairies in all different sizes stand out against the dreary backdrop.

At the town, Pax waves to a group of people.

They seem happy to see him. Until they notice me, and their faces turn hostile. Pax doesn't notice or doesn't care.

"Want to get something to eat?"

We're flying through a market, and the air is filled with amazing scents. All of them fresh. It's a wonder they can grow produce down here, but the lack of sunlight doesn't seem to hinder the production. "Sure."

He lands in front of a fruit and vegetable cart.

A sweet elderly fairy is restocking some fruit that looks like a cross between a mango and a strawberry. When she sees Paxton, she smiles. It's bright and jovial. "Hello, Paxy. It's been a while. I thought the queen finally killed you." It's obvious she's teasing. Sadly, she has no idea how close to the truth she is.

"Paxy," I whisper.

He makes a noise that says to never call him that before landing and going to the woman. She puts out her hand and he takes it, kissing the back sweetly. "It's good to see you again, Neneth."

"And you, my boy. Where have you—"

When I land, she stops talking and studies me. "The princess of the upper kingdom, I presume." She glares at me.

“Hi.” I wave nervously.

She turns her scowl to Paxton. “Why did you bring her here?” Her kindness is gone, replaced by a wrath I don’t understand. It’s the same with the students at school. I’m beginning to understand that everyone knows who I am, and no one likes me. Quite the opposite. They despise me.

“Neneth, she is a guest of the queen’s and a friend of mine.” He chides her gently, pressing her hand to his cheek. “Be kind. You have the best stangos in the marketplace. I want Aurora to try one.”

At his compliment, Neneth softens. “Very well.” She selects a round fruit, shines it with her apron, and hands it to me. “Here you go, dear.”

I take it, admiring her wings of various shades of orange. “Thank you,” I say bringing it to my nose. The scent is sweet, like pineapple and strawberry combined. Carefully, I take a bite. It’s as good as it smells. Better even. The flavors dance on my tongue. “So good.” I smile and swallow.

She bows lightly and I can tell it’s taking a good deal of effort to keep from snapping at me. “Here you go, Paxy.”

He takes a huge bite and melts. “Excellent.”

She titters behind her apron. “You’re just saying that.”

“You know I’m not,” he says as another woman, this one much younger, comes over. His face pales at the sight of her. “Verbena.” He says her name like someone is strangling him. “I thought you returned to the upper kingdom.”

She makes a face, then gives him a look from under her lashes. “I came back.”

The woman is exquisite. She and Paxton could be siblings. Her hair is dark like his and her eyes are nearly the same color, though hers have a bit of lavender. Her wings are dark as well, though there’s a hint of violet within the veins. She’s wearing a purple skirt and a white shirt with a white apron over it. Her hair hangs long and full, in twin curly tales with a violet streak in each. Her red lips are deep as blood.

I glance at Paxton, wondering what will happen next. It's obvious he has feelings for this woman. And then I remember the conversation where he mentioned he was in love with a woman who loved him back. That woman is Verbena. Without a doubt.

"Hi, I'm Aurora," I say, surprised by the twinge of jealousy striking against my heart.

"Of course you are." She smiles and it's sweet like the fruit I'd just sampled. Almost overly so. She's trying too hard, I think. Did he tell her I was his true love? Awkward.

"Verbena and I go way back," Paxton says, his eyes still on the striking fairy.

"It's true. We do." She starts to reorganize the fruit but glances up at him every once in a while. Such a simple act, but on her it looks positively sensual. "Remember that time we got caught out in the rain and had to take shelter inside a calum tree?" Even her voice is sexy. "That was one of the best nights of my life." She bats her thick, dark lashes as she studies him coyly.

Paxton chuckles and shoves his hands in his pockets. Glances at me and clears his throat. "It was a good night," he says, and I know it was much more than good. He clears his throat again and takes my arm. "We should get back." With effort, he pulls his eyes from Verbena and looks to Neneth. "Thank you for sharing your fruit with us. It was great to see you both again." He takes something from his pocket and presses it into Neneth's hand.

She gasps when she sees it. "That is too much, my boy. Way too much."

The elderly fairy tries to return it, but he shakes his head, holding up a hand. "Keep it." He gives me a sideways glance before focusing once more on Verbena. I think he's going to say something more to her, but he just nods his head.

“I’m staying at the Tortid, if you need some company later on,” she says as he turns us away.

He waves before lifting off the ground.

As I give over to the wind under my wings, I look back the way we came and am shocked when I see the Academy. It looks exactly like Hellgate High. “Is the fairy realm part of the human realm?” I ask the question softly, afraid of the answer.

“Not necessarily. More like the human realm is a glove that sits over the fairy realm. It’s why humans have seen fairies for thousands of years. Sometimes it’s too easy to cross between realms.” He drops low and picks a flower while continuing to fly. Then he hands it back to me, his face soft, though I see a hint of sadness.

I appreciate his answer but am not satisfied. “And that’s why the Fairy Academy looks like my high school?”

“Correct.” He shrugs, waiting for me to catch up with him.

“That isn’t an answer,” I say, wanting more. “But thank you for the flower.” It looks like a carnation, its coloring gray with golden sparkles along the edges.

He doesn’t elaborate further and I’m frustrated.

“Tomorrow is your birthday,” he says, changing the subject.

I’m surprised he knows, but I shouldn’t be. It’s important to know the day you’re meant to kill someone, I think. A shiver hits my body, causing me to tumble mid-flight. “Yep,” I say when I recover. “The big one-eight.”

“I thought you could skip school and I could take you to the upper kingdom.” He glances at me and smiles.

My heart literally stops. “We can do that?”

“Why not?” But I sense we would be breaking the rules.

I think about Lucretia and the curse, but only briefly. “We can see my parents?” Seeing them is the only reason I want to go.

His eyes become twin slits as he studies me a moment. “If that is your desire."

An excited jolt shoots through my veins and I twirl in midair. "I'd like that. A lot."

He chuckles. "Then it's settled."

I want to hug him, but we're close to the school now and fairies are out and about once again. He lands at the edge of the rose garden.

With little effort, I land beside him.

"You're a natural," he says. "Not that I ever doubted you." His lips curl into a grin, but I sense his mind is elsewhere.

"Pax." I touch his arm gently.

He faces me. "What is it?"

"If you still love Verbena, then you should be with her." I say the words, but my heart clenches. If I'm honest, I don't mean it. I want him. But I don't love him. My feelings for Pax are purely physical at this point. And I can't be selfish. At least one of us should get to be happy.

He shakes his head once. "I'm sorry you witnessed our interaction. What we had was special, but it wasn't real."

I tilt my head, wondering why he's lying. "It felt pretty real to me. The tension between you two was intense."

"Can we not talk about her? She's part of my past." He strides to the entrance of the school and pulls open the door.

"Whatever you say." I go in after him, but I know I'll never be able to fully let myself go with Pax until he opens up to me and is honest.

At the end of the short hallway, he pauses. "Pay attention. This is where we'll meet after breakfast."

He starts forward, but I stop him. "Wait," I say.

He crosses his arms, shutting down. "I don't want to talk about Verbena."

"That's too bad but it isn't what I wanted to ask." I lay my other hand on his arm and search his face.

“Lucretia has no control over me,” he adds. It’s possible the words are more for himself than me.

“What’s on the other side of the school?” I watch him, waiting to see him calm down since I changed the subject. But he doesn’t relax. If anything, he becomes more closed off.

“Nothing exciting,” he says and shrugs.

The thought hits my brain and comes out of my mouth before I can censor it. “Is that where the military trains?” Instantly, I know I’m right.

He can’t hide the truth from his face fast enough. “Who told you about that?”

It’s my turn to shrug.

“Like I said, it’s nothing exciting. Once a student graduates, there are two options. One of them is to join the queen’s army.” His expression becomes serious as he turns left and hurries down the hall. He’s Master Narcissus and no longer Paxton as we enter the common area. He scolds two students fighting and catches a ball one of the students throws his way, then pitches it back before we head down another hallway and turn, then turn again. And again. And again.

I’m completely lost. “I’ll never remember this,” I admit. It doesn’t help that everything looks the same. There are no telltale markings or signs to help with directions. Makes me wonder how everyone else finds their way. Am I just too dumb to figure it out?

We arrive at my door. Not that I can tell. It could be anyone’s for all I know.

“Yeah, the school is a bit repetitive.” Pax glances both ways down the hall, checking to see that we’re alone.

“That’s an understatement.”

“I know,” he says, brushing some hair out of my eyes. “Let me show you how the students figure out where they’re going.”

Relief washes through me. I knew there had to be something.

“Kay.”

“Close your eyes.”

His fingers work their way over my eyes, so I have to close them. My skin tingles at his touch and I clench my fists to keep from shuddering.

“Can you sense your magic?” he asks, his breath soft against my skin.

“Yes. It’s like it’s in a box of unopened happiness, dying to get out.” The description sounds a little off, but it’s the best I can do.

“Good. Now concentrate your magic and open your eyes.”

When I do, I’m immediately breathless as my gaze darts between his black hair with the streak in it and his magnificent lips… “Okay.”

He leans in like he’s going to kiss me, and opens his mouth. “Take out your wand.”

I shake my head and he lifts a brow in question. “It’s still in your room with my bag.”

The magical feeling between us is broken.

“Right.” He rubs the back of his neck. “Let’s try it anyway. The wand is just a way to focus your magic. I’ve seen—” he chuckles, “—and felt the force of your magic without a wand. You can do this.”

“I’ll try.” I purse my lips, hoping he’s right.

“Spells are based on the type of magic you possess. It’s like each group has their own language.” He pauses.

I take the opportunity to interrupt. “You know what kinds of magic I have?”

“I have a feeling,” he begins slowly, “you have all of them.”

“You think?” I haven’t learned enough to know whether he’s right or not. “Earlier today I tried to copy a spell and the girl told me it didn’t work because I don’t have her magic.”

“Makes perfect sense. If you have all fairy magics combined, then your spells and the words needed to access them will be different.” He studies me a moment.

“I don’t like that.”

“Well,” he shrugs. “Say these words.” He clears his throat. “Faeneth arenti webet entriti as you hold your door handle.”

I glance down and grab hold. Then, with Pax’s help, I repeat the words. As I speak them, the magic in my chest erupts and spills over, filling my veins. Like cool water, it emboldens and vitalizes. I close my eyes and witness the colors of my magic—the same colors as my wings—swirl through and drift out of my fingers.

When it touches the door, my magic sparks, then shoots off down the hall. I open my eyes and watch it zing to the end of the hall and disappear. “It’s like magical breadcrumbs,” I whisper.

Pax nods. “That’s a great way to put it.” He claps softly. “Congratulations. I knew you had it in you.”

“Thanks,” I say, though I can still feel the magic working. My guess is it’s taking me to each of my classes as well as the rose garden. Gratitude fills my soul and I breathe deeply through my nose. This is me. I have magic, and the fairy realm is the right place for me. When it’s done, there’s another spark and then my magic quiets, though it’s still buzzing. I smile, feeling slightly nervous, wishing he would kiss me. “I did it,” I say, bouncing on the tips of my toes. For a moment, I lose my balance, but before I fall into Pax, my wings correct me and I’m fine.

He takes my hand, shaking it. “It was a pleasure working with you today, princess.”

“I appreciate your help,” I say as a student walks by. She looks at the two of us and snickers. It’s doubtful she bought our teacher and student act. “You have two magics, right?”

He nods, but looks away.

“Then how do you know the spells for mine?” Seems a perfectly good question.

“It’s my job to know,” he says evasively and sighs. “Night, Aurora.”

“Night.” I watch until he turns the corner at the end of my hall. It’s then I realize I can see shadows of other magics. The memory of it, at least. Interesting. I head inside my room. After closing the door, I lean against it and sigh.

OceanofPDF.com

I CAN'T SLEEP. I try for hours. As I lie in bed, the drip-dripping sound of the faucet keeps me up. The noise keeps me a little distracted from my anxieties. When the clock strikes midnight, I hold my breath, not sure what to expect.

The dream of Pax killing me comes to mind. I push that aside and think about kissing him. That warms my body and I close my eyes, trying to float into oblivions sleep, but a soft knock on the door startles me. I check the time. It's only ten minutes after twelve.

I pull the covers over my head, hoping they will go away.

The knocking sounds again, a little louder.

My heart beats inside my ears, making it difficult to think let alone breathe.

"Rory."

"Troy?" I whisper back, kicking the covers off my legs and going to the door. "What do you want?"

"It's urgent. I need you to come with me."

I crack the door open a smidge. He's wearing clothing similar to Paxton's. All black. His wings are out, and his eyes have shifted slightly to that of his dragon form. "Are you lost?" I ask, trying to be sarcastic, but it comes out sounding breathy and silly.

He gives me a confused look. "No. It's…" He pauses and blows out his breath, sending a puff of smoke with it. "I promised your aunties I would stay with you on your birthday. That's today, right?" He watches me, a little worried. "Did I get the date wrong?"

"Today's the day," I say simply, dropping my hands to my sides. I should be thrilled. I'm officially an adult. I can vote and do other adulting things. My friends were excited when they turned eighteen. Sadly, I'm no longer like them. "Yay," I say with little feeling.

“Yay is right,” he replies, and means it. “Get dressed. There’s something I want to show you.” He eyes my plain shorts and tank top.

“Fine. Come in.” I open the door even further. “I can’t sleep anyway.”

“I get it. Not sure whether it’s because we’re underground or all the flying fairies, but my skin is constantly crawling.” He closes the door and scopes out my room.

“Dragon issues?” I open my chest of drawers and pull out a pair of pants. They’re slick and I try not to think about the fact that they’re probably made of fairy demon skin or ash or both.

“Exactly.” He snorts and his skin changes to golden-bronze scales briefly before it switches back.

“How is it Lucretia let you in? She must know you’re a dragon.” For a second I stare at him in awe. He’s a dragon—at least partially so. That’s the coolest thing ever.

“Like I said before, dragon magic is very powerful.”

I roll my eyes. “Yeah, I’ve heard that once or twice.” I retrieve a black tee shirt and shut the drawer. I’ll never tell him I think he’s cool. That would be just too embarrassing. “Pax is taking me to the upper kingdom later today. It’s his birthday present to me.” I say, disappearing into my bathroom. With the door closed, I get out of my pajamas.

“Really?” That’s all Troy says, but I hear a whole novel of emotions in his voice.

Why do I get the feeling Troy doesn’t want me to go up there? After putting on my clothes and shoving my hair into a high ponytail, I come out of the bathroom and put on black shoes and socks. “You don’t think it’s a good idea?”

“It’s complicated,” he says, turning away. “Plus…” He glances at me over his shoulder. “I didn’t think anyone could get to the upper kingdom from here. Not even Lucretia.” He shrugs, his features softening. “But enough of that. Happy birthday, Rory,” he says, switching gears as he holds out his arms for a hug.

“Thanks,” I say, stepping into his warmth, grateful for his friendship. It’s weird how easy he is to get along with and be around, even when he’s obnoxious. “Think we can sneak out of here?” I ask.

“Uh, yeah. I snuck in, didn’t I?” He puts his hands on his hips while I grab a jacket.

It isn’t really cold down here, but I want the extra comfort. “Alright, then lead the way, dragon fairy.”

He glares at the nickname.

“What?” I whisper as we tiptoe down the hall.

He puts his fingers to his lips and locks them as voices filter toward us.

I nod, pressing against the wall, trying to ignore the way it nestles against me, and watch as a two male fairies wearing dark gray uniforms pass, their measured steps in sync. They’re speaking quietly, but I catch some of it.

“Last I heard, she somehow escaped the Olclag. That place is brutal. My best friend’s cousin died in there.”

Are they talking about me?

“Probably didn’t escape but was rescued. You know Master Narcissus has a thing for her.”

My cheeks warm as they continue on, saying words I can’t understand. Troy tilts his head and I wonder if he can still hear them. But I don’t ask as he waves me forward. I creep behind him until he turns in the direction of the guards. We stick to the shadows, keeping a good distance between us and them. I can still hear their quiet whispers, though I can’t understand what they’re saying.

Finally, they exit the Academy, the door clicking shut behind them.

“Why are we following them?” I ask, my voice a barely audible hiss.

“Because you need to see what’s happening in the under kingdom. It isn’t a good place. There’s an uprising coming, and you need to ask yourself if you are with the under kingdom or against them?” He jogs toward the door, opening it without a sound and peeking out.

I stand in place, stunned by his words. Until this very moment, I would’ve vehemently concluded I was against the under kingdom. Why wouldn’t I be? The fairies are horrible. One of them tried to kill me. The place is horrible, too. Plus, no one even likes me. The only good thing about the academy is Paxton. And he’s a teacher.

“Come on,” Troy says, waving at me before disappearing beyond the door. I quickly run forward and slip through, allowing the door to snap shut behind me. Troy is standing in front of me, so I can’t see past him, but someone is speaking into what sounds like a microphone. The voice echoes through the air, crackling with magic.

“What’s going on?” I move around him so I can see.

At first, it’s hard to comprehend what I’m looking at. I asked Paxton earlier today if this side of the Academy was where the military trains, and I was right. But it’s more than that. There are rows and rows of fairies. All of them dressed in varying shades of gray uniforms. Their gazes are on Lucretia as she speaks from atop a black stage like she is everything.

“Paxton,” I whisper, when I see him sitting in a chair to the left of Lucretia. He’s there as well as others, including some teachers I recognize. But that’s not even the worst of it. In front of Lucretia, on the ground, are three fairies. They are bound and gagged, but wriggle about, trying to escape. I turn to Troy, who’s looking at me.

“I didn’t know about this. I swear.” His eyes are fearful, but angry too.

“Who are they?” I ask, regarding them more closely.

Lucretia speaks again. “These three rebels have been against me from the beginning. Captured by the great Master Narcissus, these are three of the Royal Guard.”

In unison, the crowd stomps a foot and shouts, “Death!”

“It was his cunning that brought them to us.” She looks back at Paxton. “His courageous bravery.”

I follow her gaze. Paxton’s face is a mask of empty emotion. That she’s speaking to him shatters my heart.

“Rory,” Troy says, but I don’t look away. “We should go. I can get my dad and he can bring Snow White. She’s queen over all the realms. She can put an end to this.” He touches my shoulder, but I shrug him off.

“I’m not going anywhere.” There is something familiar about the captives. Each is wearing a dress with an apron. A blue one. A green one. And a purple one. “Aunties,” I whisper as a ferocious anger fills my chest and snakes out to my limbs. It hits a barrier. Something like a protective coating covers my body. My anger bangs against it over and over, fighting to escape.

Lucretia steps forward and a long blade appears in her hand among a small red cloud of magic. “Death is too easy a punishment.” Her feet kick against Vera and she whispers some words. When she’s done, she speaks louder. “May your deaths be torturous and your pain endless.”

The group of army fairies repeat the words back as one.

I want to cry out and beg her to stop, but the furious power of my magic has other plans. Not only can I feel it, but I can see it now too. Burning and shifting colors. Changing from magenta, bubblegum and amethyst to pure, liquid darkness. With the change comes an influence I can’t describe nor control. I become unbeatable, and the influence shatters the protection around me, breaking free and consuming me until I become the magic.

“Let’s go back,” Troy says, pulling on my arm. “Please.”

I hear the desperation in his voice, but it just angers me further. “Over my dead body,” I respond, shoving at him until he steps back.

It’s like I’m moving in a dream. Each step is purposeful, bringing me closer to my destiny, though I don't know why or how. When the group of fairies nearest Lucretia sees me, they rush forward. I raise my hand and with a thought, I send the entire group crashing into the guards behind them. They fall like dominoes.

A dangerous glee fills my chest.

A part of myself wants to stop and isn't sure about this course of action, but the majority doesn't listen or care.

The teachers stand at the sight of me. Fear distorts their faces. They have their wands at the ready. There's no doubt they have the magic within them to end me. All it would take is one word from Lucretia. But she shakes her head, motioning them to hold back. "Do nothing," she says. "No matter what. That is an order."

Their wands lower. Some even return to their seats though they're clearly uncomfortable with the decision.

Lucretia continues, "This is between Aurora and me." She smiles, but all I see is evil.

"You will not harm them," I say. My voice doesn't sound like my own.

"Aurora, no," Paxton says, taking a step toward me. "This is what she wants. You're playing right into her plan. This is the curse." He takes another step forward.

"Liar!" With the flick of my finger, I send him flying back. He smacks into the chair, knocking it over as he tumbles out of sight.

OceanofPDF.com

FROM BEHIND ME, I hear Troy beg me not to do anything I'll regret, but he has the good sense to stay back. I ignore him and focus on my aunties. They look afraid, but not of Lucretia. "You fear me," I say, knowing it's true. "I won't hurt you." My voice sounds so strange, not like my own.

"It doesn't matter what Lucretia does to us, dear," Macey says. "It's you we're worried about."

"She's right," Vera adds. "That's why we put the spell on you. We wanted to protect you from yourself."

"Please, Rory, you need to calm down. It's going to be okay."

I'm only a few feet from my aunties and Lucretia. She still has the wicked knife aimed at Vera's chest and my aunties' words mean nothing. "No. Not until Lucretia is destroyed." My magic thrashes against my bones and sinews, encouraging me onward.

"That's it, Aurora," Lucretia says, and I turn my full attention to her. "You want to annihilate me, don't you?" She nods, licking her lips. Almost like she's anticipating the moment and wants it.

That little part of my brain sounds an alarm, but my magic is too powerful and beyond control.

"Take my life, Aurora." Lucretia offers me the knife.

More warning bells are going off deep in my mind, but my magic moans hungrily for Lucretia's demise, and I take the blade from her. Wrapping both hands around the hilt, it sighs in my grip and changes to fit more easily against my fingers. "You will never hurt anyone I love, ever again." As I speak the words, I lift the blade over my head.

Lucretia seems to shrink in front of me. At the sight, my magic roars louder, demanding I finish her. "This is for my mom and dad," I say. "This is for Paxton, and my aunties, and for me." All the heartache I've held inside over the years. Pain at wondering why my parents abandoned me. Fear that I'll end up alone. That I'm not good enough or worth it. All of that combines with my magic, turning it into something new, something sinister.

"Don't," I hear Paxton plead. When did he return?

But my path is set. Lucretia will be destroyed. And I'll be the one to do it. At the thought, the blade lowers swiftly and sinks into Lucretia's chest. I feel her flesh and bone part as the blade cuts through to her heart.

Her eyes widen and she lets out a breath before falling to her knees and to the ground, yanking the knife from my hands. She clasps her fingers around the hilt of the blade as her eyes roll back in her head. It's like I'm watching from a distance.

I look at my hands. They are covered in Lucretia's blood, but that isn't what shakes me from my raging fury. It's the shadowy magic swirling hungrily around them. Around me.

As the realization of what I've done fills me, I start to tremble.

In the distance, I hear a strange sound and look over at the army of fairies.

They are on their knees, their heads touching the ground. They lift their heads and put one fisted arm in the air. "All hail Queen Aurora."

They're talking about me, I think, confused.

I glance over at Troy. Devastation pinches his face. Disappointment too. I turn to see Paxton. He's in shock, as are the rest of the teachers.

My aunties are quiet. I'm almost afraid to look at them.

When I finally do, I see they're wrecked. Tears leak from Fae's eyes. Even Vera looks ready to cry.

But I don't understand. I saved them. I saved us all.

Lucretia is dead. Even as I think the words, a cloud of red magic swirls around her body and whips her away like a miniature tornado, leaving only the blade behind.

“I won,” I say, surprised it’s over. Happy birthday to me. “I won,” I say again, louder. I want to jump for joy, but everyone else seems so gloomy. I pick up the blade.

“You didn’t win, dear,” Macey whispers. Her lips quiver.

I use the bloodied knife to release my aunties from their restraints before holding out a hand to help them stand. As soon as they’re up, they move away from me, like I’m the monster.

Their dread hurts and I’m unsure what to do. “I won,” I repeat for the third time, thinking the words should mean more, but they sound hollow.

“It’s okay, Rory. You’re okay,” Fae says, and carefully wraps an arm around my waist.

“We’ll figure this out,” Vera adds.

For the briefest moment, I allow myself to be coddled, grateful for them. But before I give in fully, my intense magic is back. “I’m not going anywhere,” I say, pushing away from them. “I belong in the fairy realm and I’m going to stay and attend the Fairy Academy.” As I speak, my magic rolls off me and toward my aunties like a thundercloud.

They clutch at one another as I picture in my mind the desire to send them home. At once they are gone, but I know they’re safe. I’ve only sent them back to the human realm. Away from me.

“They don’t understand,” I whisper. How could they? They aren’t my blood. Besides, now I can disband the army and see my parents. I smile as I hold the blade out in front of me. I have the power to do whatever I want.

OceanofPDF.com

STOLEN MAGIC

OceanofPDF.com

PROLOGUE

If ever I flutter into the night sky,

I shall sail up through the clouds by and by.

A bird without feathers, but wings just the same.

I will reach for the moon and call her by name.

Higher. Higher. Passing through the inky abyss.

Embracing the heavens, I shall stroke them a kiss.

The poem from my aunties secret book of spells repeats itself in my mind. Whenever I allow myself a moment of quiet, the words materialize. Sweet and slightly silly, I sink into the picture the poem creates and focus on my wings in the bathroom mirror.

I wipe away the steam and purse my lips as my wings flutter like those of a butterfly's. I am a bird without feathers. My wings not paper-thin but strong, nearly indestructible. Could my wings fly me high enough to embrace the heavens in the night sky? Possibly. I think to add something to the poem about passing the millions of twinkling stars in all of their vast glory. The idea of soaring like that sounds beautiful and yet utterly terrifying. But a lot has changed recently, especially me. I am no longer afraid of flying. At least not like a few months ago.

"Queen Aurora." Maleficent shouts from outside in the hallway as she pounds on the door. I know Sam is nearby. They are basically the same wicked fairy. Neither is too far from the other.

"I'll be out in a moment," I holler back and frown at my reflection. Because the trivial poem has no place in my thoughts. Sam and Maleficent might be wicked, but neither compare with what I've become.

OceanofPDF.com

"HANG HER BY HER FEET." I bark the words at Sam from my magically-made throne in the oversized common room of the Fairy Academy. My extravagant seat is the color of a new bruise and sparkles with dark magic, each pointy spire along the back sharp as the tip of a needle. I feel the chair quiver and hum against my body. Created from my dark magic, it supports me in a way nothing else ever has.

"Of course, queen Aurora." Sam winks and uses her wand to lift Strata off the ground, turning her upside down.

I've told Sam more than once to call me Rory, but down here in the under kingdom, Aurora does seem more fitting even from my closest friend.

All around me students jeer and laugh. I join in as Maleficent hands Sam a rope. It sparks and flashes the whole time Sam uses a fairy spell to thread the bond through the center chandelier. Several of the chandelier's lights wink out as the little Brownies fluttering in their positions to keep the crystals sparkling are knocked away and fall to the ground, dazed. Sometimes I forget the Brownies are the reason the Fairy Academy isn't consumed in utter darkness. I should treat them better, but it's hard. Especially when I'm distracted by my game. The one where I get to torture Strata.

I study the fairy student. Her eyes are wide and filled with unshed tears while her navy, aquamarine, and sky blue wings beat spastically behind her. She's frightened but doesn't speak. After four months of suffering through my bullying, she knows better.

Payback baby!

She should've considered the consequences before lying and leading me into the Olclag like I deserved to die. At the memory, my dark magic ripples around me as my fury rises, though my wings stay tucked away. I've grown more accustomed to them over the months, but I still feel more comfortable without them.

Once Strata is dangling a couple feet off the ground, I snap my fingers and a baseball bat materializes in my hand. Since my birthday, my dark magic has grown even more powerful. I barely have to think about what I want, before it happens, particularly if my intentions are sinister as they are in this moment. I want to hurt Strata. Make her feel fear and suffer the way I did.

Sure, I could kill her, but where's the fun in that. "Get her swinging," I shout, leaving my throne and move through the crowd toward the center of the room where my classmate is suspended. Like a child preparing to hit a pinata, I wind the bat.

There's a chime to indicate lessons will start in five minutes, but no one moves, not even the teachers. They linger in the back. Some whisper to each other. Others don't speak. I know they're afraid which is exactly as it should be.

It's been like this since I defeated Lucretia on the field those many months ago. There is lots of partying. Some bullying. And a constant stream of games at another fairies' expense. I guess those who don't like the way I rule can leave, but really, where would they go?

Once you choose the under kingdom, you aren't welcome back to the upper kingdom. It's the way things are since Lucretia cursed me eighteen years ago. Since then, even Lucretia didn't break that protocol. I guess the disgruntled fairies could go to another of the many realms, including the human one. But our kind aren't allowed there either.

"Truth or dare?" I ask, raising one brow as I watch Strata twirl and spin.

I meant to disband the under kingdom's army after Lucretia's demise, but they've been useful in keeping fairies honest when playing my dangerous games or running clandestine missions. At the word honest, I chuckle internally.

“Truth,” Strata says quietly, her bottom lip quivering.

“You always choose truth.” Disappointment is evident in my voice. A dare is much more fun. “Why did you lead me into the Olclag?” It’s a simple question. The same one I ask every time. I step close so she can feel the strength of my magic. It rolls around me like a dark cloud.

“As I told you before, queen Aurora, I didn’t mean to, but Lucretia put a spell on me and made me do it.” Her voice begs me to believe her.

I don’t and force myself not to roll my eyes as I smack the bat into her stomach. “Lies,” I shout, knowing exactly what a lie looks like. I’ve told more than a few fabrications myself.

The wind is knocked out of her and her face goes stark white as her breath hitches in her throat. “I swear that’s the truth,” she says after she recovers. A tear falls from one eye and lands on the ground.

“Sam, do you believe her?” I ask the girl that is my closest friend in the under kingdom. She is shocked I hit Strata. It’s like that every time and I force myself not to bark an obscenity.

“Hit her again,” Maleficent shouts wildly appearing beside Sam.

I do, sending Strata swinging and spinning into the air. As Strata cries out, the irritating feeling I so desperately keep at bay is back. Grounding my teeth, I stomp it out. Strata deserves whatever I give her. She nearly killed me. If it wasn’t for Paxton, I would be dead.

At the thought of Pax, the little voice inside my head reappears and starts to give me a talking to. But I use my magic to silence that part of myself. Just as I did Pax. He’s deep below the Fairy Academy, in a dungeon he can never escape. Not even Lucretia can save him.

During the first month after our fight, I thought I destroyed her, but there’s talk from some who say they’ve seen her or heard from someone else that they saw her. I don’t doubt it. Her death was too easy. She played me just as Paxton said. That one decision—almost killing her—brought out the darkness in me. Do I wish my dark magic wasn’t so strong and powerful? Occasionally, but not today. Besides, I can't do anything about it now. With a secret sigh, I give in to the darkness so prevalent within.

Though truthfully, I'm grateful Lucretia isn't dead. In the moment, I was killer angry. Sure, I'm wicked right now and enjoying the deliciousness of my dark magic, but at least I'm not a murderer.

Not directly anyway. "Truth or dare?" I ask Strata again, steeling myself against my guilt.

She sniffles and I feel the protective barrier over my heart crack. I can't let that happen. In the time since I took over as queen of the under kingdom, Troy left. His displeasure in my choices too strong for him to remain and witness. Before he went, he said he hoped I would come to my senses. That was three months ago.

Not happening, I think.

Since my ascension to queen, I also could have gone to see my parents. That had been one of my greatest desires. But that was before. Nearly daily, I end up talking myself out of it.

I'm living in the moment villain style.

I don't think about Pax.

Or Troy.

Or my parents.

Definitely not my dear aunties.

And not my friends from the human realm. They wouldn't recognize me anyway.

"Dare," she whispers between hiccupping sniffles.

My heart leaps with excitement. "It's about time." Obviously, she's grown tired of my game. "I dare you to go into the Olclag and remain there for ten minutes. If you are still alive when the timer is up, I'll think about forgiving you." I glare, watching her eyes get wide as saucers. It's a lie anyway. I have no intention of forgiving her.

From the corner of my vision, I see the shadow of wings and wonder who it could be sneaking around the outskirts of the room. I refrain from looking directly to keep the element of surprise and make it a point to keep my gaze on Strata.

“Aurora.” The sound of my name flutters to my ears and I know it’s Pax. He’s somehow escaped the dungeon the guards swore was unbreakable—unless they’re on his side. They will pay for their insolence.

Pax believes he can save me. Maybe he’s right.

“Sam, cut her down,” I shout, ignoring Pax and my trembling heart. “You and Maleficent get her to the Olclag. Those who wish to can watch from the observation room with me.” I tug on the bodice of my black dress. It’s suddenly stifling and sweat pools under my breasts and along the back of my neck.

A cheer rises from the crowd as Strata crashes to the ground. Two of the guards appear and help her stand. Sam and Maleficent lead as they all make their way to the Olclag and the observation room.

The observation room is a new addition to the school. I created it using my magic by turning one classroom wall into shatterproof glass. It makes watching those fairies I send into the Olclag much more entertaining.

Freeing my wings, I lift to the air, hovering above everyone. Pax is around somewhere. I can feel his frustration from here, but I don’t see him.

Strata is no longer walking, but making the guards drag her. What’s worse? She’s openly weeping. “Please, Aurora, don’t do this. I don’t want to die!”

Sam and Maleficent laugh and I join them.

When they reach the door to the Olclag, I yell, “Toss her in.” I fly over the crowd until I reach Strata. The girl will suffer the way I did, except she won’t have Paxton there to save her.

The guards hesitate only a moment before one opens the door and the other works to shove her in.

But she clings to the door, holding on tight. “No. Don’t. Please. No!”

I keep my features blank, but I notice even Sam is cracking. We all know sending her in there is a death sentence. It’s only ten minutes though. She might survive.

The guards work to peel her fingers from the door.

“Stop this!” Pax shouts. He’s behind me and I flinch.

The fairies in the room seem to hold their breaths at the authority in his voice. When I turn, he looks more shade than fairy and a shudder pierces my veins.

“Don’t test me, Pax. Otherwise I’ll send you in there with her.” I don’t really mean it, but I can’t have him undermining me in front of the student body. Besides, I already know he can defeat the monsters within, but that’s only if he has a way out. After my birthday, I magicked away every exit from the Olclag.

“If that’s what you want,” he says through gritted teeth. With purpose he pushes through the crowd, brushing his shoulder against mine before passing the guards and going in. Strata calms down slightly as Pax turns and looks at me in a way that makes my knees weak. Regret is plastered all over his face. As though he’s saying he can’t believe he gave up the woman in the market for the likes of me. I don’t blame him either.

Our eyes lock and I work to find a way out of this for him, but there isn’t one.

Rolling his shoulders back, he walks through the entrance and into the Olclag. The door closes with finality and I take a step toward it—toward him.

OceanofPDF.com

"GOOD RIDDANCE," I hear Sam say.

"Right. Master Narcissus might be hot, but he's also way too arrogant for his own good," Maleficent adds.

My heart is racing at what just happened. I don't want Paxton to die.

A bunch of students and teachers rush into the observation room and my hesitation of a moment ago is forgotten. They don't want to miss a thing. Foreboding presses against my chest. Sam and Maleficent follow the crowd into the room.

With head held high, I join them. Inside I feel anything but confident.

Inside, Sam and Maleficent shove fairies out of the way, allowing me to pass through so I can have a front row peek at whatever is going to happen. My insides clench. I don't want to watch. Instead, I want to take it all back.

Pax, I think, my heart pounding in my throat. Because even though I'm wildly wicked at the moment, my feelings for Pax are stronger too. I can't get rid of them regardless of my dark magic holding sway over me, and despite the fact that I have pretended he didn't exist since the night of my birthday. I was just lying to myself. I know that now.

What's going on with me? In an instant, the answer comes. I'm freaking in love with the stupidly handsome fairy.

At the realization, I press my hands against the glass and search for him. "Pax," I whisper.

He seems to sense I said his name and turns just as an enormous caterpillar monster with wings too small for its body eats its way out of the ground and flops itself on the earth. The monster tries to lift off with its much-too-tiny wings as its teeth gnash in Strata and Paxton's direction. Saliva drips from its gaping mouth. When it lands on the ground, it sizzles, sending puffs of smoke into the air.

Paxton pushes Strata behind him as his wand becomes a longsword. He says something to the girl before rushing the slimy dirt-covered beast.

Strata doesn't stay behind Paxton but comes to the glass and pounds on it. "Let me out. Please Aurora."

I ignore her, focusing on Pax, terrified for him.

The monster ignores her too as a tongue flicks out of its mouth. Forked like a snake's, it wraps around Paxton. In a moment faster than a second, Paxton is inside the monster's mouth and gone before I can wrap my mind around what just happened.

Maleficent and Sam cheer beside me and high-five.

"No," I whisper, my hands turning to fists. What have I done?

There's a loud cackle behind me and my veins become ice. I know that laugh. It's been four months since I heard it, but I know it's Lucretia. Slowly, I face her, knowing I'm not emotionally ready to fight her again. But at least I still have the knife. I keep it attached to my thigh for just such an occasion. As calmly as possible, I maneuver behind a student and lift my dress, retrieving the knife from its sheath.

"You shouldn't be here, Lucretia." The words come out shakier than I want.

"Neither should you," she responds, her dark eyes glittering with malice. "In the time since I've been gone, you've done nothing for the under kingdom. I knew you were inexperienced and naïve, but I didn't plan on such immaturity." She clucks her tongue. "Frankly, it's embarrassing." With her wings, she lifts off the ground, flying over students until she lands directly in front of me.

I keep the knife hidden in the folds of my dress, knowing the weapon is my only chance against Lucretia. She watches me, waiting for me to say something, but I can't. There's nothing to say.

“I thought your dark magic would turn you into an evil worthy of my time. We are family after all. Instead you’re playing childish games. Games!” The word comes out in a hiss. “I was mistaken. You’re obviously too much like your parents.” She takes another step toward me. “I’ll have my knife back now, Aurora.”

“No.” I tuck it behind my back like the child she accuses me to be. “It’s mine now.”

She grits her teeth. “You aren’t worthy of that knife or of the title of queen.” As she speaks, she raises one hand.

Though I can’t see her magic, I feel it pummel into me, forcing my fingers to release the hilt of the blade. “Stop.” I cry out in pain as the knife sails around me and into Lucretia’s outstretched hand. Mortified, I look around the room at the faces of my peers and teachers. Surely, they’ll support me. But I realize instantly how wrong I was about them. They enjoyed watching me torture others, but they weren’t my subjects. They are hers and have been from the beginning. Each of them was biding time until Lucretia regained enough strength to return. My face heats at the knowledge, but I can’t back down. Plus I still have my own dark magic. It hasn’t failed me yet. “Give it back.” I move my hand and with my mind order the knife to return to my grasp. It jerks and sways, but she keeps a tight hold. I’m not strong enough.

She studies the blade before smiling at me. “Well at least I wasn’t wrong about your power. What a pity.” Internally, I feel her will overpower my magic and shove it back, causing me to fall against the glass. Her smile widens. “Your magic is strong, but it is also willowy and uncontrolled. Perhaps if you spent time in your classes honing your magic…” Her smile vanishes. “I have an idea.”

Sam and Maleficent clap for joy. They were never my friends. It hurts to see their treachery, though I shouldn’t be surprised.

“Since you’re so fond of throwing fairies into the Olclag, I will do the same to you—”

“But I’ve already been in there,” I whine and then snap my mouth shut. I’m not doing myself any good.

“Instead of ten minutes, I’m giving you two weeks.”

I feel my mouth fall open. Sure my magic is much greater than it was, but as Lucretia said, I’m inexperienced.

“If you can survive in there that long, then I will let you out and you can continue your studies at the Academy. If not,” she pauses and smiles again, but it isn’t one of happiness. Her eyes are filled with greedy murder. “Then you won’t be my problem anymore.”

I know I can’t defeat her. Beyond that, I know I have no desire to spend two weeks in the Olclag. So I put my head down, and try to rush her, but she stops me, her magic squeezing me with an invisible rope.

“You aren’t going anywhere.” She waves her hand and her staff with the giant red jewel appears in her hand. She smacks it on the ground once and my dress changes into inky black pants and a matching black shirt—almost like scuba gear. Then she places the jeweled orb to my forehead. Immediately, there’s a pressure.

“What are you doing?” I ask through chattering teeth. Fear beats out any of my anger.

“Stealing away some of your magic. You don’t deserve it anyway.” She closes her eyes as my magic fills her. I remember the story my aunties told about how Lucretia obtained her magic. She killed for it. As my knees buckle, I realize that if she takes all of mine, I’ll die too. She’s like a vampire. Only instead of sucking out all of my blood, she’s sucking out all of my magic.

“Stop,” I say, my voice low and shallow as my breath goes in and out in chunks.

Her gaze fixes on mine and she stands back. “There. I left you just enough magic so you will think you have a chance.” She cackles. Everyone else in the room laughs too. “Take her,” she shouts.

The same two guards who forced Strata into the Olclag, take me by the arms. I don't fight them. I'm too weak. I can sense it. Not only that but I already feel defeated. It weighs on me like lead. I let them walk me out of the room and into the hall.

"By the way, I do love the idea of the observation room." She bangs the bottom on her staff on the ground and suddenly all of the black walls in the room, including the ceiling and the floors are gone, replaced by the same glass as that of the one wall. "Now we can have a front row seat to all of your adventures all the time."

It takes only an instant to see the Olclag is part of the academy. The craggily and vast woodland holds the school together as does the demon skin on the walls. I swallow, trying to think of what to say to make her stop this and change her mind, but there is nothing. Because deep down, I know I deserve the consequences. Blowing out a determined breath, I keep my head up and my eyes forward and shuffle down the hall toward my impending doom. One of the guards opens the door. I don't fight, I just walk through. Before the door closes, I glance back.

"One more thing," Lucretia says.

"What?" I ask, monotone, knowing there is no hope, especially since Paxton is dead.

"It's always better to struggle through life with your friends." She whips her staff in a circle before snapping her fingers. The door closes.

"What do you mean," I ask aloud, though I'm alone.

OceanofPDF.com

WELL, not really alone. As soon as my feet touch the damp earth, it stirs beneath my shoes. I can feel its maliciousness and shudder. The last time was bad enough. Strata screams to my right and I take off in that direction. Pax is over that way too. Or at least he was. I don't have my wand, but I haven't needed one in months. What I need is to kill the beast that ate Paxton. It's the least I can do—take my revenge. I think of the monster who ate him and in the same moment think of its destruction. Blowing it to bits with Pax still alive somehow inside. As soon as the monster is in view, it begins to shudder and rolls onto its side.

"Crap." Lucretia stole a lot of my magic. But that isn't what has me stunned. There's a jagged hole the size of a person cut out of the side of the monster. Blood drips from it like red rain and its guts spill out. It's gross and smells like rotten fish, but I'm too relieved to care because the monster's demise means Pax escaped.

"Pax," I shout, turning away from the dead creature and searching the gray and shadowy landscape. My knees are weak as I dare to hope he really is alive.

"Aurora," Strata calls from the other side of the creature.

I don't respond. Just because we're both in the Olclag doesn't mean I like her any more than I did when I threw her in here.

A glimmer of light shines in the distance and I move away from Strata and toward it, hoping it's Pax. Creatures writhe and hiss all around me. I feel claustrophobic, like at any minute I will be swallowed whole. And I'm not far off. If another one of those enormous caterpillar things is around, I could be.

In the distance, I hear the call of a bird. Or probably something much scarier and carnivorous. Working to keep calm, I relax my hands, shaking out my fingers since they were clenched so my nails cut into my palms. Strata is somewhere behind. I can feel her back there. The flutter of her wings tells me she's flying, and I wonder why I'm not. That's better than touching the ground. It's just most of the time I forget I have wings. They are still new to me.

"Aurora wait." Strata comes up beside me.

"Did you see which way Paxton—I mean Master Narcissus went?" I try not to look at her.

"No— What are you doing in here?" Surprise laces each word with spite, and I can't blame her. Her pretty face is scrunched up in arrogant confusion.

A frustrated howl exits my throat and I walk faster toward the light.

She keeps talking though. "Did you come in to rescue Paxton?"

I see from the corner of my eye she's shaking her head.

"That can't be it because Paxton is the one who saved you from before…" Her mind is working through what could've happened. It won't be long until she knows I was betrayed.

I glare at her and her words die in her throat.

"Lucretia returned, didn't she? And she threw you in here." There's a harrumph of satisfied finality from her that sends me into a panicked rage.

"Why do you all hate me so much? I didn't do anything to you. To any of you," I shout, throwing my hands up in annoyance. Tears press against the backs of my eyes, but I blink several times to keep them from falling. One false step could send me to my death in this place.

Strata balks at the force of my words. Opens her mouth and closes it. Crosses her arms. "You are the princess of the upper kingdom. Destined to rule us all. Just like your parents, you'll treat those that don't belong to the royal families like trash, the same as they do."

I grit my teeth together. Jump over some muddy sludge and catch myself as I start to slip. The sky, which is heavy with bleakness begins to lighten, casting more shadows as a shot of lightning slashes the clouds. It's been too quiet for too long. Something is coming and I'm not the least bit prepared. "I don't even know my parents. I was taken from them when I was still a baby. Raised by the Royal Guards in the human realm. How can you think I would be like them?" I rip out a weed from the mud and toss it away.

She shrugs. "You're right, I guess. But Lucretia—"

"Is the queen's sister," I finish. "If anyone will make the same choices as the king and queen, it's her." I shudder at the thought. "Why hasn't she tried to kill them or dethrone them and take over?" I voice the question aloud, not expecting Strata to have the answer. But as I say the words I think of her army and know that's exactly what she intends to do. "That's what the army is for. That's why the fairy academy exists down here."

"That's right," Strata snaps. "She intends to kill them all and reset the system so there aren't statuses. No royalty. We will all be equal." Strata crosses her arms and her wings flutter faster.

"Including Lucretia?" I ask, knowing my aunt would never consider herself anything but a queen.

"She— Her—" Strata shakes her head. "I guess," she says, though it doesn't sound convincing and her wings slow.

"You guess what, Strata? She'll be queen. That's what. Then she'll choose a select few to be in her court. Before long, it'll be exactly as it is now." At the edge of a clump of low hanging trees, I stop. This is where I saw the strange light. Chasing the light might have been a stupid idea. Like the fish in the deep who lure their prey with light, I think that is exactly what the Olclag did. "Pax," I yell, hoping to stop my chattering teeth. "It's me. Rory. Where are you?"

"Stop yelling you crazy girl. I'm not the only one who can hear you," Pax says, stepping out from behind one of the trees.

OceanofPDF.com

WAND IN HAND, Pax marches toward me like he's going to kill me on the spot. I take a step back and his face softens. "Lucretia?" he asks, knowingly.

"Yeah," I say, my voice hoarse, grateful I don't have to explain that my own flesh and blood sent me in here. Again.

He shakes his head. "I'm usually not one to say I told you so, but…" He tilts his head to the side. "I told you so." He blinks slowly, watching me.

I nod, fighting back raw emotions. "It isn't every day I see how much of an idiot I am."

His features soften further. "Hey, it's okay. I got you out of this last time, I can do it again." He pulls me into a quick hug.

I cling to him, desperate for his touch, for his understanding, and forgiveness. Not that I deserve it. But being in his arms feels like I'm home.

Too soon, he releases me and says hello to Strata.

She responds and I wait, unsure how to share the dangerous reality of our situation.

"What?" Pax asks, squinting as he moves in close, searching my face for answers.

"Um… After I stabbed Lucretia and she vanished, I sort of magicked away all of the exits." I swallow, not wanting to reveal the rest.

"And?" Pax asks.

Lucretia is making me stay in here for two weeks." I glance down at my muddy boots. "I'm sorry," I say and mean it.

"That's impossible." Paxton flicks his wand and a cockroach monster that was trying to sneak up behind me turns to dust. "She can't keep us in here. If I figure a way out, we will be leaving." He sounds so confident; I can't help but nod.

"No. We'll never make it that long. No one ever has," Strata whines. She's turning in a circle and tears are leaking down her mud-stained face.

Before Pax or I can say more, there's a loud scream followed by another. It's coming from within the forest.

"Help," a female voice shouts.

The voice is familiar, but I push the thought away as impossible.

"Someone, please, for the love of grizzly bears, get us down from here!"

A different voice, but equally familiar and I find myself moving toward the sound.

When I pass Pax, he touches my arm. "Going in there is foolish," he says. "It's probably a trap. I know a place we can hide where none of the monsters in here will find us, but it's this way." He points in a different direction.

I glance cautiously at the ominous forest next to us. Paxton is already moving toward the course he indicated.

"Okay," I say, working to figure out how I know the voices as I fall in line behind Paxton and Strata.

"Please!"

"Somebody!"

Like a giant tidal wave, it hits me why the voices are familiar. "Merida. Tiana." I forget where I am or that I'm filled with dark magic. I forget about everything except saving my friends. "Merida! Tiana!" I say again, this time with purpose. Fear for their safety fills every crevice and pushes out everything else. As quickly as the dark magic took over four months ago, it vanishes and in its place shines newness and light, like the sun pushing through the clouds as they part after a storm. "I'm coming."

“Who’s Merida and Tiana?” I hear Strata ask.

Paxton growls. “Follow her.”

In the back of my mind, I know they’re behind me and I’m grateful. I need Paxton. Strata, not so much, but whatever.

Giant grayish green leaves smack against my thighs as low hanging branches tangle in my hair. Some pull, but I think about them shriveling up and dying. The branches retreat and I continue on.

It’s a shock when I see them. Merida and Tiana are dangling from an enormous pine tree. At least that’s kind of what it looks like. The scent of moldy cheese wafts from it, probably because the tree itself is in some weird stage of decay. More of an ash color reminiscent of a shadow instead of the actual tree. Wilted vine arms swing Tiana and Merida around like I did Strata from the chandelier earlier today.

“Rory?” Tiana shouts. Her features are a combination of dizziness and shock.

“Help us,” Merida adds.

Connecting with my magic, I tell the tree to turn to ash. The branches shudder, but don’t die like I commanded, and I grind my hands into fists that Lucretia stole most of my magic.

Pax’s wand changes into a bow and arrow. Nocking the arrow, he fires. The end sinks into the thick vine and it drops Tiana. Faster than I believe possible, he shoots another arrow into Merida’s vine and it drops her as well.

I run toward them, but the vines are swinging wildly, and one smacks into me, sending me flying. Branches suddenly surround me as I’m flung into a tree a ways off. I land with a thud as branches circle me into a death grip. Howling in pain, I demand the tree release me. The hold is loosened slightly, and I wiggle my way down and trunk.

Strata is just standing there as though she’s in shock. One of the wild vines picks her up. At the same time, another vine wraps itself around her neck. Until that moment I believed I wanted Strata to die, but no more.

“Let her go,” I shout, flinging my hand and my magic out and into the vine around her neck. It slackens but doesn’t drop her. I send another jolt of magic into the tree. And another and another and another. I’m breathing hard and drop to my knees, but they still hold Strata.

Paxton is dragging Merida and Tiana out of the reach of the vines.

“Help her.” I can’t tell whether he heard. Strata’s eyes are big and look like they are about to pop out of her head. There’s a snap and I witness the life go out of her. “No. Please. No.” As Strata’s body turns to ash, tears burn down my cheeks. Because I did this to her. I’m to blame. And I don’t know how to deal with that.

OceanofPDF.com

PAXTON IS SUDDENLY in front of me. “Aurora. Can you walk?” He pulls me to my feet, but my legs feel like rubber and I sag against him. “Please,” he says quietly. “I can’t carry you and Tiana.”

At the sound of my friend’s name, I crack to attention, forcing my legs to respond. “I can walk.”

He leans down and kisses my cheek. His lips are warm, and the touch sends tingles over every inch of my body. “Good.” He helps me stand. I let him pull me over to my friends. Merida is on her feet but looks dazed, her eyes glazed over with a faraway look in them.

“Merida are you okay?” I rush to her and take her hand. She’s freezing and I think about warming her. My magic flows from my fingers and into hers until she pulls away.

“Stop that.” She shakes her hands, rubbing them together. “What is this place?” she asks, zeroing in on me.

Relief washes over my heart. I’m just so happy she’s okay. I need some good news right now. Sure, I didn’t like Strata. She was conniving and rude. But she was still a living being. A fairy. One of my kind. And I couldn’t save her.

“Rory!” Merida snaps her fingers in my face.

I jerk back. “We’re in the Olclag,” I say, forcing down my guilt. “In the under kingdom of the fairy realm.

“Figures.” She walks in a circle, her curly red hair swirling like a fire around her head.

I glance back to see Paxton is working to revive Tiana. Merida notices too and together we rush over to them. “Please tell me she’s alive.” I fall to my knees beside him, desperate for her to be okay. Her features are soft and slack, and she has an ashy look about her, like the Olclag has already taken her over.

“She shouldn’t be.” He shakes his head and touches the tip of his wand to her chest and a gauzy bandage wraps her up.

I fall to my knees beside her. “Tiana.”

Her eyes flutter open and she breathes in. Before my mind can grasp hold of what’s happening, she grabs me by the shoulders and pulls me down so that my neck is at her mouth. There’s a pinch and she’s sucking. Drinking my blood!

“Tiana!” I try to pull away, but she holds me fast a moment longer before releasing me.

I stumble back, pressing one hand to my throat. It’s slick with blood, but that’s not what has me in shock. “You’re a vampire?”

She jumps to her feet and tears the bandages from her chest in one motion. “I told you Lance was going to change me.” She smiles and a chill runs down my spine. “Your blood is delicious. Sweet with a dash of dark.” She licks her lips just as an enormous monster shaped like a millipede materializes just outside the tree line and directly behind her. It bends over, legs like a shadowy wave.

“Look out,” I holler, but Tiana senses it before I finish. She spins as the thing whose face is mostly teeth opens its mouth, giving a liquid roar. So fast, I lose track of her a moment, she’s on its back just behind the neck. In one motion, she shoves her bare hand into its neck and rips out its tongue. Using it like a rope, she jumps down and wraps it around the things neck before getting back up and choking the life out of it. The creature expires, letting out a final breath all before I can blink.

Tiana is wearing jeans and an emerald green top, though it’s dirty. Her hair is up, and out of her face, but several pieces have fallen out and are standing at odd angles like the jagged points on a crown. In that moment, she looks like a warrior princess and I can’t help but be in awe of her.

“Gross,” she says, wiping her hands on her pants before jumping down.

“T, I—” I’m unsure what to say. She’s a vampire and I’m a fairy. We make quite a pair.

Merida screams. We all spin around and watch as a snake the size of a Doberman sinks its teeth into her thigh. It’s eyes are the color of fire as it releases her, flashing its fangs and prepares to bite her again.

Paxton sends magic from his wand into the gigantic thing. It hisses and slithers away, but not before Tiana catches it and tears it in half.

She growls and her eyes flash red a moment too.

I shudder at the sight of her. She is a little scary.

Merida lets out a soft breath and grabs hold of her leg. “Ouch,” she says, barely above a whisper. Her eyes roll back into her head and she falls to the ground.

“Please be okay,” I say, holding my breath.

Paxton kneels beside her and does something with his magic. “She is for now but will die if we don’t get her the antidote.” He lifts her into his arms. “Let’s get out of here.” Pax gives Tiana a wary look before heading along a cobblestoned path I didn’t see before.

T and I glance at each other before following behind him.

“You are bad ass,” I whisper, hooking an arm through hers.

She doesn’t respond, but we walk in silence for a few minutes until I can’t help but ask her, “How long have you been a vampire?”

“A few months,” she says, her voice soft as mine.

“Did you die?” I recoil at the thought.

“Pretty much.” She feels me tense beside her and continues on. “But that’s how it works. It didn’t hurt.” She shrugs. “It is what it is.” Sadness rolls off her along with obligation.

I nod, unsure how to respond. “Does your family think you’re dead?”

She doesn’t answer right away. “That was the hardest part,” she finally admits. “I went to my own funeral.” Her sadness deepens until it’s so thick I can almost touch it.

“Sorry, T,” I say squeezing her lightly.

“Me too, especially since Lance and I are on a permanent break. Now that I’m a vampire, there is a whole lot of his crap I’m seeing about the guy, and I don’t like it.”

“Like what?” I trip over a root. T rights me before I can even think to use my wings. They flutter behind me though and Tiana glances at them.

“Like it doesn’t matter. Just know I appreciated the talk we had the night you left, and I love you for it.” She bumps into me and I smile.

“Love you too, T.”

“By the way, your wings are cool. Love the colors.” She glances back at them again. “What’s it like to fly?”

“When we get out of this, I’ll show you,” I say, giving her a wry smile. Now isn’t the time to have fun, especially since we can be killed or eaten at any moment. Though, this part of the Olclag is silent and I wonder why.

“This place is nuts,” Tiana adds.

“Agreed,” I say. “How did you get here?” Lucretia mentioned my friends. I thought she was talking about Pax and Strata or even Sam and Maleficent. Instead, she dragged my actual human friends, though Tiana isn’t human any longer, and brought them here.

“I have no idea. One minute I’m in California having a midnight snack and the next I’m in this place being strangled by a disgusting vine.”

“It’s my fault,” I say as the reality of our situation hits me in the gut the way I hit Strata with the baseball bat.

“How so?” She looks at me.

OceanofPDF.com

I DEBATE what to say but decide it's time for the truth. "I did something to the queen of the under kingdom and she is paying me back by dragging you and Merida into this." I study the ground in front of me as I speak, too much of a coward to look her in the eyes. "I'm sorry."

She wraps her arm around my waist. "Don't worry about it. We'll figure this out." She pauses and I look up. "I need to apologize too."

"It's fine. Giving you some of my blood is the least I could do," I say, thinking she's going to tell me she's sorry for using me like a sippy cup.

"Oh, not about that. I mean, yeah, I guess I'm sorry for not asking first, but I meant about telling you I was going to take off for a guy. And one I barely knew." She blows out her breath. "So not cool."

Up ahead, Pax arrives at what looks like a hovel. The roof seems to be caving in on one side and there's a tree branch growing through it.

"I'll forgive you if you'll forgive me," I say, stopping to show her I'm genuine.

Pax kicks the door in and goes inside.

"Done." Tiana moves forward and I trail behind her.

Something laughs behind us and I turn around, my wings fluttering me backward and into Tiana, knocking her to the ground. "Sorry," I say, but don't help her. The creature is the same one that called me delectable when I came in here the first time. Her hair is long and red and covered in daisies, though they aren't the usual color, but more gray and grimy.

"Hello Aurora." She steps forward, reaching out her hands, but is stopped by an invisible force. When she touches it, the area lights up with a blueish black light. She looks at it, surprised and her pleasant features become angry. “What is this?” She pounds against it, each time causing the area to light up.

I swallow and turn. Tiana is on her feet. “Run,” I say, grinding my teeth.

“Who is she?” Tiana asks, not even a little afraid.

“I don’t know.” I get my feet moving, though they feel like lead. My wings remind me they are there as I am lifted off the ground.

Tiana runs toward the hut, passing me like I’m standing still.

Paxton suddenly appears. “Hurry,” he says, waving us in.

Tiana slows as she reaches him and walks past, moving inside.

There’s still a good distance between me and Pax and I push forward, forcing myself to fly as fast as my wings will carry me. My body gets heavier and heavier until the tips of my boots drag on the ground. “Pax,” I say. “Help.” I don’t understand what is happening.

He steps off the small wooden porch. As soon as he does, a vine shoots up from the ground and wraps around his leg. He sends a bolt of magic into it and it disintegrates.

I can’t do anything but watch. My mind is dull, like I’m only half awake. I know it’s the Olclag and know I should do something but can’t for the life of me think what.

Pax flies over. “I’ve got you,” he says, wrapping his arms around my waist. I fall against him as a vine wraps around the both of us. He growls, moving against it and I guess he’s trying to get his wand into place to use his magic.

But the vines squeeze us tighter until I feel like I’m going to burst open like a pinata. Release us, I think, though it’s vague.

If anything, it squeezes us tighter.

Pax hollers in frustration. “I’m sorry, Aurora.”

I’m not sure whether that’s him saying he can’t save us or what, but I refuse to let us die. At that thought, a jolt of magical power I didn’t think I still possessed springs into my chest. With suddenly clarity, I send it radiating out of my body and into the vine.

It crumbles and we are free.

Pax goes limp, his arms loosening from around my waist. I catch him and fly with all my might toward the entrance of the shack. When I land on the porch, Tiana appears and helps me get Pax inside.

“Sorry I didn’t help,” she says. “But I’m no use against those vines.”

“You did good,” I respond, glad she didn’t try to help.

Paxton is heavy and we drag him out of the doorway so we can close the door. Merida is still unconscious and on the drab couch. I try to roll him on his side, so his wings won’t get squished, but they vanish, and I carefully put his head on the ground.

“Isn’t this the guy from school?” Tiana asks, her voice shaky at the sudden clarity. “What’s he doing here?”

“Yeah. This is where he’s from,” I say, resting my ear against his chest, listening for a heartbeat. I can’t hear it, but his chest rises and falls. “Well, not the Olclag, but the fairy realm,” I say, correcting myself.

“Is he alive?” she asks.

“I think so.” I touch his face, unable to help myself. It’s strange, but the man has my heart on so many levels. As I watch him, I think healing thoughts. My magic radiates from me and into him. I can sense the damage in him—the broken ribs, and his torn wings. His injuries are worse than I thought, and I push more magic into him. As much as I can. I feel myself weakening, but I don’t care. He needs to get better because we can’t survive this place without him. It’s more than that too. I don’t want to survive without him.

In the background, I hear Tiana. She’s saying something, but her words are muffled, and far away. I feel my strength abating, but still I don’t let go of Pax. I can’t. His injuries heal under my command, but I’m dying, I think.

My head smacks against Pax's chest, and I close my eyes…

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN I WAKE, there's bright light shining in through the window. It's warm and brings with it the scent of peonies like the ones in my aunties front yard. After a moment more, the aroma of baked bread fills my nose and my mouth waters.

Blinking my eyes open, I look around. It's the same old place, but somehow feels more cheery. There are patterned curtains dancing in the window as a soft breeze fills the room. The hut is built with trees, giving every inch of the place a honeyed glow. I'm lying on a yellow couch and sit up, admiring the solid wood table beyond the living area and the kitchen past that.

"Pax?" It looks like him with his dark wings with the blue streak and his matching hair. He's wearing light gray pants and no shoes as well as a white shirt and a yellow apron. Against his wings, all of the color stands out and I have to blink several times to make sure I'm not dreaming.

Except I must be. "Where are we?"

He looks up and smiles before taking something from a bowl and popping it into his mouth. "The Olclag," he says when he's done chewing.

I go over to the window and look out. Before, it was ferocious and covered in gray and dreary. Now, it's all color and light. The trees are lush and different shades of green, including pine, grass, and lime. All around them are lush green grasses and an exorbitant amount of fully bloomed flowers in a rainbow of colors. Beyond is the lake, the one I almost drowned in. It's sparkles in frothy blue. Overhead the sky dazzles as rays of orange and yellow light shine down, giving me a complete view of the landscape. It's glorious, like something out of a painting. Dust particles twinkle in the air and I think I must have died.

"How is this possible?" I ask, noticing the surprise in my voice. I pinch myself and feel the smidge of pain. Am I dreaming? I pinch myself again. Supposedly I'm not supposed to be able to feel that. Right?

"This is what the Olclag looked like before Lucretia came to power."

I flinch at his sudden nearness. I didn't hear him come up beside me. "Ohhhhhh—" I struggle to form a fully coherent word as my insides tingle. I have no idea where I am. I could be dead, yet my body responds to him on a cellular level. "Cool." I clear my throat. From the corner of my eye, I watch him smile. My heart thumps against my ribs.

"See, the Olclag is where fairies get their magic." He pauses and I look over at him. He's beyond handsome with his chiseled jaw, kissable lips, and stunning eyes. Even in his comfy clothes and an apron, he's the most gorgeous man I've ever met. Not to mention his hair and the width and breadth of his perfectly sculpted body. The fairy was blessed in every way. No doubt about it. "At least it was," he continues.

"What do you mean?" I clear my throat and force myself to focus on what he's saying.

"Since Lucretia took power, she's polluted the Olclag. It's dying. Everything that was once good and glorious is changing into evil and monstrous."

The giant caterpillar things comes to mind and I try to see that as good and glorious. What was it before it became that?

Paxton continues. "Her goal is to destroy the magic of the Olclag. Over time, fairies will be born with less and less until they have none." He looks at me then, his eyes brim with an unreadable sadness. "It'll be easier to rule all of the kingdoms if there isn't anyone powerful enough to rise against her."

I suck in my breath, unable to help myself. Sometimes when I look at him, it's like looking at the sun. "But that will take centuries, surely," I say, facing him.

"True, but she has time. Fairies live long lives, and new fairies aren't born that often. So if she can destroy the Olclag, then it won't be long belong before the fairies are easy to control." He crosses his arms, but his features remain soft.

"Why can't my mom and dad do something about it? They have the royal guard. Surely, they have armies too. Why can't they send down their armies and capture her and put her in jail?"

He takes in what I'm wearing and I do the same. It's then I notice I'm still in my dirty clothes. "Why don't you get cleaned up? Then we can eat, and I'll tell you all about it."

"Okay."

He heads past the kitchen and down a hall. To the right is a door and he opens it. "Here you go."

I glance inside and see the room is as light and airy as the rest of the hut, decorated in eggshell and other neutral colors.

The hut is bigger than it looks from the outside.

Pax shows me the bathroom and I quickly get cleaned up. Change into a butter yellow dress. Two slits are in the back for my wings, but I don't bring them out. Running my fingers over the front of the dress, I sigh. It's soft as cotton and skims across my skin. I follow Pax's lead and don't put on any shoes. Plus, I leave my hair down. It'll dry with natural waves in it.

Timid, I make my way into the kitchen. Pax has berries on the stove. They boil gently in a thick syrup. He's making jam, I think and smile.

At that moment, he catches my eye and smiles too. "You look nice." He hugs me and my body warms.

"Thank you." There's sliced bread on the white counter as well as what looks like butter or thick cream. "Did you make all of this?"

"I did." He takes the sauce from the stove and pours it into a dish.

Then using magic, the boiling syrup stops steaming and thickens. “Ready to eat?”

In answer, my stomach growls. “Definitely.”

I sit on one of the rustic stools on the other side of the counter. Pax pushes the bread, plates, butter, jam, and silverware over so I can reach it and then comes to sit beside me. I watch as he takes a piece, slathers butter on it, followed by the jam and then hands me the knife. “Rodithian berries are the most delicious of all the berries in the Olclag.” He takes a bite.

I do as he did, putting a little less jam on top than him and take a bite. Flavor like I’ve never tasted floods my mouth. Sort of like if strawberries and raspberries had a baby.

He smiles as he watches me chew. “What do you think?” he asks after he finishes his bite.

“So good,” I admit, wishing I put more jam on my bread.

We eat in silence a few minutes, but I have to know more about the Olclag and what we are doing here. I’m still not sure whether I’m alive or dead. “Tell me why my parents haven’t captured Lucretia and put her in jail or something?”

“They’ve tried. When the Olclag began to die, they made every effort to apprehend her, but her magic is very powerful. In the last eighteen years, they’ve sent down their armies more than once, but many of those fairies stayed. In the last year or two, the tides have shifted and there are more who support Lucretia than your mom and dad, I’m afraid.”

My mouth is hanging open. I can feel it and snap it shut, my teeth clamping together. “Why are they on her side?”

He takes my hand, twining my fingers with his. “It isn’t so much that they’re on her side as they want to be on the winning side, and they believe she will win.”

“They’re afraid,” I say tightly, wiping the butter from my face.

“Yes, but I can’t blame them. Even I was afraid when Lucretia took my sister and I thought she would kill her. But now?” He stops and looks away, playing with some breadcrumbs that have fallen onto the counter.

“Now what?” I shake his hand, desperate for him to look at me.

“My sister is on her side anyway,” he says quietly.

“Maybe not. Maybe Lucretia has a hold over her as well.” I want to believe because I want to give Pax hope.

“No.” He swallows. “She likes the darkness too much. It’s been that way since she was a child. The dark parts of her magic were always the strongest. I thought if I fought hard enough for her, she would change, but if anything, she’s embraced it even more.” He brushes the crumbs onto his plate and looks at me. His eyes shine with unshed tears.

“I’m sorry, Pax,” I say, wishing I could make him feel better. “But how do you know?”

“My sister is Maleficent, one of your supposed best friends. You saw how she behaved. What she did. Do you think she has any light inside her?”

I gasp, but quickly shake my head as I think about the three of us over the last four months. “Maybe,” I finally say. I allowed the dark magic within me to flourish, but I knew the light was still there, just buried. “I mean look at how I acted. I went dark within a few days of getting my magic. If I can overcome the darkness, then she can too.”

He nods and let’s go on my hand. “I hope you’re right.”

OceanofPDF.com

WE CLEAN up the dishes in comfortable silence, each of us lost in our own thoughts. I can't imagine how hard it was to watch his sister behave the way she did. After he puts away the last of the dishes, I take his hand. "Can you ever forgive me for how I acted?" I'm referring to the way I let my darkness take over. I liked the power it brought, and I liked feeling as though I was on top. But it was all a ruse. Lucretia planned it and the students and teachers sat back and watched me behave like the queen I wasn't. There's a saying, the bigger they are the harder they fall. As I study Pax, it's embarrassing to reflect how true the statement is.

He observes me intently for a long moment and I think maybe he can't forgive me. That I did too much bad and could never make up for it. He smiles. "There's nothing to forgive. It's me who should be asking you that question."

"How so?" I ask, curious why he thinks he owes me an apology.

We walk hand in hand past the dining area and into the living room. The chairs look cozy and I'm full. Briefly I think about getting comfortable in one of them and chilling for a while, but I don't know how or why I'm here and I long to explore the Olclag as it is in this moment—full of light and color.

"You're here because of me," he responds quietly. "I could've told Lucretia you didn't possess magic. I could've lied and let you live your life in the human realm. But I was a coward and now we're in this predicament." He squeezes my hand.

"You're not a coward," I say, opening the front door. "If you left me to my life, I wouldn't have met you." I stop and rest my head against his chest, inhaling his deliciously warm scent. "And I'm so glad I did."

He smiles, releasing me and walking slightly ahead, stepping off the porch before facing me. “You mean it?” There’s sweet sincerity in his eyes.

“Without a doubt.” Before I can think about it, I rush toward him and do something bold, pressing my lips to his. It was going to be quick, but the feel of his mouth on mine sends me into the stratosphere. I sense his hunger as his hands cup my face, his thumbs gently stroking my cheeks.

I step off the porch and into his arms and he tugs me against him. In that moment, I’m the happiest I’ve ever been. It doesn’t even matter if I’m dead, as long as I can remain with him like this for eternity.

Too soon, he lifts his head.

I open my eyes. There’s a happiness I haven’t seen before on his mostly serious face. “Are we dead?”

He smiles, sending a jolt of longing through me. “No. Our bodies are still in the hut in the Olclag, but I wanted to show you why it’s important you defeat Lucretia.” He takes my hands. “We’re here because I want to show you how it all began.”

For some reason, my heart skips a beat as nervous energy flows through my veins. “Like how fairies came into being?” I ask as I follow him down the cobbled path that leads away from the hut and into the forest.

“That’s right.” He tucks my hand into the crook of his arm and pats my hand. “You know about the seven magics?” His wings lift his body off the ground.

I nod. The few times I did attend class, I learned about the seven creatures created and the magics that came with them. “I do,” I say, giving him a sideways glance as I extend my wings and lift off as well.

“Tell me what you’ve learned.” He looks at me and smiles.

In that moment, he reminds me of a teacher. “Sure, Master Narcissus.” I pause, watching him voraciously. The fairy is hot.

His lips twist as he kisses my hand. “I’m not really a teacher. I just help out with flying lessons." He smirks. "But go on then. I'm listening."

"The vampires, Silindra and Sharra came first. Then the fairies," I say slowly, trying to remember.

"What else?" He's listening intently.

I lift an eyebrow, working to decipher what he's looking for.

"Where do fairies draw their magic?"

We fly over a thicket of purple wildflowers. Their lovely scent fills my nose and I forget for a moment what I should be thinking about.

"Aurora?" Pax gives me a worried look.

"Fairy magic comes from the heart," I say, tapping my chest when I snap out of it. I also remember vampires get their magic from essence while dragons use the soul. I think of Troy, but quickly push him away. He left after I used the blade on Lucretia, obviously disgusted.

Trolls get their magic from their strength while unicorns get their healing powers from their horns. And finally, the seventh magic comes from Hunters, who draw magic from blood. Many other creatures exist and their magic falls under the seven originals, but we didn't discuss them, though gargoyles and ghouls, Nephilim, and even werewolves were mentioned. And I'm not too sure where dragons fit it. Some say dragons came before the vampire sisters. Others say dragons came after. I have no idea.

"Correct." He seems pleased. "The original fairies moderated our heart magic into subcategories, including air, water, earth, and fire, as well as those who have more than one of the four."

We leave the brightness of the path and the field of flowers and are in the shadow of the forest. I pull away as fear of flying in such close proximity to the enormous trees and their branches sends my feet to the ground.

"What's wrong?" He lands and comes over, his features scrunched in worry.

“I don’t think I have the skills to fly in there.” I say the words calmly, though my insides are shaking. It’s more than just fear my wings might get caught on a branch and tear or that I’ll fly into a trunk. I sense a powerful vibration of magic deep within. It calls to my heart and there’s a pull that’s difficult to resist. In fact, my feet respond before my mind is ready.

“No problem.” Pax strolls beside me, our arms brushing against each other.

I can’t help but feel the tingle of skin against skin and wish we could do something fun, like a date with dinner and a movie. Normal stuff. “Thanks.” The word comes out timidly because I don’t want him to be disappointed.

Not more than a few feet beyond the tree line, rustling from every direction surrounds us. I lean into Pax. After my last experience in the Olclag, I can’t help myself. “Something’s coming.” My fingernails dig into his flesh.

“It’s okay.” He stops and wraps his arms around my waist, trying to protect me.

But I don’t feel safe. As my fear rises, so does the dark magic within my chest. It builds and builds until I think it might burn a hole.

Pax senses what’s happening. “It’s okay.” He massages my arm and shoulder. “I promise. Nothing will hurt you here. As it is now, the Olclag is safe.”

I want to believe him, but my fear is stronger than my common sense. “I-I can’t stop it.” My knees are quaking as colors fill my body as all four of the magics within turn and turn.

Before the magic can leave my body, Pax acts fast and his wings suddenly surround me, like I’m in a soft and shadowy cocoon. His eyes are locked on mine. They’re filled with worry and love. I don’t understand how he can love me. I’m not very lovable. Besides that, we haven’t known each other long. But I see it. “I can’t let you hurt anything in here," he whispers. "But if you need to use your magic, if you can't control it, then use it on me."

At his words, I swallow. I don't want to hurt him. I won't. Taking a deep breath, I nod. "I'll make it stop." I blow out, looking down at the space between us, ashamed of my uncontrollable magic.

"Another one," he says, his voice barely audible.

I do. Each breath is ragged until the darkness subsides. I force myself to look into his gorgeous eyes.

"Better?" He nods like he can sense I've calmed down.

"Yes, I think so, but what was making those noises?" I cling to his arm, forcing myself to remain unruffled even as I watch his vivid blue eyes dance with anticipation.

"See for yourself." Slowly, his black wings retreat until I'm no longer surrounded by them.

From the corner of my vision, I catch twinkling and turn toward it. Sucking in a breath, I surprised to see dozens of golden shimmering fairies surrounding us. Dressed in gilded armor, their wings sparkle with gold, silver, and various shades in between. "What are they?" I ask, though it's obvious they're fairies, but it's also apparent they are special too. Thankfully, they don't seem upset or angry. Only protective. "What are they guarding?" I keep hold of Pax's arm as he faces them.

"They are the guardians of Werethea, the soul of the fairy realm," he says softly and bows.

I bow with him about to ask what Werethea is when several of the guardians gasp.

"I didn't bow right?" I'm confused and more than a little worried, though I look to Pax for help.

He smiles, clearing his throat. "It's unusual for someone of your stature to bow at all," he says.

"Oh?" I straighten and try to smile though I think it might have come out as a grimace.

“They know who you are and consider you bowing to them a great honor.” He stands and pats my hand and I loosen my grip slightly.

“Well it’s an honor to meet them,” I respond a little louder so they can hear.

Pax nods and steps forward. I go with him.

“One of the guards. A woman with long silver hair steps away from the rest of the fairies. “Welcome Paxton.” She glances at me, but only briefly. “What is the meaning of this visit?” Her skin is deep brown like wet earth. What stands out are her eyes. Only a shade or two lighter than her skin, they glisten with intellect and curiosity. “The Soul’s whereabouts is a secret few know, and you were told to forget.” Her full lips form a grim line.

“I know, Roton, but Aurora must learn the truth of this realm. It’s why we’re here.” As he speaks, each word gets stronger, like he’s convincing himself as well as the tough leader.

Roton crosses her arms over her armored chest. “I do not think it wise. I can see the darkness in her. Its tendrils still leak into her heart.” She looks at me like I’m a cockroach. Obviously, her shock that I bowed a moment ago has worn off.

I work to make myself invisible, but the effort is useless.

“You know me,” he says, and swallows. “If this weren’t important, I wouldn’t be here, but it is imperative Aurora meet Werethea.” Pax keeps his voice controlled but kind. “The Soul has brought us here so let us pass,” he continues, gritting his teeth and crossing his arms. “Please.” The word is said without politeness. Yet, it wins Roton over and she drops her hands to her sides.

“Very well.” Roton turns away from us and faces the other guards. They part as one to the left and right in a unanimous movement, like they’ve been doing the move for thousands of years. Something tells me they have, and I study them more closely. No wrinkles on their faces. Nothing that would reveal the fairies ages. They might be eighteen or eighteen hundred.

Roton walks through the center of the mass. “Follow me,” she says, her voice clipped.

OceanofPDF.com

PAXTON FALLS in line behind her. I hesitate a moment before hurrying to catch up. There isn't room for us to stand side by side as we pass the guards, so I take the opportunity to give tentative glances to either side of the line, searching the blank faces of the gold and silver guards. The guardians of Werethea, who or whatever that is.

It's difficult to know whether the guards are male or female. Sometimes like with Roton, there's an obvious tell. Hers is her long hair. But come to think of it, male fairies can have long hair too.

Once I'm through the line, I move beside Paxton.

He gives me a tender look, one that is void of displeasure and full of love. My stomach flutters in ways it never did with Carson. Or anyone else.

As I smile, I wonder if Troy has right or wrong. Was Paxton my evil true love? If anything, it was my own choices that led me down the path of dark magic, not the shadowy fairy beside me. Pax was as disappointed in me as Troy when I chose to channel my darkness.

At that line of thinking, my gut fills with guilt and I drop my chin to my chest, wishing I could take all of my horrible choices back. If only, I think and snort.

Paxton looks at me, one eyebrow raised in question.

I shake my head. It feels wrong to speak. It's as though we are moving closer and closer to something divine or powerful or both. Each step brings us deeper into the light, which is so different from the Olclag I know, I wonder if we're no longer in the grimy place.

Though, Pax did say we were at a different time.

Weird.

The whole supernatural, paranormal, fairies, vampires, witches, magic, angels, and whatever else I don't know much about is weird.

“That’s putting it mildly,” a soft voice whispers from behind. Or maybe it was overhead. I look up but see nothing new. Just more light.

Paxton gives me another curious look.

“Did you hear that?” I whisper.

“I didn’t hear anything.” He shakes his head, but I watch his shoulders tense and then relax. He’s on high alert. Then he relaxes again and smiles. “It’s okay.”

“What is?” It’s my turn to be confused.

“Werethea spoke to you. That’s good. She deems you worthy.” A shadow passes over his features and I shudder at what would’ve happened to us—to me if she didn’t feel that way. After only a moment to consider, I push those thoughts aside. They do me no good.

Anxiety twists up the trembling excitement I felt a moment ago and turns to knots. “What is Werethea?” I ask, my voice barely audible.

“She is…” Paxton’s voice trails off. “She wants to show you.” He nods encouragingly as though hearing something I can’t. “It won’t be much longer. We are nearly there.”

I wrap my arms around myself, fighting against my need to run away. There’s a voice in my head, different than the one from a moment ago and it’s telling me I don’t belong here. It’s telling me to get as far from this place as possible.

Paxton stops and I do the same, sensing that whatever is in front of us, whatever it is the guard, Roton is blocking from my view, visiting with the being will change my life forever.

I hold my breath as Roton moves out of the way. Before I can see what it is, I drop my gaze taking the cowardly approach.

Paxton gets down on one knee.

Without thinking, I do the same, keeping my eyes focused on a tiny golden pebble just in front of me and wishing I wasn’t so terrified of letting myself see what Werethea is.

“Welcome, Aurora.” The voice is soft like the fur of a kitten as it brushes against my ears.

I don’t respond. My body begins to shake. I can’t help it.

“Rise Paxton,” she says.

Paxton stands, his fingers brushing against my shoulder, sending a shiver of love beaming through my veins. The unexpected feeling comes in such a wave that I sway and am nearly knocked over.

“Rise Aurora,” Werethea repeats to me.

I do, standing on wobbly legs but keep my focus on my hands.

“You need not fear, Aurora.” Her voice is close and my breath hitches in my throat at her nearness, though I can’t see any part of her yet. “Look at me,” she adds.

I have no choice but to lift my head. My eyes pan slowly from the creamy folds of her long gown until they reach the ends of her midnight hair, hanging past her waist in gentle curls, her small hands at her sides, resting comfortably. She shimmers as though I’m looking at her through a filter. Her waist is small and circled by a thin black belt. As I continue up, I see there’s a charm dangling at the end of a long golden chain. It looks to be filled with a silvery substance and rests between her breasts. I continue up and see she’s wearing a black choker made of what looks like the same material as her belt. It’s shiny and thin. On the end is a small diamond charm. When my eyes take in her face, I start breathing again. Not because she isn’t stunning, because she is, but because I forgot I was holding my breath and need some air. Her lips are thick and pouty and a soft pink. Her face shaped like a heart with large eyes. The scleras are white, and they shimmer like satin while her irises are mostly black with a deep blue ring near the pupil. She has long black lashes. Along the lids is diamond encrusted eyeliner. Her hair is parted in the center of her face and frames it without a wayward strand.

For the briefest moment I wonder if she’s real. Her smile grows larger and I find myself returning it. The longer I look at her, the more beautiful she becomes. Though I guess beautiful isn't the right word. She's beyond anything I've ever seen. Other worldly… Or divine.

Werethea waits patiently for my appraisal. "Welcome to the center of the Olclag. I am the soul of the fairy realm." She pauses.

My throat is dry again, like sandpaper and hurts when I try to swallow.

"You've had a lot going on recently, haven't you?" she asks.

I think I nod but can't be sure.

One of her hands reaches out and takes one of mine. She's neither hot or cold, but a pleasant warm. "It's a pleasure to make your acquaintance, Aurora."

"And yours," I say after several bumbling and embarrassing tries. My gaze falters and I take in our touching hands.

Werethea smiles, seemingly bemused by my idiocy before releasing my hand. "We must celebrate Aurora's visit," she says, stepping back so she can look at Roton.

The guardian leader bows slightly. Then snaps her fingers. Two lesser guards step out of line and go over to her. Roton speaks to them briefly before they rush away.

In that instant, the overwhelming light dissipates, and the lush green forest once again appears around us. It comes alive. Birds sing their songs while other creatures get back to whatever they were doing. Werethea turns and I see a throne made of twigs and blooming flowers in pinks, purples and blues. She sits, crossing one leg over the other. She reaches out a hand. "Come, Paxton."

He takes her outstretched hand.

"How does a party sound?" She looks at him like a mother elated to see her son after a long trip away.

"Wonderful," Paxton says. I can't tell how he feels about Werethea. Reverence comes to mind, but there's also some nervousness too and I wonder why.

My question is immediately answered.

“I’m not upset by your decision to leave the guard, Paxton. No need to be anxious. You did the right thing,” Werethea says. “No need to dwell on it.” She speaks with finality, releasing Paxton’s hand. Then she looks at me. “Before Paxton became a Master at the Fairy Academy, he was the leader of my guard.”

That surprises me and I feel my eyebrows raise as I study him.

Werethea continues, “His dual magics were of great use to me and he was my greatest protector before Roton.” She sighs and looks again at Paxton. “But alas he wanted more from his life, including love.”

I shudder when she speaks the last word. Because I know she’s talking about me, though I can’t help but think of the woman in the market. “You didn’t care that he is born of two magics?” I ask hesitantly, knowing it’s a crime in the upper kingdom.

“Definitely not.” Her features become sharp. “More than one magic is a blessing, not a curse regardless how it is brought about.”

I feel the weight of her words and am grateful she feels that way, mainly because that’s how I feel as well. It’s a relief to know Werethea agrees, but I wonder why. “Who are you?” I ask boldly, clenching my fists a moment before relaxing them. Pax said she is the soul of the fairy realm, but what exactly does that mean?

“I am the original fairy and keeper of this realm. My heart and body keep the realm vibrant and alive.” Her features tighten a moment before she softens them. “But enough about me, for now.” She stands. “A celebration is in order and we will honor you.” She claps her hands and we are no longer in the forest, but in an enormous bedroom suite. “This is yours. I will send the best fairies to help you get ready for the party.” She heads to the silver door and is gone before I can thank her.

Paxton is gone as well, and I wonder what she’s done with him.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER HANDLING PERSONAL NEEDS, I take some time to wander around my room. It's extravagant with a four-poster bed all in gold with gold and stark white bedding covered with dozens of throw pillows. There's also a sitting area that is white and is downy soft. I sink into it a moment and think about using the throw at the other end and taking a brief nap, but there's a knock at my door. Before I can respond, the door is thrown open and three fairies burst in. Their wings are the same in ruby, topaz, and lavender and I gather they are triplets.

"Hello, your highness," they say in unison. One is carrying a dress that is the color of onyx but has a shimmering overlay in her arms. She tosses it onto the bed before facing me. The other two wait. One carries a cherry colored tote while the other has all sorts of bags in her arms. I'm guessing they contain shoes and accessories, but don't know for sure.

I sit up and watch them like I'm in a dream and only an observer until the one who held the dress acknowledges me.

"I'm Clara and these are my sisters, Lara and Tara. We are here to get you ready for Werethea's party." She rubs her hands together before coming to stand in front of me. "Shall we get started?" She holds out her hand.

I take it, allowing her to help me stand.

For the next several hours, the three of them do their thing. They ask me questions, which I answer to the best of my ability. I ask them some as well. The sisters have worked for Werethea for more than five hundred years though they don't look a day over twenty.

When they are finally satisfied with my appearance, Clara motions me over to a full length mirror. My blond hair is loosely curled and pinned up with pins decorated with a black diamond. Each pin together makes what looks like a crown around my head. It's stunning. My dress is strapless in the front and curves super low in the back, giving my wings plenty of room. It's black and tight-fitting, so it clings to all of my curves until it reaches my upper thighs. There's a slit up one side, showing off one of my legs, and giving me the chance to show off the black diamond encrusted shoes. By the looks of them, my feet should be hurting, but they are more comfortable than my most comfortable slippers.

My makeup is smoky, making my blue eyes pop, and my lips are a bright pink that matches the most prominent color of my wings.

"Thank you," I breathe, unable to stop turning from side to side as I study my reflection. The dress is a daring choice and I look older than I am. At the same time, I feel confident, though I asked the sisters how my dress remained up and they snickered before answering that it was by magic. "But it won't fall down," I verify.

"You'll need magic to get it off," Lara says before glancing at her sisters.

"It's amazing," I admit. "Thank you," I say again.

"It was our pleasure," Clara responds just as there's a knock on the door.

"That will be Master Narcissus," Lara says, and her cheeks blush bright red. Tara smacks her lightly before opening the door. Her cheeks have reddened as well.

Not that I blame them. I'm suddenly nervous and unsure what to do with my hands as I turn away from the mirror and toward the door.

Paxton steps in and I stop breathing a moment. He is wearing a black suit with a midnight blue shirt that is the exact color of the steak in his hair and the interior of his wings. His eyes get wide when he sees me, and I think mine do too. As one, we move toward the other.

"I want to kiss you," he says when he reaches me.

I want that too, but don't want to offend the fairies who just spent hours putting me together.

Clara makes a noise and Pax glances at her before continuing. "But I won't. At least not until after the party." He tucks my hand into the crook of his arm and escorts me out of the room and down the hall until we reach a set of double doors. There are two male fairies standing on either side. Dressed from head to toe in gold, they practically blend into the walls and decor. When they see us, they snap to attention and push the doors open.

Night has descended upon the Olclag, but there is still plenty of moody light. Thousands twinkle above us in rows and lines, though they aren't still. Upon closer inspection, I see they are brownies and I send out a silent thank you. A dozen round tables covered in golden cloth and ornamented with gold and silver settings fan out in front of a long rectangle table. It's decorated the same as the round ones, but with only three table settings and three gold and silver high back chairs. I can only look at them for a moment because creatures of all shapes and sizes begin to appear and find places to sit.

My mouth falls open more than once and I have to remind myself to keep it closed. There's a giant of a creature whose backside completely engulfs the little chair he sat on. I have no idea how it isn't smashed to rubble. At another table, there's is a woman dressed in a black hooded cloak that leaves most of her face in shadow. Except the spiraled red horn extending out from the center of her forehead. And then there's a woman whose skin is an emerald green and looks like the scales of an alligator. A thin sheath of a matching dress barely covers the important bits. Her hair is also long and green. It's up in a high ponytail, revealing slightly lighter green pointy ears.

She's an elf, I think, glancing at Paxton.

His surprise is nearly as great as mine, but he doesn't say anything because Werethea walks in followed by her guardians, including Roton who is at her right.

The rest of the tables fill up with others. It occurs to me that there is one creature of interest at each of them and then their entourage. Many look like a watered down version of the creature that caught my attention, including a beautiful woman dressed all in red and an incredibly handsome man seated beside her. No doubt they are in love. I feel the sensations rolling off them. To the right of the woman is another. She has wings, but they aren't like mine. They remind me of a bat. In a table directly to the left of them is a woman with similar wings, though they are much bigger and gray like a storm cloud, and her scaly skin is the same color.

Roton catches my eye and waves us over. Paxton takes my hand and together we weave through the tables until we're in front of Werethea.

She smiles. "You will sit beside me, Aurora." She indicates the seat to her right before sitting.

"O-Okay, thank you," I say quietly, wishing I didn't stutter.

Pax and I make our way around the table where a fairy holds our chairs out for us and pushes them in as we sit.

Once we're seated, our glasses are filled and Werethea picks up hers. Everyone picks up theirs as well.

"It is an honor to have you all with us." She pauses, taking the time to meet each of their gazes. "Aurora is young, but she is the one I've chosen, which is why I invited you all here on such short notice. You would do me a great honor to introduce yourselves and accept her as I have."

My heart stops and I glance at Paxton. "What is she talking about?" I'm not sure whether the words leave my lips or not.

Paxton shakes his head slightly, though it's apparent he knows, but doesn't want to say.

"Let us fill our bellies before we will our hearts," Werethea adds.

Before I can comprehend what she's said, food materializes in front of each of us.

By magic!

I stare at the salad but can't do anything else. The words Werethea said are stuck inside my brain. Finally, I lean over to her. "You accept me for what?" I think I heard what she said, but I really need her to say it again.

"Never you mind, Aurora. Eat. You'll feel better." She picks up her fork, stabs what looks like a small, yellow tomato, and puts it in her mouth. "Go on," she says around the small bite.

I do as she commands, stabbing a similar looking vegetable and gingerly putting it in my mouth. It does taste similar to a tomato, though not quite the same as those I've eaten in the human realm.

Once half her salad is gone, she leans over. "You look extraordinary, by the way." She smiles as she speaks, and I respond in kind.

"It's all because of Clara, Lara, and Tara." I set down my fork and place my hands in my lap.

"Their magic is special, but they can only enhance what is already there." She eyes my wings as she sips her drink, which I notice isn't the same as what's in my glass. Hers is clear and bubbly while mine is pink and slightly frothy. Not that I'm complaining. It's the most delicious beverage I've ever tasted.

"Thank you." It doesn't escape me she's wearing a similar dress to mine, only it's gauzy white with gold and silver threads throughout to match her wings. It also occurs to me that I feel a kinship to her. "Do I know you somehow?" I ask, studying her intently.

There's surprise in her eyes. "My blood runs through your veins, Aurora" she responds softly, glancing out over the crowd before continuing. "And that's why only you can save us."

I don't know what I expected her to say, but that wasn't it. "We're related?"

She laughs and it's a sound that resonates deep in my soul. "That's right, dear Aurora."

I can't even fathom what she means by the second part—that part about only me being able to save us. Who's us? And save us from what? So I do my best to ignore it, thankful the main course appears by magic as the salads are whisked away by an unseen force. Again, each of our plates are different. Hers looks like a stew while Paxton's is some kind of meat and potatoes with a little something green on the side. The big man's plate is enormous and filled with what looks like a rack of ribs the size of a cow. As for mine, it's similar to Werethea's only my sauce is white instead of red. I pick up my spoon and shove a bite in my mouth. My taste buds sing with happiness. Potatoes in alfredo with celery, carrots, onions and mushrooms. My insides immediately warm.

I forget about anything but my food until its gone.

Even dessert is amazing. It tastes like angel food cake covered in strawberries and topped with cream, though it's better than anything I've ever eaten.

Too soon the food is gone, and I know it's time to get back to our celebration which feels more like a meeting.

Werethea clasps her hands together in front of her. "Before the entertainment, I would ask each of you to introduce yourselves to Aurora and tell her how you know her." She indicates the table closest to her, which is the woman with the ruby horn. "Jada, you're first."

The woman stands, removing her hood as she steps over to the center of our table directly in front of me. She bows.

Her hair is long and covered in daisies. It's also a deep red, the same color as her lips and slightly brighter than her horn. Another surge of familiarity washes over me. I clasp my hands together, thinking she does look familiar, but I'm unsure why or how. I would remember if I met a woman with a horn growing from her forehead. But something about the daisies…

OceanofPDF.com

"AURORA," she begins once she's straightened. "We met on your first visit into the Olclag." As she speaks, her eyes flash and she becomes the shirtless and stark white man with the pointy teeth. He called me yummy, I think.

And I'm immediately shaking.

Werethea rests a calming hand on my arm and I relax. "It's alright, Aurora. Jada won't hurt you now." She eyes the man before he shifts again, this time into a black unicorn.

Her shiny black eyes are calm, and she comes forward.

"You must touch the tip of her horn," Werethea says. "In that way, you can get to know her."

I glance at the fairy briefly before looking at Paxton. He seems on edge, but nods. "No worries," he says, giving me a broad smile.

I trust him and swallow before reaching my pointer finger out and prick my finger on the sharp tip. Before I can pull away to see if I'm bleeding, I'm whisked away into a land not unlike this Olclag. Filled with bright white flowers like the ones in her hair and lush greenery. Off to the right is a whole herd of unicorns.

Jada nickers and I understand what she's saying. That they are her family. Sadness permeates my heart and I face the unicorn. She changes into the woman with red hair.

"I left them to help Werethea. It was my calling to be the Olclag's healer—to be the healer. But all things must come to an end and Werethea has been around for thousands of years. Her time has come." She takes my hand, turning it so the finger I pricked on her horn is facing us.

And we are no longer in Jada's land, but someplace else. It's dark and foreboding. In the distance is a castle. At once I recognize it as the one in my dream when I passed out on my front lawn. It seems like forever ago, but the castle is unforgettable.

I blink several times. “What is this place?” There is a slight prick on my finger. I catch my breath as blood rapidly flows from the wound, down my hand to my wrist before it trickles to the ground. As soon as the first drop of my blood touches the darkened and decaying terrain, it changes. The decay vanishes and is replaced by a seedling. Vibrant green, the stem grows rapidly before the bloom of a white daisy touches the back of my hand. The flower grew in seconds. Surprised, I look to Jada for answers.

“This is the future of the fairy kingdom if you do not accept your fate and take your place.” Her eyes are kind and I sense the rightness of her words.

“But I don’t understand,” I say, caressing the flower after my wound heals.

“Your blood is the same as that of the original fairy, Werethea. Only blood from her blood will set this realm right.”

A noise escapes my throat as I try to voice my concerns, but Jada continues.

“You will never be alone. I will be around to help when you need me as will the others.”

Before I can respond, I am back in the Olclag seated between Paxton and Werethea.

Pax rests a hand on my thigh and I’m immediately comforted. He doesn’t say a word, but I know he’s here if I need him and am so grateful.

Jada walks back to her seat, putting her hood up so I can no longer see her face. A kinship has somehow formed between us, like an unbreakable bond. She nods as though to confirm she feels the same thing I do. Then picks up her golden goblet and takes a sip.

It’s then I recognize just how thirsty I am and pick up my glass as well. When I’ve drained the glass dry, I set it back down.

“Next up is Shereneth. Come forward please,” Werethea says.

The gray scaly woman with the enormous wings comes forward. Her dress is sleek, like liquid metal and her hair is long and the color of morning sky. She bows. Then holds out her hand. “If you would be so kind,” she says, her gunmetal gray eyes never leaving mine.

Hesitant, I place my hand in hers. Her skin is warm like an oven and sends a shiver of warmth through me as my mind is whisked away. We are flying. Well, she’s flying and I’m riding on her back. She is in the form of a great dragon. As we sail toward a setting sun, she speaks.

“You will recognize me as the caterpillar who ate Paxton.” She burps like it was only a moment ago, sending a puff of smoke in front of her.

I want to be nervous but can’t help the giggle that escapes my throat. Flying with her is like nothing I’ve ever done before. I think about that part in Harry Potter, when he’s flying on the hippogriff and want to spread my arms wide and embrace the moment. It’s a far cry from how I used to react to even the idea of flying and am glad to recognize far I’ve come and how much I’ve grown.

“We are changed in the Olclag because of the sickness spreading over the land,” Shereneth says, interrupting my thoughts. “Lucretia was chosen to take Werethea’s place. But instead of following her destiny, she used her power to wreak evil in the under kingdom. Soon that evil will spread to the upper kingdom. You must choose to take Werethea’s place or we are doomed to die.”

“But you’re a dragon. You don’t belong in the fairy kingdom,” I say.

“I may not be a fairy, but I do belong in the fairy realm. I cannot remember living anyplace else, nor would I want to. The fairy realm is my home and has been since Werethea was created. She is my dearest friend and understand me when I say that accepting you to replace her isn’t an easy decision. As a dragon, my magic comes from my soul and I've seen into yours. There is darkness in you. Despite that fact and that you momentarily embraced the darkest parts of yourself, you have chosen the light. For that, you deserve to be the next Soul of the realm."

We are so close to the setting sun it feels like I can reach out and capture one of the rays. I want to pinch myself awake from this dream as I glimpse over the side and see just how high we are. I can barely make out anything below us. It's my decision she said, but whatever I decide there will be consequences. "Thank you for telling me, Shereneth." As with Jada, I feel a bond with her and know we are connected in a way I may never understand.

"It was a pleasure, Aurora." As she speaks, I am again in the Olclag and beside Paxton and Werethea.

I can't help but sigh with relief since I have a feeling something similar will happen with each of those I meet.

Next, I'm introduced to Carina. She is the alligator slash mermaid creature who nearly killed me in the Olclag. In actuality, she's an elf and it is her sight that warns of danger. She told Werethea about Lucretia's betrayal and my coming. Carina touches her forehead to mine and shows me what will happen to the fairy kingdom should I choose not to take Werethea's place. But she also shows me something else. My future if I do decide. There will be trials and hardships, but there is also family and love. When we return to the Olclag, I hesitate to release her as a tear drops onto my cheek.

"Are you okay?" Paxton leans in and asks.

"Yes," is all I can get out, but I squeeze his hand under the table. I don't dare hope what Carina showed me will come true. Not yet.

Landoth introduces himself next and takes me to the land of the trolls. While there, he explains he is the tree that almost killed Merida and Tiana and apologizes.

"In the Olclag as it is in your time, Lucretia poisoned us to the point where we don't know what we are doing or can't control ourselves." He also explains he's the fairy realm's strength, but he is waning considerably and doesn't think he can hold off the sickness much longer.

After him, I meet the vampire queen, Snow White. She is beyond intimidating, but also, I sense her kindness. We are whisked away to her realm where she shares some of her story and what it means to be given a choice and choosing incorrectly. We talk in a forest with her castle as a backdrop. The fruit on the trees is plump and smells sweet and delightsome, like a perfectly ripened apple.

As we make our way through the orchard, a Hunter whose name is Christopher comes up to the two of us. At first, Snow seems ready to kill him and calls him a traitor. After a few tense moments and a lot of groveling by the Hunter, Snow reluctantly allows him to stay. He represents one of the seven magics of the world—that of the Hunter. Between the two of them, I learn that in every realm there is need for all seven magics. Otherwise the realm couldn't exist. But most importantly, I learn that there is an essence of each of those magics within me as well.

Then Snow shows me the beginning. As in the beginning of Earth's time. When the Unknowns created the world as well as the original vampires, Silindra and Sharra. She shows me the dragons, including the original called Abernathy as well as the creation of all seven magics and the beings correlating with them.

By the time I return to the Olclag and my place at the table, I'm exhausted. It's hard to tell how long Snow and Christopher kept me. It feels like days even though it can't have been too long. Still, all the other guests, except the man beside Snow and the young woman with wings on the other side of her have left. I want to know who they are.

Inside my mind, Snow gives me the answer. The man is her husband, Dorian. He is somehow part of the seven magics too, though she isn't sure how and then there's the girl. Her name is Jasmine. She is their daughter. I smile as I watch Snow return to them. They stand and leave the party, disappearing into a mist that I'm guessing will return them to their realm. The girl, Jasmine studies me a moment before lifting her hand in a farewell wave as she vanishes.

“Now you see,” Werethea says when they’re gone. She stands and pulls me up with her.

“I think so,” I say, as all I’ve been taught circles through my mind in jumbled images and feelings. It’s a lot to take in. Overwhelming even.

Pax stands beside me, a hand rests on my waist. A rush of gratitude swirls through my heart. I am so glad he’s here. Troy got it wrong when he spoke about Pax saying he was my evil true love. Deep in my heart and soul, I know Pax is the only one for me. There isn’t a doubt. He isn’t my evil true love or my pure true love, but he is my true love. Good and evil. Right and wrong. Both exist in him as they do in all of us.

I rub my chapped lips together and lean against Paxton. “I do,” I reiterate, wishing for some water. At the thought, a glass appears in my hand and I drink it, not even bothering to be surprised.

When I finish, the glass is gone, and I force myself to believe I did actually drink water and that it wasn’t a figment of my imagination.

“Good. Now, Paxton, I need you to leave us,” Werethea says. “Aurora and I require a moment alone.”

He tenses behind me and I lean into him further. I don’t want him to go.

“Very well,” she says with a sad smile. “What I will now reveal affects both of you anyway, but it will be hard to hear.” She moves in close and takes us each by the hand.

OceanofPDF.com

THE THREE OF us are no longer at the party. The tables are gone, and the landscape is completely different. Where we are now is also a mystery. Walls of water roar on either side of us, misting us. Directly in front is a golden throne and behind us is darkness. Above, millions of stars twinkle and under our feet is a ruby paved road.

Werethea stands between Pax and I, but only for a moment and then she turns us, so we are in a triangle and facing each other. “You must understand,” she begins above the thundering water. “What I’m about to tell you must happen. Otherwise, the fairy realm and everyone in it will cease to exist… except Lucretia and her followers. But that cannot be. For once she takes over the fairy realm, after a time it won’t be enough, and she’ll move on. Power is a ravenous master and must be fed. She won’t be satisfied with just this realm for long.” Her eyes bore into Pax and then me. “Do you understand?”

I am shivering with cold and fear but speak softly. “Yes, Werethea.” After all that’s been shown to me by the others, there is no question what she’s about to tell us is the truth. I couldn’t doubt her even if I wanted to.

“Paxton, you have known me a long time. Despite your choices, do you believe I will not lie?” Her dark eyes wait patiently for him to respond.

Pax tugs me close to him, but nods. “Of course, Werethea. You have always spoken truth.” His jaw works in frustration, but only because he doesn’t want to hear what she has to say any more than I do.

“Good.” Werethea notices my shaking and stops the water, leaving me feeling exposed. The quiet is deafening too. She notices and starts the water again, but more slowly so that the water trickles down in a soft rush.

I sigh with relief and think of a cloak for warmth. One surrounds me and I snuggle into it. Pax pulls me against him, and I smile. Whatever she will tell us, we can get through it because we have each other.

A passage from one of my aunties spell books comes to mind.

Love is more than a feeling.

It's the beating of your heart.

The intake and exhale of your breath.

Without your true love, there is no life.

For when love is real, it realigns your every attribute.

Even your soul befalls change.

Twined as one.

When I read the words, I was with Carson and chuckled, thinking the person who wrote those words must've had one too many drinks of the hard stuff.

As the words fill my mind, I realize true love is its own kind of magic. When it's real, there is nothing more powerful in all the world.

"Aurora," Werethea says, snapping me back to the here and now.

"Yes, I'm listening," I say.

She closes her eyes a moment then opens them, and I swear I see fear. Quickly, she blinks and whatever I thought I saw is gone. "To save our realm requires the ultimate sacrifice," she begins.

"What's that?" I glance back at Paxton to see if he knows. By the look on his face, it isn't good.

"That cannot be," he says, his voice like steel as his hold on me tightens.

"I'm afraid so," Werethea says. "As you know, Aurora possesses all of the magics."

"There must be another way." Pax is furious and also scared. I sense both in him and wonder why.

“This is why I only wanted to talk to Aurora. I knew how difficult this would be for you to accept, but accept you must, Paxton.” The sadness leaves Werethea’s face and is replaced by a furious determination.

“Please clarify,” I say, my anxiety rising. “Lucretia stole most of my magic. I’m of little use really.” I hold out my hands like she can see my lacking.

“It isn’t your magic I need.” She blinks several times. “But I will clarify by getting right to the point.” She looks up at the twinkling night and then nods. “You are pure and rare and the best of all the fairies in the land. For that reason, you must die in order for the fairy realm to live.”

“I—” She must have sipped too much of her fairy juice and is confused or drunk. Before I can say that, I sense she is completely, one hundred percent serious. Not only that, but like the bonds I felt with the others tonight, there is a connection between her and I. For that reason, I know she is telling the truth.

Werethea continues. “Not only must you die, but your true love…” At that, she looks at Paxton. “He must be the one to kill you.”

Paxton is tight as a coil. I feel his body stiffen and get the sense he intends to whisk me away at any moment.

“So Lucretia’s curse over me must come true regardless,” I say.

“Yes,” Werethea says. “By the time she realized her curse was fulfillment of the prophecy, it was too late.” She shakes her head. “But even the wicked can’t escape their destiny,” she adds with a desolate smile.

“You will have to find another way because I don’t care what you say, I will never kill Aurora.” His hard voice breaks. “I can’t.” Tears fill his eyes and I see even he knows Werethea’s words are genuine.

“It must be done here, in the heart of the Olclag and you must retrieve the blade from Lucretia—the one you used on her those many months ago.”

At her words, shame reddens my face. “I am sorry for that,” I whisper.

“Don’t be.” She give me a gentle smile. “Sometimes we have to momentarily embrace the darkness so we can appreciate the light.”

I nod and she pulls me into a hug. At Paxton’s absence, I’m instantly afraid, but also resolute. We will do this. Paxton will kill me with Lucretia’s blade here at the heart of the Olclag and I will die. It must be done.

Werethea whispers in my ear so softly, I barely hear her. “I need to make Paxton forget all that’s been said. Otherwise he will do something foolish. I sense him making plans even now. We both know I’m right about what must be done. It’s imperative or the fairy realm with be destroyed. Understand?”

“Yes,” I say just as softly, and I suddenly feel alone. The burden of what must happen is mine to endure and I nod. “Do it.”

“Thank you, Aurora.” As she speaks, the world begins to swirl like rain on a painting and I am back in my seat. There is no one else around. Not even Paxton. At his absence, I’m afraid and push out of my seat. “Pax,” I shout, taking off in the direction we came from.

Inside the castle, I head down the hall toward the room where the fairies got me ready. As I reach my door, I sigh, wondering where he could be.

“Aurora.”

It’s Paxton. He sounds tired. Steeling myself against all I’ve learned, I plaster a smile on my face and turn. “There you are,” I say, rushing into his arms.

His hair is tousled, and his shirt is untucked from his pants, several buttons undone, giving me a glimpse of his muscled chest. Even his feet are bare. “I must’ve fallen asleep,” he says as his arms surround me in a cocoon of warmth.

I inhale the scent of him. “It wasn’t the worst party I’ve ever attended,” I say with a forced laugh.

“Yeah.” I feel him smile against my hair. “But the food was good.”

I turn into his arms and look up at him. He’s the most handsome man or fairy in all the realms. No doubt about it. And he’s going to have to kill me. At that thought, I feel my face fall.

“What’s wrong?” he asks, suddenly on high alert. “Let’s go into your room. I’m sure it’s nicer than mine.”

I open my door and walk us passed my bed and to the window. Stop and turn so that I can put myself back in his arms. “Can we stay here in this room, just the two of us forever?” The words come out with more force than I intended, but I do mean them.

“Just the two of us?” His face turns serious. “I could live with those terms.”

“Me too.” I tilt my head up, hoping he’ll understand what I need. His lips on mine.

“You want me to kiss you, don’t you?” He gives me a sensuous smile.

“If you—” Before I can finish, his lips brush against mine. It’s all the encouragement I n need, and I wrap my arms around his neck, my fingers playing with the edges of his hair.

He crushes me against him, and our mouths become hungry. With a low growl in the back of his throat, he presses my mouth open and we are lost in each other.

OceanofPDF.com

I WAKE JUST as I fell asleep, with my body across Paxton's. A quick perusal of the room reveals we are no longer in Werethea's castle, but back in the hovel in the Olclag in our current time. Though I knew Pax and I couldn't stay in that moment forever, while we spent the night in each other's arms, I hoped.

Stifling a sigh, I untangle myself from Pax and stand.

He face is serene like he doesn't want me to know how he's feeling, and I realize there is still so much I don't know about the fairy. Like how old is he really?

Paxton stands as well and pulls me into a side hug. "My love," he whispers, kissing my cheek.

Tingles run the length of my body as memories of our time together rush through me. "Hi," I say, glancing up at him.

"When we finally fell asleep," he lifts an eyebrow and my face gets hot. "Werethea told me we need to go to the center of the Olclag and there we will find what we need to save the fairy realm."

Profound sadness overwhelms me a moment and I wish he could remember our conversation with Werethea. About what has to happen. To me. And what he has to do. To me. As I search his eyes, it's obvious he doesn't. Really, it's for the best. At least for now. "Good," I say, clearing my throat and rolling back my shoulders.

Merida and Tiana's laughter filters over to us.

"I have it—" Pax begins but is interrupted.

"It's about time you both woke," Merida says coming out of the kitchen and pulling something from her pocket. "While you were asleep, that guy Troy appeared out of thin air and gave me this letter." At the memory, I see her face react with surprise.

"He came here?" I go to her and take the letter from her outstretched hand. “What do you mean?” I ask confused. “Where is he?” I turn in a circle, searching the hut for a sign of him, but am disappointed.

“It was weird. He wasn’t here-here, but here enough to give me the letter.” Merida sounds crazy, but no crazier than what Paxton and I just went through.

“What did he want?” I glance out the dirty window at the dreary Olclag unsure about the time. It could be midnight or midday.

“He didn’t say anything. Just gave Mer the letter before he vanished.” Tiana wipes flour from her hands onto her yellow apron. “It was bizarre and scared the crap out of me.”

“Of us,” Merida adds, tucking her hands into her back pockets.

“What does it say?” Pax leans in as I turn from the window and open the letter. There isn’t much written in his handwriting.

It’s super short and to the point. More a message than a letter.

Dearest Rory,

I haven’t forgotten about you. Be courageous. Help is on the way!

Your Friend,

Troy

I can’t help but smile. What Troy wrote isn’t urgent or even necessary, but it’s exactly what I need to hear. Warmth tingles through my body. He’s forgiven me and I’m glad, though a wedge of guilt interrupts my good feelings. Strata is still dead because of me.

Merida and Tiana are back in the kitchen, talking quietly between themselves. Though our situation isn’t great, it’s amazing to see them again. Nostalgia washes over my heart as I think about our baking cookies, pies, cakes, whatever we could think of when we were in elementary and junior high. Not to mention all of the fun and wild dances we choreographed. In those moments, our friendship solidified. We became more than friends, our bond like sisters.

“Are you guys hungry?” Merida asks, smiling lightly. There are still deep shadows under her eyes. Still suffering from the ill effects of this place, but okay. She holds out a plate filled with something that smells delicious.

Except I'm not hungry and the scent rolls my stomach.

Tucking Troy's letter into my pocket, I walk over and sit on one of two rickety chairs along the small island. "You've been busy," I say, studying my friends.

"When I woke up, I was famished. T and I made these. Here you go." Merida sets the confections on the counter between Pax and I as Tiana set a plate in front of each of us.

"Thanks." I force myself not to wrinkle my nose.

Pax acts like he hasn't eaten in a week and takes one, devouring it in two bites. "Amazing," he says after swallowing as he picks up another.

I watch him in fascination. "You have a little sugar," I say, and pause, wiping at the powdery goodness from the corner of his mouth.

He watches me, his lips quivering slightly, and I know he wants to kiss me again.

"How long were we out?" I ask before I give in and let him, and then have to explain.

"A few hours," Tiana says before taking a bite of a scone. "But Merida woke not too long after you guys went unconscious, so I didn't have much time to worry, especially when Troy said you both were fine."

"I'm so sorry we left you alone like that." I pick up a ball of sugar from the plate and stick it in my mouth. It melts on my tongue, sending my taste buds into overdrive. But the queasiness subsides some.

"Don't even worry about it. I'm just glad you," she pauses and looks from me to Pax before going on, "are both okay."

Can she tell something happened between us? Vampires are supposed to have an extra super keen sense of smell. I look down at my hands a moment.

Pax nods. “Me too.” He wipes his hands on a napkin before reaching back and pulling the map from his pocket.

“What’s that?” Whatever Tiana senses, she dismisses it, moving the nearly empty plate to make room.

“This is a map of the Olclag,” he says, spreading it out and pointing at the very center where there’s a set of golden wings. “We need to get here. Werethea said we will find what we need…” He trails off and looks at me.

It’s then I notice my hands are clenched into fists and my breathing is erratic.

“What’s wrong?” he asks, but Merida and Tiana have the same question on their expressions.

“Nothing.” I straighten and shake my head, focusing intently on the map. “Is this us?” I point at the little hut on the map. It isn’t very far from the center of the Olclag. At least it doesn’t look too far on the map.

“Yes,” he responds after a few moments. “It’s been a while, but I should be able to get us there by midafternoon if we leave first thing in the morning.”

“Sounds like we have a plan,” Merida says. Her gaze lands on the window before looking away. It’s apparent she isn’t excited to go back outside, and I don’t blame her.

“Should we leave them here?” I don’t want them to see what will happen once we reach the center. Pax will have to kill me. But first I somehow have to get the blade from Lucretia.

Tiana and Merida voice their objections. I appreciate the effort, but I don’t want them to watch me die. Nor do I want to worry about them dying on our journey.

“Why don’t we find a way out first. Help Tiana and Merida get back to the human realm and then you and I can go alone to the center." That sounds like the best idea to me. It's important they're safe and living their best lives. "Please," I add in a small voice.

Paxton takes my hand and shakes his head sadly. "I know what you're trying to do, and I appreciate the effort." He glances at my friends. "They appreciate your need to keep them safe, too, don't you?"

"Not really," Merida says, crossing her arms in frustration, though I sense her hesitancy.

"Not at all." Tiana shakes her head vigorously. "It's probably hard for you to get your head around it, Rory, but I'm a vampire. You need me." She sounds hurt, but mostly determined.

"And I have some magic," Merida adds.

I shouldn't be surprised, but I am and want to hear all about it. "Thanks guys." It warms my heart to witness the way the care.

"Besides, we don't have the time to get them out of here even if there was a way out. Lucretia has sealed us in here and her magic is anything but weak, right?" His gaze falls from my face and back to the map where he traces the path we will follow with his finger.

"Right." I'm beyond sad. This journey isn't going to end well for anyone, least of all me.

We spend the next hour making plans and packing whatever supplies we can find before Paxton tells us to get some sleep. Merida and Tiana take the bed in the one bedroom while Pax takes the floor, leaving me the couch in the living room.

After a couple of hours of tossing and turning, I fall into a fitful sleep…

I'm dreaming. At least I think so. I'm no longer in the hut but the common room in the academy. It's empty except a hunched over fairy who's sweeping the floor the old fashioned way. As I pass by him, he looks up.

“Can you see me?” I ask.

He tilts his head to one side and lets out a crazed cackle before turning away and continuing his work.

“Okay.” I hold up my fingers and see them though they appear faded. Like a ghost.

From down the hall, I hear someone speaking and move toward the sound. The hall and upcoming door is the same one I exited through with Paxton on the night of my eighteenth birthday. Carefully, I step out, making sure the door closes quietly before heading over to the field. Like that night, there is a large group of fairies dressed in various colored uniforms. All are standing at attention and Lucretia is addressing them. Lucretia has a full on army.

Is this a memory, I wonder.

Despite the fact that I want to leave this place, I can’t. Without trying, I glide over to Lucretia until I’m only a few feet away.

“The upper kingdom won’t know what hit them,” she shouts, addressing her army.

They cheer once in unison.

I’m two feet away.

“We will invade with our full force and take no prisoners!”

There’s a crazed ferocity on her face. I can’t look away even when I’m so close I can see the little hairs on her face.

The army roars twice in unison.

“Together, my friends, we will take what is rightfully ours!”

Three cheers from the crowd in unison.

I glance down and see the blade is on Lucretia’s belt. That’s why I’m here. Without knowing how, Werethea has brought me to Lucretia to retrieve the knife. Holding my breath, I reach out. As my fingers brush the hilt, Lucretia’s gaze turns and falls on me. A deadly stare emits from her vivid eyes. She speaks one word and with magic I’m back in the hovel drenched in a cold sweat. Breathing heavily, I clasp my hands together. Hold it together, I think.

"Aurora?" Paxton's voice cuts through my fear.

I take a deep breath. "Everything's fine. Go back to sleep."

OceanofPDF.com

THE NEXT MORNING, we are up early. Paxton uses his earth and air magic to cloak us, similar to the one used to cloak the hut. Paxton explains his magic and the hut have become a part of the Olclag over the years, but that the creatures within will sense us once we step out of protective barrier surrounding the hut.

I'm terrified to leave but push those feelings down since the fate of the fairy realm rests in my hands. Or more accurately my blood. It must be spilled. There's no time to be afraid or to bemoan my situation. Fate is a freaky fiend and escaping is out of the question.

"Ready?" Paxton asks, taking my hand once we're outside. Off the porch and down the path we go. He's wearing a pack and a small smile. If I didn't know better, I would think we were off on an adventure.

"Yes." But I force us to stop at the edge of the barrier. I can't see it, but I sense it and close my eyes, ordering myself to be strong.

Merida is rattled too. Tiana has an arm around her shoulder, working to comfort her. "I swear if anything gets near you, I'll suck it dry before it has the chance to pounce."

Merida swallows and nods and then the two of them cross the barrier.

"You saw what I did to that caterpillar thing," Tiana continues, this time talking over her shoulder to me. "I have no problem killing the monsters." She is intense and I don't doubt she means it.

According to the information we were provided in the human realm, vampires can live forever and should be avoided at all costs. A stake can hurt them, but not for long. The type of vampire determines the way to kill one and none of those ways are easy. The knowledge gives me a whisper of solace, but not much. Because as kick butt as Tiana now is, she hasn't trained. It helps that she's fearless. She proved herself when she killed the caterpillar thing, but that isn't the same. "I know you will," I respond, gritting back all of the things I want to say.

She smiles grimly, her focus momentarily shifting to Merida.

With only a slight pause, I step over the mostly invisible barrier surrounding the hut. Immediately, I feel movement beneath my feet. The insects and rustlings of unseen creatures stop. Silence permeates the air. Even the trees grow quiet. Sinister.

Though I have only a little magic left, I pour it into Paxton's cloaking magic. Paxton feels what I've done and squeezes my hand.

"We're going to get through this. I promise." There is so much love in his words and etched across his features.

In that moment, I think about telling him the truth. About what will happen when we reach the center of the Olclag. That I only hope he can get through what has to be done. My job is the easiest of the two. I just have to die. But he has to kill me. If the roles were reversed, I don't think I would have the resolve to go through with it, even knowing what's at stake.

I hope Paxton does.

As we trek through the gray and swampy Olclag, menace lurks all around us. Like a loosening coil on a spring, trying to hold back, but barely able to contain itself. I keep close to Pax while occasionally checking on T and Mer. Merida moves more confidently as each moment passes. I see it in the way she holds herself next to Tiana.

Without incidence, we come to the end of the path and the edge of a forest. Even Paxton is surprised we haven't been accosted by something monstrous yet. He pulls out the map. "We need to pass through here."

"Seems sketchy," Merida says, her voice small as she hugs herself.

"And dark," Tiana adds.

"But you can see in the dark, right?" That's another benefit of vampirism. Really there are lots of benefits, except one. And I wouldn't be able to tolerate it. She has to drink blood to survive. Gross. No more real food. I think the term, eat to live came from a vampire.

"Of course, but Merida can't." I think she forgot for a moment that she can see in the dark but covers it up with her comment. "Did someone bring a flashlight?"

I think about a light in the darkness to illuminate our way. Magically, a ball of light appears a few feet above my head. It's bright red with shades of pink.

"It matches your wings," Merida says, gratefully.

I glance back, having forgotten about my wings again. Will I ever get used to them? It's doubtful.

"That's because her magic and her wings are connected," Pax says, distracted as he moves to one side searching for the edge of the forest for something. It's then I remember the night he came out of the forest. I was at a party and a drunk student was trying to have his way with me. Foreboding rushes through my heart at the memory followed quickly by appreciation.

I can't help but feel a hint of regret over the situation. The guy—Jesse deserves some payback!

Before I can mull over what I want to do to the guy, a shadowy image materializes. Bare chested, I recognize that it's Jada the unicorn. Except the sickness of the Olclag has changed her in many ways.

"You really do smell yummy," he says, flashing his pointy teeth.

From behind Jada, Paxton pulls out his wand, ready to pounce.

Tiana growls, bending at the waist.

"Wait," I say, holding up a hand. There's something different about Jada this time. I'm not sure how I know, but the feeling is tangible.

Neither Pax or Jada move, and I realize I'm holding them off with my magic. “Jada,” I say softly, embracing the connection between us.

“I know you now. We’ve met.” Jada changes into the beautiful woman with red hair, a look of confusion muddling her features. “I didn’t recognize you the first time.”

“It’s okay,” I say, and without thinking I reach out and touch her shoulder.

“Don’t,” Paxton says, fighting against my magic.

I shake my head at him as Jada’s magic rushes into me. A cooling balm, it travels along my veins until it reaches my heart. There, Jada’s healing magic swirls, pumping her therapeutic magical elements into me. I pant at the change because it’s strong and immediate. I’m mended in a way I didn’t recognize was broken. I barely comprehend what’s happening before I feel my newly altered magic travel from my heart, down my arm and out through my palm and into Jada.

Confusion and shock changes Jada’s expression as a sparkling aura begins to shine through her pores. In an instant, she is no longer the woman with red hair, but an inky black unicorn with a ruby red horn. She shakes her mane and stomps one foot.

I’m surprised too because I don’t understand how this is happening, but I’m glad. At least I think so. It feels right.

Jada whinny’s and shifts forms into the woman again. “Lucretia’s sickness no longer resides within.” She looks at her hands, which are plump and full of life, the way I saw them when I was with her at Werethea’s party. “Thank you, Aurora.”

I relax my magical hold on Pax and Tiana as I study the unicorn woman. “I don’t know what happened, but my magic is healed too, and I know it’s because of you. I owe you my thanks.” I pull back my hand, but she grabs it and pulls me into a hug, laughing happily.

“You are a gift to us all,” she says, pushing me away from her so that she can look into my eyes. “I will join you on your journey and be of whatever help I can.” She turns her attention to Paxton. “Fairy guardian, you needn’t worry about me any longer. Aurora has driven all of the disease from me and I am whole and once again in control of myself. Rest assured, Lucretia's malevolent magic no longer affects me." She blinks several times, waiting patiently for Paxton to respond.

He lowers his wand. "Very well, Jada." He sounds like one of Werethea's guardians and for the briefest moment I can see him as he once was. Garbed in golden armor, his wings various shades of silver and gold as a permanent shimmer hovers all around him.

"Aurora, why don't you ride on my back?" Jada shifts into her unicorn form, nudging me lightly.

"Thank you, but I'll walk," I say, patting her neck. She shakes her head but moves back. "I hope I haven't offended you. It's just I prefer to walk on my own." With my magic healed, I sense a strong tugging. Toward what I'm not sure.

"I am not offended, Aurora," Jada says. "Will you introduce me to the others?"

"With pleasure." I introduce Jada to Tiana and Merida. My friends are both more than a little star stuck. It isn't every day one of your childhood fantasies is fulfilled by being in such close proximity to a real life unicorn.

"Can I ride on your back?" I hear Merida ask. Her hands are clasped together like she's meeting her celebrity crush. She bats her eyelashes several times before taking a cautious step toward the beast.

I smile as I move close to Paxton. He pulls me into his arms and kisses me thoroughly, taking my breath away. When he releases my lips, I smirk. "What was that for?"

His fingers still tangled in my hair, he gazes on me with hunger and devotion. "You know I love you, right?"

I hold my breath at his words because while I believe him, it's new to hear him say it so boldly. "Yes." I take his face in my hands, stroking his cheeks with my thumbs as I search his eyes. "And I love you, Pax." I pull him down and kiss him again. This time I take the initiative and deepen the kiss.

A low rumble emits from his throat as he tightens his hold, his hands moving down my back and around my waist.

Tiana clears her throat. “You two aren’t alone you know? And in case you forgot, just about everything in this place wants to eat us.”

Merida giggles.

I untangle myself from Pax. Tiana’s hands are on her hips, but she’s doing her best not to smile. “Sorry about that.” That isn’t true. I’m not sorry. Since I’m going to die soon, I want as much time with Pax and my friends as I can get.

Jada kneels and allows a nervous Merida to climb on her back. I’m grateful because I know she’s safer near the unicorn.

We step into the forest together, Pax and me. My red glowing light rests above Pax’s head, making the thick and dank forest feel even more menacing. Occasionally I see the glowing yellow eyes of mysterious creatures as they track us, but they never leave the protection of the undergrowth. “What are they waiting for?” I whisper to Pax. It’s almost more stressful anticipating their attack. My shoulders strain and my legs quiver with expectation.

“They won’t attack,” Jada says.

I turn back, expecting her to have shifted back into the form of a human, but she’s still in her unicorn form and I slow to walk beside her. “Why not?”

“Because they sense what you did to me and are hopeful you can do the same for all of them.”

I wait for her to say more. After a few long minutes, she continues. “You saw what the Olclag can be. All of the creatures in this place were once good and filled with Werethea’s light and soul. Lucretia poisoned us all and turned us into monsters.”

“So they are fighting against the sickness?” I ask, hoping she won’t reveal what will happen once we get to the center of the Olclag. I don’t know whether she knows my destiny or not and want to keep my friends and my love from the pain as long as possible.

They don't know? Jada's voice is inside my head, tender and filled with kindness.

I shake my head. Then, like I'm speaking to myself, I explain what Werethea did by removing Paxton's memory of her telling him.

It will be difficult for them, especially the guardian. He loves you. That much is clear. In the end, they will understand. She pauses. You will make sure they understand. Uneasiness permeates her words and I get why. She doesn't want to return to what she was. Nor does she want to die. My sacrifice means she will never have to succumb to Lucretia's sickness again.

I am sorry for what you must endure, Jada says.

Thank you.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN OUR GROUPS exits out the other side of the forest, it's late, not that the sky is much different. Gathered in a circle around a magical fire, we eat the remainder of the scones before getting some sleep. Tiana takes first watch.

As she stares out into the night, I can't help watching her. Physically, she hasn't changed much. She's still lean and beautiful. But the way she carries herself is different. No longer worried about mortal and human frailties. She is different in other ways too. There's a lot about her that's the same too. Her kindness. Protectiveness. Even her occasional silliness is there. She's still my best friend and I will miss her. Merida too. They are like sisters to me.

My mind wanders from my friends to my aunties. They are the only parents I've ever known. They were there for me when I skinned my knees trying to skateboard and each time I tried and failed at something. As well as my successes. They were my greatest cheerleaders. Physically as well as emotionally. Every good and strong and courageous part of myself exists because of them. Because of their love for me.

I wish I could tell them that. The last time they saw me, I gave into my dark magic, to all the wicked parts of myself. A wash of shame overwhelms me, and I close my eyes against those that I hurt and all I did to them…

At once, I'm no longer in the Olclag but standing off to the side of Lucretia. She's in her office, speaking with a group of fairies. I somehow know they are her commanders and she is talking war strategies with them. Most of it goes over my head until she mentions my mom and dad.

"Orion, you will capture the king and queen, secure them, and then wait for my instructions. No matter what, I want them alive." An oily smile lifts her features.

“I thought we were taking no prisoners,” one of the commanders says.

“We aren’t,” she snaps, perturbed he questioned her. “They will witness what I intend to do to this realm before I kill them. Is that clear?”

The fairy agrees.

“Very good.” She stands and walks over to a table covered in an enormous map of the realm. “We will enter here because that is the last place they will expect us.”

I glance over her shoulder and see it’s in the castle and says nursery. A small memory filters through and I realize that’s where I slept when I was a baby. “My bedroom,” I say and then cover my mouth.

Lucretia pauses and turns, her gaze seeming to cut into me, though I know she can’t really see me. Still, she senses I’m there and reaches out a hand. “I will kill them painfully. You can count of that.” The words are directed at me, but her commanders respond as though she is talking to them.

I swallow as wild fear causes my heart to clench. My eyes shut and I wish to be far away, but when I open my eyes, I’m still in the room. And Lucretia is still staring like she can see me.

“That is all for tonight. Get some rest.” She orders them from the room.

Reluctantly they all leave. Some give her curious stares, but none say anything. When they are gone and it’s just the two of us in the room, she pulls out her wand. “I know why you’re here.”

I’m glad she does because I don’t… until I see the blade still at her waist. I’m here for that.

She smiles. “You can’t have it. All this time I thought your curse was exactly what was needed for me to conquer this realm. Turns out,

I was wrong. Werethea is smarter than I gave her credit for." She sniffs before looking away. "But I learn from my mistakes and I swear the only way you will ever get this blade," she lifts it from its case and points it at me, "if is you pry it from my cold, dead hands." Cocking it back, she throws the blade directly at my head.

I gasp, expecting it to connect, but I am back in the Olclag. Tiana is no longer surveilling the night alone. Paxton is seated beside her. They are speaking quietly, and I strain to listen.

"I feel like I've forgotten—"

Paxton is interrupted by a loud rumbling followed by a crash coming from the forest behind us. He and Tiana stand. Pax pulls out his wand. Tiana bares her fangs.

"Get behind me," Pax shouts flying toward me.

Trees buckle and break against the onslaught of whatever is charging toward us. Murky leaves are shaken loose and rain down, blanketing the forest floor.

Tiana is beside Merida and Jada in on all fours, one hoof digging at the ground nervously.

I'm in the air before I realize it. My wings lifting me up off the ground as dark magic stirs in my chest. It's always easier to default to the fear.

"What is it?" I ask, forcing myself to dig for the magic Jada provided.

"I don't know." Pax's voice is shallow as though he forgot how to breathe. "But we should get out of here." He rips his eyes from me and toward the others. "Run," he hollers at Jada, Tiana, and Merida.

The unicorn takes off.

"Aurora, go. I'll hold whatever is coming off, but you need to get out of here. It has to be you that survives." He sounds so sure of himself. But he's wrong.

I purse my lips. "I'm staying Paxton. If you die, then I die with you."

He rolls his eyes, frustrated. "You are such a drama queen."

"Yeah, well you're a drama king," I huff, but am no longer focusing on him. The thing breaking through the forest has arrived and stops in front of us. It's an enormous tree. The one that almost killed Tiana and Merida. "It's Landoth," I say, surprised.

"Maybe it used to be the troll, but Lucretia's magic has turned him into a monster. He can't be reasoned with." Paxton sends a bolt of magic into the tree.

Landoth roars like a wounded lion when the magic strikes him, charring a black spot into his trunk.

Without a pause, Pax sends another and another.

I can feel the pain radiating off the troll. "Stop," I yell, before Pax pummels Landoth again.

Pax's wand stops mid swing and he looks at me like I'm crazy. "You saw what he did to your friends and what he tried to do to us."

I nod. "That was before…" As with Jada, I feel the bond between Landoth and I. The troll is fighting the sickness. He's fighting against Lucretia's dark magic and what it turned him into. "This time it's different." I carefully fly up to the top of the tree. There is no face, but the limbs quake with restraint as I touch the highest branch. As soon as I do, magic rushes from Landoth and up through my arm and into my heart where there's a heavy change. Strength overwhelms me before I send the magic back out to him.

As soon as the transformed magic touches the tree, it changes from a gloomy trunk with ferocious and gloomy leaves to a lush and exquisite tree before finally shifting into Landoth.

He is surprised and takes a moment to touch his arms and legs and face. "You did it," he says, stunned, but pleased.

"We did it," I reply. Because it was both of us. Somehow, Jada and Landoth have healed and strengthened my magic and in turn I was able to heal and strengthen them.

"I felt that." He steps forward and drops to one knee. "For your courage, I will go with you on your journey. Whatever you need, I am at your service, Aurora."

I glance back at Paxton who is in a state of astonishment and awe. "We can always use a troll," he says, putting away his wand.

Landoth stands as Jada and the others return.

Quick introductions are made before we set off, deciding it's better not to wait until morning.

Over the course of the next five miles, we come into contact with Carina, the elf who used to be the alligator thing that almost drowned me. At my touch, she is renewed to herself with my magic while she also gives me additional sight. With new eyes, I take in the Olclag, able to see each rock and creature is it should be.

"There is still Snow White, the Hunter, and the dragon, but I can't imagine the vampire queen will make an appearance in the Olclag." Paxton speaks gently as we trail behind our growing band of friends once we are on our way again.

WE ARRIVE at a muddy stream when the Hunter arrives. His name is Christopher and I command the others to stay back while I speak with the vampire. As I take his hand and our magic is swapped, I'm given a vision of him as a young man, before he was turned. If he desires it, I have the power to give him back his mortality. "Is that what you want?" The words come out softly, meant only for him.

Tears fill his eyes and I think he will say yes, but finally he blinks them away and shakes his head. "Thank you for reminding me what it means to serve out of kindness and not because of what it can bring me." He pulls me into a hug, and I think for a moment he intends to drink from me. But just as speedily as he tugs me in, he pushes me away. Then addresses me as well as the group. "It's obvious you are in good hands. I will take my leave as you have given me my purpose, but I will remain within the Olclag until your journey is done."

Before I can respond, he is gone like a rushing wind. While I watch, a portal appears and Snow White steps through. She looks at me for a long time without a word, then holds out her hand. I'm starstruck. The woman is like a superstar. She's beyond beautiful, but more than that, she radiates power. It's understandable since she is the vampire queen, ruler of all the realms, including the fairy kingdom. "If you need me to step in and help you with your destiny, I will, but it is better to fight for your realm on your own terms and according to the laws and magics surrounding you."

"Th-thank you." I take her hand. Immediately a surge of incredible power rushes along my veins and beats into my heart before it changes slightly and is returned to her.

As the reformed magic flows into her, Snow's eyes widen. I know why. We are both given a vision of Jasmine in a billowy black dress hovering in the air. Her black wings are spread wide and her eyes closed. Behind her is an eclipse. The sun almost completely blocked out by the moon—at least that's how it looks before the moon seems to shatter and dozens of beams of light break through, striking Snow's daughter. The girl opens her eyes and I swear she is looking right as us. Like me, the girl is transformed, though I don't understand how or why. As quick as the revelation appears, it is gone.

"Thank you, Aurora," the vampire queen says, her voice throaty and warm. "The fairy realm will thrive with you as its soul." She turns and steps back through a portal. I can't help but wonder what she was like when she was my age. Probably had it all together and knew exactly what she wanted out of life and how to get it.

When she's gone, I fall to my knees. Not because I'm weak or defeated, but because I am filled beyond measure. Not that long ago, Lucretia took most of my magic, but these amazing beings have given of themselves to help me become what I am meant to be. Because of their sacrifices, those in the fairy realm will be safe. At least that is my hope. My eyes close and I am whisked away again…

No!

But it’s too late.

Lucretia stands at the head of her army as the gateway to the upper kingdom opens. Any second, she and her army will start a war. The upper kingdom will lose. My parents will be captured, tortured, and finally killed. Lucretia will rule the fairy realm until she has a craving for more.

“We must hurry,” I say, coming to myself and rising into the air. My wings spread out like a cape behind me as my friends jump with various states of bewilderment. “Let’s go.”

OceanofPDF.com

"TELL ME AGAIN WHAT HAPPENED," Pax says. We are leading the group as we come upon a waterfall.

I take Paxton's hand and lean into him while going over again what happened between Christopher and I and then Snow White and I.

"There is still the matter of the dragon. He will appear. We must be on guard," he says when I'm finished and then kisses my fingertips.

Tingles spread along my skin as I sink into his touch. Because my end is near. We are minutes away from the center of the fairy realm. I can feel it. The pulling is so strong, it's all I can do not to run. But I know what happens when I reach the center and I'm not ready. Death isn't my friend but an enemy.

I feel the blood drain from my face. What am I doing? Why am I willing to sacrifice everything for this realm I barely know and for a people who don't even like me? Is it magic? Has Werethea put a spell on me? Question after question flashes across my mind until I pull away from Paxton. "I can't," I say, my breath coming in short bursts.

"What?" Concern etches his features, making his glorious face even more handsome.

I reach out and cup his face in my hands. He wraps his arms around my waist as his eyes flick back and forth searching mine for answers I'm too cowardly to share. "The end," I respond, evasively, walking away.

"But once we reach the center of the Olclag, our journey will only just begin."

I nod, not wanting to contradict him and turn away and wiping at my eyes. "Do you love me?" I whisper.

"With all that I am and more." He is behind me and wraps his arms around me, his face tucked against my cheek.

His touch nearly sends me over the edge. Because I can feel his love and I yearn for him in ways I'm only beginning to understand. Slowly, I turn in his arms and look up into his blue eyes that are so deep and vivid and endlessly loving. "I'm sorry," I say and pull away. Before he can respond, I take off. Running toward my demise.

Paxton yells after me, but when I don't look back, he pursues.

Faster and faster I go until I reach the waterfall. For the briefest moment, I'm confused about where to go next until my wings ascend me up along the edge of the falls. My eyes catch hold of the opening and I fly through. Behind the falls is a cave with a low ceiling. I land and step cautiously inside. The darkness is complete until I use magic to create a light. This time it is a soft pink. Almost as an afterthought I acknowledge that my magic has changed.

I walk quickly, heading further and further into the cave. The remainder of my group is somewhere behind. I can hear the echoes of their feet. When I think I can't go back any farther, the cave opens up to a small glade. In the middle of the clearing is a thick but sagging tree. It's probably five or six feet wide at its base and I guess it's been growing for a thousand years. There is a hole in the trunk, and something is within. Leaves left the tree long ago. The trunk and limbs are gray and stark. I move forward, knowing the pull comes from whatever is within.

Directly in front of the tree, I kneel, not sure what I except to see. Inside the hole is a small and gray-brown creature curled up in a ball. It opens its eyes, hisses and kicks out with its little legs. Though it looks nothing like her, I know the creature is Werethea.

"It's okay," I say and touch one of her withered legs.

Immediately, her thrashing stops and she sighs as all the magic I've collected floods into her.

"Aurora," Paxton calls.

Behind him, I hear the rest of the group, but I don't face them. I can't. Instead I focus on Werethea. Her change happens in moments. Before my eyes, the withering creature becomes the glorious being that is the original fairy. Werethea. She leaps into the air and twirls, throwing her arms out wide as she giggles.

"What's happening?" Merida asks.

Tiana responds, but I don't hear what she says.

After several moments, Werethea lands and helps me stand, then wraps her arms around me. "You did it," she whispers.

"Because of you." I embrace her back, thinking perhaps I won't have to sacrifice anything. Werethea seems fine. But even as I think the words, her body slowly hardens.

She steps back, a look of peace on her face. "You must die before I am completely gone or the realm with fall."

"I don't have the knife," I say, my voice desperate. "I tried to get it, but Lucretia felt my presence."

"You don't need her permission, nor do you have to be sneaky about it. The blade is yours. You possess the power to call it forth Aurora. It will have no choice but to obey." One of her arms turns gray like ash and falls to the earth in pieces like a claustrophobic rain.

"What is she talking about? What's happening?" Paxton is beside me and I glance at him a moment, begging him with my eyes to help me. But he's in shock and for the first time unsure about what it is he should be doing.

Werethea presses a finger to his forehead and says, "Remember." Then she grabs my arm before her fingers break and fall into an ashy pile. "Call forth the blade, Aurora," she says calmly.

I'm not sure how but do the first thing that comes to mind. "Blade, come to me," I say, holding out a hand like I expect it to drop from the sky.

"Again," she says as her knees disintegrate, and she crumbles, falling onto her back while her calves and feet are still upright.

“Blade,” I shout. “I order you to come to me.” I shake out my arm but still don’t feel anything.

Werethea’s eyes close. She’ll be gone in seconds.

I close my eyes as well and think of the blade. The weight of it in my hands and imagine it leaving Lucretia’s side and sailing through the portal and through the Academy and into the Olclag, passing the forest and the waters, through the waterfall and into the cave until it reaches my hand. With a weighty smack, I feel the blade in my palm and open my eyes, wrapping my fingers around the hilt.

Paxton stares as though seeing me for the first time.

I think I smile as thoughts travels in and out of my head at once.

Like the dragon, Shereneth. He never came to me with his magic so I could heal him. Maybe he’s dead.

Then I think about what needs to happen next. Paxton must kill me now or all is lost. My friends will all die. Everyone in this realm will. “Pax,” I whisper, tears filling my eyes, making it difficult to see him.

He swallows and shakes his head. “I can’t,” he pleads.

Beside me, the wide tree begins to shudder and the top half falls to the ground away from us, leaving just a stump. It’s jagged, but I know that is where I need to lay. The sacrifice must happen there. Without a word, I climb up and send my wings away as I lay down against the pointed edges of the tree.

“What are you doing?” Tiana comes over. She’s ferocious and desperate to reach me. Before she can, Christopher is suddenly there and holds onto her. Tiana fights against him, but the Hunter is much stronger than the newly created vampire.

I don’t ask where the hunter came from, guessing he was tracking us the entire time. A small smile lifts my lips. I’m grateful he’s here.

Without seeing her, I hear Merida crying and Jada consoling her. Landoth and Carina are on the other side of Paxton.

“It must be done,” the troll says solemnly.

Carina agrees.

“You know they’re right. I know you do.” Tears leak from my eyes, but I hold out the knife for him. “Take it. You have to. Otherwise the whole realm will die.” I try to sound brave, but my voice is trembling.

Paxton grasps my hand, still holding the knife. “I don’t want to live without you.”

“I’m sorry, but perhaps it’s better this way.” A vision of the beautiful fairy in the market dances across my vision. He will be happy with her instead of me.

He growls. “No. It will always be you, Aurora.”

More tears drip from my eyes. I shouldn’t be glad to hear him say that, but I am. “We’ll do this together,” I say and pull his hand toward my chest.

Tears streak his face as he puts a booted foot on the edge of the stump for leverage, pressing in so the tip of the blade cuts through my clothes and pierces my skin. I want to cry out, but bite my bottom lip to hold it in.

The ground begins to shake from an earthquake. Above us, the rock cracks with a sound like thunder. Rocks crumble and fall. Carina is hit by a larger one in the shoulder and falls back, but Landoth holds her steady, using his magic to put a barrier between us and the falling rubble.

Another thunderclap and the earth shifts beneath us.

“You must hurry, or we will all die,” Carina cries, holding her arm.

I put my other hand over his. “It’s going to be okay,” I whisper and call forth my magic. “Always remember I love you.”

He closes his eyes and looks away, but together we force the blade deep into my chest.

OceanofPDF.com

ANOTHER THUNDERCLAP ECHOES around the cave as rocks fall more rapidly around us.

"We need to get out of here," Landoth shouts, before vanishing from my view with Carina.

"Go then. I'm not leaving her." Devastation causes Pax's breathing to come out labored as he retrieves the knife. He studies the blood. First on the blade and then blooming from my chest.

It's okay, I think. I'm fine. The words come to mind, but I can't get them out.

Aurora, you are the bravest fairy I've ever known. Jada's voice is inside my head, calm and reassuring.

I want to thank her. She's standing beside Merida. Her arms around Jada's neck and is sobbing uncontrollably.

"Mer," I try to say, but I don't think anything comes out. My body is dying. I can feel the life leeching from me as my blood trickles onto the stump, down the side, and into the ground. My breathing slows. My heart stutters.

"No. No. No," Paxton coos. "Stay with me." He climbs onto the stump and tucks my upper body and head into his lap.

"Pax." My heart stops a moment before starting again. Slowly.

Thump. Thump.

Darkness edges around my vision, but I keep my eyes on Pax. He's so sad. I wish I could reach out and comfort him.

Slowly. Thump.

Darkness closes in, more thickly and I strain to keep my eyes open, but it's so difficult.

Slowly. Th

I'm no longer with my body. At least I don't think so. The pain from my wound is gone. There's nothing at all. Except utter darkness and I'm part of it. I thought when I died everything would go quiet, especially my thoughts. But no. All I can do is think. About my friends and Pax. About my aunties. Even Strata. And Carson. Troy and my new friends, Jada, Landoth, and Carina. Even Werethea, Snow, and Christopher…

She did it, an unknown voice whispers, startling me.

"Who's there?" I speak the words. At least I think I do. My conscious mind searches for the voice, but as far as I can tell, there is nothing to see.

Yes. I wondered for a moment, but she has saved the fairy realm. Werethea nearly lost her entire kingdom. If not for the girl.

"Are you talking about me?" Seems kind of rude since I'm right here, wherever here is. But they continue on as if they can't hear me.

It was a close call. My favorite. Nothing better than drama and this world is thick with it.

Yes! I kind of hoped she would stay dark. The girl would have made an excellent villain.

"Stop it! Hello?" I shout this time… into the nothingness.

Her transformation will be exceptional.

Let's wait a little longer. The boy needs to suffer.

Fine, but let's send her back into the Olclag. The one who killed her has taken her body from off the altar. Soon the group will be back at the hovel. Let her spirit follow.

I hear clapping as though a child is excited to visit Chuck E Cheese. Before I can comment about it, I'm whisked away from the nothingness and back into the Olclag where I drift near my body.

The Olclag is no longer shaking as though it will split in two at any moment. Below me, the mournful group climbs down from the cave and moves somberly from the waterfall to the river with Paxton in the lead. He is flying with my body in his arms. If what I heard is correct, he will take me and the rest of the group back to the hovel.

For a moment I'm worried about them. The monsters with the Olclag are dangerous. But as we go, the monsters appear, though I can see them as they are. The nasty looking goblins are actually fairy foxes. As they run, they leave a trail of sparkling dust before them.

Demons race along the edges, back and forth alongside the group. With my improved vision, I see them as the fairies they are, or where before they died. Landoth and Carina trail behind Jada, who is carrying Merida and Tiana. They cling to each other while Jada keeps her head down. Merida is crying heavily while Tiana stares out straight ahead, her eyes puffy with a dam of unshed tears.

Paxton sails over the forest with purpose, and I wonder whether the others can still follow. But there's a force of deep blue magic glowering off him, leaving a trail like magical breadcrumbs.

Sensing my friends are safe, I focus on Pax and my body. It's weird to see it lifeless in his arms. My color is ashen instead of the vibrant peachy-white it was.

"Paxton," I say once he is over the forest and the hut is in view. "I'm here."

He glances down at my body, but quickly looks away, blinking back tears. I wonder what he did with the blade but push the thought away. It doesn't matter. Not right now. Then I think about what those voices were saying. About my transformation and the boy suffering. It's obvious they were talking about me and Paxton. Weren't they?

Softly, Paxton lands and walks up the steps, pushing open the door to the hut with his foot. "Let's put you in here," he says, walking into the bedroom. Using magic, he renovates the space from wilted and white-washed to luxurious and opulent. Amethyst walls with shimmering hints of pink and a sparkling chandelier ceiling. The bedding is no longer drab gray but royal blue with golden leaves.

Carefully, he lays my body against a pillow that matches the bedding.

“Let’s do something about your clothes.” They are bloodied and I’m glad he magics them away. In their place is a long and beautiful dress a few shades lighter than the bedding, except around the collar, which is sweetheart with the sleeves off the shoulder. My hair is down and long and full and clean. There’s a hint of makeup on my lids and my lips are a soft pink. The man has great taste.

“Thank you, Pax,” I whisper softly.

As he adjusts the pillow under my head, the rest of the group crowds in.

“Nice touch,” Carina says.

Jada, who is no longer in her unicorn shape smiles. “If I may, there is one more thing she needs.” With the wave of her horn, a golden crown appears on my head. “There.”

Paxton tries to smile but can only grimace.

“What if I gave her some of my blood?” Tiana pushes her way into the room and moves over to my side. She goes to bite into her wrist, but Merida pushes her hand away.

“It’s too late for that,” she says.

Tiana nods.

“I hate to break up the party,” Landoth says soberly, “but there’s an enormous crack in the Olclag, giving us a way out.” He rubs the back of his enormous neck. “And that means Lucretia is no longer down here.” He glances at Carina and the elf nods. “We are going to follow Lucretia and her army into the upper kingdom. The war is on. That much is obvious. Perhaps it isn’t too late, and we can do something to help.”

“I’ll go too. I can heal the wounded.” She touches my hand. “Until we meet again, Aurora.” Then she and the others leave the room.

Paxton puts an arm on Tiana and Merida’s shoulders. “I’m so sorry,” he says, shaking his head as fresh tears fall onto his cheeks.

They turn and the three of them hug for a long time, finding solace in each other. My heart hurts at their pain and I wish I could take it away.

“What should we do now?” Merida asks, wiping her eyes.

“I want to fight some bad guys,” Tiana says, flashing some fangs.

“As do I,” Paxton says. He glances at my body. “She would want us to fight.”

I nod vigorously. “Yes. Don’t worry about me,” I say.

“Then let’s fight,” Merida says. “Or, at least help. Maybe Jada will allow me to assist her with the wounded.

“That’s a great idea. Come on.” Paxton ushers my friends from the room. Before closing the door, he studies my body. “I’ll be back, my love.”

OceanofPDF.com

"I KNOW YOU WILL," I say, my spirit floating after him, Merida, and Tiana.

There is an enormous fracture between the Olclag and the Academy just off the hut. It wasn't there when Pax returned my body.

"Through here?" Tiana asks.

"Yes but let me go first." Paxton pulls out his wand and steps through.

"I don't need protection fairy man. I'm a freaking vampire." She shakes her head, though there isn't any kind of force behind her words. "You're next," she says to Merida.

Once her red headed friend is through the fissure, Tiana follows.

I try to go through as well, but as soon as I reach the crack, I'm pulled back so that I'm again in the room where my body is. Loneliness overwhelms me.

"It won't be much longer now." Her voice startles me and I watch her spirit float through the ceiling and into the room.

"Werethea?"

"Hello Aurora." Her smile is kind. She looks well rested and at peace.

"What won't be much longer?" I ask, glad the fairy is with me.

"Look." She points at my body.

In my periphery I see a golden light emanating and turn. The ashen color of my skin changes to light gold with a hint of blush. My lips become a deeper pink, but the biggest change is my hair. No longer basic blond, but a twinkling gold that matches the leaves on my dress.

"You are the soul of the fairy realm," Werethea says, clapping her hands softly. "All of my power is now yours."

I hear what she's saying but can't look away from my body.

Werethea's ghost continues. "As the soul of the fairy realm, you are part of the land. With each day, you will feel the connection grow stronger. And Aurora?"

She pauses and I force myself to look at her. "Yes?" She is shimmering and her already ghostly appearance starts to fade.

"Thank you. I know your choice wasn't easy. Go to your love. Paxton Narcissus is the best of the fairies. He was an amazing guardian and though he lost his way in the dark for a while, he found his way back."

I nod as she speaks, knowing all that she says is the truth.

"He is suffering greatly at losing you," Werethea finishes. "It had to be this way." She smiles. "In order for the transformation to be complete. Now go. On your way, be sure to heal the Olclag and all of the creatures within. They have fought, agonized and grieved against Lucretia's wicked sickness for too long. The time has come for them to be whole once again." She rests a hand on my shoulder, but I don't feel it. "Plus, they serve you now. With their help, you can defeat Lucretia and her followers and return peace to the realm."

I take her hand in mine, though it's like I'm holding nothing. "Thank you," I say, feeling my body calling for my spirit to return—yearning for the two to become one. "It was a pleasure to meet you, Werethea. I will do my best to help the realm and live up to your expectations."

She shakes her head, though it's nearly gone. "There are no expectations. Be yourself. This is who you are and what you were meant to be." With that, she is gone.

I stare at the wall and door behind where she appeared a moment ago, hoping she will return, but something inside tells me she won't. It's my turn and while I don't know much about the realm or the fairies, I do have friends who do. They will help me.

Paxton will help me.

For the briefest moment I hover over my body, studying the woman I've become. It's weird to be looking at myself this way. Without insecurity. And though it might seem silly to some, I promise my body I will treat it with compassion and love, above all else. Then, like sliding a glove over a hand, I sink into myself. There's a weight that comes with my newly altered body. A sense of self, sure. But also a sense of all that is required to return the fairy realm to its glorious state once again.

With only a small surge of trepidation, I open my eyes.

All around me are Werethea's guardians, including Roton.

"When did you get here?" I ask, sitting up and resting my feet on the floor.

Roton bows as do the rest of the guards. "A few hours ago, Aurora. We are your guardians now."

As I study them, it comes to me that I know each of their names and strangely, I can see into their hearts. All are here for my protection. All would die for me. That knowledge fills me with a warmth I can't describe. Beyond that, I want nothing more than to protect them too and I would die for them, for every living thing in the realm. Including those in the under kingdom—dead and alive.

Urgency gets me to my feet. "Rise, my friends. We have a lot of work to do."

OceanofPDF.com

WITH A SINGLE THOUGHT, my wings appear at my back. There's a mirror over the dresser and I'm drawn to it, unable to help but admire my wings in the glass. They are enormous and filled with colors of azure, cobalt, and cerulean. Separating the lighter colors are streaks of navy and gold.

My wings beat lightly as though the movement is an afterthought. As I study my reflection, I can't help but wonder if Paxton knew what would happen. Because the dress he put me in matches my wings perfectly. But the crown on my head? It seems like too much and I try to remove it. But it won't budge. Please don't let the crown be a permanent fixture, I think, but know it's just my body's way of reminding me of who and what I am. The Soul of the Realm. What will my parents think? What will my aunties think?

"Let's go," I say, fluttering through the guardians and outside. Above the sky is still murky, but as I fly into the air, I think of the Olclag as a whole and see it renewed.

I turn back to see the hovel and think it whole. In quick succession, I think of the ground around it as well as the path and the trees. The shrubs and the rocks. The weeds and the water. I think of all the creeping things as well as the goblins and the demons.

More quickly than I can comprehend, the Olclag is transformed. The hovel is no longer broken down and dingy, but bright and whole. The trees turn brown and the leaves change to various forms of green. The ground is rich and the cobbled path shimmers gold.

Above, the sky changes from cloud covered to a bright blue and I wonder at how it's done, but not for too long. All around me, the guardians change as well. Their wings no longer silver and gold, but various colors of blue and gold to match my wings. Their armor matches my dress, a cobalt blue with golden leaves.

As I make my way up higher, I'm able to see the waterfall and the river as well as the bog and the weeds. The water is an azure blue while the weeds transform into blooming flowers. Like the rising of the sun, all around the shadows are chased away and replaced by light and replenishment.

Creatures great and small reveal themselves as they shed their sickness and return to the glorious creatures they once were. Goblins return to foxes. Demons are once more fairies…

Including Strata!

I push off with my wings and fly over to her. At first, she's frightened, covering her face in her hands.

"It's okay, Strata."

She peeks at me. "Did you do this?"

I land in front of her and hold out my hand. "Strata, I'm so sorry I got you killed. I'm so sorry for all I did to hurt you." I swallow, hoping she'll forgive me, but knowing it isn't up to me.

"Am I alive again because of you?" She studies her hands, arms, and body.

"Yes," I say, nodding.

"Then all is forgiven."

Relief washes across my veins and I feel my connection to the Olclag grow. All around me is change and it's like the entirety of the realm is thanking me at once. I close my eyes, sinking into the feelings of warmth, kindness, and happiness. That is the greatest feeling. A tremendous joy!

Someone takes my hand and I open my eyes. It's Strata and she's smiling. "Look," she says, directing my gaze to the land around us.

We are surrounded by fairies and foxes. Elves and trolls. Brownies and sprites. As one, they bow. Strata bows too. My guardians stand all around, protecting me though it isn't necessary.

"We are yours to command, Aurora."

“Rise, all of you,” I say, my voice stronger and sounding more sure than I feel.

When they are all standing, I take a deep breath. “As you know,” I begin, turning in a slow circle to address each of them. “Lucretia poisoned the Olclag and the under kingdom. But that ends today. Her tyranny ends today.” I pause a moment, letting my words sink in. Everyone’s eyes are on me, waiting for me to continue and I don’t disappoint. “With your help, we can save the upper kingdom, rid the realm of Lucretia, and either imprison or help those who follow her to see the error of her ways. We can become united once again. Without bloodshed. Without any more killing.”

“We are with you,” Strata says, her voice barely above a whisper.

“Yes, Aurora. We are one hundred percent with you.” The deep voice is in the back, but fairies four deep part and the dragon Shereneth walks through. One of his wings looks smaller than the other as he makes his way over to me. “I am sorry I couldn’t get to you sooner, but as you know, Paxton gutted me.” He glances around the crowd. “Where is the boy? I want to thank him.”

I smile, reaching out my hand and placing it between the dragon’s eyes. He closes them, letting out a deep sound, almost like the purring of a cat. At my touch, his magic filters into me, spinning through my heart where it completes me in a way I didn’t know I was broken. Shereneth is the final piece, I think, sending his healed magic back into him. He shudders as he becomes whole, including both of his wings.

He steps back, a huge smile on his dragon face. Then leaps into the air, twirling his wings and his tail. “Aurora truly is the soul of the fairy realm. Bless her!” He drops to the ground and it shakes at the weight of him.

“Bless her,” the mass says.

“Let us put an end to the bloodshed once and for all,” I say, knowing we will accomplish our honorable desires. Without waiting for a response, though it comes in the form of the multitude roaring, cheering, and clapping, I make my way over to the door. The one through which I entered from the fairy academy. Not everyone will fit through the small opening, so I think of removing the whole wall and it is gone in an instant. Then I walk through followed by the group.

As I go down the halls and into the common room before heading toward the grand entrance, the whole fairy academy edifice changes from leathery black demon skin to golden brick. The lights of the chandeliers gleam even brighter as the brownies regain their stamina and shine like they each possess their own little sun. Following a route I can't understand, we arrive at the opening where Lucretia led her army into the upper kingdom.

I glance back.

Behind me are my guardians, wands magically transformed into swords, they faces serious. They are followed by Strata, Shereneth, and hundreds of thousands of others. A smile splays over my lips. "For the fairy realm," I say and step through the opening.

OceanofPDF.com

A RUSH of memories crash into me all at once and I'm momentarily dazed. Back in time, I see my dad in a rocking chair, reading a fairy tale to me as I lay listening against his broad chest.

Then my mom hums lightly as she walks around the room, soothing me to sleep. "I love you, Aurora," she whispers as she lays me in my crib.

Feelings of love swirl into my heart. It permeates every crevice in the room as well as each vein and sinew. Again, I'm healed in a way I didn't know I was broken as feelings of abandonment and worthlessness retreat from my heart.

The memory vanishes and I'm once again in the present where my guardians fight against those who would destroy me. The fairies fighting against my guardians don't stand a chance. They fall.

The scent of blood and death reaches my nose as blood oozes from mortal wounds.

"Stop!" The word leaves my mouth at the same moment I think it.

All around me, the battle is halted.

"No one move," I command.

Beyond the nursery there is still the sounds of war. I close the door, blockading it with magic. Then I fly over to the closest fairy. She is breathing heavily and looks afraid.

"Fear not, young one." She is probably older than me, but after all I've been through and the power I possess, it feels like I've been alive forever. "I'm not going to hurt you." With my first finger, I touch her forehead until all of Lucretia's sickness is rooted from her. I also see her own darkness. It's there because of past hurts. I can't heal those, but I can help her to see the other side and recognize her hurts, while valid, can be healed. But she must be the one to let the healing in.

She smiles. “Thank you.”

“Return to the under kingdom. You will be safe there until this war is over.” I indicate an opening I create since those who are fighting with me are still coming through the first opening.

She looks nervous, but I assure her she will be safe. For the next several minutes, I do that to each of the rest of those in the room. When the nursery is clear, I open the door. The sounds of fighting reach my ears.

I step out.

And repeat the process in the hall. Every room. Then make my way down the stairs. Each time I come to the wounded and hurting, I help them and tell them to hide in the under kingdom.

Once the castle is clear, I head out into the courtyard where I repeat the process. Then head to the outer walls. Lucretia is close. I can feel her. But there is just so much anger. So much death and destruction.

More than once, I am overwhelmed.

Landoth appears as though he sensed my need. “Aurora, welcome back.” He clasps my arm as I clasp his. Magic leaves him, strengthening me before I return it to him.

“Thank you.”

He bows. “My pleasure.”

With Shereneth nearby, I continue on.

Jada is with Merida. They are in one of the gardens healing and caring for the wounded.

When Merida sees me, she lets out a sob and runs to me. “I don’t care how it’s possible, but I’m just glad.” She squeezes me tightly.

At her touch, I see her magic and send some of mine into her to strengthen her.

When she releases me, Jada and I embrace. As our magic heals and strengthens each other, I realize this is how life is meant to be. We are here to help and heal one another, not tear each other down.

“Where’s Paxton?” I ask.

“I don’t know,” she admits. “We lost track of one another.”

“And Tiana?” I look at Merida.

“She was with Paxton,” she responds.

“And Christopher?”

“No idea,” Jada says, making a face. Even as a unicorn, it’s easy to see she finds the vampire Christopher attractive.

“Okay.” I nod and get to work, hoping they are still alive. Once I finish with the fairies there, I move on toward a second, smaller castle located behind the big one. I sense Lucretia is in there and that she has my parents. The dark magic is strongest there.

Shereneth takes off to help Carina and a group near the outer gates. Jada and Merida stay behind in case more wounded arrive. Landoth, Roton and the other guardians accompany me toward the castle.

“There has to be a better way,” I say, exhausted.

“Have you thought about using your wings to spread your magic over the kingdom,” Landoth says as he gives me more of his magic. The troll is fading. Even though I’m returning his magic to him with some of my own, he isn’t like me and can’t go on forever.

“You’re right.” Lifting myself off the ground, I rise until we are face to face and lean in to give him a kiss on the cheek. “There has never been a finer troll.”

Landoth blushes and smiles. “Well I don’t know about that.” He steps back and crosses his arm looking embarrassed.

“I do,” I say and fly high into the sky. My fear of heights has evaporated, and I focus on healing the fairies and all things in the upper kingdom. Soaring through the air, I send my magic out and over those still fighting. Like a blur, I see Christopher funning away. He looks up when some of my magic reaches him. I wave. “Thank you for your help," I shout.

He waves back and hurries on. I briefly wonder where he is going, but don't have time to consider him further. I need to heal my realm and do so quickly. As I go, more magic lands on several fairies fighting each other. As soon as they notice, they stop. "Return to your homes in peace," I say for all to hear and continue on. Faster and faster, I make my way over the whole of the realm so that my magic touches everything—except the smaller castle.

When I return the guardians surround me in a cloud of blue.

"We've assessed the situation," Roton begins. "Lucretia has your mom and dad in there as well as Tiana and Paxton." Her right eye twitches as she speaks.

"Are they alive?" I can barely get the question out.

"As far as we can tell, Aurora. We can't see them but used our magic and know they are on the upper level in one of the bedrooms." Roton's blade changes into her wand before it becomes a bow and arrow. "I can kill her off from a distance, if you will allow it."

"No," I say as I start my descent. In my mind, I work through what I will do once I am face to face with my aunt, Lucretia. And more than that, what will happen when I see my parents. Nervousness flits across my stomach. "I want to talk to my aunt. Let's try to be civilized." I land in front of the shiny double doors and knock. They are sleek and black, the same as the rest of the castle. The material isn't demon skin. Of that, I'm sure. But I wonder whether Lucretia changed the color or if this is how it's always been.

When no one answers, I shove the door open, but pause at a sound from behind me. Shereneth appears, his wings beating languidly against the sky. On his back is Landoth and Carina. Below him and a little further away is Jada. Merida is on her back, holding on for dear life as the unicorn heads toward me. A smile cracks across my face as gratitude fills my soul.

Before Shereneth lands, a portal opens, and Snow White as well as Troy appears through the portal.

“I felt your change,” Snow says when I look at her in question.

“And I had to see for myself,” Troy adds, hugging me. “You’re freaking amazing, Rory.”

I hug him back. “Thank you for coming. It means everything to me.” Tears line my eyes. Because this strange man has my best interests at heart, even if he was wrong about Paxton and me. He cared. And his showing up proves he still does. That’s how deep friendships are cultivated.

“Wouldn’t miss it.” He taps the end of my nose. “Even if you are the all powerful Oz… or Soul… or whatever.” His smile grows and I can’t help but smile with him. He’s trying to help me refocus and it works.

I explain what Roton and the others told me about where Lucretia, Tiana, and Paxton are. We all contribute to forming a plan. It isn’t brilliant. Heck, it really isn’t even good, but it’s all we’ve got in such a short amount of time.

The plan is simple. We will divide and conquer. The vampire queen and Troy will wait outside one of the windows. Shereneth, Carina, and Landoth will take the other window. When I give the magical signal, they will either portal or bust into the room. My guardians and I will go up the stairs.

The plan is too tame for some, especially Landoth and Shereneth, and they voice their concerns in hushed whispers. But I explain I want to talk to Lucretia first. They don’t like it, but all reluctantly agree.

Once all but my guards and I are outside, the rest of us proceed across the enormous entryway to the stairs. Without effort, I lift into the air as do the others. With Roton in the lead, we make our way up to the second floor and down the hall to the room where Lucretia is holding the hostages. The door is slightly open, and I hear my wicked aunt talking. When I’m close enough to the door, I land along with my guards just outside and wait.

Taking care, I peek inside the room. Lucretia is pacing in front of two individuals whom I know are my parents. Seated to the right of her with their backs to the windows are Maleficent and Sam. They are scowling at my parents and seem perfectly content with what's going to happen. To the right of my parents and nearest the door are Tiana and Paxton. Both are on the floor, unconscious. Blood flows from a wound on Paxton's temple.

Before I think, I push through the door. "Lucretia," I shout, my wings lifting me from the ground.

OceanofPDF.com

THE CEILINGS ARE PROBABLY twenty feet high and covered in art. But there's plenty of room to use my wings and I do.

She turns as a spark of fear crosses her features. Quickly, she recovers. "So it's true. You've become the Soul of the fairy realm." Her staff materializes in one hand as she reaches for the blade. The fear returns and her mouth falls open. "How?"

"It was mine to command," I say, my voice soft, knowing I can call it forth if I need it, but I hope I don't.

Without warning, she sends a lightning bolt of magic toward me. Before it strikes, I command a barrier around myself and those of my company. As I do, the power within me soars large like my wings and I realize just how much I possess. There is no need for my guardians or Shereneth and the others. If I wanted to, I could end Lucretia with only a thought. With that knowledge comes calmness and I roll my shoulders back. "Lucretia your reign of terror is over. You will do no more harm." Lifting one hand, I think about encircling Lucretia in a ring of magical fire. Almost instantly, it surrounds her. The flames not burning anything but keeping her within.

She uses her magic to strike against it, but the magic melds into my own, and I use her own magic against her to strengthen the circle. "It's no use. You are done."

"No!" Lucretia steps back, her staff disappearing as she heaves deep breaths, like a child winding up to throw a serious temper tantrum.

Behind Lucretia is Maleficent and Sam. They are on their feet and slowly inching their way around the room to the door. I know they are just followers, but sometimes that's even worse. Momentarily turning from Lucretia, I focus on Sam and Maleficent. "You are free to go, but you are not unrestricted," I say, and place a peacock blue cuff on their left wrists.

They are horrified by the cuff and make a point of letting me know.

“What is this? We can still get away,” Sam says, arrogant and a little frightened.

“Yeah, we are free,” Maleficent says, but I see the horror on her features as well.

“You are free in the sense that you can go wherever you want. However, you are also required to do two hundred hours of community service.” I speak in terms I know from the human realm. When I see they are confused, I try again. “You must make an effort to give aid, help, assist, or work for the fairies of this realm in some capacity for two hundred hours. Once that’s complete, the cuff will come off, but if you haven’t finished the service in the next sixty days starting today, the number of hours required will double. Then you will have one hundred and twenty days to complete your newly appointed service hours. If you don’t, the amount of time will double again and so on. Do you understand?” My gaze flits back and forth between the young fairies. As with those in the Olclag, I see there is good in them and I hope they will take the opportunity to build on that instead of the festering evil that is also with them.

Both fairies look at each other before looking back at me. Sam seems like she wants to say something but doesn’t as Maleficent takes a threatening step toward me.

Roton blocks her, resting the edge of her blade on Maleficent’s chest. “Aurora is the Soul of this realm. Without her, you would be dead. The punishment she has offered is beyond generous. I suggest you and Samantha leave now, before she changes her mind.” Danger radiates from Roton. Her voice is steely and while I believe the consequences given fits their crimes, it’s also very mild and I will add on more punishments to back up Roton.

“I am sorry for any part I contributed to encourage your viciousness, Maleficent and Sam. That is why your consequences are easy. Go in peace. Be of help to those in this realm. Do good."

"Easy?" Sam smirks. "Thank you," she says as she and Maleficent bow. But she isn't genuine. Neither of them are and I hope Paxton will be okay with the punishment. Maleficent is his sister. More than anything, I want them to change. But if they don't? I'll have no choice except to deal with them more harshly.

Roton escorts them from the room before closing the door and locking it. She's all about my safety.

I open the window where Shereneth is waiting with Carina and Jada. "Everything is under control, but…" I pause working to get the pain from my chest. I have a whole realm to think about now, but I'm beyond worried about Tiana and especially Paxton. "Jada, can you check on Paxton and Tiana, please?" I possess all of the magics, but I don't know anything about healing and Jada does. It's her magic. I glance at Lucretia. She's watching—all of us and pacing like a caged tiger. But she doesn't say a word and I'm grateful. Because now that I have Lucretia captured, I don't know what to do about her. Killing her isn't an option. At least I don't want to do that. And I feel like I shouldn't. I'm guessing the fairy realm has prisons, but I don't think keeping Lucretia there would be appropriate.

"Of course," Jada says and hurries over to them.

Hesitantly, I glance at my parents. They are bound and gagged, but their eyes speak volumes. Surprise. Gratitude. And, love. They don't appear to be wounded though and I'm glad of that.

"Aurora, might I speak to you alone," Snow asks, appearing in my line of vision and blocking out my parents.

"Sure." I lead the way over to the other side of the enormous suite and next to an oversized fireplace. Nervousness crackles along my wings. Because Snow is the vampire queen. She is queen over all the realms, including mine. Whatever she needs, I'd do well to give it to her. "What's up?" I ask, sounding like the eighteen year old teenager that I am.

She smiles kindly. “I wondered if you had a plan for where you intended to keep Lucretia?”

I glance down at my hands, surprised she was thinking along the same line as me. “Not yet.” The words come out slightly mumbled. I may be the Soul of the realm, but that doesn’t mean I’m not still me. And right now, I’m nervous and confused.

“Well, I have a solution, if you’re willing.”

“You do?” I am relieved and look at her, unable to help the smile that spreads over my face. “What is it?”

“In Sharra, there is a place where we keep vampires and other creatures of the seven realms who don’t follow the laws and must be imprisoned, including murderers and worse.”

I can’t imagine what’s worse than murder, but only nod.

Snow continues, “If you would like, I can take Lucretia to Sharra and lock her away within the prison. You needn’t fear she will escape. No one can.” She smiles as well.

My heart swells with gratitude at the rightness. “That is exactly where she belongs,” I say, wanting to hug the vampire queen, but holding back.

She must sense my desire because she pulls me into a hug. “You remind me so much of my daughter. I hope she turns out as amazing as you, Aurora.” The words come out softly and tears prick against the backs of my eyes.

I think about the girl, Jasmine who was at the party Werethea held. “I’m sure she’ll turn out even better,” I say back.

“Thank you.” She releases me. “I will leave immediately,” she adds and goes over to Troy.

They speak a moment before he comes over to me. I haven’t really spoken to him. He pulls me into a hug. “You are amazing,” he says kindly. “You and Paxton are great together. I’m sorry I doubted the two of you," he adds, studying me.

"You're pretty amazing yourself." I smack him on the chest lightly.

He kisses my cheek. "Tiana is awake, but she needs blood. I'm going to take her to Sharra, if that's okay with you."

I glance behind him at Tiana. When our eyes meet, she runs over to me. "I'm so glad you're okay." Her surprise and elation are obvious.

I squeeze her tightly. "And I'm glad you're okay." I look at her. "Do you want to go to Sharra instead of New York or elsewhere?"

She glances at Troy before rolling her eyes. "I have no desire to go to New York anymore. Sharra will be for the best, but we will see each other soon, right?"

"You better believe it, T." I hug her again. "I still owe you a flight."

"Yeah you do." She doesn't seem as excited as she was.

"It'll be fun," I singsong.

"We will see." She hugs me again and moves over to Snow.

"You'll take good care of her?" I ask, hugging Troy again. I consider the dragon boy a friend and hope he feels the same way.

"I will." He gives me a salute before going over to Snow and Tiana. The three of them take Lucretia through a portal and disappear faster than I expect. I'm glad Lucretia is gone though. The tension eases considerably without her in the room.

Landoth, Carina, and Shereneth take their leave after advising me they intend to help the upper kingdom's guards get things back in order. I thank them and promise them we will have dinner together soon within the Olclag. Now that I'm the Soul, the place where I was once so scared to be feels exactly right. And the members of the seven magics who supported Werethea before she left? They feel like my family. Our connection is strong and will remain that way for as long as I am the Soul. I need them to help me too and teach me what they know.

Jada leaves next, informing me Paxton is okay and should regain consciousness soon. She is going to help the wounded fairies. I hug her and tell her about dinner as well.

Which leaves five.

Paxton, who looks completely healed, stands and is watching me with such awe and love that I want to run and bury my face in his chest. But Merida is speaking with my parents. Though I have vague memories of them, it's like they are strangers.

Carefully, I move over to them, grateful their restraints are removed. My mom is crying. My father examines me with swollen eyes.

"Hi," I say as I get closer. Nervousness causes my mouth to get dry and I swallow.

Paxton steps between my parents and me. His face filled with emotion. I know mine is too. My love, I think, but we don't speak. Not yet but when we do there will me a lot to say.

Instead he introduces me to my parents. "King Stefan. Queen Danina, may I present to you your daughter, Aurora."

"It's nice to meet you," I say quietly. Nervously. Because I can't help but worry they might not like me.

"Aurora." My mom comes forward first and wraps me into a hug.

I send my wings away and hug her back, enjoying the sweet vanilla scent which spawns another memory. Of the morning before Lucretia cursed me. My mom is singing as she dresses me. Then lifts me into her arms. "You will make the best queen of the upper kingdom my dear Rory."

I gasp at the memory. "You called me Rory," I say, searching her face that is so like my own.

"I did," she says and laughs and wipes at her tears.

"We both did," my dad adds, hugging the two of us.

Our visit is short, but that's because we have a lot of work still to do. The upper kingdom and the lower kingdom are in complete turmoil. But I can fix it. I know I can. With the help of my parents and my friends.

Before my mom and dad leave, my mom insists on having dinner together that night. She asks Paxton to help her set the plan in motion.

He seems surprised and I know why. He was exiled from the upper kingdom because of his parents. What they did was against the laws of the upper kingdom.

"Mom. Dad." The words are unfamiliar on my lips.

They turn. "Paxton is my true love. We will be together forever, him and I." I pause, letting the news sink in.

My father blusters. "But I just got you back," he says.

I smile. "I'm not going anywhere. The fairy realm is my home." As I speak, I think of my aunties, Fae, Vera, and Macey. They are my family too. I need to make amends to them. "But the law that fairies of different magics can't…"

"Say no more," my father interrupts.

I sense Roton, who I forgot was still here since she and the rest of the guardians were silent in a corner of the room, tense, and I hold up a hand so my father can finish.

"As of this moment, that law is no more." He smiles at me, and I return it. Then he looks at Paxton. "I always wanted a son."

Paxton laughs heartily, his eyes holding mine.

I nod. "See you soon."

"Yes, you will."

Then it's just Merida and me (and the guardians). She's seated on the windowsill, staring out at what, I'm not sure. "Hey, Mer. You okay?"

She doesn't respond, just looks at me for a long moment. Finally, she says, "And I thought I was the weird one."

I laugh, seeing again the magic within her. But there's more. This time as I look at her, I see the outline of a bear. "You think you're weirder than me?" I laugh harder.

"I did before all of this." She waves her hands around the room, though it looks fairly normal now that everyone except my guardians are gone. "Now, I'll have no problem telling you…" Her voice trails off.

"What? That you're a bear in a human's body." I wink, taking her hands and pulling her to standing.

"How do you know?" she asks, gasping.

"I can see it now," I say, hugging her. It was Carina's sight that allowed me to see Merida's truth.

She hugs me back. Then looks at me. "I'm sure my family is worried sick about me. But when I get back, we are moving to the moors of Sharra where we can practice our magic freely." There's a desperate happiness in her. "I hope you'll come and see me."

I didn't know there were moors in Sharra, but my guess is Snow created them for Merida's family. "Mer, you're my best friend. I'm going to visit you and Tiana as often as I can. And you're welcome here anytime as well."

"Thank you." Merida hugs her tightly again. Then looks down at her ripped and dirty clothes. "Do you know how to get me back to my family?"

I'm about to say no when the magic to open a portal appears in my mind. "I do, but first, let's get you cleaned up." In my mind I think of Merida wearing an emerald dress with mint trim and that her fiery red hair is clean and untangled. Then I imagine matching shoes and open my eyes. Merida looks just as I imagined.

"I look much better, but a dress?" She wrinkles her nose.

I laugh. "Right," I say and make her dress into a shirt and add jeans.

"Better," she says.

With another thought, I open the portal to the human realm and her front lawn. She steps through. As it's about to close, I step through as well.

Roton shouts my name, but I close the portal before she can follow.

Merida takes my hand. "You going to see your aunties?"

"Yes, I need to ask their forgiveness." I glance down at our hands as a wave of nostalgia washes over me. Merida, Tiana, and I have been friends since we were kids and we will be friends for life. That will never change.

"Don't worry," she says. "They love you. They will forgive you. I'm sure of it."

OceanofPDF.com

FROM MERIDA'S LAWN, I stare at the house I was raised in. What do I say to them? Apologize sure, but that doesn't seem like enough. I tighten my hands into fists and roll my shoulders back, determined to do what I have to. But before I can get up the courage, Mr. Beazley and his little chihuahua round the corner.

He looks me up and down, a scowl on his face. "Kids and their cosplay." He shakes his head and it looks like his chihuahua does too.

I glance down at my dress and smirk. "I like it," I say.

His chihuahua barks. With my newfound sight, I'm able to see that the dog thinks he's a rottweiler and the man feels insignificant and is desperately lonely. Thinking quickly, I send a little magic into the man, filling him with hope and confidence. He jolts as the feeling enters him. His eyes get immediately brighter, and he picks up the pace.

"You're right. The dress is very lovely. Have a nice day," he says, tilting his hat and continues on his way.

"Thanks. You too." I take a deep breath and blow it out. Then cross the street and walk up to my door. Instead of going in, I knock.

There is talking within before the door unlocks. Fae, Vera, and Macey are there just like always. Wearing their same dresses and aprons.

"Mind if I come in?" I ask anxious.

Vera looks down her nose at me as though I am poop on a shoe.

Fae smacks her on the arm with a dish towel. "Of course you can, dear." She moves out of the way. They all do.

Nervous, I rub my hands together. "I'm sorry about what happened in the fairy realm," I begin.

"Well come in and have a seat. We just finished making strawberry tartlets.

Covering a smile, I follow them into the kitchen and sit at the counter while they fuss around, getting me a plate, a tartlet, some whipped cream, and a fork. When it's in front of me, they stand back and watch, anxious.

"Go on then, try it," Vera says. She's smiling and I see they all are.

My heart warms at how loving these women are. Without a doubt I can tell they've already forgiven me. "Okay." I pick up the fork, and cut a piece, determined to eat every last bit, even if it doesn't taste good. It's the least I can do after all they've done for me. But when I chew, something amazing happens. My taste buds start to sing. "It's so good," I say, trying not to sound surprised.

"Really?" Fae asks. "Because I shredded the cold butter and cut that into the flour to make it more flaky.

"And I handpicked the strawberries, but I was worried they were too ripe," Macey adds.

Vera went on. "I added just a hint of lemon and almond extract to the cream too."

They are smiling expectantly.

"Seriously, this is the best thing I've ever eaten." I take another bite.

The three of them clap and smile, patting each other on the back.

"We did it," Fae says, happily.

Vera and Macey respond as they study their recipe.

I watch them with an overwhelming sense of contentment. When I'm finished, I push my plate away. "Thank you," I say, but the words are for so much more than the food.

"You're welcome," Fae says, touching my hand.

"Not just for the tart, which was incredible, but for the last eighteen years. For all the three of you did for me. You three are the best in the world." I walk over and hug them as tears stream down my face.

My aunties sniffle and fuss and we talk for the better part of the night as I share all that happened since I sent them away. When it's nearing midnight, I ask them if they will return to the fairy kingdom.

They look at each other.

"Perhaps, dear," Fae says.

"We've been away a long time," Vera adds.

"The fairy kingdom has changed a lot," Macey says.

"Yes, and so have we." Vera wipes her hands on her apron. "But I have missed my magic." She pulls out her wand.

The others do too, though they don't use them.

We talk some more, and I tell them about the party my mom and dad are throwing.

Frazzled, they quickly agree and change. We use a portal back to the fairy kingdom.

When we arrive inside the castle, I pause, unsure where to go. Vera takes the lead. She looks amazing with her black hair up in a bun. Regal. Her shamrock green dress is long as are her sleeves. Behind her trails a seafoam green cape. The other two have changed as well. Fae and Macey's dresses are similar in style, but Fae's dress is artic blue with a navy cape while Macey's dress is a lovely shade of plum while her cape is iris. Their wings are out, matching their dresses exquisitely.

For several moments, they fuss and fluff each other until every collar is straightened and every hair is in place.

"Are you going to wear that?" Vera asks.

"I guess I should change." I scrunch my nose and think of a new dress. One with small cap sleeves and a V neck. The bodice is tight against my waist and the color of rosewood. From just below my waist, the long skirt fans out with several tiers in rosewood, daisy, and pearl. As my magic courses through my veins, I also think of my wings the same color. Immediately, they appear.

My aunties gasp.

"You are so very lovely," Macey says, and the others join in, sharing their admiration.

After thanking them and hugging again, we walk down the hall and toward the banquet room. When we arrive, it's to see most everyone is there, including Shereneth, Jada, Carina, and Landoth as well as my mom and dad. Even Snow, her husband, and their young daughter is there. Troy isn't, which saddens me. And neither is Tiana or Merida. But it's still great to see those that came.

Roton and my guardians notice me immediately. Relief washes over them and I feel bad for leaving the realm without them. I have a feeling I won't get away with that again. "Everything is okay," I mouth.

Roton nods, but her features are grim as she and the others move to stand beside me.

My father, the king stands and clinks on his glass. In moments the room is silent. "Now that Aurora has arrived, let the festivities begin," the king says, giving me a very fatherly smile.

AS THE PARTY WINDS DOWN, Paxton makes eye contact before he gets up from his seat next to my father and heads out outdoors. I excuse myself and follow him. My heart pounds in my throat with excitement and nervousness. I don't think he's changed his mind about me, but I can't help feeling that maybe he might.

There is a cobbled outdoor area with chairs and tables. Beyond that is a garden and I head out there, admiring the flowers as I go. When I see him, my breath hitches in my throat and I stop to admire him. Dressed in an indigo suit that matches the streak in his dark hair. The fit is perfection, allowing me to admire his broad shoulders, slim waist, and the thickness of his muscled thighs. His wings are put away and I do the same with mine before making my way over to him. He hears me and turns, studying me with a look I hope I never grow accustomed to. A combination of love and hunger.

"Aurora." My name on his lips is throaty and warm.

"Hi," I say, feeling shy. "I'm alive," I add, and smile.

His face turns serious. "Did you know what would happen?"

"No," I say when I'm directly in front of him. So close, I can see the sparkle in his eyes. "That was the point, I think. We had to be willing to sacrifice everything for the realm, including our love and our lives."

He reaches out to touch me but pauses. "And I'm not dreaming?" There is a hint of fear. At the look my heart breaks a little. Because I'm sorry he had to suffer.

I move into the heat of his hand and he caresses my face. "If you are, then so am I." The words come out softly and I close my eyes.

His lips find mine as he presses my mouth open, kissing me deeply. I wrap my arms around his waist, and he folds me into his arms.

Too soon our lips part. Breathless, I gaze into his eyes, hoping he sees I want more of that. A lot more.

"That night in the forest in the human realm. The night when that boy was hurting you…" He pauses and I feel my eyes get wide. "You're glad we met?" I sense his hesitation. "You still love me then?" he adds.

"First of all, you've just reminded me of some unfinished business." I close my eyes and imagine that jerk of a guy. Then with my magic, I send him a serious case of poison ivy. When I'm sure he's got it, I smile and open my eyes.

Paxton watches me with an amused expression on his face. "What did you just do?"

"Gave the guy a serious rash. And it's everywhere." I smirk, hoping he isn't offended.

Paxton bursts out laughing, and I join in. "He deserves that and more, my love."

I nod but allow myself to get serious again. “Paxton, you are my truest love. My one and only. If you’ll let me, I’ll love you forever and always.” My hands cup his face. He tilts down and kisses my palms, sending a shiver of desire across my skin.

“Marry me,” he says. “Since the day I met you, I’ve loved you.”

“Then I will marry you. The sooner the better.” My arms circle his neck and I pull him down so I can kiss him again.

A growl escapes his throat and we spend the next several minutes wrapped up in each other. Every touch, every caress more hungry and needy than the one before.

There is a loud boom and we are both startled, our lips parting as we study the darkness. An explosion of light fills the sky.

Relieved, I watch the sparkling red, pink, and blue lights. “Fireworks,” I say, shuddering.

“You think your mom and dad would approve if we did it now?” his voice whispers in my ear.

I face him. There’s a frisky grin on his face and I know what he’s implying.

“If you don’t ask them, I will,” I respond, enjoying our teasing banter.

He kisses me again as more fireworks light up the night. Then he takes my hand and places it over his heart. “Aurora, my dearest truest love, let’s get married and then spend the rest of the night and forever making love and creating baby fairies. Deal?” He watches me like a tiger surveys his prey.

I inhale a ravenous breath as my eyes rake down his body before returning to his face and I give him my biggest smile, eager to get started. “Deal.”

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE IN DEMONLAND

OceanofPDF.com

IN DEMONLAND, the weak died. And the strong? Well, they didn't necessarily live either. Down here, even the weak were stronger than any human. That we could be killed was saying something. It had to do with our fathers. They were the greatest of all the demons. Beyond vile and wicked and willing to destroy their offspring at any cost—

"Alice, are you listening?" Peter's words cut through my thoughts.

I snapped my head in his direction. "Of course," I said, facing front once again.

Snickers filtered through the quiet and punched me in the gut. I was a warrior trainee and should be focused. My life literally depended on it.

"Good. Now, as I was saying…" Peter started up again. I tried to listen but found myself tuning him out once again.

We were in one of the enormous training rooms deep below Wonderland, Arizona, in our compound. It was a realm unto itself and was called Demonland. Aptly named because of what we did and where we came from.

Peter sauntered in between all of the trainees, me included, as he spoke, his hands behind his back. As he went, he would push out a trainee's foot, so his stance was precisely hips-width apart or adjust the way one of us was holding our weapon. But it was hard to concentrate.

Any moment, we would play my favorite game. Slaying menial demons. And I was antsy, ready to start. Peter, our trainer, was one of the greatest Dark Moth warriors ever to walk the Earth, and he didn't seem to care that I was sick of instruction and itching to fight. He continued on and on about the demon order and how things began in the Demon Realm. As though where we lived was any better. Not in the slightest. Though the room was cool, sweat trailed down the center of my back and pooled between my breasts.

The worst part about Peter's speech was I'd heard it at least a dozen times over the years. He needed to shut up already so I could slay me some demons.

"You know of the seven deadly sins?" Peter asked as though determined to try my patience. His eyes focused on mine.

I swallowed, forcing my mind to listen. "Yes," I said as well as the rest of the trainees. They were as antsy as me. I could sense it. We were like the coil of a spring desperate to break free.

"Well, not only are they scary stories told in Sunday School, but they are also living, breathing demon royalty."

Blah. Blah. Blah, I thought, but he wasn't kidding. Unfortunately, some of those demons also happened to be our parents.

"The demons you'll be fighting today are menials." Peter pointed at the cage on the other side of the large instruction room. The pen had been fortified by troll magic, and every time a demon tried to slip between the metal bars, their nasty bodies were electrocuted.

A hundred of them growled and gnashed their teeth. The foolish ones threw themselves against the rods, making the air reek of burning demon hair and flesh. Not a pleasant scent when they already smelled like rotting eggs mixed with decaying corpses. They didn't look much better, resembling oversized sewer rats with leprosy. Their skin appeared to be peeling off and oozed snot-looking liquid.

"They're fast and devious," Peter went on. "Killing them is easy if you can catch them. Don't use your weapons unless you're sure you have a clean shot, and avoid using your demon powers altogether. Otherwise, you'll wind up killing one of the other trainees. Got it?" Peter gave me a direct look. "Alice, what did I just say?"

I forced myself not to roll my eyes. Peter was a great Dark Moth, but his father had been a Pride demon, which meant he had an inordinately high opinion of himself.

"Be careful. The menials are tricky. Don't use our demon powers, but stick to our weapons." My weapon of choice was a katana, but I also kept a small dagger in my right boot and a 9mm in a holster under my shirt.

"Very good." His light gray eyes that exactly matched the rest of the Dark Moth trainees studied me. I was an oddity in many ways, but the most prominent was my eye color, which was a vivid blue.

"Queen of Hearts," the guy on my right whisper-coughed.

Everyone around him snickered.

"Quiet!" Peter's angry voice boomed. Even the demons stopped chattering. "There will be no name-calling. Use your energy on slaying the demons, and for Hell's sakes, please focus." The tension in the room shot up. "This isn't a game…" he began and then trailed off as a giant smile filled his face, replacing the anger. "What am I saying? Of course, it is." He clapped his hands.

The half dozen trainees around me joined in, cheering, hooting, and hollering excitedly. Because it was a game. One our father's started thousands of years ago.

The demonic rules of our demon fathers were simple: Bed a woman. Wait until after their half-demon child was born. Kill the human mother. Once the child reached the age of maturity, which was eighteen, the real fun began. At least according to the demon sire. They would hunt their offspring and wouldn't stop until the child, and everyone the half-demon cared about was dead.

"It's so awesome," said no one ever, including me. I wasn't going to let some filthy demon hunt me down in its twisted game. Instead, I intended to take the fight to him. Well, in a manner of speaking. The other trainees knew at least something about their demon parent. They found out by the color of the marks on the backs of their hands once their abilities manifested. If their demon parent were Pride, like Peter's, then the marks would become purple. Greed was gold. Those from a Lust demon had their marks turn pink. Envy was green. Gluttony demons produced orange markings. Wrath became red. And,

Sloth half-demons had their markings turn blue. The marks on the backs of my hands had been black since the day I was born. They hadn't changed colors, even when my abilities manifested.

It was yet another odd thing about me.

All Dark Moth trainees wanted to see our demon parent dead. Killing them was how we proved ourselves, how we became full-fledged warriors. Most half-demons, called Moths, were born without any extra powers. Those like me were the elite. Born with power equivalent to that of our demon sire. If we survived the deadly battle with the demon, then we became Dark Moth warriors. Our destiny was to fight for those Moths without the marks. We would become their protectors, their light in the darkness. That was what the Dark Moth Society did. It was why we were all in the compound preparing to kill as many menial demons as possible.

Practice for the real thing.

"And the winner gets a night off above ground," Peter said, crossing his arms.

"Oh yeah. Watch out, Wonderland, here I come," Steven said.

Peter chuckled. Walked over to the cage. Unlocked the padlock. "Get ready. In three. Two. One." He jerked open the enclosure. Menials flooded out, stepping on and clawing each other to get at us.

I ran forward, pulling my katana from its sheath and driving it at the leading menial. Before it connected, the demon darted to the right and landed on top of Pamela, pulling her hair and digging his claws into her face.

"Hold still, you writhing little rat." I brought my blade down across the demon's neck, slicing it in two. Green blood spattered my face and got all over Pamela before it turned into a pile of dark ash.

Neither of us was fazed. "Thanks, Alice." She spun, pulling an arrow from her quiver and sinking it into the stomach of the nearest demon. "Blue," she shouted.

I went after two demons, cutting one of the Menials in half while sinking the blade from my boot into the eye of another. “Red and pink. That’s three for me.”

The others were counting, too, even though Wrythe, the ruler of our society, would decide the winner.

Eric and Wendy worked together, which wasn’t surprising given they were a couple. First, Eric would bait the demons, and Wendy would slaughter them. Then they would switch it up. I wondered if they fought together, hoping for a tie so they both would be able to go above ground.

I didn’t care whether I went into Wonderland or not. My goal wasn’t to have fun. All that mattered was I got plenty of practice so that when I met my demon father, I would be ready.

Still, it was great practice, and I quickly took out five more.

“Alice, save some for the rest of us.”

“Not a chance, Georgia.” I smirked. The girl was greedy, but then she was the half-demon offspring of Greed.

“Tell me something, Alice. If you win, what do you intend to do with your prize?” Georgia asked, slicing off the head of another demon.

“Enjoy it,” I responded, killing three more in quick progression.

She used her double-edged axe to kill another two demons. “Guess I better make sure you don’t win.”

“If you think you can.” I sliced through two more at once and stabbed another in the stomach. Then I spun around and cut through two before noticing four of the demons on Gilbert. He fell to one knee as one of the demons bit off his ear.

Gilbert screamed as deep red blood dripped from the wound.

I aimed and tossed the knife from my boot at the demon. The blade sunk deep between its beady eyes. The demon fell off, taking another of them with it to the ground. I ran forward and sliced through both.

“It’s over,” Peter’s loud voice boomed. “Do we have our winner?”

He glanced over at Wrythe, who'd come in without my knowledge. Our king nodded.

"We do. Bring the trainees forward," Wrythe commanded.

OceanofPDF.com

I ADVANCED TOWARD HIM, as did the others, except Gilbert, who was getting examined by the doctor. Heathcliff was a scientist as well as the Society's physician. I'd heard he worked for years in Massachusetts at one of the colleges with his father, a vampire called Adam Henry. At the college, Heathcliff created supernatural formulas and used his discoveries to help those in the human realm as well as supernaturals like me. We were lucky to have him.

Lined up, Wrythe walked down the line. As he went, we each took a knee, placing a fist over our hearts. Then, he rested a hand on each of our shoulders before moving on, even waiting until Gilbert could join us and did the same for him.

I looked on in awe. The king was an ominous man. Describing him did him no justice. He stood nearly seven feet tall, the same as every other male warrior. His eyes shone with intellect, and he had long ebony hair. Though his eyes and hair color matched every other Dark Moth, on him, it was as though every feature, every muscle, and sinew had lined up flawlessly. In truth, he was nearly too gorgeous to look at.

His markings were deep red, the color of the Wrath demon. He possessed an exceedingly strong note of anger. It seemed to boil through him like a living creature just beneath his skin. Being near him was intimidating. It was apparent in the way he held his shoulders that Wrythe knew he was meant to be king. That he was right where he belonged. I wondered what that felt like. To know without a doubt where you fit in.

Once he'd walked the line twice, Wrythe stopped in front of Eric. "Rise, trainee."

Eric stood, keeping his eyes on the ground.

"You fought like a champion this evening. You will be a fine warrior." He patted Eric on the shoulder.

Then his gaze fell to Pamela. "Stand."

Pam rolled her shoulders as she straightened. Every female Moth was a foot shorter than the males, so she tilted her chin up to meet his gaze. I internally rolled my eyes. "Your Highness," she said.

"It is apparent you were sired by a Pride demon." He touched her arm. "You'll have much to overcome. Take care to school your prideful thoughts lest they get the better of you."

A small sigh escaped her lips before she checked herself and nodded.

He gave her a grim smile. "Still, there is hope. You fought well."

He spoke a few words to each of the other trainees until he reached me. "Hello, Alice." He held out his hand to help me stand even though I didn't need it. For the longest moment, he studied me. I worried I'd done something wrong. Then he said, "You aren't like the rest of them." He flipped over my hand so he could get a better look at the markings on my wrists. "Haven't you reached maturity?"

"I have. When I'm fighting, I feel the demon's power, but my markings haven't changed color," I said, feeling small, especially since I wasn't quite as tall as the other female trainees. The oddities were plentiful.

Peter came to stand beside the king. "Between the lack of color on her markings and her eyes, we aren't sure which demon is her sire," he said as though he were studying a new species.

Wrythe leaned in so close I could smell the spicy scent of his aftershave. "I've seen rare cases where the demon's genetics are revealed through eye color, which would make her sire a Pride demon." He lowered his head and moved even closer as though he might kiss me.

I couldn't help but notice the fullness of his lips and was suddenly embarrassed. My eyes wanted to cross, but I held his gaze, hoping he would be able to give a solid answer. Perhaps my demon sire was a

Sloth, but there were certain times that my eyes would change from blue-green to green-blue, so did that make my sire a Greed demon then?

“The other trainers and I have discussed it and can’t say for certain. She doesn’t fight like a Sloth demon. Her movements are too quick and calculating,” Peter went on.

“You’re right. She doesn’t move like a Sloth warrior. I would guess Wrath by her aggressiveness.” He seemed satisfied with that guess.

“We’ve considered Greed as well, but she doesn’t display a Greed demon’s appetites.” Peter continued to study me, clasping his hands in front of him.

“I would also agree with that assessment based on what I’ve seen tonight.” Wrythe straightened. “You’re a mystery, Alice Blackburn.” He crossed his arms in front of his bulky chest, causing his rippling muscles to flex under his black tee shirt. “And you’re also tonight’s winner. Congratulations.” He clapped, and the others joined in even though I could tell they weren’t thrilled.

“Thank you, Your Highness.” I bowed at the waist, locking eyes on his inky combat boots.

“What do you intend to do tonight?” he asked.

“Um,” I glanced at the other trainees. “Would you mind if I invited everyone to go up into Wonderland with me?”

The king’s brows scrunched together. “Most definitely not a Greed demon sire and much too beautiful as well.” He contemplated me.

My face heated under his scrutiny, and I wanted to hide.

“That wasn’t the agreement,” Peter chimed in, but I figured it wouldn’t hurt to try.

“It’s true. But,” Wrythe paused and smiled a large, genuine smile, making him even more gorgeous. “I like your style, Alice Blackburn.” He walked to the exit, where he pushed open the door. “Yes, I think that would be an excellent idea.” He gave Peter a pointed look. “Go with them. They deserve the break."

Peter nodded. "Of course, sire."

"Besides, I believe it's Eric's birthday?" the king added.

Eric lifted his head a bit higher. "It is."

"Well, then it's more than settled. Be sure to eat some cake for me too," Wrythe said and left.

OceanofPDF.com

BIRTHDAYS WEREN'T EXACTLY happy for us Moths, especially when it was our eighteenth like Eric's. That was because the demon parent officially began its hunt to kill their offspring on this day. The Dark Moth Society's ruler knew what today meant. For that reason, I was surprised that Wrythe had agreed to let him go above ground.

When I asked Wrythe to let everyone go, it was because I'd forgotten Eric's birthday. I'd been too excited about winning.

Now, though…

It was well known that the demon sire rarely came after his offspring on their actual birthday. That would be too easy. And the demons hunted us for sport. It was amusing to them. They'd discovered eons ago that they could do it, so they did. We were nothing more than their entertainment.

They impregnated human women without their knowledge, forced them to carry the Moth child to term, and once born, terminated the mother. It was heartless, cruel, and evil. But it was all we knew.

Usually, the demon would allow the Moth to worry and fret a week or two, even sometimes killing those close to the Moth first. Or he might enter their dreams, showing them how he intended to kill them. I'd heard of one sire who'd taken over the body of a half demon's fiancé only so he could torture her, bring her low and break her mentally before slaughtering her.

"I've changed my mind. I don't think we should go," I said to Wendy while I watched her apply her makeup. We were in our shared bedroom, and I was sitting on my bed. There were no posters on the walls. Barely anything sat atop the dresser, and no fancy bedding with extra pillows. Basically, there was no frou-frou. It was like what I imagined a military barracks would be in the human realm. Beds, a dresser, and four plain walls. Not that I minded. The accommodations were better than my living arrangements before the Dark Moths took me in.

Wendy looked pretty in heels, skinny jeans, and a red silk halter-top. She'd curled her dark hair, and it lay against her creamy skin in a halo of soft curls. For makeup, she'd done smoky eyes in dark gray and black and then applied red lipstick that matched her top as well as her markings.

During dinner, the others had talked excitedly about what they wanted to do while above ground. The plan was to go to a club called The Mad Hatter. It was rumored to be the party place for all Warriors with drinks and dancing and fun. Not that any of us had much experience with the meaning of that word. We'd been training within the compound since we were twelve, and for most of us, it was the only home we cared to remember.

"Of course we're going to go, Ali—" she paused and took in my outfit.

I had on dark jeans, my old black combat boots, and a black tank top. After my shower, I'd brushed out my hair and put some mousse in it, figuring I'd let it air dry. My makeup consisted of nothing unless I counted the lotion I applied.

"Is that what you're wearing?" She wrinkled her nose like I smelled terrible.

I glanced down, sniffing slightly. "Yeah." Soap scent filled my nose.

She shook her head. "You're lucky you have those weird eyes. At least they provide a pop of color." She grabbed her bag, added a small dagger to the contents, and then sealed it shut.

"I seriously doubt they'll let you bring a weapon into the club." Of course, I didn't tell her about the knife hidden in my boot.

She laughed, retrieving it from her bag. "Old habits die hard." She set it on the tall oak dresser we shared and headed toward the door.

"With Eric's birthday, I don't think it's—" I tried again.

Wendy held up her hand, cutting me off. “Look, I know you’re the Queen of Hearts and that you don’t care about the rest of us.” She went over to her wooden jewelry box, found a necklace, and put it on. “Not really, anyway. But Eric is my boyfriend. Tonight is his birthday. And since you won the challenge, you have to come.” She stomped one of her healed feet as her markings glowed deep red. “So get off your butt, and let’s go.”

“Fine.” I hated it when the others called me Queen of Hearts, probably because the nickname fit. But not the way they thought.

That was my biggest secret: my heart overflowed with emotions and feelings. I cared too much. More than I should. I fought to protect my heart because caring hurt more than they could know.

As we walked down the hall, we met Pam and Georgia. They both looked great as well. Georgia in a bright yellow sundress and Pam in a plum poplin top and white pants.

We turned the corner and opened the door to the guys’ hallway. They were waiting by the elevator, all dressed in variations of the same outfit. Jeans and button-up shirts. Eric wore green, Gilbert had on orange, Steve looked nice in blue, and Leif wore pink.

Eric’s eyes lit up as soon as he saw Wendy.

“You look gorgeous,” he said, hugging her and kissing her neck.

“Thanks.”

The rest of us tried to pretend we were invisible while they proceeded to passionately make out.

Finally, Steve had enough. “Let’s go.”

“We can’t yet. We need to wait for Peter.” I faced the door that led to the teachers’ quarters just as Peter appeared with the key that would unlock the elevator and take us up. Up out of Demonland and into the real world, the one where we were hunted like animals.

Usually, Peter wore all black. Tonight he had on faded jeans and a purple tee shirt. He’d showered and pulled his long black hair back with a tie at the nape of his neck.

“You clean up nice,” Pamela said, sidling closer to him.

“So do you,” he responded with appreciation, though he kept his distance.

His words surprised all of us. He took in our shocked faces and chuckled. “What? I’m not allowed to have fun? I need to stick to babysitter duties?”

I hadn’t thought about that. To me, Peter was a teacher, someone way out of my league, but he was probably only a few years older than the rest of us.

“Oh no. You should definitely have some fun,” Pam said, giving him a sultry smile.

“How about I find a happy medium.” He went over to the elevator covered by a wrought iron gate and opened it with a squeal that set my ears on fire. Then he took the strange circular-shaped key he carried, inserted it into the keyhole just below the button with an up arrow, and turned it to the right.

A motor kicked on, and after several long moments, the doors pinged open. Silently, we road up. It seemed to take an hour but was probably closer to five minutes. When the door opened again, we stepped out into a parking garage.

“Welcome to Wonderland, Arizona. Population 17, 275,” Peter said, tucking the key into his pocket.

I was the last one out and gulped down the dry, hot air. It took my breath away. Even at eleven o’clock at night, the heat was stifling. “So, where’s this club?” I asked, longing to turn around and go back.

“What’s the matter, Queen of Hearts? Can’t take a little heat?” Leif lightly punched me in the arm.

He was trying to be cute and flirty. It wasn’t working. I punched him back, not so lightly. “I just want to get this fun over with.” My nerves tingled, and I was on edge.

Peter faced us. “Huddle up,” he said, sounding like the coach in a football game.

When we all faced him, he said, “There are three rules. One: Watch out for each other. If you see a trainee in trouble, help them out. Two: Don’t use your abilities on non-Moths. Leave the humans alone. And three: If we lose one another, this is our meeting spot.” He gave each of us a severe glare, gauging how well we were listening. “We won’t return to the compound until we have everyone. Got it?”

“Got it, boss,” Steve said.

“Keep your eyes peeled. Check out your surroundings. If something looks out of place, let me know.”

I gave Peter a mental snort. Didn’t he realize it all looked out of place to us? I didn’t know for sure, but I was pretty positive none of us had been above ground in at least a year.

OceanofPDF.com

SEVERAL BLOCKS before we reached the club, I could feel the music. It radiated from the ground and caused it to shake. Old movie posters of Avengers, Hunger Games, and The Duff lined a bus stop. We walked past a Barnes and Noble, a store with a weird apple sign, and a grocery store called Winegar's before turning into an alley.

"Stay close," Peter said as though the homeless littering the concrete walls could hurt us.

A man held out his hand. "Spare a dollar?" he asked.

I touched Peter's arm. "Do you have a dollar I can give him?"

He chuckled and kept walking. Apparently, he had no intention of giving the guy any money. "You have been out of touch with the real world for way too long. There should be a class that teaches you how to live out here. You won't be down in the compound forever."

True, but only if we don't die, I thought as we rounded the corner.

It was evident which building housed the club. A long line of people stood waiting to get in. Steve headed toward the end of the line.

"Stick together," Peter said, grabbing him by the shirt. He walked up to the bouncer. The big guy took off his sunglasses even though it was way too dark to be wearing them in the first place. Peter and the guy talked for a few seconds before the guy put his shades back on. Then proceeded to unhook the velvet rope and let us walk in.

Those still waiting shouted obscenities and grumbled. Someone even threw an empty can. I heard it coming and caught it in mid-air, then turned, searching the crowd for the culprit. No one came forward, which was probably for the best, so I tossed the can in the trash and walked inside.

The temperature immediately went from stuffy hot to positively chilly. A light mist sprayed the room, giving it a smoky quality. It caused the colorful ceiling lights to linger in the air. Bodies writhed and moved on the dance floor to the beat of some kind of electro-techno music.

Eric and Wendy found us a couple of tables, and the rest of the group were seated. A waitress came over and took their orders after checking ID's. As far as I knew, Peter was the only one old enough to drink, but he wasn't at the table.

Not that it really mattered whether we were old enough anyway. The demon DNA we possessed made it, so alcohol metabolized and burned up before we were affected. It was the same with drugs, or so I was told. Our DNA had benefits too. We healed fast and rarely got sick. When we were wounded, though, we just had to suffer through the pain.

I didn't sit but stood a little ways off, checking the surroundings. That niggling of being watched still lingered, and I worked to figure out why.

Peter was suddenly at my side. "Why don't you go over and hang out with them?"

"I… In a minute." It was hard to explain how little I fit in. "Why aren't you over there?" I asked, turning his question back on him.

"Well, I'm the teacher. Not an equal or an ally, but a superior. Going over there will only make them uncomfortable." He crossed his hands behind his back.

"I guess that makes sense." We weren't friends, though I'm sure he had some.

Eric and Wendy got up and began dancing, their bodies twining together like two pieces of the same rope. Eric leaned in and kissed her cheek, causing Wendy to giggle. Leif flirted with the waitress when she brought back the drinks. Steve and Gilbert were speaking to a couple of girls at the next table. Georgia and Pam chatted and laughed, swaying to the music. It was sweet seeing them laughing, enjoying themselves, and doing something besides training.

A small part of me felt envious.

“But you should totally get over there,” Peter continued. “I mean, I know what they call y—” He didn’t finish.

I glanced up at him. “Peter, what is it?” I followed his gaze.

A man was walking along the outskirts of the club. Like a cougar, he hunted for something. Or someone, I thought and immediately froze. He looked like the actor from a movie we’d just watched about an alien superhero. Thor, my mind said.

He was tall, with bulging muscles straining against an expensive suit. The man had long blond hair that he let hang free, and he wore a ring that glittered against the lights on his left middle finger.

Who are you hunting?

Before I finished thinking about the question, I knew the answer. He was an Envy demon, which meant he was here for Eric.

“Peter, he’s a demon.”

“I know.” He faced me. “Calmly go over to the group and tell them to head back to our spot.”

“And what are you going to do?”

“I’m going after it.” His dark eyes shimmered with anticipation. “Do as I say.”

I jumped into action, walking too quickly. When I realized it, I slowed my pace, keeping my heart rate even. Just in case the demon was listening.

“Alice, glad you could join us,” Leif said, reaching out to hug me.

I sidestepped him and went over to Wendy and Eric.

“Alice, what is it?” Eric gave me a questioning glance.

“He’s here. Your demon sire.” I figured it was best to get straight to the point.

“No, he can’t be,” Wendy said, but I smelled the immediate fear on her.

“It’s true. We need to go. Peter wants us to meet at the garage. Help me gather the others.”

“No, if he’s here for me, I have to stay and fight. I can’t put anyone else in danger.” As Eric spoke, he looked at Wendy, and I saw the raw love he had for her.

I reached out and touched Eric’s arm. “That’s honorable, and I know that’s what we’ve been trained to do, but you aren’t prepared. You have no weapons. We should do as Peter said. Regroup, and then we can help you go after the demon.”

“Dammit.” He slammed his fist into the table, causing it to crack.

“What’s wrong,” Leif asked, standing.

“Envy demon. He’s here for Eric. We need to take off.” I searched the perimeter for the demon and quickly found him. He had his slimy arm around a tall, blonde woman. They were talking. She started to head toward the exit when the demon looked directly at me. His dark eyes seemed to pierce through my body. Then he smiled. If I hadn’t known what he was, I might’ve been taken in by his easy manner and charm. Instead, I grabbed Leif’s arm and shoved him toward the exit. “Hurry.”

Without effort, the demon jumped on a table, scaring the supermodel and the others around her. His nails grew long, like pointed claws.

People began to scream.

We pushed toward the exit. I searched for Peter as I moved, wondering where he’d gone. Before I found him, the demon leaped from the table he stood on and onto the table our group had been sitting at only moments before. He picked up a drink and chugged it down. Then threw the glass into the mirror behind the bar, causing it to shatter. More people screamed.

Several of the bouncers headed toward the demon.

His smile grew bigger.

“This is my favorite part,” I heard him say. It wasn’t that he spoke loudly but that his words seemed to pierce my insides. The table split in two, but he was prepared and landed gracefully.

I shuddered with fear but also with exhilaration. I’d never seen a royal demon up close. Sure, I’d seen plenty of Dark Moths, and it was true that we all possessed the same powers as our demon sire, but we looked human.

Demons could look human too, and the one after Eric did, though that wasn't his true form.

I watched in disgust as he tore through the bouncers like they were made of nothing more than paper.

“Alice,” Leif yelled.

Everyone was at the exit, and they were waving me over. But I didn’t feel right about leaving those in the club to die.

I took the knife from my boot and ran toward the Envy demon. My pulse quickened. I was impatient to fight. But before I reached him, someone pulled me back.

“What do you think you’re doing?” Peter hissed in my ear.

“Protecting the humans,” I said, keeping my focus on the demon.

“No. Get out.”

“I won’t,” I said.

The demon noticed us and stood, though he didn’t come over. “I won’t fight you, girl. I’m here for the one called Eric.” He slashed through a bouncer and shoved anyone in his way until he was directly in front of Peter and me. So close, he appeared to be over eight feet. “Besides, your sire would kill me if I laid a finger on you.” He pointed one of his claws in my face. “But oh, I’m tempted. You are luscious.” His voice was gravelly, not quite garbled, but it sounded like English was not his first language. “As for you,” he turned to Peter. “I can lay as many fingers on you as I want.” His clawed hand reached out to grab Peter's neck.

Without thinking, I cut off the demon's hand.

He roared, bringing his bloodied wrist into his chest. "Evil child. I look forward to the day when your sire comes after you. I'll be an enthusiastic spectator for your death."

"Who is he?" I shot back, desperate for answers.

He gnashed his teeth, held out his arm, and I watched his sleek, clawed hand regrow before my eyes. "Tell Eric I'm coming for him." He cackled gleefully. "Let the games begin." He jumped into the air. It looked like he would go through the roof, but he vanished.

OceanofPDF.com

"ALICE BLACKBURN, WHAT YOU JUST DID…." Peter stopped and shook his head. "It was irresponsible, careless, and one of the most heroic deeds I've ever seen." He pulled me into a quick hug.

Beyond shocked, I didn't respond. Just stood there. As trainees, physical contact wasn't a regular occurrence, especially between trainers and their students.

"Let's go find the others. They can't be far," he said, releasing me

I nodded, a numb euphoria coursing through my veins. I wasn't ready to be done.

We exited the club and blended with the crowd. Swirling red and blue lights filled the sky. Police cars, a fire truck, and an ambulance had arrived on the scene. Crews helped those who'd been wounded while the police went inside.

"Where are they?" I asked Peter, searching the crowd for the rest of our group.

"I'm guessing they went back to our meet-up spot. Let's go."

Before we'd gone two feet, the air changed. Overhead it was like spilled ink over white paper, and thick darkness descended. It roared past the Spanish-styled buildings, blocking out the stars and the three-quarter moon.

"What's happening?" I'd put my knife back in my boot, but I itched to have it in my hand once again.

"It's the demon. He's called the menials who serve him. The hunt is on."

Peter was right. The impenetrable darkness wasn't just the blackness of a starless night but hordes of rat-like menial demons. They brought the pungent stench of sulfur and decaying flesh with them.

“And me without my sword,” I said sarcastically.

Peter chuckled. “You’re such a warrior.” He searched our surroundings. “We need some cover.”

“Can the humans see the menials?” I asked, hurrying after Peter as I passed by the people. They didn’t seem afraid but milled around like the menials weren’t there.

“They can probably feel their presence, but no, not unless the demons want them to. Come on.” Peter took off running. “We need to get away from everyone,” he shouted as he ran directly into the menials.

I followed, grabbing the knife from my boot as a dozen rats swooped in front of me. I gutted one and punched another as I tried car doors along the street. Finally, I found an old beater and dove in, slamming a demon in the door when it shut.

The rats were everywhere, so thick I couldn’t see anything else, not even Peter. Where are you? I hoped he was okay.

The passenger side door opened, and a guy got in.

“What the— Get out,” I shouted. He’d scared me, and I’d nearly stabbed him in the throat.

He pushed my hand away, careful to avoid the pointy end of the knife. “You realize they can get into the car if they want. You aren’t safe in here.” As he spoke, one of the menials slammed against the windshield. Shattered glass went everywhere and bit into my face, neck, and arms.

I ignored them as the guy grabbed the little demon by the neck with both hands and twisted until there was a pop. It immediately turned to dark ash. “One down, a million to go.” He smirked and reached through the glass, grabbing another.

The move surprised me. He surprised me. Who the crap was he? It was apparent he knew about the demons and also had abilities. Not to mention he’d been well trained, but he didn’t look like a Dark Moth.

With one demon dead, a dozen more started through. I cut through them and was quickly covered in demon goo.

“Take my hand,” the guy said, holding it out.

“No way.” I didn’t know the guy. I preferred to take my chances with the rats.

“Okay, but I’m out.” He opened the door and disappeared into the sea of demons, fighting and punching as he went.

In moments, it became apparent he was wise to leave. The menials had me pinned against the seat and were biting and clawing at my skin. “Get off of me.” I stabbed one in the neck and wrung another’s. Demon ash covered me and combined with the blood from the places where I’d been bitten.

I growled as one of them pulled my hair while another bit my cheek. My knife was snatched from my hand, and a demon sank its rotten teeth into my flesh. “That’s it.” In the past, I could count on one hand the number of times I used my demon powers. In truth, they were scary, and I preferred to use my weapons. But with a dozen demons pinning me inside the car, I had no choice. Closing my eyes, I took a deep breath, feeling for the strength. At once, the power raced along my veins, changing the color of my blood to black as it swelled.

Continuing to focus, I kept my eyes closed as the menials squealed in pain. Ash soaked me like rain in a thunderstorm. When I opened my eyes, I was surprised to see a cobalt light emanating off my skin and pushing outward. Every demon that came in contact with it was instantly incinerated.

Though I’d learned in school about the power each Dark Moth possessed, seeing it come alive was utterly different. I felt formidable and unstoppable and, if I were honest, a little out of control. But I wasn’t going to question it, not right them. Blood dripped from my cheek and onto my hand as I pushed the door open and climbed out.

Humans were wandering around, still dazed from what’d happened in the club. One of the medical professionals came over and asked if I needed help. The shield that surrounded me and kept the demons at bay didn't faze him, or maybe he couldn't see it because he walked right through it.

"I'm fine," I said and took off, heading in the direction of the parking garage.

OceanofPDF.com

THE MENIALS FOLLOWED and continued to attack my cobalt shield without regard for their own lives. I hoped my powers would hold until I reached the others.

Pushing faster, I ran down the alley, past the grocery store and the bus stop. The guy who'd been in my car was in the middle of at least twenty menials, battling for his life. But it looked like he had the upper hand. He held a sword in each hand, mowing through them like they weren't there. Demon blood spattered against everything, soaking it in freckled goo.

The guy's eyes found mine, and he smirked before refocusing on the menials. It looked like the guy was having fun. Crazy. I shook my head, moving past him and into the parking garage. If he were a Dark Moth warrior, he would know where the entrance was and how to get himself to safety. If he wasn't, it didn't matter if he knew or not. No one but a Dark Moth who'd been deemed worthy could enter.

The elevator was on the bottom level. I scampered to the edge of the concrete wall and peered over as shouts and screams reached my ears from below. Those were my people, and they were losing. Flinging my legs over the edge, I jumped off and sailed down the five floors. My feet struck the floor with a heavy thud, and I felt my bones jar a moment.

"Alice." Leif noticed me first. He was covered in ash and had a significant scratch on one cheek. "It's here," was all he said, but I knew who he meant.

The Envy demon. I saw it at once as well as a few dozen menials. There were also six other demons, more significant than the menials but not as big as the royal. By the looks of them, they were trackers or mid-level demons.

Each stood four feet tall with skin that glistened like oily green snakes. Their eyes were small and beady. They had two slits for a nose and a large mouth full of black, razor-sharp teeth. Their tails were lined with spikes, like thorns on the stem of a rose.

Peter fought with two of them while Steven, Leif, and the others battled the menials.

Except for Wendy. The Envy demon had Eric cornered, and she was fighting four trackers on her own, slashing through them, trying to reach her boyfriend. The markings on her hands were lit up bright red.

Wrath, I thought, impressed by her ferocity.

As I watched the scene unfold, I realized that the only Moths in real peril were Peter and Eric. The menials and mid-level demons weren't delivering lethal blows. It looked more like they were toying with them, keeping the trainees occupied while the Envy demon went after Eric.

A quick appraisal told me Peter had his demons under control, but Eric had suddenly vanished. I ran over, using my shield to get past the trackers. They shrieked as my shield fried their skin.

"Alice," Wendy cried, sounding relieved I was there to help.

The Envy demon turned when Wendy spoke my name. His face changed into something, not at all human. He had the same sharp black teeth, like the trackers, but they were much larger. His mouth took up most of his face.

It was with shocked sadness that I saw a hand dangling from the demon's teeth. "Alice Blackburn," it hissed, pitching the rest of Eric's appendage into his mouth. It crunched down, grinding the bones as he chewed.

Wendy screamed from behind me, and I guessed she'd seen what I had.

The remains of Eric sagged in the demon's clawed hands. His head was still intact, and his eyes were open but lifeless. It looked like Eric had died in the middle of a scream.

“No,” I whispered, unable to believe what I was seeing. It wasn’t that the rest of the trainees and I were close, but they were all the family I had. Seeing Eric killed in such a gruesome way infuriated me. I ran forward, my power still burning around me, and dove for the demon’s neck.

The Envy demon dropped Eric and tried to swat me aside, but I grabbed hold of his fingers and twisted, listening to the bones break. At the same time, I sent my elbow into his windpipe. He gasped as I spun in the air, moving my hands to his mouth where I took hold of his upper and lower jaws, ripping them apart. There was no pain when his teeth dug into my fingers. I felt nothing but white-hot rage as I tore him apart.

My demon power was doing its work as well, and the smell of sizzling demon flesh filled my nose. Green blood covered me like I’d bathed in it. As the demon went down, his voice hissed inside my head: You’re stronger than the others. Seven times seven. But that means when your sire comes after you, the pain you’ll endure will be seven times seven. Remember that, Alice Blackburn.

“Who is my sire?” I shook at how close I was to the answer. The demon’s body turned to ash. With the Envy demon gone, the lower demons vanished as well. I guessed they’d gone back to the Demon Realm where they’d come from.

“How did she do that?” Leif asked, his voice filled with awe. He was breathing heavily and appeared to be in shock.

“I thought Dark Moths could only kill a greater demon after they’d killed their sire,” Steven added. One of his arms dangled at an odd angle. It would heal on its own, though.

“Does that mean the Envy demon was her dear old dad as well as Eric’s?” Pam asked. The gash in her thigh soaked through her pant leg.

“Did you see that shield around her?” Georgia wiped some blood from her eye on her shirt. “It was incredible.”

I didn't want to listen to anymore. Killing the Envy demon felt good, right, but that didn't mean he'd been my sire. The demon had said seven times seven. Which demon was that?

I didn't have the answers, but at least my years of training had finally come to mean something. I'd experienced what destroying an upper-level demon felt like. And I knew without question my destiny. I would rid the world of every last one of the nightmarish demons.

Armed with that knowledge, I turned my attention to Wendy, worried about what she might do. She'd gone over to what was left of Eric and had his head in her hands. Sobs tore through her.

"I'm so sorry, Wendy," I murmured. For some reason, I felt responsible for his death.

She shook her head. "I can't believe it. He's gone. No. No. No." She was on the verge of a breakdown. I didn't know what to do.

Thankfully Peter took over as my powers subsided and finally vanished, leaving me tired.

OceanofPDF.com

THE RIDE DOWN in the elevator was beyond somber. Wendy cried quietly against Peter. Leif and Steven carried Eric's remains. I stood in the front, near the doors. Between the stench of death and the Envy demon's blood as well as the ash, it was hard to breathe.

When the door pinged open, I stepped out.

"Take Eric's remains down to the infirmary. Heathcliff will know what to do," Peter said as he practically carried Wendy.

"Yes, sir." Steven and Leif headed toward the hospital wing.

"Leif? Let Heathcliff know I'll be down in a few minutes."

"You got it."

Georgia and Pam quietly turned toward the dorms.

"Alice, you coming?" Pam asked.

"In a minute."

"Go on," Peter urged. "I've got Wendy." He gave me a once over. "Get cleaned up."

I nodded dully. "Okay." I entered my room after Pam. As I walked past the bed, a part of me longed to fall on it and sleep for a week. But that would be gross since I was covered in dead demons. So I edged into the bathroom, closing the door.

After I showered and dressed, there was a knock on the door. "Alice, it's Peter."

"Is Wendy okay?" I opened the door.

"Yes, Heathcliff gave her something to help her sleep, but that's not why I'm here." He was changed and cleaned up as well.

"Oh?"

"It's Wrythe. He wants to speak with you."

My heart jumped into my throat. "Why?" I threw my towel into the hamper on top of my dirty clothes before sitting on my bed. There I tugged on my black boots that matched the rest of my outfit.

“I’m guessing he wants to know what happened tonight,” Peter said, but I sensed there was more.

“So what do I tell him?” I grabbed my leather jacket and threw it on.

“The truth, of course.” Peter smiled and put an arm around my shoulder as we went down the hall together. “He isn’t as scary as he seems.”

“I’m not sure I believe you.” I gave him a sideways glance. Wrythe wasn’t a Moth I would ever want to cross in a dark alley. He made me more nervous than the demon I killed tonight.

“Wrythe has been around a long time. He’s killed more royal demons than anyone. He knows how to protect regular Moths as well as the rest of our kind. So don’t shut him out. Tell him everything.”

We came to the door that led to Wrythe’s private chambers. Peter knocked.

“Enter,” Wrythe commanded.

“Remember what I said.”

“I will,” I replied as my knees began to quake.

The door swung open, and a butler waved me inside.

The room was filled with expensive and extravagant things, but I couldn’t focus on them once my gaze landed on the king.

“Hello, Alice.” Wrythe sat on an oversized leather couch. He wore a pair of board shorts, flip-flops, and a tee-shirt. He didn’t look like the leader of the most dangerous league of assassins the world had ever not known about.

I bowed, keeping my eyes trained on my boots. “Hello, sir.”

“Have a seat.”

I scoped the room and took the leather chair that matched the couch across from him.

“Would you like a drink?” He indicated a decanter and glasses on the coffee table between us.

“No, thanks.”

“So you want to get right to it?” He sat up and leaned forward. “Very well. Tell me what happened tonight.

For the next ten minutes, I explained everything. Well, nearly everything, just as Peter told me to. When I finished, Wrythe picked up one of the glasses and poured himself a drink. “Do you think the Envy demon was your sire?” he asked after taking a long sip.

It was the moment of truth. Did I confess what the demon had said about the seven times seven? It felt like nothing and too big a secret at the same time. I needed to research and mull it over. I respected Wrythe as the leader of our society, but I didn’t trust him. I didn’t even know him. I shrugged. “I don’t know. It seems likely given the fact I was able to kill him, doesn’t it?” I wanted answers.

Wrythe leaned back. “Our kind has existed for nearly as long as man has walked the Earth. As soon as demons realized what they could do, they began the awful game of creating and then killing their half-breed offspring. There’s no rhyme or reason to it. As with most evil in the world, there doesn’t have to be.” He took another drink of whatever was in his glass before setting it back down. “I was one of the first to be born with the markings.” He turned his hands, so they faced me, and I could see his marks. They were still red, the mark of Wrath, but they’d faded over the years. “I first realized I had powers about a week after I turned eighteen. There was no society back then. I didn’t even know other Moths existed. My demon came after me with a vengeance I’d never seen. He was hungry for my murder. When my powers manifested, it was a complete surprise to him as much as it was to me, which was how I was able to beat him.” He clasped his hands together.

I crossed one leg over the other and waited for him to continue. His story was one I’d heard before I could read or write, but never from his own mouth.

“Over the centuries, others like me started to find each other. Instead of being chickens in a coup full of more chickens awaiting the inevitable fox to come and kill us, we finally became our own breed of fox, and we could kill just as easily.”

“Why do you think certain Moths began to receive the markings and powers?” That was a question none of my teachers could ever answer definitively. Our histories were full of theories and ideas, but nothing concrete.

“I believe it’s because life always finds a way to go on. We’d been nothing more than prey. Playthings to be toyed with and consumed, but our will to survive caused us to evolve.”

I liked that philosophy. Life finds a way…

“Perhaps you’re our latest evolution, Alice. A Dark Moth that can kill any demon.” His eyes glittered in the overbearing lights.

Tell him what you know, my mind shouted. “Maybe you’re right,” was all I said.

“Alice?” He came over to my chair. “You can tru—”

There was a sharp knock on the door.

Wrythe straightened. “Enter.”

Two warriors came in. Between them slumped the guy who jumped into the car I’d been trying to steal.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHO IS THIS?" Wrythe asked, a bit of amusement in his voice.

"We found him in the parking garage near the elevator," one of the warriors said.

Wrythe checked the backs of the guy's hands. "He has no marks. Why would you think to bring him down here?"

"He had this blade on him, not to mention all of the demon blood." The other warrior produced a sword that had the marks of the Dark Moth on them.

I felt compelled to add the information I had as well. "He was also able to see the demons. And he told me they would be able to get through the car… Maybe he's a regular Moth who knows how to fight?"

Wrythe smiled. "I believe you might be right." He went back over to the couch. "Boys, take him to Heathcliff."

As they carried him out the door, Wrythe said, "Alice, I'm making this boy your responsibility. Once he's healed, find out his story. Discover what you can about him, and then bring me the answers. Understand?"

I shivered internally, even though I didn't know why. But I wanted to decline. Instead, I reacted like a good little soldier. "Yes, your highness."

"Good girl, now get going. Your mission starts now. Don't leave his side until I instruct otherwise." He went to the door and held it open, waiting for me to leave.

"Very well." I followed after the warriors and held open the double doors to the hospital wing so they could carry the wounded man inside.

"Heathcliff!" one of the warriors shouted. "We have another wounded."

The physician was sitting at his desk looking into a microscope. At his name, he jumped with surprise and let out a very unmanly yelp. "Isaac. Neeko." He brushed his graying hair out of his face. "Who have you brought me?"

"We think he's a regular Moth, but he's wounded and unconscious."

"Well, get him on the table so I can have a look."

They got him up, laying him on his back.

The room was clean and sterile. Everything in its place. The walls, ceiling, and floor were stark white. Lights blazed so brightly, it looked like daytime. Rows of glass cupboards lined the wall on the left. I saw a heart, an ear, and the head of an unknown creature before I looked away. The back wall held two doors, and in between was Heathcliff's workstation. Built in the shape of a T, it had three computer monitors, a microscope, and other machines I wasn't sure about. On the wall above the workstation were four rows of bookshelves filled with old books behind glass doors. To the right was a sink, more cupboards, another table, and some machines. In the center of the room was a stainless steel table on wheels. Below it was a drain.

The room terrified me.

"Does he have a name?" Heathcliff asked, his gaze landing on me.

"I don't know," I said.

"Fine." Heathcliff took a pair of shears from one of his drawers. "Everyone can go. I have work to do." He shooed the warriors from the room. "You too, Alice."

"Wrythe ordered me to remain by his side," I said, swallowing down the lump in my throat.

Heathcliff raised his thick, graying eyebrows. "Very well then. You can be my assistant." He handed me the scissors. "Cut the boy's shirt at the center and straight up." He went to a jar and removed some gauze. “Hurry. I need to assess his injuries and see what kind of damage is under there.”

I went over to the table. The guy’s black shirt was soaked in demon blood and some of his own. I tried not to touch it as I cut into his shirt.

He looked like a Moth with deep black hair, tanned skin, tall and muscled. His eyes were closed, but I had a feeling when they were open, they’d be gray too. The same as everyone else’s.

Not me, though, I thought.

“Hustle, Alice,” Heathcliff urged.

“Right.” I finished cutting and parted the shirt. There was a large gash across his incredibly toned abs. It was bleeding though it had slowed. He had more minor scrapes, welts, and teeth marks all over his torso, arms, neck, and face, similar to mine.

I’d tried to bind my fingers after my shower, but they were still bleeding.

“Good green goodness. What happened to you all?” He pressed the gauze to the guy’s wound and then turned to me. As he pulled the bandages from my fingers, I told him about the Envy demon as well as the menials.

“Sounds scary,” he said, leading me over to the large sink and turning on the water. “Why didn’t you say something about these wounds?”

“I forgot,” I said, shrugging.

He mumbled something incoherent as he squirted something that smelled like antiseptic into my hands before moving back to the guy bleeding on the table. “Wash up. Use that towel beside the sink to dry your hands. It’s clean.”

I rubbed my hands together, forcing myself not to wince. The liquid stung as it hit the places where the demon teeth went in. Fresh blood poured from my fingers as I removed the hardened, old stuff.

“Good.” He returned and quickly bandaged my hands. “Put on a pair of gloves so you can help me attend to this guy. This looks like the work of a tracker. Its claws got him good.”

“Claws did that?”

“Afraid so.” As he spoke, he dabbed at the wound with something that smelled of lemons and alcohol. Once I had my gloves in place, he handed the wad of gauze to me. “Carefully clean away as much blood as you can while I hook him up to a saline drip and give him some blood. He’ll need both.”

I wiped at the blood until the gauze was soaked. Grabbed another and continued until the area was as clean as I could get it.

Then Heathcliff pushed me out of the way. “I’ll need to sew him closed to assist with his healing.” He held a needle and thread in one hand and a clean swatch of gauze in the other. “This is going to hurt him. Since anesthetic won’t help, I’ll need you to hold his hands, so he doesn’t get in my way.”

“How? Where—” I wasn’t sure where to hold him down, and touching him in his current state seemed too personal.

He shook his head. “Our instructors really need to work on giving you trainees some medical skills.” He pushed me toward the guy’s head. “Stand above him. Lean over and take his arms, and hold them tight until I’m finished.”

“Fine,” I said, thinking Heathcliff was right about some medical training. I grabbed the guy’s arms. His biceps were thick, but I pressed down as best I could.

“Here we go.” Heathcliff stuck the needle into the guy’s skin.

The guy groaned in pain and tried to roll away.

“Keep him steady,” Heathcliff snapped.

I tightened my grip as Heathcliff fished the needle back through the skin.

The guy groaned again, one leg kicked.

“Do not let him move.”

I leaned over the guy, pressing my elbows into his shoulders, watching his face.

As Heathcliff stuck his needle in once again, the guy moaned. And his eyes opened.

“What the hell are you doing?” His eyes caught hold of mine. I glanced away, but not without first seeing that his eyes weren’t gray, and they weren’t like mine either. They were bright green.

“Don’t move. You’ve got a nasty cut, and I’m trying to patch you up, uh—what’s your name, kid?” Heathcliff stuck the needle that resembled a fishhook through his skin.

“Ahhhh, damn, that hurts.” The guy shuddered.

I glanced down at him, trying not to stare, but I couldn’t help myself.

“I’m Kade. Kade Everett,” he said through clenched teeth.

“Well, Mr. Everett. My name is Heathcliff Henry, but you can call me Doc.” He pulled the thread all the way through.

“Good to meet you, I guess,” Kade said, blowing out a steadying breath.

“We’ll see if you still feel that way when I’m finished sewing up all of your wounds.” Doc winked. “The woman holding you down is Alice.”

“Hi Alice,” he said, tracing my face with his eyes.

Embarrassment rushed through me. “Hello.” I looked away, watching Heathcliff work and hoping he’d finish quickly.

“This is going to hurt. Be strong and hold still,” Heathcliff continued.

OceanofPDF.com

FOR THE NEXT THIRTY MINUTES, Heathcliff sewed up the gash on Kade's torso. Then got to work on the smaller ones.

I was impressed with how still and quiet Kade was. I felt his jaw clench and unclench several times, but he didn't let out another sound.

Finally, Doc straightened. He rolled his shoulders, cracking his back. "Done."

The tension in Kade slowly relaxed. I removed my elbows and arms from him.

He rubbed them gingerly. "You're strong."

"Sorry," I muttered but didn't really mean it.

Kade could tell. "Uh-huh."

With the wounds cleaned, they were already healing, as were my fingers.

"I'm going to keep you in the sickbay overnight." Heathcliff helped Kade sit up as he spoke. "I'll need to check the wound tomorrow, but you should be pretty close to back to normal in a couple of days."

Kade stood but kept himself bent over. I had a feeling it had to do with the fifty or so stitches in his abdomen.

Heathcliff took one of Kade's arms, and I took the other. We slowly walked him to one of the small rooms at the back of Doc's office. The doctor pushed a button, and the door slid open. There were two twin-sized beds with a small dresser near the footboard of each. Opposite the entrance was a tiny bathroom. "There are clothes in the dressers. Help Kade get some clothes on."

"What, we're going to be roomies?" Kade glanced down at me.

I literally felt my heart stop. "I guess so."

"Oh, I get it. So you're my PO."

“PO?” I asked, confused. I had no idea what it could mean.

“Parole Officer,” he said, carefully sitting on the edge of the bed. “You’re going to keep me out of trouble, make sure I mind my manners, that sort of thing.”

I chuckled lamely. “Something like that unless you just want to tell me everything there is to know about you now.” I crossed my arms, hoping he would.

“Cool,” he said

“I supposed a shower is out of the question?” I asked, eyeing his disgusting clothes and working to ignore the scent.

“You are more than welcome to give me a sponge bath.” He raised his eyes, hopeful.

I would’ve smacked him, except he was hurt everywhere. Instead, I rolled my eyes. “Not happening.

“Yeah, but he’s going to need your help.” Heathcliff opened the door and started laughing. “Good luck with that.”

I nearly died of embarrassment. “Thanks.”

As Doc was about to leave, I said, “Can I borrow those shears I used to cut open his shirt?”

“Sure thing.” Heathcliff left a moment and then came back. “Do I want to know what you’re going to do with these?”

I took the scissors. “Yeah, I’m going to cut off his clothes.”

“Good plan,” he said and left, letting the door slide closed.

“Ohhhhhh, you’re putting the moves on me now?” Kade smiled, showing off his sensual mouth.

I was mesmerized by his lips. They seemed to call to me, which totally ticked me off. “No, but your clothes do need to be incinerated.”

He glanced down. “Do what you must.”

“Whatever,” I snorted, coming at him with the scissors.

He held up his hands and then winced. “Ouch.”

I set down the scissors and helped him remove the shirt. It came off easily since it was already cut in half. Then I threw it in the corner, knowing what I had to do next. “Now, your pants.”

“Go ahead.” He smirked, and I was mortified.

“Thanks.” I knelt in front of him and grabbed the bottom edge of one leg. “Hold still,” I said, quickly glancing at his face. I’d removed my gloves after helping Heathcliff but now wished I’d kept them on. Carefully, I cut straight up the middle, trying to avoid getting dirty. When I reached the waist, I paused and removed his belt before cutting through. “Now, the other one.”

“Try to go easy on me,” he said.

I snorted. “Don’t you wish?” Nervously, I cut the other side all the way up, careful to avoid his boxers. Kade was all muscles and warmth and strength. Amongst all the blood and gore still on him was a light scent of cinnamon. His pants fell in pieces to the floor.

I stood there, unable to figure out what to do next.

“Take a picture. It lasts longer,” he said, shocking me into a standing position.

“Shut—” I began but stopped.

His eyes seemed to glow in the dim light of the room. “Up.”

He leaned down and kissed me lightly on the mouth. The move wasn’t anything big or grand, but his lips against mine sent a rush of emotions through me, and I would swear there was a spark. It was as though I’d been in darkness, and suddenly the lights within me flickered on. I gasped and fell back.

There was shock on Kade’s face for a moment before he glanced away. “I didn’t mean to scare you.” He held out his hand. I ignored it. “Can you assist me into the bathroom? I want to get cleaned up.”

“You can manage just fine on your own.” I went over to the other bed and sat, watching him struggle. When he was inside the bathroom, I joined him, putting down the toilet seat. “Sit.” While he did, I grabbed a washcloth and ran it under hot water. “Let me get your back.”

“Go easy on me. I’m not at one hundred percent.”

I ignored him and quickly scrubbed off as much of the blood and dirt as I could see.

“Don’t forget to get behind my ears,” he joked.

Wounded or not, he deserved it when I punched him. He winced and chuckled as I threw the washcloth at him.

“Finish cleaning up yourself,” I said and walked out.

OceanofPDF.com

PAM UNLOCKED the door to our room and pushed it open. She appeared haggard and quickly fell onto her bed, crossing her hands over her face.

“Are you okay?” I asked, even though I knew she wasn’t. Neither was I. Images of Eric’s hand dangling from the demon’s mouth kept driving their way into my dreams.

Attending Eric’s funeral had been difficult. I’d seen enough television to know that while they were somber, they were supposed to celebrate the life of the person who’d died. Unfortunately, we had nothing to celebrate. His whole life had been about training to kill his demon sire or be killed. The latter happened. It was all too common in our world, and I hated it.

But as children, once we were found and plucked from whichever foster home we’d been living in at the time, we were brought to the Dark Moth compound and trained from morning until night every single day. There were rarely field trips or birthday parties. We primarily focused on not dying. Our sole purpose for living was to bring down our demon parent and hopefully save several hundreds or thousands of regular Moths in the process.

If we lived, it was to serve.

If we died as Eric had, there was no celebration. His life was just over.

“I’m fine.” Pam sniffled and wiped her eyes with the back of her hand. “Or as fine as I can be knowing I turn eighteen in three days.” She paused, sitting up and removing her shoes. “Because what we saw —what happened to Eric—that’s going to be me soon.” She unzipped her black dress and pulled it over her head. “I’m not ready to die yet. I haven’t done anything.” Tears streamed down her face along with her mascara.

I understood exactly what she meant. My birthday was coming up too. “You’re not going to die. I won’t let you,” I said.

Pam smiled, but it was full of cruelty. “I appreciate your courageous words, Alice. But no one believes you slayed that demon because of skill. It was a fluke. You’re no more ready than any of the rest of us.”

She wasn’t wrong.

I kept quiet as she pulled on her gray training pants and matching gray shirt. Then put on her black combat boots. “How did you produce such a powerful shield?”

The rest of the Dark Moth’s had demon power too, but it wasn’t quite so all-encompassing as mine. I pulled off my black dress and tossed it on the floor, kicking my low heels on top of it. “I really am not sure,” I said and meant it. Sure, I knew how to call forth my powers, but without doubt and for whatever reason, mine were stronger than the other trainees.

“Whatever,” she said, slamming the door shut behind her, and she was gone.

I went over to my bed and lay down. I wasn’t trying to be complicated or keep a skill from my fellow trainees. In all truth, I’d tried to make myself produce the shield several times since that fateful night, but I hadn’t been able to make it happen.

There was a knock at the door. “Alice? Are you in there? We need to train.”

It was Kade.

We’d spent every moment together over the last three days. I’d even slept in the sickbay with him. Coming to my room to dress and undress for the funeral and using the bathroom had been my only alone time.

He was a nice enough guy, but it felt like Wrythe was punishing me for some reason. Had I done something wrong? I wanted to ask him the question on more than one occasion, but there hadn’t been an opportunity.

“Give me a minute.” I jumped off my bed and quickly dressed in a black training outfit. Laced and tied my boots and then went to the door, opening it. “Hi, Kade.”

He was dressed from head to toe in black, like me. Yet on him, it looked stylish.

“You ready?” he asked, appraising me.

“Sure.” I shut the door and walked beside him down the hall.

“How was the funeral?” He gave me a sidelong glance.

I shook my head. “Depressing.” Kade hadn’t been invited. Wrythe and the others didn’t trust him. Kade said he was a Moth who secretly trained on his own and that even though he didn’t possess any demon power, he’d killed his demon sire. He claimed to have grown up in Wonderland, gone to school, and held a job, just like the humans who dwelt above ground.

He also claimed to be twenty-five though it was hard to tell. For all I knew, he could’ve been ninety. Moths stopped aging once we reached maturity, which was eighteen. For most, it was the year of our death as well.

I was tired and restless at the same time. If I were going to die in a few weeks, I wanted to really live first, like so many of the humans I’d seen in television shows, movies, and in the books I’d read. Second, I wanted an experience that had nothing to do with demons or Dark Moths. “Tell me something about you,” I whispered.

He raised an eyebrow. “Like what?”

I shrugged. “Anything… A story. Tell me what you did for a living. What was your job?”

He laughed. “It wasn’t all that interesting. I was a mechanic.”

I pondered the word. “You fixed cars?”

“Cars. Boats. Motorcycles. If it’s got an engine, I can fix it.”

“Did you go to school to learn your craft?”

“Not any further than high school. My foster dad was cool, though. He taught me about engines, how they work, how to make them go again.”

“It sounds like you enjoy your job.”

He shrugged. “Sure. It isn’t glamorous, and I have permanent grease stains on my hands and under my nails.” He held out his hands to let me see. “But it pays the bills and keeps me busy.”

We’d reached the training room. The door slid open, and we walked through. Pamela was in the corner shooting arrows into several different targets.

“How did you get mixed up in our fight the other night?” I walked over and selected a katana.

He picked up one of the long swords. “I was there in the club when it all went down.”

“Oh?”

“Yes, even greasy mechanics like to go out once in a while.” He swung the sword with expert skill.

“And you saw the demon?” I’d asked him to tell me about that night more than once already, but something didn’t sit right about his answer.

Kade tossed the blade back and forth between both hands. “As I said, it wasn’t until the demon began fighting the bouncers that I realized what was happening.”

“Why didn’t you try to help?” Doing so seemed as natural as breathing. At least to me.

“If there’s one thing I’ve learned over the years, it’s that it is better to stay out of it.” He went to the center of the room so we’d have plenty of space to spar. “Ready?”

I picked up another, smaller sword and found a spot to stand a few feet in front of him. “Always.”

Kade leaned in, but at the last second, dove into me, knocking me to the ground.

“What the hell? Get off me!” I shoved him hard, sending him away.

He winced but stood, holding something in his hand. “Sorry. Your roommate shot an arrow our way.” He held it out for me to see.

I scrambled to my feet. Pam was an excellent shot, which meant she sent the arrow at us on purpose. Furious, I stomped over to her. “Do you have a problem? Trying to kill us?”

Her eyes were blurry with tears. “Sorry, Alice. It was an accident. The arrow got away from me.”

I didn’t believe her.

Neither did Kade. “Accident, my ass.”

That was my thinking, but I didn’t want to believe it.

Kade placed the arrow in Pam’s hand. “Be careful, Moth,” he whispered.

“Or what?” She shoved him.

He was aggravated but didn’t answer. He just walked away.

I followed. “How’s your injury,” I asked. It didn’t seem to bother him as much anymore.

Kade lifted his shirt. The skin where the large cut had been was nearly healed and puckered pink. In a few days, that would be gone as well. “Better,” he said, putting his shirt back down.

“Good.” My cheeks warmed, and I looked away.

Kade tapped me on the shoulder with the edge of his sword. “So you don’t have to take it easy on me today.”

I faced him again. “About time,” I said.

We sparred for an hour. I finally got the better of him and had him on his back. My knees were on either side of his chest and my blades at his neck. “What are you really?”

Kade was breathing heavily, and so was I. “I told you already.” He leaned up.

At his nearness, I stood, working to get my restless heart under control.

He jumped up and slid his sword into the wooden case with the rest of the training swords. Then plopped onto the mat, patting a space beside him.

I put away my swords but didn't sit. "I don't believe you're a regular Moth."

He crossed his legs, resting his elbows on his knees. "Well, you might be right about that," he said, his voice soft.

"Vague much? Why won't you tell me?" I spread my legs out until I dropped into the splits and stretched, laying my upper body on the mat.

Kade's eyes went wide, and I blushed.

The bell rang, indicating dinner.

OceanofPDF.com

KADE WAS QUIET, witty, and had a serious love of tacos. If we had eggs and toast for breakfast, he stuck the eggs on the toast and wrapped it like a taco before eating it. Whatever meat and veggies we were served for dinner were stuffed between two halves of a roll and eaten like a taco. For snacks, he put cucumber into a tortilla or shrimp or tomatoes or corn. It was crazy and strangely endearing.

He was also very regimented. Each morning he woke, stretched, and took a cold shower. Heathcliff had us stay in the sickbay for only one night, and then we were moved to a standard dorm room. It was in the trainers' hall closest to the exit.

I figured I would tire of being in such close proximity to a person for so long, but instead, I grew to like his silly stories and the way his voice lilted on certain words. Sure, he'd answered the basic questions, but while he didn't lie, he hadn't given me the whole truth either.

Kade could fight better than anyone, especially as he continued to heal. Peter sparred with him a couple of times, and I could tell he let Peter win. It was the same with weapons training and hand-to-hand combat. Kade held back. I wondered why, but each time I tried to bring it up, he changed the subject.

I knew the feeling about holding back. Not once had I fully freed my demon power. It surged within, like boiling black lava waiting to erupt, just below the surface. Sometimes antsy to get out, but I kept it in check.

Over dinner on the third night, I finally blurted all of the questions Wrythe wanted to be answered at once. "How did you know about Demonland? What do you want? Why are you here?" He'd already said he wasn't a Dark Moth. That was evident since he had no marks, but he held more power than many trainees and even Peter.

Kade offered me a secret smile. "What do you think I want?" He bit into his chicken fried steak.

I dropped my fork. The man was infuriating. “Were you friends with a Dark Moth, and he or she told you about this place?” I sipped my water.

He rolled his eyes playfully. “No.”

He was vague about everything, except the personal stuff, like where he worked.

“You stole the Dark Moth blade after killing the owner?” He didn’t seem like the type, but what did I know?

“No.” He was offended.

I picked up a roll and took a bite. “Don’t you want to return home? Aren’t there people who must be missing you?” He wouldn’t be free to leave Demonland until he answered our questions since the compound was supposed to be secret.

He used his fork to cut into his cherry tart. “There’s no one,” he finally said after he swallowed.

I sensed sadness in his voice and realized that I knew very little about him even after several days together. “What about your job? Don’t you need to go to work?”

He shrugged before shoveling the tart into his mouth.

It was apparent he didn’t want to talk about it, but I couldn’t be put off so easily. “What’s the name of the place where you work?”

Pam and Georgia had been talking, but at my question, they stopped and focused their attention on Kade.

Steve and Gilbert also quieted.

The attention didn’t seem to affect Kade, though. He kept chewing, swallowed, took a long drink of his water, and then looked at me. “The Caterpillar’s Place.”

“That’s a silly name.” I dunked my roll in gravy before taking a small bite.

“Well, that’s Wonderland for you.” He reached over and picked up my tart. “You gonna eat this?” Without waiting for a response, he stuffed half of it in his mouth.

I shook my head. I wasn’t fond of the fruit, but he could’ve waited for me to give him permission. “Not now.”

“Oh, come on. I know you don’t like cherries.”

It was true. Cherries made me queasy. “Still,” I said, pushing the dessert plate toward him. “Where are your manners?”

Kade finished off the other half. Picked up his cloth napkin and dabbed each side of his lips. “I have them when I need them.”

With my fork, I pushed around the green beans still on my dinner plate, desperate to get him to answer my questions.

When he swallowed, he went on, “In this life, you have to take what you want and damn the consequences.”

His words shocked me, and I gasped. It felt like something had changed within him. “Really?” I tilted my head, feeling my eyes squint as I studied him for answers.

“Very few humans and even fewer demons will wait for you to ask for what you want. They will take without remorse.” He chugged the rest of his water before slamming down the glass.

I didn’t like that. “I don’t believe you,” I said. But I’d lived with humans until I was twelve. They had been some of the vilest people.

“It doesn’t matter whether you believe me or not. That’s the truth, and you’d do well to listen.” He stacked his dessert plate and mine on top of his dinner plate, tossed his napkin over them, and stood. “I’m done. You ready?”

I shook my head. “No, I’m not finished.” I stabbed a bean and put it in my mouth. It was cold and didn’t taste very good, but I wasn’t going to be bossed. His strange attitude was annoying.

“Fine. I’ll see you later then.” And with that, he walked away.

We weren’t supposed to be apart, but I didn’t care. I watched as Kade put his dishes on the conveyor belt and prepared to leave the dining room.

Wrythe walked in. When he saw Kade, the King stopped. “You, come with me.” He then found me and bid me follow as well.

“Great.”

OceanofPDF.com

I CAUGHT UP WITH KADE. He gave me a severe look before turning his attention to Wrythe's back. I continued to stare up at him, unable to believe the strange and varied emotions coursing through my body. That Wrythe asked to see us wasn't a good sign. Either he intended to get to the bottom of the Kade conundrum or kill him. I hoped for the first. As for me, well, it was possible Wrythe could exile me for not doing my job. I'd been given an order but still hadn't accomplished it.

Kade wasn't as tall as the other males but was head and shoulders taller than me. "What do you think he wants?" I whispered.

Kade gave me a sad smile. "We'll know soon enough, won't we?"

Wrythe walked to the elevator we'd ridden to go up into Wonderland a few nights ago. Once we were inside, he pulled a key from his pocket. Stuck it into the keyhole and turned. Instead of going up, we went down. I hadn't known there was anything below us. We were so far down already.

"Where are we going?" I asked nervously, my dinner turning sour in my stomach.

Wrythe didn't answer, and my heart sped up. Fear was an emotion I'd schooled myself to control, but at our King's strange conduct, I was afraid.

The elevator stopped, and the door slid open.

"Stay close." Wrythe glanced over his shoulder, making sure I heard him.

"Okay."

The air was chilly, and I could see my breath. Wind ghosted past, causing the edges of my hair to tickle my neck. Our footsteps echoed, making it obvious we were surrounded by rock. It was dark too. No light guided our way. My demon power shuddered to life, and I could see well enough to know we walked along a concrete path.

Metal doors lined the hallway, but I had no desire to know what was being held behind them.

When we reached the end of the hall, we turned left and continued down another hall with more doors, precisely like the first. It was our fourth left turn that I realized something was off. We should've come full circle, but we hadn't. Though the halls looked the same, they felt different. The air was thinner.

On the seventh turn, Wrythe came to a stop at a dead end. At first, it appeared to be nothing more than a rock wall until he placed his hand upon it. Then it ignited red, and the outline of a door appeared. He leaned his body weight against it, and the door swung in. "After you," he said, stepping to the side once it fully opened.

A new kind of terror sank like a weight onto my heart. I had no idea what was about to happen. But, whatever it was, it would end badly. Of that, I was sure. But I went in after Kade because Wrythe had ordered it.

The room we entered was dimly lit. Then thousands of candles sparked to life. They sat on darkened candelabras thick with hardened wax. More candles lined shelves and rested on every flat surface. The walls were covered in what appeared to be sheer white curtains.

In front of us stood six figures dressed in covered robes, each dressed to match six of the seven deadly royalty demons. A large hood swallowed their faces, making it impossible to tell who was underneath, though I believed I had an idea. They were my instructors, each one representing the demon who had been their sire. The one in the purple hood lifted his head, and Peter's face came into view. The others followed. Wrythe took his place in the center. He'd put on a red robe.

Without meaning to, I stepped closer to Kade, which made no sense. I'd known the men and women in the robes since I'd first come to the compound at the age of twelve. I should be less afraid of them, but I wasn't. My body sought out Kade's comfort.

"Kade Everett. You have been summoned," Wrythe said.

"For what purpose? I've played by your rules and have done as you've asked by allowing the girl to keep a close eye on me, though you know it wasn't necessary."

He gave me a quick look, and I glared. He hadn't allowed me to do anything. Not only that, but what did he mean that they knew. Was his identity not a mystery to them?

"I've given you no cause for concern," he went on, his voice confident and steady.

"This is true, Wrythe. He has been nothing but respectable," Peter said.

"Yes, but we're no closer to knowing what he wants. He's told the girl nothing about his true heritage or why he is here," the trainer Lily said. Her gray eyes cut to me. They felt like knives against my soul. "Unless the girl has developed feelings for the boy and no longer is on our side."

How dare she? Why would she say such a thing?

"Fine, I'll answer your questions now, if that will make you happy." Kade took another step toward the seven before glancing back at me.

"It's too late for that," Wrythe growled. "You must face the Trial of Three. If you return, then we will listen."

OceanofPDF.com

MY HEAD SHOT up at that. I'd read about the Trial of Three. They would test the Moth physically, emotionally, and spiritually to discover a Moth's true purpose.

"Highness, it would serve your Society better if you did not make me do this."

Had I misheard, or did Kade sound sad?

"He dares to speak to us with such arrogance?" Gillian, the Greed warrior, demanded.

"We should kill him and end this charade. It doesn't matter what he wants. The fact remains that he should not be down here. He has no right. And we cannot have him in our midst any longer." The Lady Edith, sired by Envy and devastated at the loss of Eric, spoke severely.

"You can try, but I promise you will not succeed." Kade bowed low as though he were humbled, but he so obviously wasn't.

What the hell was he? In an instant, I knew it didn't matter. I could not allow them to kill Kade. "No!" I shouted. "Don't kill him." Somehow I was drawn to the man and desperate to have my questions answered. I placed my body between Kade and the Society.

"Alice," Wrythe demanded. "It is not your place to come between the Society and our decision."

"Perhaps we should send her back up. She's still young." That was Peter who spoke.

Wrythe shook his head. "Perhaps…"

"I'm not going anywhere without Kade." I had no idea what had gotten into me, but something deep inside demanded I fight for him the way he'd fought against those demons the other night.

"Give her the trials as well," Sabrina said. "We've long said she should face them in order to discover the truth of her sire and her true path. It will help her prepare." The Dark Moth sounded smug.

"We swore never to force the trials on a trainee. She won't be able to handle the weight of the experience," Peter said.

But I felt Wrythe considering it. He believed it would be a good idea, and so did I, even if the thought terrified me. "It's all right, Your Highness. I volunteer to face the trials."

Kade glanced over at me. "We will face them together, Alice Blackburn," he said, giving me a wisp of a smile.

I nodded as knots turned my insides. But it was the right thing to do. I felt it.

"Then it's settled." Wrythe walked over to a slab of flat granite rock covered in candles and pushed them aside, knocking them to the floor. They clattered before flickering and burning out. "Alice, come and lie down."

As I did, he walked over to another granite slab. They were side by side. Once the candles had been removed, Wrythe motioned to Kade. "Lie down."

"I will. But know this. It would be better for everyone if I simply tell you what I want."

Fury flashed across Wrythe's face. "Are you frightened, cherub?"

"You know I am not," he said, raising his head.

Wrythe faced the Society. "What say you?"

"The trials," they responded in unison.

Kade shook his head. "As you wish."

Wrythe stood back, and Edith moved between the two stone slabs. "Take each other's hands," she said.

I held out mine, and Kade took it, giving it a slight squeeze. Whatever was about to happen, I wasn't going to like it. I could feel that truth in my bones. They seemed to tremble with my fear, clattering noisily. Edith produced a golden cord and bound Kade's wrist with mine.

Then she spoke words I didn't understand, like a poem. I was suddenly tired. Too tired to keep my eyes open. So I closed them, thinking I could rest until the time came to start the trials.

And that's when I saw him, the white rabbit with eyes the color of Kade's. He pulled a watch from his white vest pocket.

"I'm late." Then he dashed through the tall grass. I was no longer deep underground but in a lush field. Surprised, I hopped off the stone, quickly searching for the Society but seeing none of them. The slab Kade had laid on was gone, too.

So I went after the rabbit, following him until he reached the other side of the enormous field where he jumped into a hole.

"Wait," I called. When I reached the opening, I fell to my knees and peered inside. "Hello? Rabbit!"

He didn't answer, so I did the most logical thing I could think of at the time. I climbed in after him.

OceanofPDF.com

THICK, dry roots protruded from every direction within the dirty hole. I watched the rabbit hop in, under, and around them, dodging expertly. For a full-sized person, the terrain rendered itself much more difficult. I clawed my way after him, scraping my hands. Oozing blood from my fingers made the roots slick. “Rabbit,” I called, irritated he wasn’t waiting.

It was challenging to get a sense of direction. When I’d gone into the hole, I’d been heading down, but now it felt like I was going perpendicular to the ground. At the end of the tunnel shone a bright light. The rabbit stopped and sniffed the air. Then he pulled his watch out of his pocket. “Must hurry.” He turned and acknowledged me. “Stop dawdling, Alice.”

My irritation rose. He knew my name? I had several choice words for the rabbit, but I held my tongue, utilizing my energy to tear at the blasted roots. Occasionally a chunk of soft dirt would fall into my hair or rain on my hands. The earth smelled strange, like sulfur and overly ripened apples. “Where are you leading me?” I asked as he exited the tunnel and leaned against a rather large elm tree in the distance. He opened his pocket watch, then gave me an irritated glare.

“It won’t matter if you don’t hustle,” he said, obviously exasperated.

I huffed. “I’m going as quickly as I can.” When I reached the end of the tunnel, I exited and stood to my full height, glancing up. The whole sky was ablaze with orange, yellow, and red. It was gloriously peculiar. The landscape was just as bizarre. Giant mushrooms were interspersed with even bigger trees. Their colors were like that of a color wheel. Some had black stripes, while others were spotted. Tangled white foliage covered the ground and climbed up the mushroom stems as well as the tree trunks. Large gold flowers blossomed randomly. The ground consisted of a substance similar to clay, and I wondered how anything grew amongst the dry cracks.

"About time." The rabbit pushed off the tree that wasn't actually a tree but the stem of an odd plant and started forward. With each step, the foliage receded, creating a path.

I followed but kept a hesitant pace as I debated the strangeness of my situation. A few moments ago, I'd been lying on a slab bound to Kade. Yet I'd just climbed out of a rabbit hole, and as I scanned the strange landscape, verified he was nowhere to be found. Thinking about the gorgeous man with green eyes caused my heart to flutter. He was chock full of secrets, and none of them made sense. Like the fact that he fought the way, a Dark Moth warrior would, yet didn't have the marks on his hands. Then there were his eyes. They were green instead of gray. He had carried a Dark Moth blade, yet he hadn't been trained by them. For those reasons and more, the Society elders had demanded he face the Trial of Three, or be killed.

Kade had agreed.

But why?

I had a feeling killing him wouldn't be easy.

According to the books I'd been required to study, the trials were meant to test the emotional, spiritual, and physical faculties. Some didn't survive. In fact, many died, the trials proving too difficult. But if one completed the trials, a trainee's true nature was supposed to be revealed.

Kade suggested he could tell them what they wanted, but the Society wouldn't hear it. I still wanted to know what he was and had a feeling the Society had known all along.

From the short time I'd spent with the man, I highly doubted he was a demon. But he wasn't a Dark Moth either. The trials were a good idea. I'd agreed to go through them as well to hopefully find out who'd sired me. Whether my demon father was a Greed, Wrath, Sloth, Gluttony, Pride, Lust, or Envy demon. But as I glanced around, I wondered if something had gone horribly wrong with the trials. I guessed my body was still lying upon the stone while I dreamed. But that didn't make sense either. I pinched my arm and felt my nerve endings respond to the pain. "Feels real enough."

"Alice, we don't want to be late," the rabbit said, rummaging me out of my thoughts.

"Where are we going?" I asked the question but guessed I wouldn't get an answer, the same as last time.

The rabbit rechecked his watch and hopped along the path. I silently followed, studying my surroundings, wondering if I could use something as a weapon if I had to.

We passed through more mushrooms and trees. They seemed to be getting thicker. A quick look at the sky proved my point. I couldn't see past the gnarled branches. Darkness permeated, and it became quiet like death had decided to take a break. I sped up, realizing I could only just make out the rabbit in the distance. He'd hopped far ahead, and fog swirled around the space between us.

"Hang on." I jogged until I reached the edge of the thicket. The rabbit had just hopped onto a treacherously long bridge. It appeared to be made of wooden planks and rope and didn't look very sturdy. Normally I'd cross without a second thought, but as I peered over the edge, something strange overtook me. Or, left me. I felt only one thing. Terror. Like the fog blanketing the landscape, the emotion infiltrated every crevice of my being. Unable to shake the horror building inside me, I forced myself to step on the first plank. The whole bridge wobbled, and I screamed, scampering back. "Rabbit, wait."

"We're almost there. Keep going." His voice sounded from far away as though he were already on the other side.

I took a deep breath, focused on slowing my fearful heart. Then took a step back onto the bridge. This time, when it wobbled, I took hold of the ropes on either side, hanging on for dear life. When I reached what felt like the midway point, a brisk wind picked up, causing the bridge to sway. Tendrils of hair blew across my eyes and into my mouth. “I can’t do this,” I said, my teeth chattering. My knees quaked, and the muscles in my stomach clenched with unease. Had I not been filled with so much fear, I might have been angry. I knew the feelings I was having were unfounded, yet I couldn’t make them go away. If anything, they were getting worse. And then I knew. My fears were a product of the trials. But even knowing didn’t erase the feelings. They continued to buzz within my body and wouldn’t stop.

“Let go,” the rabbit shouted. This time his voice seemed to come from below the bridge.

I glanced back the way I’d come and then forward. A faceless figure appeared. It hovered about twenty feet in front of me, blocking my path across. Smoke gray robes covered the being, snaking around him in the wind, making it difficult to see anything beyond. My panic grew stronger. “I can’t,” I said hoarsely.

“You can, and you must,” came the rabbit’s reply.

“Ugh.” I didn’t know what to do.

The figure floated toward me at a slow but menacing pace.

I couldn’t do this. “I’m going back,” I said and turned around on the rickety bridge. Why had I decided to follow the rabbit anyway? I took one step, followed by another and another, but with each step came the realization I wasn’t going back. In fact, I couldn’t even see the place I’d come from any longer. Another faceless figure sailed onto the bridge, its fingers made of bones, as it reached out to me.

“Please, Alice. If you don’t want to become like those creatures on the bridge, let go,” the rabbit shouted.

The wind became fiercer as though it were trying to convince me to listen to the rabbit too. My options were limited. I couldn’t go back, and I couldn’t go forward. The wraiths were closing in. My only choice required listening to the damned rabbit and doing something totally out of character—giving up control. “Fine.” I released the ropes. Immediately, the wind turned into a hurricane, which picked me up and flung me over the side.

OceanofPDF.com

I WAS FALLING… or floating… or both. It felt like both, especially since I wasn't picking up speed. My descent meandered through the thick mist that smelled of deep earth and decaying worms, and when I finally landed, it was like landing on soft pillows.

By the time I stood upright, the mist had dissipated, giving me a clear view of my surroundings, which consisted of very little. Ruddy rocks that looked like giant anthills protruded from the ground and sides of the chasm. In the center of the room stood a compilation of black pillars shaped into an oversized throne. It was shiny yet crude and dark. Jagged edges pierced the air, its points glistened in the non-light. Sitting on the throne was a being, elegant and cold. He radiated evil. It rolled off him in droves. But, in a strange way, he was beautiful. A beautiful monster, my mind said. And it was true. He looked more or less like a man with dark hair and skin so white it could've been snow. He reminded me of a demon who'd taken on human form. Dressed head to toe in red, he stood out against the dark rock. Worst of all were his eyes. The way he studied me, inquisitive, his blue eyes exactly the same color as mine.

The white rabbit hopped into my line of sight and approached the man. "See, my liege. I did as you asked and brought her." He bowed slightly. The rabbit looked ridiculous in a charming way. His vest nearly matched the color of his fur, except his collar, which was red like the monster's suit.

The being turned his gaze onto the rabbit. "You did very well, Bleach. Thank you. You may go." He dismissed the rabbit with the wave of his hand. I couldn't help but notice his fingers. They appeared to be mostly bone and very little flesh.

Bleach wriggled his nose, causing his whiskers to bounce around. "Good. Good." He took his watch from his pocket and checked the time before glancing at me. “Very good.” The rabbit hopped away, disappearing behind the throne.

“Now it’s just you and me, Alice.” The pretend man grinned, his lips shaping a smile with oily clarity.

“Who are you? How do you know me?” Something told me I didn’t want to know the answers to my questions. Even as I had the thought, my body lost its strength, and I crumpled to the ground. It happened in an instant, and I had no control, like a puppet without strings. “I don’t want to be here.” The words came out softly.

“Oh, but you do.” The ground came up around me, bending me into a sitting position facing the man. “You see, Alice Blackburn, I have your answers.” He steepled his fingers in front of his face and waited.

“No.” That was all I could utter because speaking proved difficult. I’d lost nearly all power over my body. Fear is an emotion, one that is all in the mind. But it’s a weakness that can strangle a person physically, and I was feeling the effects. It was so strong all I could think was that I wished I’d never been born.

“Don’t play coy. I sense you’ve already guessed the answer—at least to a degree.” One side of his thin, red lips lifted.

I closed my eyes and wished I could cover my ears, desperate to disappear. “Who are you?” I finally struggled out.

“A decent first question, but I must admit I’m a little disappointed.”

I cracked open one eye and saw he’d left his perch on the throne and stood in front of me. Had I the faculties, I would’ve screamed. As it was, I pushed against the chair that held me fast.

“Still, I’ll answer. My name is Deckland Friche.” He smiled, his putrid breath burning my nose. “Better known as the Devil. I am the ruler over all demons.” As he spoke, the ruddy chasm around us vanished and was replaced by millions upon millions of demons, their bodies twisted and hairy, an evil kaleidoscope of claws and teeth. An incomprehensible force of pain washed over me. Like an ocean wave, it struck my body. My mind wanted to explode at the idea that I stood in front of the Devil himself—the most powerful demon known to exist. But I couldn't get further than that. My mind seemed to be shutting down.

"What do you think?" He lifted his arms, sweeping them from side to side. "The world will be ours. Not just the Demon Realm, but all of the realms. After eons, we deserve it. No more living in the shadows or sleeping in the dirt." His smile grew. "Of course, you'll need to die first. That's a given."

My bottom lip quivered. I clamped down on it with my teeth, desperate not to let him see I was afraid.

"But first," he continued. "Let's have a little fun." He snapped his fingers, and a large metal cage appeared beside the throne.

The demons around the room cackled and gnashed their teeth at the sight of the metal enclosure but didn't come forward, seemingly trapped behind an invisible barrier.

The cage was made of tarnished silver. It hung from a long chain that was attached to something above I couldn't see. Green sparks swirled around the bars like an electric current. But that was nothing compared to what the cage contained. And I sucked in a breath. "Wendy? Is that you?" For the second time, I questioned whether this was real or just in my mind. Was I awake?

The Dark Moth trainee looked up at the sound of her name. Blood dripped from a gash on the side of her head, running between her eyes and down her nose and cheeks. "Alice." She shook the bars. "Help me." Her marks flashed red as she tried to pull apart the bars. They wouldn't budge. Not even the power of her wrath could break them.

My capabilities returned at the sight of Wendy. I pushed out of the chair with little effort and scrambled forward to help, breaking the lock. But before I could open it, Wendy vanished.

"Over here, Alice. Look what we have." The Devil indicated a point behind me as he moved toward it.

I turned, following him with my eyes. All of the trainees hung upside down by their ankles, including Wendy. Except for Eric, who'd died. Of course. Their legs were held together by thick chains that went up into the endless gray sky and kept going until I couldn't see them any longer. "What are you—"

"It's simple, Alice. You must choose which of them you're going to save?" He gave Wendy a little push so that her body began to swing, then he moved on.

Wendy cried softly, but I saw her frustration too. She ached to get at him.

"I know they call you the Queen of Hearts," the Devil said. "And I respect your decision not to get attached to anyone. It's smart. It's what I'd do in your situation." He grinned as a beautiful woman in a red dress appeared in front of him. He took her in his arms and kissed her passionately before letting go, spinning her away from him. She giggled before she burst into fiery pieces.

I stood there, shocked. What had he done? Who was she?

The Devil faced me. "If you allow yourself to let go, you will see we are alike, you and I. And we can take what we want when we want it." He tucked his hands into his front pockets like he was just sharing a story about the weather.

"I'm nothing like you," I said, gritting my teeth.

"Right." He gave me a look that said he disagreed. "But hey, the situation I've placed before you should be easy since you really don't care about any of them."

"I won't choose," I growled.

As I spoke, six royal demons appeared, surrounding me. They were in their proper forms—large, slimy, hairy creatures that oozed with open sores. I glanced from one to another, turning slowly, studying each of them. "What's this?"

The Devil laughed, and the demons joined in.

“These are the demon sires of your companions.” He indicated the dangling trainees. “For each one you kill, that trainee gets to live.”

My heart picked up speed. I felt physically ill. I couldn’t fight all of these demons. There were too many. I wasn’t strong enough. My throat felt dry.

“Rules,” the Devil went on.

The room erupted with raucous laughter. Tracker demons shouted obscenities as well as other things.

“Break the rules,” one of them said.

“We don’t need them,” another added.

“No rules.”

“Bloody stupid.”

The Devil’s smile grew. “My trackers have a point. But…” He tapped his chin. “For you, there are rules. Number one. You have twenty-four hours to kill each demon. If you fail, the Dark Moth trainee will die. Rule number two…” He trailed off.

“But you can’t kill the Dark Moth trainees until they turn eighteen. That’s your one and only rule. It’s been that way for thousands of years. You can’t change that.” I wanted to gloat, to grin like a Cheshire cat, but I couldn’t.

The Devil raised one perfectly shaped eyebrow. “Is that so?” He addressed the gallery of demons. “Alice is telling me, the first and oldest demon, what my one rule is. Isn’t she cute?”

They cackled, their jubilation so loud it hurt my ears.

My paralyzing fright rose. He had probably crafted the one rule the demons possessed regarding the creation of Dark Moths.

The Devil wiped his eyes. “Oh, Alice. You’re a funny girl.”

I swallowed.

“I put the rule into play, and now I’m removing it.” He shrugged casually. “They are all nearly eighteen anyway. And it isn’t like anyone is going to miss them." He came forward and touched my shoulder.

Immense depression seeped through my skin and into my bones. It seemed to eat away at my insides. "I-I'll miss them," I said. "And I won't let them die."

"Ohhhh, did you hear that?" He spoke to the group. "She's fiery. I like it."

I didn't know what to say.

"Your time starts now." He snapped his fingers.

Poof.

I was back on the stone slab deep below in Demonland.

OceanofPDF.com

I GASPED, surprised, opening my eyes. “What the hell?”

Wrythe came over and helped me stand. “What is it, Alice? You’ve only been lying there a few minutes.”

“Impossible.” I glanced at the faces of the Society members, then over at the slab where Kade was supposed to be. “Where is he? Did he already pass his test?”

“He’s gone,” Wrythe said, his face a mask of malice. “What happened, Alice?”

“I—” I wasn’t sure. Had I only been dreaming?

“It’s okay, dear.” One of the female Society members came over. She smelled like stale booze and tainted blood.

“I don’t think it is.” I went to the door. “I need to find the other trainees.”

“Wait,” Wrythe said.

But I opened the door and ran and ran and didn’t stop until I reached the workout room, hoping against hope they would be there training. But they weren’t. “Dammit. They aren’t here. It was real.”

“Alice!” Wrythe rushed into the room. He glanced around, seemingly feeling the emptiness like I did.

I froze. “Your highness.” I bowed my head.

“Tell me what you saw while in the trial.” He came forward until we were toe to toe. The man was so tall and so big and so freaking handsome.

My shoulders slumped. “It’s… painful.”

His features softened. “I have a feeling you know why the trainees are gone?”

“I think so,” I said. Then told him about following the rabbit, meeting the Devil, and what he said.

"You spoke with him?" It was strange, the look on his face, almost as though he was awed by what I'd done.

His expression bothered me. Being near the Devil had been painful, and I wanted to enlighten him, but I didn't know how to explain the magnitude of the powerlessness I felt in the demon's presence. It'd been beyond frightening, and the trepidation still lingered.

"Yes." I pushed past him, unable to fight the need to find and slaughter those six demons. "And my—" I almost said friends, but that wasn't true. They were people I'd known for years. We'd trained together, lived together, and eaten together. They were the closest things I had to family. But I hadn't let them in. Not really. They knew my favorite weapons and moves, but I hadn't let them know who I was. Hell, if I thought about it, I doubted I knew. "He's got them, and he's going to kill them unless I kill their demon sires." I went over to the weapons rack and grabbed what I needed—a katana, a gun, and several knives. I tucked them into their spots, the blade on my back, the pistol in its holster, and knives hidden everywhere.

Wrythe rose to his full seven feet and crossed his arms. "If the damn Devil can break his one and only rule, then I'm going with you."

That surprised me, but I didn't have time to thoroughly consider it. "Are you sure? You're the King. I have a feeling some won't appreciate you putting yourself in jeopardy."

"She's right." Peter walked in. "Whatever you're planning to do, I don't think it's a good idea." He gave me a once over. "You don't look too good."

I snorted. "Thanks." I started for the door, but Peter grabbed my shoulder.

"What's going on?"

I didn't want to have to explain myself again.

Wrythe seemed to sense my frustration. "Get your gear. I'm ordering you to come with us. I'll explain on the way," Wrythe said as he loaded up on weapons.

"Yes, Sire." Peter didn't seem convinced, but he wasn't one to question the King. So he grabbed two katana swords, a double set of Colt 911's, corresponding ammo, and several knives.

I watched quietly, unable to say anything while I waited. The reason was simple. I was freaking out. What the hell was I doing? I went to the door and stopped. My eyes found Peter's then Wrythe's before settling on the floor. A drop of blood stained the surface, its coloring no longer bright red but burgundy. At that moment, I knew blood would be spilled, probably my own, and most likely at least some of the trainees. How could I save them all? I didn't know whether I had the stamina and necessary power.

"Alice?" Wrythe asked.

"I have no clue where to begin," I blurted. Desperation and gloom closed in, weighing me down.

Wrythe grabbed my shoulders, spinning me to face him. "Let's go up into Wonderland. Above ground, there aren't protective wards keeping demons out like we have down here, and I have a feeling that the moment the demons can sense you, they will come for you. We won't need to go looking for them."

I nodded, swallowing nervously. That made sense. Besides, I didn't have any other ideas. "Are you positive you want to come?"

Wrythe cracked a smile. "Of course I am. It's been a while since I was in the thick of an actual battle, but I'm ready." He looked over at Peter. "You?"

"Hell yeah." The warrior's eyes sparked with anticipation.

"Well, then lead the way," Wrythe said.

OceanofPDF.com

KADE

I climbed off the stone slab. The room was empty except for me. Nervous about Alice's whereabouts, I exited and went searching for her. It was apparent the spell hadn't worked, and they'd left me to rot. I couldn't blame them. The Dark Moths had been fighting a losing battle for thousands of years. Unbeknownst to them, I'd been tasked with joining in their war against the demon sires many years ago. At least until I could come for Alice.

It was my calling to save as many Moths as possible. And I understood why the Society had insisted I complete their Trial of Three, but it would've saved a lot of time had they just allowed me to come clean and tell them what I wanted. They knew what I was, but they didn't know why I was there.

Of course, I'd lied to all of them at first. Told them what they wanted to hear. It'd been the best move at the time. I'd needed to get close to Alice. Our destinies were entwined, but the Society members had easily discovered that I didn't belong in their compound.

I knocked on her bedroom door. "Alice. Are you in there?" I waited several moments without a response. Something was wrong. The training center was ghostly quiet. I went back to the training room and grabbed a couple of swords.

As I rode the elevator topside, I thought about the night Eric died. It pained me that I hadn't been able to save him. Poor kid. But Alice had taken care of his demon sire, destroying him almost too easily. The girl was even more impressive than I was told she would be. That was good in a horrible, terrible way. The Moths would need Alice to defeat the demons and their ever-growing numbers, but it was more than that. The Moths would require her to make a difficult choice if they wanted to survive as a species.

As soon as I got above ground, I went to my car. Parked only a hundred feet from the elevator leading into the Dark Moth's secret compound, the car was a two thousand fifteen Ford Thunderbird. Smoky blue-green with a metallic sheen, it had twenty-two-inch rims and an engine that roared like the king of the jungle. I took my cell from the glove box—it still had one bar—and checked my messages.

Bill, my boss, had called twice. The second time was to fire me. "Damn." I'd also received a call from Arvid, asking if I was up for a party this weekend. He and I worked together at The Caterpillar's Place.

I sent him a quick text telling him I was busy. My fingers flew over the letters a little too quickly. As soon as I recognized it, I slowed down. It was a habit, something I'd been doing for decades. That was at least one thing I hadn't lied about. I had assimilated into the human world, including the purchase of property, jobs, and sometimes friends.

None of that mattered now. My human integration had all been done with one goal in mind: Find Alice, and help her realize her destiny. After that, it didn't matter.

Of course, the Trial of Three hadn't affected me. It couldn't. The magic used in the spell had been created for Moth's, and I wasn't one of them. But I'd no doubt Alice was dealing with hers. And I had a feeling she was probably in a bad way.

"Hello, Kade. I wondered when you'd turn up."

I tensed, but only for a second. It was good he'd come. We needed a chat.

I sighed heavily. "I'm hungry. Get in." I'd tossed one of the swords onto the passenger seat and now put it and my other sword in the back.

Deckland Friche, better known as the Devil, got in. "Where are we going?"

I ignored him, backing out of the garage. "I need tacos."

“Oh, there’s this great place on the corner of Bandersnatch and Billings that has the best carne asada—”

“I know the place.” I gritted my teeth, irritated. Dealing with the devil was a necessary evil. “Now, why don’t you tell me what you’ve done to Alice?”

He sat back, resting his hands on his knees. Deckland wore a powder blue suit with a white shirt and matching shoes. He looked like a douche from the seventies. Even had his hair slicked back with gel. “She’s working on her first trial, of course.”

I waited for him to go on. Instead, he turned up the stereo. “Does she know who you are?” I asked.

Deckland winked. “Wouldn’t you like to know?” He changed the stations until he found something he liked. It was the latest pop song. Made me want to wear earplugs.

The sun blared down, heating the car. I turned on the air conditioner. It was a little after one in the afternoon. I guessed it was either Friday or Saturday. The streets were mostly clear, which meant probably Friday. “Yes, I would. It would be nice to know how much she knows.”

He tapped his hand on his knee in time with the music. “If you’re talking about her destiny, she has no clue. The Trials require she be tested physically, emotionally, and spiritually. I’d say I’m doing her a favor, not giving her more than that.”

“Tell me what you did, dammit.” I gripped the steering wheel until I left handprints.

He sighed heavily. “She must slay each of the other six trainees’ demon sires over the next six days, one every twenty-four hours. If she fails, the trainee dies.” He shrugged. “Simple.”

“Are you sure she can handle that?” I knew she wasn’t like the others. Not even close. But that was a lot.

The Devil chuckled. “You saw the way she handled the Envy demon. I was too easy on her. This trial might be too easy for her.

Perhaps I should've tied one of her hands behind her back."

I growled, slamming a hand on the steering wheel. "She doesn't know what she's capable of." My teeth ground together. It felt like they would turn to powder. "If she dies, you'll die. Did you forget that? Or are you narcissistic enough to believe it's impossible? Because I assure you, it isn't. You can be killed. Hell, I could kill you now."

"Tut. Tut, Kade. Don't make threats unless you intend to back them up." He turned in his seat, glaring. Waiting for me to make a move.

"I hate that I have to deal with you and your kind." The words tore from my chest. They'd been buried deep, deep down for a long time, but it was the truth. I'd come to accept what my destiny was, but that didn't mean I had to like it. Although each time I thought of Alice's blue eyes and quick wit, I believed my life to be a little better. Half demon or not, she was special.

Deckland chuckled knowingly. "Well, the feeling is mutual."

When we arrived at the restaurant, I turned off my car and got out. "I think I've said all I have to say to you. Why don't you go?" I slammed the door, not waiting for his answer.

Deckland got out. "Don't make me miss out on these tacos." He glanced in the direction of the restaurant, took a deep breath, and sighed. "Fine." He snapped his fingers and vanished.

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE

We sat at a small, round table, the top covered in glazed Aztec tiles. Peter, Wrythe, and I hadn't made it far from the compound before the men felt the need to stop for food. They claimed to be starving, which was verified by how they inhaled the chips and salsa the waitress brought a few moments ago. I felt nauseous. The smells wafting from the kitchen made it worse.

But there was nothing to do except to wait.

I squirmed in my seat impatiently as guilt ate away at my conscience. While they sat and snacked, time slipped away, marching me that much closer to being the reason one of the trainees would die. "Maybe we should go." I leaned forward and spoke in a soft voice. I doubted either of them heard, but my voice quivered.

Both men stopped shoveling chips and salsa into their faces. Wrythe looked at me earnestly before speaking. "We are in the right place, Alice. Like I said, anywhere works. They'll be coming for you."

"Yes, you said that, but it's been an hour, and we still haven't seen one."

"Patience, Alice. It won't be too much longer." Peter picked up a chip and held it out for me to take. "Why don't you have one? They're delicious."

I scrunched my lips in disdain. "Pass."

"You need to keep up your strength. When we run into a demon, you'll need it." Wrythe gave me a stern look. One I'd typically be intimidated by.

I gave him a tiny smile. "I know."

"And we're here for you," he continued, patting my hand. Warmth from his skin radiated into me, giving me strength. He seemed different outside of the compound. Less intimidating. “Those demons don’t stand a chance. We won’t let another trainee die because of them.” His gaze softened.

“Thank you.” I appreciated the sentiment. And I was grateful he and Peter had my back. They were both great warriors. It was strange. As I watched him eat and chat with Peter about mundane things, it occurred to me that he was so much more than just a king. He was a man with needs, wants, and freaking feelings of his own. The idea was eye-opening. I wondered if he had a wife and children. Those thoughts sent my mind whirling, and I wondered what was possible for me. I’d never considered anything past killing my sire. There hadn’t been time to think beyond that. But I considered it now. What did becoming a warrior really mean? Could I have love? Was motherhood a possibility for me? The idea sent excited nervousness up and down my spine. Followed by paralyzing anxiety. I needed to stop. I needed to focus.

Movement in the parking lot outside caught my attention. I looked more closely and realized Kade was out there standing beside a gorgeous car. But that wasn’t what held my attention. It was the person he spoke to. The Devil himself.

“What the crazy, crazy hell?” I darted for the door even though I had no idea what I would do. That damned devil would die. And if I killed him, then my fellow trainees would surely be safe. The Devil vanished before I reached them. “Kade,” I shouted, running toward him. “What the hell are you doing here? Why were you talking to,” I paused and looked around, then continued softly, “the Devil?”

Kade was still standing beside his car, and his face twisted into a surprised smile at the sight of me. “Alice. You’re just the person I was looking for.”

I noticed how his green eyes lit up with genuine happiness, but I wasn’t deterred from my questioning. “Do you know who that was you were with?”

He nodded solemnly. “Yes. Of course. Listen, Alice, we need to talk."

Betrayal and anger furrowed out of me. Was he a demon? "You're damn right we do. I want to know what is going on." I crossed my arms, furious and confused.

"It isn't what you think, but I believe I'm partially to blame, and —" He held out his hands as though pleading for me to listen.

I shook my head, planted my feet, and waited for him to go on.

"Alice." Wrythe and Peter shouted together, coming over to me. Their features were priceless, a combination of perplexity, worry, and irritation.

Before I had the opportunity to explain, an enormous demon reminiscent of a hairless cat appeared directly behind Kade. "Alice," the demon hissed. "Are you ready to die?" His eyes shone liquid blue, making it obvious he was a Sloth demon. Steven's sire.

I debated my options as I stepped around Kade, moving forward and sizing up the demon. Sloth demons tended to move more slowly than the others. I would use that to my advantage. Their biggest strength, aside from size, was their cunning. They were good at planning several moves in advance.

I took a moment to ponder the situation. We were in a parking lot, surrounded by cars. The street wasn't too busy, but there were customers in the restaurant and people nearby. It was apparent by the screaming and shouting that could be heard. Obviously, the demon was arrogant enough to reveal himself to everyone.

As I debated what to do, some people came out of the restaurant and their apartment. Many had their smartphones out and were recording the whole scenario. Others got into their cars and drove away, which was what everyone should do.

"Leave," I shouted in the direction of the crazy people sticking around to record the monster for their social media. I was thinking the Sloth Demon showed himself out of arrogance, but maybe he was just an idiot. Not that it mattered. These people needed to run away. "Get the hell out of here. Now."

Some of them had the gall to laugh.

"Stupid!"

The demon growled, and I returned my focus.

Wrythe appeared at my side.

I jumped up on the hood of Kade's car.

"Alice, be careful," Kade shouted. "Where's your weapon?"

The Sloth Demon laughed. "You're so cute when you're trying to be a warrior, Alice. If only I could take you and keep you as my pet. Put you in my pocket and play with you when I want." He glanced down at himself. "I don't have a pocket, but I'll eat you up and keep you there." He patted his stomach.

Drool dripped from his mouth and landed on Kade's car with a sizzle.

"There goes the car. Damn." Kade blew out a breath as he reached into his car and grabbed his weapons.

The demon grabbed the car by the tires and lifted it. As the car rose, I used the momentum to dive over the demon's head, stabbing a blade in each of its eyes before flipping and landing on the ground behind him. The demon screeched in pain, tossing the car through the restaurant windows. Glass shattered in all directions. People screamed and scattered.

Now they run, I thought.

There was an explosion, probably in the restaurant's kitchen. Flames shot out of the flue on the roof, and smoke billowed. Wrythe, Peter, and Kade, made quick work of the demon. He turned to ash before I had a chance to catch my breath. It was very anticlimactic and a little disappointing, if I were totally honest.

"Next time, I get the kill shot," I shouted.

Kade rolled his eyes.

Wrythe and Peter were clapping each other on the back.

Someone was crying, and I bent over, looking under one of the cars closest to me. A woman had her leg caught under the tire.

“Hang on.” I rolled the car forward.

She scooted out from under the car and stood. Though she limped, she was able to walk away and did so without so much as a thank you.

I glanced around at all of the damage. The parking lot looked like a war zone. Kade was helping an elderly couple from the building. The fire spread rapidly, engulfing what was left of the stucco building just as Kade and the others escaped.

Peter and Wrythe ran to Wrythe’s giant black Hummer and were yelling at me to hurry.

“Chill, I—” I needed to speak with Kade. “Kade, come on,” I said. At the same time, there was another explosion.

The Hummer’s passenger window came down. “We need to go before the police get here,” Peter yelled.

Sirens wailed in the distance. They were minutes away. I ran over to my swords and lifted them from the demon ash before running toward the vehicle.

“Let’s go.” Kade ran past me, taking my arm. I went with him, sliding into the Hummer’s backseat and buckling my seatbelt. As the Hummer peeled out of the parking lot, I glanced at the back of Wrythe’s and Peter’s heads, then toward Kade. As warriors, they were awesome. I had a feeling that we could be unstoppable. Hell, I doubted I was even needed.

Wythe glanced at me through the rearview mirror. “I know what you’re thinking.”

“Oh?” I highly doubted he had a clue.

“We couldn’t have killed that demon without you,” he went on. “The knives to the eyes….” He shook his head. “Brilliant.”

“Thank you,” I said, grinding my teeth. “But I get to kill the next

one. This is my trial."

Peter turned in his seat to face me. "Alice is right," he said, shaking his head. "We don't want her to fail on a technicality."

Kade nodded, though he seemed surly. I guessed it was because of his totaled car. "Yeah, from now on, we'll let you do all of the ass-kickings. The three of us will be nothing more than the clean-up crew."

"Thanks." That meant a lot.

OceanofPDF.com

I STEPPED out of the shower and dried off. It felt good to get the Sloth Demon ash off me. My room felt empty without Pam and the others. I hoped they were okay. It wasn't like I talked to them much or anything, but the other girls talked to each other, and I missed the noise. But it was more than that. I missed them too.

After braiding my hair and dressing in black camo pants, black boots, and a matching tank, I went to the hospital wing to speak with Heathcliff, but Doc wasn't there. The hospital was as empty as the rest of the compound. Fighting down a lump of depression, I headed to the cafeteria. I still wasn't hungry, but it was probably best that I get something in my belly.

I pushed open the swinging doors. The smell of oregano and nutmeg met my nose, and my mouth watered.

Cook had made lasagna.

I loved lasagna.

My footsteps quickened. Until I realized the cafeteria was empty and I was completely alone. All was quiet except for the occasional banging of pans in the kitchen. There wasn't a single warrior or teacher, or trainee in sight. That was my fault. Although since the Sloth demon was killed, the trainee, Steven, should've been returned.

I remembered Wrythe had said the compound was protected by spells, and I wondered how the Devil got them all out in the first place, but maybe he was immune. I needed to ask Wythe.

I sighed, my excitement over the prospect of eating lasagna diminishing. There was still so much to do. Five more to kill.

Before I could leave, Cook came out with a plate filled with extra-wide steaming noodles swimming in cheese and red sauce, a side of bread, and asparagus spears as well as a glass of water. "Eat. It's your favorite," she said.

I tried to smile, grateful the woman was so intuitive. "Thanks, Cook." Her real name was Frances, but everyone called her Cook. She had that look about her—slightly round through the middle, short graying hair, and a stark white apron with black ruffles along the hem. Her marks were the color of gluttony, but they were nearly faded to nothing.

She patted me on the head. "Finish it, and you'll get a slice of my chocolate mousse cake.

I nodded, sitting at the nearest table and going in for a bite. Once she was satisfied I intended to eat, she went back into the kitchen.

I took another bite, chewing slowly. Cook's chocolate mousse cake was the best thing ever, but it was doubtful I'd finish all the food in front of me.

"Hey, Alice. I hoped I'd find you here." Kade sat in the chair across the table from me.

"Hi." I couldn't help but study him. He'd showered too, and the edges of his hair were still wet. It also seemed as though the cinnamon scent that radiated off him was more potent than usual.

"That looks good." He eyed my food.

"It is, but I'm not sharing." The guy could get his own damn food.

He didn't move. Just watched me eat, his green eyes never leaving my face. "Go ahead and ask," he said.

I set down my fork. "What?"

"About the Devil. You wanted to know why he was with me."

"Yes." I still wanted to know.

"Then ask your question."

I watched his lips move, wishing I wasn't so in tune with everything about him. "Are you a demon?"

"Absolutely not." He blew out his breath, running a hand through his wet hair. "Not even close." He shuddered.

“Then why were you with him?” I pushed my food aside and leaned toward him. Like a moth to a flame, I thought morbidly.

“He knows who you are and what you’re supposed to accomplish. I wanted to make sure he knew I was aware of that,” Kade said.

The hairs on the back of my neck stood on end. “Do you know who my sire is?”

“I do, yes,” he said and winked.

“Then tell me.” Frustration oozed out of me.

He glanced down at my plate of food. “Do you mind if I have a bite?”

“Sure, after you tell me who my freaking sire is.” It was apparent he was procrastinating.

Who is this guy?

Kade looked away. “It isn’t my place to tell,” he said. “I would be breaking all kinds of laws if I did.”

“Whose laws? What do you mean?” My frustration built. “I don’t know about you, but I’m still going through the Trial of Three. And the first one requires I kill all of the Dark Moth trainee demon sires. And if I don’t kill them, the trainees die.” I slammed my fist down. “So I’m not in the mood for anything but answers. If you know who my sire is, tell me.” Fury burned through my body. I needed answers, a place to start.

He studied me intently, and I guessed he had an internal debate going on.

“Please.” I touched his hand, immediately feeling that strange shock I’d felt when he kissed me. It was obvious he felt it too.

He let out a heavy breath. “All right. I’ll tell you what I know. But not now. First, there’s something I need to do. Meet me in my room tonight. Okay?” He took my fork and stabbed a giant piece of lasagna before shoving it into his mouth. “Mmmmm. Damn, that’s good. Frances knows how to cook.” He smiled. “Ten o'clock.”

“Where are you staying?” I snuck a look at his breathtaking eyes.

“Guest bedroom at the end of the boys’ dorms. Knock three times, like this.” He showed me on the table.

“So stealthy.” I couldn’t help the sarcasm that bit into my words.

He came around the table and bent, so his face became parallel with mine. At his sudden closeness, my heart beat faster. He smelled good enough to eat. “Ten o’clock.” His breath tickled my lips, and I smelled the lasagna on him.

I had an overwhelming urge to kiss him. I swallowed. “I’ll be there.”

“Good.” He brushed his thumb against my bottom lip. “See you soon, Alice.”

When he was gone, I rolled back my shoulders, trying to ease the tension. The man made me forget everything, and that wasn’t good. I got up from the table and went to my room, where I promptly lay down and fell asleep.

OceanofPDF.com

AT PRECISELY TEN O'CLOCK, I arrived in front of Kade's door. It was closed, and I reached out to knock but stopped. Kade had said he would answer my questions. That meant I would finally find out which demon was my sire. It seemed almost unreal. After nearly eighteen years, I would know why the marks on my hands hadn't changed color, why my eyes were blue instead of gray, and why I was able to kill a greater demon without having killed my sire first. Finally, I would understand.

Those thoughts filled me with anticipation but dread as well. I'd had nightmares about it while I slept earlier, not that it mattered. But I did worry that I might not want to hear what Kade had to say.

The door whipped open. "Alice, you going to stand out here all night, or did you want to come in?"

My eyes got wide. Kade had on gray camo pants but no shirt. My eyes couldn't help but linger on his muscled arms and shoulders. His chest was hairless, except a dark line that started at his belly button and disappeared down below the waist of his pants. "Okay." I stepped inside and moved so he could close the door, clutching my hands together.

The room was sparse, nothing more than a bed, a nightstand, and a chest of drawers, same as my room.

Kade went over to the bed and sat, then patted a spot next to him. "Come here."

I crossed my arms over my chest, nervous. "I think I'll stay right where I am, thanks."

"Why?" He licked his lips. "Afraid I'll bite?"

My heart rate spiked. I was shaky, a bundle of nerves. "Try it, and it'll be the last thing you ever do."

Kade laughed. “Sit down. Let’s talk. I won’t do anything bite-related until you have your answers.”

I would’ve believed him had he put on a shirt, but I didn’t say anything. I didn’t want him to know the effect he had on me. I didn’t want to seem weak. I was the Queen of Hearts, after all. “Good.” I sat, staying as far from him as possible.

My seat choice caused him to laugh harder, but only for a moment. His face became serious. “I’m ready to tell you whatever you wish to know. Ask me your questions.”

I pushed my arms farther around myself. Looked down at my pants. Swallowed. “Which demon is my sire?” I waited for the answer, unable to look at him. But when he still hadn’t responded after several long seconds, I peeked.

A ripple of movement rushed over his skin, like an electrical current, glowing in the dim light. “Your sire is the Devil himself.” As he spoke, his eyes glowed bright green.

“That’s impossible. He isn’t one of the seven deadly sins.” Before I realized it, I was off the bed, and my back was pressed against the door. “You’re lying,” I whispered, my voice pleading. It couldn’t be true because if I was the devil’s daughter, then what kind of monster did that make me?

His expression turned sad. “I’m afraid not, Alice.”

Desperation surged through me, sucking away all my strength. “I was taught about the demons and why they do what they do. Never once has a Moth or Dark Moth ever been sired by the Devil. Not once in all the millennia.” I slid to the floor. Leaned my head back and closed my eyes. And I knew he spoke the truth. It was the only thing that made sense. “So why me? Why now?”

“It’s simple, Alice. Even the vilest of creatures have a desire to leave behind a legacy.”

A burst of bitter laughter escaped my throat. “But he’s going to kill me anyway. So why bother?”

“In the animal world, lions, bears, even dogs are known to kill their young. In nearly every case, it’s because the child was defective in some way, either sick or deformed. The Devil will try to kill you, but I can promise you there is a part of him that wants you to live, to prove yourself to him.”

I opened my eyes in time to see him look away. “There’s more,” I said. It wasn’t a question. I sensed he had much more to say.

Kade ground his teeth together before speaking. “We’re talking about the oldest monster in the world. Of course, there’s more. We could spend weeks talking about them, and I still wouldn’t have told you everything. For now, it’s enough to know that the Devil is your father.”

“I need to go.” I tried to stand, flustered, scared, and wishing he hadn’t told me the truth. “This is too much.” Tears pressed against the backs of my eyes, and I wasn’t a crier. Never!

“Hey. Hey. It’s going to be fine. I’ve got you.” Kade was suddenly beside me.

When I didn’t respond, he lifted me into his arms and took me over to his bed. At his nearness, all of the fight went out of me. With Kade by my side, maybe everything would be okay. I needed him desperately to tell me everything would be fine.

Kade straightened. “I’m going to the kitchen to get you a glass of water. I’ll be—”

“No,” I grabbed his arm. “Don’t go.” I pulled until he sat beside me.

“I’ll be back in a few. Promise.” He gave me a sad smile.

I sat up. Caught and held his gaze. “Kiss me.” I knew my request was out of character and surprising. One of Kade’s eyebrows rose in confirmation. But that didn’t change the way I felt. I wanted his lips on mine. I wanted to forget what he’d just told me. Slowly, my fingers moved along his forearms and slowly trailed up his biceps, to his shoulders and neck, and finally cupped his face. “Please.” I tugged him down.

Urgent hunger replaced the worry on his features. “You sure?” he asked, sitting beside me.

I nodded. “Yes,” I said, moving in so I could feel his breath on my face.

He came closer, leaning down until our lips met. At the touch, there was a spark. I saw it as well as felt it. The shock reached into my heart, melting away the locks and chains surrounding it. I whimpered as my insides warmed and expanded as though my feelings required my heart to grow to handle them. Kade deepened the kiss, pressing my lips open. I urged him closer, clinging to his shoulders as I got on my knees. Kade cupped my face, his hands heating my skin.

Never in my life had I believed I could feel the way I did at that moment. Later, when I recalled the experience, I would believe Kade, and I had fused. I couldn’t find where I ended, and he began. It was the most amazing, intoxicating experience of my life, and I didn’t want it to end. Kade, my mind whispered.

I know. I feel it too.

I gasped, my eyes opening, searching his for an answer. He heard my thoughts, and I’d heard his.

Abruptly, Kade pulled away. “I can’t do this,” he said, standing, his arms crossed.

“Why?” I was confused and heartbroken. It was as though when he pulled away from me that he took my heart with him. I wanted to cry out at the pain I felt with him gone. “Kade.”

A wild look shone in his eyes. “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have let that happen.” He yanked open the door and left without a backward glance.

I sat up, stunned. “Kade,” I whispered softly. Tears fell, wetting my cheeks. I had no idea whether Kade knew what he’d done to me. Or maybe he didn’t care how much he’d just hurt me. The love and warmth, and happiness I’d felt a moment ago were replaced with darkness.

And I wanted to hate Kade.

In the early morning hours, I stopped crying and made myself a promise. I would forget about Kade and focus on the first trial. There were still five more demons to kill. Six, if I counted my sire. After that, the damned Devil would die and do so painfully, especially if I had any say in the outcome.

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE FIGHTS DEMONLAND

OceanofPDF.com

“SHALL I call you Alice the Demon Hunter?” The Wrath demon tried to make small talk as he circled me slowly, his heavy body leaving footprints in the cracked ground as he searched for an opening.

“Call me whatever you want for the next few minutes as long as I get to call you dead when we’re finished.” I followed him with my body, keeping my katana in front of me. This demon would be my fifth in as many days. Who knew killing royal demons would become almost mundane?

We were several miles outside the city of Wonderland, in the middle of the desert. I’d decided that if the demons were going to track me, it’d be better to fight them in a place where humans couldn’t get hurt or see and record what was happening, like the fight at the Mexican restaurant. That battle had made front page news. Local government agencies began poking around, asking questions the Dark Moth Society didn’t want to have to answer. Wrythe made an executive decision to have Heathcliff, our resident doctor, create an elixir. We put it in the water supply to remove all memories of demons from the humans’ minds. Brief confusion had ensued, but humans believed only what they wanted to believe. And giant demons walking the Earth were more than most people could handle.

“I knew you had a mouth on you, but I hadn’t appreciated it would be so bloodthirsty. Show some respect for your master,” he said, sending spittle into the air between us.

I watched it land and sizzle. Then snorted at his bluster. He wasn’t my master any more than the Devil was.

So far, this match had been the easiest of all. It didn’t matter that he was a Wrath demon, supposedly the most aggressive. Within minutes after the battle began, the demon became so frustrated, he shed his human husk and now stood over ten feet tall. Two great ram horns shot from his skull and curled three feet in the air, red as blood. He looked like a zombie bull; his body sparsely covered in patches of black fur. The skin puckered and was leaking pus. His eyes were empty sockets and his mouth was filled with rotting teeth. The worst part was his smell, like over-ripened fruit and the decaying flesh of a menial rat. Sweetly putrid and utterly nauseating. My stomach rolled, but I steeled myself. This monster wouldn't get the satisfaction of seeing me lose my breakfast.

I rolled my shoulders and readjusted my sword. I'd already chopped off one of his legs. Black blood had oozed from the gaping wound briefly, but it was already starting to close. In a minute, his leg would regenerate, and I'd have to start over. I so wasn't in the mood. I just wanted to get this trial over with.

Mentally preparing, I twisted my katana, bringing it above my head. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw a flash of light. Distracted, I turned, but there was only sand and more sand.

The Wrath demon pounced, using his tail to swipe my feet out from under me. "You've already become complacent," he huffed, saliva coming from his mouth, spraying against my face and arms.

My skin hissed as it burned me. I forced myself not to focus on the pain. It would do no good to whine about it. I'd heal quickly anyway.

"How arrogant you are. Give me a few more minutes and I'll chop you into little pieces." He was bluffing. We both knew who would win this fight and it wouldn't be him.

I yawned to prove I knew he was full of it and flipped myself back to my feet.

"Slay him and be done with it," Peter said. He and Wrythe stood off to the right, their weapons drawn, though they were obviously bored.

I'd forgotten he and Wrythe were there. They didn't need to be. After I'd defeated the first demon, my confidence, skill level, and abilities had flourished. Even now my demon power burned like a dull flame radiating from the center of my belly, waiting for a time when I would need it. “Fine.” I ran and leaped on the demon, wrapping my legs around his neck. He grabbed hold of my legs, trying to rip me in half, but I held on, driving the edge of my katana deep between his eyes. The power within burned hot as it left my body, coursing through the sword. It was my power that would kill the demon, the sword just the vessel used to drive it home.

The demon’s body went rigid. A second ticked by before it released a heavy, repulsive breath, falling to the earth in a heap. I held on with my legs until the last moment before doing a front flip off his lifeless body. The demon’s body turning to ash as it hit the sandy floor, becoming one with the hot Arizona wilderness. When he was gone, I faced Peter and Wrythe. “Done,” I said, sheathing my sword and trying not to smirk, though it was difficult not to feel pride at my accomplishment.

“Now you’re just showing off,” Wrythe said, his gray eyes alight with irritated amusement.

“I don’t even know why we come with her anymore. She doesn’t need us, that’s for sure.” Peter jumped down from the large rock he’d been standing on, landing a few feet in front of me.

Wrythe did the same, his gorgeous eyes sparkling as he studied me.

I patted him on the shoulder. “Let’s get something to eat. I’m starving,” I said, heading back to Wrythe’s Hummer.

“Do you ever get the feeling I’ve lost all mystique and she no longer respects me as her king?” Wrythe asked Peter, his voice low, but not low enough that I couldn’t hear.

“I respect you, sire. I’m just really hungry. Demon slaying really builds up the appetite.”

He roared with laughter. “Well, then, Alice, let’s get you something to eat.

As we drove back to the compound, Wrythe turned on his favorite music from the seventies. Over the last few days, I’d learned he liked the Bee Gees, Blondie, and Queen. It was heavy on the disco with a little classic rock thrown in for good measure. Not my favorite, but it was better than silence, especially since Peter and Wrythe weren't big talkers.

After he parked his Hummer in the large concrete parking garage and we rode down the elevator back into Demonland, I went to my room, showered, and dressed in my standard black before heading to the cafeteria. Wrythe and Peter were already there. Their heads hung together, obviously discussing something. I paused mid stride, clinging to my tan tray. Atop it sat my chicken and waffles and my mouth watered at the scent of salt and sweet. But should I sit with them or find another table?

The cafeteria was empty, so I had plenty of choices. Everyone else was training or in class at eleven fifteen in the morning. But since the ultimatum given by Deckland as part of the first trial, I kept different hours than the others.

Wendy and the other trainees had been returned thankfully. At least Deckland kept his end of the bargain. I hadn't had the chance to talk to them yet. Partly because I didn't know what to say. It was my fault they'd been put in danger and I would understand if they weren't happy with me. The other problem was they knew who my sire was. That knowledge had changed the dynamic between us. I didn't want to believe it made any difference, but it was true. I saw it in the looks they gave me as well as the hushed comments I overheard.

I wanted to feel bad about it. Angry. Upset. Or even sad. Before Kade figuratively stole my heart and left, my emotions had exploded in abundance. But since he'd gone, I hadn't allowed my feelings to overpower me the way they used to. Wrythe and Peter could tell there was something off about me, but what could I say? I was in love with Kade. He'd kissed me and then he told me we couldn't be together.

I shook my head at even the thought of telling Peter or Wrythe the truth. Doing so would be mortifying. Because how did I, the person everyone called the Queen of Hearts, explain to a teacher and her king that I'd fallen in love with a stranger. Even as I thought of Kade, memories of our kissing came to mind. My body warmed all over and desire filled my belly.

No, I shouted at myself internally. I'd decided that despite the fact that I knew I loved Kade, I needed to lie to myself. It was the only way I got through the day.

With a sigh, I took another step toward Wrythe and Peter. Wrythe saw me and waved me over.

"Alice. Come and sit with us." His easy smile didn't intimidate me as much as it used to. I was glad of that. In fact, I'd spent so much time with Peter and Wrythe the last few days, I kind of considered us friends. More so Wrythe than Peter. I didn't know if that was disrespectful or not, but it was how I felt. The two of us meshed well together.

"I just didn't want to interrupt," I said, sitting beside Peter. "It looked like the two of you were in serious conversation."

Peter narrowed his eyes before taking a bite of the food Cook had prepared. "Not at all," he said, but I could tell that wasn't true. He wasn't trying very hard to hide it either.

"What were you talking about?" The food smelled amazing. My mouth watered. While I waited for a response from either one or both of them, I spread a large pat of butter across the waffle, stuck the crispy chicken breast on top and poured thick, maple syrup all over the whole thing.

"Nothing too exciting," Wrythe said, his eyebrows raised as he watched me.

The king was seriously hot, but also so far out of my league there was no point taking my thoughts about his fineness any further. "Really?" I cut into the food and shoved a bite in my mouth. My taste buds sang, and I closed my eyes a moment, savoring the combination.

"Really," he said, copying the way I'd laid out my food on his plate and then taking a bite. He chewed several times. "Very good," he added around his food. “Much better than eating the waffle and the chicken separately.”

“Agreed,” Peter said. He’d been eating his food the same way I did.

It was obvious they weren’t going to tell me what they’d been discussing. Besides, the king’s close attention to everything I did made me nervous. Resolute in my desire to ignore the feeling, I took another bite. I didn’t have room in my brain to figure out what was going on in Wrythe’s head.

“You have one more demon to kill,” Peter said, changing the subject. “I think we should get an early start and head out to the dunes again tomorrow. That way we can get out there before the blasted heat boils my skin.”

Wrythe shook his head, pointing his fork at Peter while he finished chewing. “True, but I want to know what will happen to Alice once she completes her task. She’ll have the second trial to contend with, but what will it be?” He licked his fork. “I don’t like not knowing.”

I hadn’t thought about that. “It doesn’t matter what his plans are for me. I have a plan for him and that is snuffing out his very existence,” I said forcefully and lifted my cup.

Peter pushed away his food. “I’ve been studying the histories all the way back to the beginning and there isn’t one iota of evidence leading me to believe that killing the Devil is a good idea or even possible.”

I focused on my waffle, deciding I wouldn’t pay too much attention to Peter’s comment. Whatever the histories said, it had to be possible. I would end him. Without a doubt. Otherwise where did that leave me?

“The texts talk about a need for balance. That there must be equal opposition in all things. Good and bad. Light and dark…” His voice trailed off and he drank from his glass.

What aren’t you saying? I resisted asking the question aloud. That had probably been what he and Wrythe were talking about when I arrived with my food and interrupted.

But it didn't matter. I'd heard the talk about balance before. From what I'd seen the bad far outweighed the good. Killing the Devil could only make the world a better place. As I thought about it, other questions arose. Like if the Devil were gone, what would happen to the demons? Would there even be a need for the Dark Moth Society any longer? At that last question, a pang of doubt filled my guts. Training and killing demons were all I knew, were what I lived for. My purpose. I didn't need the Trial of Three to tell me that. I knew it as surely as demon blood flowed through my veins. In the same breath though, I understood I had no idea what I would do after I'd destroyed them all, but I wanted to find out.

Just as the human race continues to climb, so too will the demons. That thought entered my mind. I shook it away.

"Alice?" Wrythe was watching me again, his eyes flicking over my features.

"Hmmm," I said, before drinking more water.

"What do you think? Can the Devil be killed?" He stuck an enormous bite in his mouth. Syrup coated his bottom lip and I had the urge to kiss it away.

Nope. Not happening. "Of course he can," I said, tossing my napkin on top of my unfinished food. I was no longer hungry.

"I'd better get back to the books," Peter said standing. He seemed frazzled by my commitment to kill the Devil, possibly because that would mean he was out of a job.

My eyes narrowed as I studied him. Or was it something else? A twinge of worry crept up my spine

"We know Alice will kill the sixth demon tomorrow. After that, we aren't sure what will happen. All we know is that the second trial has to do with the emotional part of her psyche." A shadow crossed Peter's features. "I don't know what that's going to mean, but I hope to figure it out."

Pushing away whatever bothered me about Peter, I stood too. “I need some sleep,” I said.

Wrythe growled. “I guess I’m finished as well, then.” He shook his head in exasperation. “All work and no play is really starting to drag me down.”

Neither Peter nor I offered an apology and from the look on Wrythe’s face, it was obvious he didn’t expect one. “I’ll speak to the others and seek out their opinion on the subject as well.”

We placed our trays on the conveyer belt and went to the exit. At the end of the hallway, I was to turn left and they were to go right. But Wrythe stopped, taking hold of my arm. “Have you heard from Kade?” His voice was easygoing, but there was a glint of… was it wrath or jealousy in his eyes?

“No,” I said. I hadn’t told them about seeing him in my room and our shared kiss. I couldn’t. “Do you know what he is?” My question was direct and to the point, so I was surprised when Wrythe stepped back, concern replacing his previous emotion. But I’d been plagued with strange dreams that were hard to explain. All I clearly remembered was that it felt like I was flying.

“It doesn’t matter what he is,” he growled. “As long as he hasn’t contacted you.” He tilted his head, as though that would help him gauge what I wasn’t saying. “Kade isn’t to be trusted, that’s for sure.” Wrythe rocked back on his heels.

Peter nodded in agreement.

My head rubber-banded back and forth between them. Sometimes I despised the Society and their secrets. “Let me get this straight. You both know what he is but are refusing to tell me. Is that right?” I was in shock. The last several days we’d spent loads of time together, but they hadn’t said a word about any of this.

“Knowing what he is won’t help you fight your demon tomorrow. In fact, it might throw you off your game. Plus, we have no idea what he really wants.” Wrythe stepped closer as though he wanted to say more, but hesitated.

“If you want my opinion, it’s a mystery best kept unsolved,” Peter said, an unreadable expression on his face.

I opened my mouth to tell Peter I didn’t want his opinion, but Wrythe spoke first.

“Once your first trial is finished,” Wrythe said, taking my hand in his and stroking the back of it. “Then we can discuss it.”

At his touch, I felt a jolt—like electric fire—and it stung me red hot. Dazed, I gasped, pulling away, placing myself at a safe distance from him.

“Alice?” Wrythe’s emotions changed again. This time to a look I never thought I’d see him give me—one of yearning. It was obvious he’d felt the electric fire like I had. “What the—” He swallowed, his pupils dilating.

“Hell,” I finished, moving around them. I couldn’t be in Wrythe’s presence a moment longer. “See you at sunrise,” I added before turning the corner into the hallway that would lead to my room.

In a quiet tone, I heard Peter question the king, but didn’t wait around to hear his response.

OceanofPDF.com

I NO LONGER SHARED A ROOM WITH the other trainees. After slaying the second demon sire, I made the excuse that I didn't want to disrupt their schedules with my odd hours. While that was part of the reason, mainly it was because I could sense their discomfort around me. My life was already awkward enough. I didn't need the few moments I could spend recuperating to be filled with anxiety.

Unlocking my door, I went in, glancing around. The furnishings in my new room were even more sparse than my previous one. Just a single bed, a bedside table, and a dilapidated old chest of drawers. To the left was a small closet where I hung my clothes, all of them black.

I changed and got into bed. My body was exhausted, but my mind wouldn't shut down. I kept thinking about my father and his reasons for siring me. Burning anger consumed my thoughts. As I debated his motives, I stared up at the ceiling, watching a yellow and black spider make its web in the far-right corner of my room.

Out of the corner of my eye light glinted, and then Kade appeared at the foot of my bed. Out of thin air!

On reflex I grabbed the knife I kept under my pillow, brandishing it in front of me. "What the hell?" My momentary fright dissolved into anxious need and a ribbon of desire crept through my veins. Irritating. After days without seeing him, I felt discombobulated and out of sorts. My cheeks became warm and my heart crashed like cymbals in my ears. "You shouldn't be here," I said, working to sound calm.

Kade raised his hands, a wisp of a smile on his lips. "Take it easy. I just… wanted to check on you." He seemed nervous, not the usual cool and overconfident man I'd come to know while he stayed in the compound.

He looked better than I remembered too. I shook those thoughts away, reminding myself that I hated him. "More like you want to torture me," I whisper-shouted. Seeing him made my heart ache in unnatural ways.

He seemed to sense what my body wanted and came around the bed. "I've missed you, Alice."

The covers had fallen to my waist, revealing the black tank I slept in. I crossed my arms. "I haven't missed you. Not in the slightest," I lied.

He sat down; his green eyes boring into me. "I know that isn't true." He leaned in and his heady, spicy scent filled the air.

To keep from grabbing him and kissing him, I got out of bed. "What are you doing here? The last time I saw you, you kissed me and then said we couldn't be together. I-I don't want you here. Leave." I pointed at the door as he stood. But I still wasn't far enough away from him and walked to the far corner of the room. The same one the spider was using to build her web.

Kade gritted his teeth and then took a deep breath. "That's still true. We shouldn't be together. But…" He wrung his hands, squeezing them tightly, like an unseen force rallied against him. "That doesn't change the fact that it matters what happens to you."

His choice of words were like a slap in the face. He didn't say I care about you or I love you, he only said it matters what happens. But he also said shouldn't not can't. That brought me hope. While he spoke, he slowly came toward me like his body didn't care what his mouth had to say. It eased my longing soul that he was struggling as much as me.

"Why, Kade? Why does it matter?" I pressed my back into the corner, wishing I could disappear into the walls. There must be dozens of women in Wonderland desperate to spend time with him. Why would he continue to make the effort to see me?

"Alice, I want to tell you—" He held his hands out as though trying to calm a scared animal.

"You kissed me," I said, interrupting him, tears budding at the corners of my eyes. In that moment I despised myself for the way I reacted to him.

He sighed. “Please try to understand,” he pleaded.

“Why?” I didn’t understand. Not in the slightest. “You used me and then you left. You think you’re too good for me or something? Because you’re not.” Unwilling to assault him physically, I verbally lashed out at him, hoping to hurt him the way I was so desperately hurting.

“Think about it, Alice. I know the Dark Moth teachings are lacking when it comes to things not pertaining to demons and how to kill them, but there must’ve been a chapter or two in your schoolbooks explaining why it would be a bad thing if we were together.” He took another step forward. His hair fell into his eyes, making him look young and gloriously handsome.

I tried to focus, to figure out what he could possibly be talking about, but my body yearned for the feel of his crushing mine. I wanted to shout that it didn’t matter the reasons we couldn’t be together. Consequences be damned, I knew how right we were. I swallowed. “Is it because you aren’t a Dark Moth? Regular Moths and Dark Moths can be together. It’s frowned upon but not unheard of.”

He took another step forward. Way too close. I could hardly breathe at his nearness, but when I did I could smell cinnamon. “I’m not a Moth, Alice. I tried to tell you that before the Trial of Three. Wrythe and the council know what I am, but I guess they haven’t told you either.” He paused, momentarily irritated before smoothing his features and leaning in. “I wonder why Wrythe hasn’t told you yet.”

I nodded, indicating Wrythe did know, but was unable to say anything as an image of Kade and me side by side on the stones, preparing for the Trial of Three, came into my mind. We’d been bound by a golden chord. Because of that bond, I’d believed we would traverse the Trials together, but then he’d vanished. What are you? I asked in my mind, knowing he’d heard me once before.

His lips were inches away. I could feel his breath, the warmth causing my body to tingle. He put a hand on either wall, pinning me there. Not that I would've moved. I was exactly where I wanted to be. My anger dissipated like frost melting in the morning sun. In that moment, all I wanted were his lips on mine. His body against mine. His hands in my hair and on me, exploring, while I did the same to him. I wanted to feel one with him again.

Does it matter right now? He didn't say the words, but I felt them inside my head.

That he spoke to me like that shouldn't have surprised me. No, I responded, only a little freaked that we could speak to each other without speaking. "Kade," I said aloud, before closing the tiny gap between us and pressing my lips against his.

He groaned against my lips, kissing me deeply as his hands wound around my waist and he pulled me against him. Then his hands went to my hair. He tugged away slightly, pulling my lips from his. "You're irresistible," he whispered, his voice gruff with emotion.

I took a small breath. "Am I?" I responded, my lips meeting his again. He was definitely irresistible to me.

Willpower abandoned us, and we were like starved animals. So hungry for each other. Desperate for more. He spun me around, walking me backward toward the bed, his mouth never leaving mine. I clung to him, already so close, but wanting him nearer. It was as though he'd consumed me. Nothing else mattered, not the demon I still had to kill, not the Devil. There wasn't anything but him.

Until a knock came at the door. "Alice." It was Wrythe's voice.

Kade pulled away, his features a mixture of frustration and… relief? "Saved by your blasted king," he said, and vanished. I jumped up, grinding my hands into fists and stomped to the door. It only took seconds for the heat to leave my body and the hunger to shrivel like an ember floating into the atmosphere. "What is it?" I growled, throwing the door open, desire still a dull ache in my stomach.

Wrythe held his hands up in surrender, obviously sensing the emotion coming off me. “Mind if we talk?”

I glanced at the clock on my nightstand. It was after midnight. “It’s late,” I began, clearing my throat.

“I know, but this won’t take long.”

“Um, sure. I guess. Come in.” I opened the door.

Wrythe wore sweatpants and a black t-shirt. His feet were bare, and his wet hair hung sleek and long to his shoulders. There was no denying the man was breathtaking. A flicker of craving for him fluttered to life. What the crap was wrong with me?

“What’s up?” I asked, trying to keep my voice light.

He rubbed the back of his neck, keeping his eyes on the floor, and I remembered what I was wearing. Tight shorty shorts and a tank top. I thought I should be embarrassed, but instead I lifted my chin in defiance. I had nothing to be ashamed of. He came to my bedroom door in the middle of the night. If he expected me to be wearing more, that was his problem.

“I spoke with the other council members,” he began, glancing around me, probably looking for a place to sit. I didn’t have any chairs, which meant we would have to sit on my bed.

Refusing to act nervous, I went over and straightened the covers, indicating my bed.

He looked around, verifying there wasn’t another spot and then gingerly sat on the edge.

I took the spot at the head. “And,” I said, hoping to urge him to continue. He brushed some hair off his face. The earthy scent of teakwood filled my nose. I placed one of my knees between us.

“They all have very strong opinions about your decision to slay Deckland Friche.” He paused, and I found it interesting he didn’t say “the Devil” but used the demon’s stupid human name.

“Yeah? What do they think?” Not that it mattered. I would do what I wanted. My rebelliousness surprised me, but I didn’t let it show.

“Peter went through the books and found several passages indicating that killing Deckland is a very bad idea. The other Society members agree you shouldn’t take him on.”

“What do you think I should do?” I wanted his approval. That realization caused me to grind my teeth, though I wasn’t sure why.

His gray eyes studied me. “I’ve no doubt you can defeat him, Alice. You have unmatched skill as well as courage greater than I’ve ever seen before and your power grows with each slayed demon.” He licked his lips.

My head swelled with pride as I waited for him to go on.

“But there are too many unanswered questions for us to allow you to destroy him,” he finished.

“Allow? Really? So, this is a kingly decree?” I pressed my back against the headboard, forcing myself to remain calm.

“You’re so brave, so full of courage. It’s one of the many qualities I admire about you.” He nodded as though he’d expected my outrage. “I need you to understand that killing Deckland isn’t about bravery or courage. It’s about what’s right for not just you, but all of the Moths.”

I opened my mouth to interrupt, but he held up a hand, keeping me silent.

“Think about it. If you kill Deckland, who will take his place? Will another rise to the rank of Devil? We know there is demon royalty, but we don’t know if there is an heir to his throne. And if that happens, what if the new Devil changes the game? Killing Deckland could lead to chaos whereas, at least now we know what we’re dealing with, we understand the game they are playing, and we have a way to combat them.”

He pleaded with his eyes, asking me to grasp what he was saying. But I couldn’t. Not a moment longer.

“Who cares if there’s a hierarchy? Who cares if no one takes his place or another demon does? Whatever happens, we can handle it. I will take care of it." I pressed my hands together in a fist.

Wrythe smiled grimly, leaning back. "You're his daughter, Alice. What if you're the heir?" he asked quietly.

That question rocked me like a physical blow. I hadn't even considered such an idea. "That isn't possible," I said.

"No?" He rolled his shoulders. "As far as we know Deckland has never sired a Moth before. You're it. And it occurred to us that if he sired you, it might be because he wants to bequeath the throne to you."

The words the Devil had spoken to me returned to my mind. He'd said the world could be ours and that we would be great together. Wrythe might have a point, but I wasn't ready to admit it. "That's crazy," I said. "Why would he want to give the throne to his mutt offspring? It's unlikely the demons would listen to me anyway."

"Don't sell yourself short. You ask why, but I say why wouldn't he?" Wrythe leaned forward, his large body seeming to force the air from the room. "I don't want anything to happen to you, Alice," he said. "You may not know this, but I've grown quite fond of you over the last few days."

It seemed like there was more to his words than what he was saying. "And I'm fond of you," I admitted. "I don't have a lot of friends, but I consider you one of them." I placed my hand over his and he covered it with his other hand. The spark of desire grew brighter in my belly, but I did my best to tamp it down.

"Thank you, Alice." He stood. "I'll let you get some sleep, but please think on my words and consider your king's request." He went to the door. I'd left it open and his frame filled the entrance.

"I will," I said, unable to stop myself from admiring his massive arms and muscled physique.

"Thank you." He took my hand in his. Compared to his, mine seemed so small. And he placed it over his heart. "Goodnight."

“Goodnight, sire.” I swallowed, wondering about the herd of horses racing through my chest. Once the door was closed, I leaned against it and sank to the floor. He’d asked me to consider his request, but I knew he meant it as an order. He didn’t want me to kill the Devil and it was my duty as his subject to do as my king commanded.

“He has a point,” Kade said, appearing in front of me.

I yelped, gripped by stupid fear. “Stop doing that,” I spat, the initial panic melting into irritation. “Please. I can’t keep doing this. It’s obvious there is a physical attraction between us, but nothing more—at least not for you.” I rolled onto my knees and stood.

When I faced him, his fingers caressed my face as his green eyes held mine. “Do you want more, Alice?”

“Yes,” I breathed. My eyes flicked to his lips, my frustration morphing to longing at his touch.

Kade looked away.

I ground my teeth together, telling myself to focus on what needed to be done. I wouldn’t be his plaything. “But I can tell you don’t want that. You don’t think I’m good enough for you—”

He shook his head, placing a finger over my mouth. “That’s not true. Not at all.” He turned away so his broad back was to me. “I have directives, same as you.” His shoulders sagged as though a weight rested heavily on them.

“What are they?” This was news to me. Maybe if he shared, we could work through whatever was bothering him together.

“Have you ever been commanded to do something, but deep down you know it’s wrong?”

I nodded though I wondered why he was asking. “Not even two minutes ago when Wrythe ordered me not to kill my father,” I said, moving around him so we were face to face again. “Whatever your command, I say follow your heart.”

“How can you be a demon for all intents and purposes, and yet care more for me than anyone I've ever met?" His question was filled with wonder.

"I do care. I don't know why, especially after what you did, but I do." I shook my head, forcing myself to understand how I felt about Kade. Lust came to mind. I wanted Kade more than I'd ever wanted anything in my life. But beyond that, would I care if he died? If harm came to him? I didn't know why, but the answer was a resounding yes. "I want you. I want to be with you. When you're around I can't think of anything else. But beyond that, before you disappeared that night—" I hoped he knew the night I was speaking of. By the look on his face, he did. "I thought we were friends. We talked, trained, ate together. I mean, I know how you eat your food, and—"

"How do I eat my food?" he asked, interrupting, a perfectly gorgeous smirk on his face.

The way he looked at me was disarming and my belly quaked with need. "You always make your food into tacos, whether it's a tortilla or a piece of bread or a potato chip. They become the vessels for whatever food you place on them, so you can eat them together," I said, twining my fingers with his.

Kade chuckled. "I do that, don't I?" He stepped closer.

"Yes, and then there's the way you tilt your head when you have something particularly exciting to say…" I let the words die off as he did exactly what I said. "Like that, damn you." I looked away, pushing myself not to sigh.

He took my chin in his fingers and forced me to look at him. His eyes were dark with need. "We were friends. I enjoyed every moment we spent together. Too much. Because I like you more than any friend should. In fact, I want you desperately. But more than that, I care for you more than I've ever cared about anyone." He placed his hand on my chest, just below my collarbones.

"What are you doing?" Heat radiated from his palm as white light glowed all around it. I watched in fascination, trying to comprehend where his power came from. He didn't have markings on his wrists the way Dark Moths did. Nor did his light radiate one of the colors of the seven deadly sins. Yet, he definitely had something. I just couldn't decide what. It didn't help my thinking that my knees felt weak.

He tilted his head, listening to the way my heart pounded against his hand and gave me a lopsided grin, but didn't respond.

His grin was so damned disarming.

Finally, he spoke. "Do I have your heart, Alice Blackburn? Or is it your soul?" His eyes met mine.

"You have them both," I admitted, breathlessly, though I really didn't know much about my soul.

"What if I don't want to give them back? What if I want to keep them forever?" He was serious. I could feel the truth as well as see it on his face.

White hot need rushed through me and I took a deep breath. "You can only keep them if you intend to give me yours in return, Kade Devereaux."

He picked me up and carried me to the bed. I wrapped my legs around his waist until he lay me down on the bed. Then he settled in beside me. I searched his face, hoping against hope he intended to give me what I wanted.

"I shouldn't be with you. Not in any way. My orders are clear, but I say damn my orders and damn my heritage." He rolled on top of me, his eyes searching mine.

I didn't need any more encouragement. Without another thought, I began unbuttoning his shirt. He lifted himself so I could pull it out from where it was tucked into his jeans. When I couldn't reach the final three buttons, he sat up, pulling his shirt apart so the buttons popped and landed like soft pinging rain around the room. Then he tore it off, revealing his taut chest and arms. I ran my hands along his abs, realizing I would never get enough of how gloriously handsome he was. "Kade, I want you. I want this. More than I've ever wanted anything else."

He tossed his shirt to the ground before leaning down to kiss me. But something was wrong. I couldn't feel his lips on mine anymore and my hands were no longer touching him but grabbing at air. Before my eyes, he was evaporating. "What's happening?" I asked, trying in vain to keep him with me.

Disbelief crossed Kade's face. "This can't be," he growled. When he was almost gone, he added, "I'm sorry, Alice."

"No," I sobbed. "Not again." Pain radiated through me so strong, I doubted I'd feel anything but sadness ever again. Hot tears burned my cheeks and I let them, allowing myself to cry long after he was gone. When sleep finally found me in the early hours before dawn, it was restless and filled with nightmares. I was surrounded by demons, each one more desperate to end me than the next. They stood just out of reach, as though an invisible barrier kept them from me. I turned, searching for where the barrier came from. And saw him. My father. The Devil. He smiled, smug, until he wasn't. Light emanated from somewhere over my shoulder. I turned to see where it came from, but couldn't make it out.

When my alarm went off, I woke gratefully, determined to make quick work of the final royal demon so my first trial would be over. After that, I'd hunt down my father and end him too, no matter what Wrythe and the others said.

OceanofPDF.com

WRYTHE AND PETER waited for me at the elevator doors. I couldn't help but study them as I made my way over. Both stood seven feet tall, the same as every other male Dark Moth. But Peter was lithe while Wrythe filled out his black camo pants and t-shirt like they'd been painted on him. He was incredible to look at, no doubt about it. Even after the pain of last night, I had no trouble admiring the man.

Wrythe noticed me and smiled.

"Let's go," I said, not bothering to greet them. We were headed out to slaughter a demon and that was all I could focus on.

Peter glanced at me, giving me a once over. "About time," he said. He stuck his key in the elevator's lock and pushed the up button. The pulley system whirred to life, squeaking loudly as it went. Wonderland was calling and the three of us were off to save the world—or at least the final trainee.

Lily, one of the Moth council members came around the corner. "Do you think it's wise to let her out into Wonderland?" She eyed me sharply.

Peter grunted, scrutinizing me carefully before facing her. "It's fine, Lily. We'll be with her.

Wrythe rose to his full height, bristling at her question. "Of course it's wise. She's working to complete her first trial and we're going with her to back her up. You know this. We've discussed it at length." He glared, but it seemed like it was more than that. Were the two of them an item? I wouldn't have recognized the tension before, but after last night, my emotions were raw, and I was more in tune with the physical part of myself.

Peter rolled his eyes. I knew he didn't want to be here. He'd made it clear he didn't think I needed backup, but there were others on the council who disagreed, so he went. It looked as though he hadn't slept for days. Alarm bells went off in my head.

What had he been up to? I brushed the question aside.

“If you say so.” Lily gave Peter an expression loaded with accusation but didn’t bother another glance at Wrythe before continuing down the hall.

I clenched my teeth together, forcing myself not to watch the way she sashayed her hips, as though each step were an invitation. She’d been sired by a Lust demon, that much had been obvious from the moment I met her, but I hadn’t realized just how much of it rolled off her. Besides that, she also had a problem with me. Was the Society really that worried about my parentage? Apparently so.

The elevator doors opened.

“We will talk later,” Peter said to Lily’s back before getting in.

Wrythe and I followed.

“Be careful with Lily,” Wrythe advised Peter. “She’s part of the council, but I don’t agree with most of her opinions.”

Peter grunted, but didn’t respond, and we rode up in silence. Out in the parking garage, I followed Peter to Wrythe’s Hummer. It would take an hour to get out to the desert. After buckling up, I ignored the warriors and faced the window, staring out at nothing. As Wrythe drove, the world went by, but all I saw was Kade’s face in my mind. I was worried about what had happened. He’d never faded away like that before. Usually he just appeared and disappeared at will. Last night, something out of his control had happened, as though he’d been forced from me. But why? Or by whom? Those giving his orders seemed the most likely. Would they kill him for what we’d been about to do? I hoped not. Kade had to be okay.

“Are you ready to finish your first trial?” Wrythe asked, his eyes finding mine in the rearview mirror.

“I am,” I said, gritting my teeth. “Are you?” I studied his face, surprised by the sudden rush of emotion I felt for him before quickly looking away. There was growing magnetism between us. I could feel it, but it wasn't the same as the uncontrollable fire I felt when Kade was around. This was purely carnal.

Wrythe snorted, oblivious to the thoughts tumbling around in my head. "As ready as I need to be," he said dryly. "Basically, I'm just your driver."

Peter nodded. "And I'm here as hero support, no more than a sidekick." He crossed his arms, grimacing. Peter had been sired by a Pride demon. Occasionally, like now, when he wasn't the center of attention, his patrimony was exposed.

I laughed, which surprised them and me. Wrythe raised an eyebrow, his gray eyes searching mine from the mirror while Peter turned to look at me from the front seat.

"What?" I shrugged. "If there's one thing I've learned, it's that you're both hilarious." When they didn't respond, I added. "And I really appreciate you coming with me. I wouldn't want to do this alone." That was the truth. Before entering the Trials, I'd been eager to slay all demons—it was great practice for when I had to fight my sire. But now I knew who my father was, and he'd forced me to slay royal demons on a daily basis. Despite what Wrythe and Peter thought, I needed them, even if it was just as support.

Peter squinted, studying me. "You're welcome," he said. "But what's gotten into you?"

I didn't know. "Nothing. Sheesh. Can't I share my appreciation without getting the third degree?" I turned my attention toward the window again. We'd left the city and were making our way out to the spot where I'd killed the Wrath demon yesterday. Sand stretched in front of us on all sides. The temperature rose ten degrees. "Wrythe, can we turn on the—"

Something slammed into the driver's side of the Hummer causing it to flip several times. I was glad I'd buckled my seatbelt. Glass shattered, sending twinkling shards through the air and into my skin. The sound of ripping metal raked my ears. I tried to cover them, but my katana struck my lip, splitting it open. Then the butt of Peter's gun hit me in the forehead, gashing my skin at my hairline. Blood oozed from the wounds. A salty, copper stench stung my nose.

When the vehicle stopped moving, I let out a shaky breath, wiping blood from my eyes. Grabbing the knife from my boot, I cut myself out of the seatbelt. With the Hummer upside down, it took a moment to get by bearings. My mind was fuzzy, like I wasn't all the way awake.

Shaking off the feeling, I listened for what I already knew had happened. The final demon had launched a surprise attack. And he wouldn't wait for me to catch my breath before bombarding us again. Righting myself, I did a quick check in the front seats for Wrythe and Peter. Neither was inside. Despite the heat, a chill ran the length of my spine.

"Alice!" Wrythe's hands appeared through the broken window before ripping the passenger side door off its hinges. "Are you all right?"

"Great," I said, taking his outstretched hand and hauling myself out. Blood was smeared on his face from a gash on his cheek. There was another on one arm and a third across his chest. His shirt was sticky with blood, but none of it seemed to bother him. "Where's Peter?"

"He's contending with the demon but just barely." He shook his head, releasing me. "I know we talk in class about how Pride and Greed demons can be similar, but many times they aren't. Pride is arrogant and self-righteous while Greed demons tend to be much more sneaky."

I glared, wondering why he felt the need to lecture me at this moment. He noticed and shook his head, then winced. "Sorry. Peter and I went through the windshield. I'm not functioning on all cylinders, but Peter's worse off than me. He took the brunt of the blow. I don't even know how's he's standing."

“Okay. Hang on.” I clambered back inside the Hummer, searching for my katana and praying it was still in one piece. It’d been in its sheath on the seat beside me. I found it in the back, grabbed it, and careful to avoid the shattered glass, stepped out. “Where are they?” I pulled off the sheath and searched the sand dunes until I found them.

“There,” Wrythe said, pointing.

I nodded, watching Peter as I felt to make sure I still had my gun. “You’re right, Peter looks bad. Let’s go.” They were about fifty feet away, Peter covered in blood from head to toe. One of his arms dangled at an odd angle.

Thankfully the demon hadn’t taken on its original form, but still held his human shape. He wore a bright gold suit with a white shirt open at the collar. At least a dozen gold chains dangled from his neck. One of the sleeves had been ripped, but otherwise he looked like he belonged at an upscale Hollywood party, not fighting a bloody man in the middle of the desert.

I took off running, my katana drawn, desperate to get in there. The demon was playing with Peter, one hand behind his back, smiling smugly. I would skin the smile off his face.

“Hey,” I shouted, pushing Peter out of the way just as the Greed demon swung down hard with his sword. My katana took the brunt of the impact, vibrations running painfully down my arm. I grunted as I removed my gun and shot the demon between the eyes.

He roared, shaking his head back and forth as he fell, momentarily stunned. The bullets had been dipped in a special solution Heathcliff created. Whatever was in it was powerful if it could cause such damage to a royal demon.

He was Greed and he writhed on the ground. I took the opportunity to check on Peter. “Are you all right?”

His face was ashen, I guessed from the loss of blood. With little effort, I lifted him and brought him over to Wrythe. “Take him. I’ll finish off the demon.” It only crossed my mind for the briefest moment that I was giving orders to the king of the Dark Moths. Such a thing was unheard of. If the council had witnessed me doing so, it would've been considered treason. I shoved the thought aside. If necessary, Wrythe could punish me for my treachery later. Right now, I needed him to get Peter out of harm's way so I could finish my first trial.

Without a word, Wrythe took Peter and moved off toward the mangled Hummer.

I faced the demon, gun in one hand and my favorite sword in the other.

While I'd been distracted, the Greed demon shifted into his true form and now stood nearly nine feet tall and half as wide. "Are you prepared to die?" He spoke with superiority as he studied my katana and gun. Then, a blade exactly like mine appeared in each of his slimy, pus-filled hands. "You think you're better than I am, Alice, Queen of the Halflings? You think you can take me?"

I nodded. "I know I can," I spat.

In response, he growled, gnashing his teeth.

"I don't care what the Devil says. I will kill you. Have no doubt of that."

I flinched at his words for two reasons. The first was that he'd called me Queen of the Halflings. Why? I wasn't queen of anything, nor did I have plans to be. The second reason was what he'd said about the Devil. Had my father told the royal demons to let me kill them? That seemed absurd. "Not happening," I said, trying to cover up my annoyance. Why was I even listening to him? It was literally in his blood to lie. Pushing aside my doubts, I stepped toward him and shifted my weight. It was difficult to get good footing in the sand. As I moved, the demon followed my every step. Just to make sure he was copying me; I bent my knees and swung my sword. To which the demon replied in kind. It was like watching myself in the mirror—a much grosser, much larger, and slimier version. "What are you doing?" I didn't realize I'd smiled until the demon did too, flashing his blackened teeth.

"Just showing you what an idiot you are," he replied.

I didn't respond with words, but ran and jumped so I was his height. Our blades clashed as I landed in front of him.

For several minutes, we sparred, our blades sending sparks into the air as the distinct aroma of burned metal momentarily covered up the demon's stench. Unfortunately for me, the stink returned all too soon.

"You're good," the demon quipped. "Passable as a fighter, but nothing compared to me. I've trained in every form of fighting ever created. I know it all." He threw his blade into the sand and created a much bigger one. It was the same size as me, but it wouldn't matter. He was still going to die.

I shifted to the right, hoping he wouldn't notice. But he did, following suit. His actions had me grinding my teeth, especially with that extra-large sword in his hand. I was on the edge of losing my temper. "You should be proud of yourself, demon. The others died much more quickly than you." I'd expected my words to throw him off, but he repeated them back to me, which threw me off instead. "Are you going to stand there copying me all day or are you going to fight?" Anger bubbled to the surface as he repeated my words and I felt my demon power spring to life. I hadn't used it on any of the other royal demons. I hadn't needed to. But this one was really starting to tick me off.

With a backward glance at Wrythe and Peter to make sure they were out of the way, I turned, dropping my hands to my sides, and closed my eyes. The tip of my katana dug into the sand as the power within me boiled, inky and thick. The last time I used it, it came out of me like a thunderclap. This time it rolled off me like smoke in a dry ice machine. I opened my eyes and watched the misty tendrils leak toward him.

The demon inhaled, getting ready to speak, and choked. "What are you doing to me?" He fell to his knees, dropping his weapon while his fingers dug desperately at his throat.

He was dying. I could feel it, but I wasn't taking any chances. Grabbing the demon's massive sword with my free hand, I lunged at him. We were eye to eye. My power stirred stronger than anything I'd ever felt before. I didn't recognize it and it startled me. "Not so smug now, are you filthy beast?" I said and shoved both blades into the demon's eyes. He roared as I pulled the weapons out and crossing the blades, sliced the demon's head clean from his neck. It rolled backward and turned to ash. A moment later, his body followed.

I heaved a cleansing breath, my demon power dissolving as quickly as it'd come.

"Very good, Alice."

To my right stood Deckland Friche or more accurately the Devil. My father.

At his arrival, the morning sun seemed to lose its luster. Clouds rolled in, making the sky, clear blue a moment ago, turn gray and ominous, a torrid cauldron of dreariness.

I worked hard to hide my surprise at his being here and cleared my throat. "I defeated the sires just as you demanded," I said, lamely, my wrath from a moment ago softening at the sight of him. Had he come to kill me? Kade said he would try. Not that I would let him succeed. He would die instead, and I would be the one to kill him.

"Of course, you did, my dear Alice." His hands were in his pockets and he stood like we were chatting about the weather.

"I'm not your dear anything," I hurled back, the anger flaring up again.

He chuckled. "I can't say I'm at all surprised. My hope for these Trials was that your confidence would increase. It obviously has. I believe, from what I've just witnessed, that your powers have increased as well." He clapped slowly. "It's incredible. You're incredible."

The Devil stood on a shiny black rock that had appeared out of nowhere at the same moment my father did. He wore a black suit with a blue silk shirt that glistened in the sun. His sleek hair had been pulled back, revealing his angular face, highlighting the blue eyes that perfectly matched mine.

After what I'd just done, the Devil seemed smaller somehow and I stepped toward him, thinking if he took that moment to kill me, I would be ready, and I would retaliate with a vengeance. The power I'd sent into the Greed demon returned, thick and needy. I longed to fling it into the demon before me and end him where he stood.

"Alice," I heard Wrythe call in warning.

I glanced back at my king. He gasped when he saw me and took a tighter hold of Peter, who hung limply against him. Wrythe was afraid. Of me. "What is it?" The words hissed from my mouth like snakes in a pit.

"Let's go. You've completed your task. He—," Wrythe indicated the Devil with his head before continuing, "He can't make you stay." His voice didn't possess the confidence I was used to hearing and I wondered what he saw when he looked at me.

"Well, King of the Dark Moths, that isn't true. Yes, she completed her first task, but since she followed the rabbit down the demon hole and came to me, I'm in charge of her Trial of Three, and the next one has already begun." He smiled, showing off teeth that looked too perfect to be real.

I wondered what his real form looked like. Was he a pus-riddled giant like the others?

"I understand that, but she needs time to recuperate," Wrythe said, some of his confidence returning. "The first task was for one demon sire per day. You can give her the remainder of today, Deckland." Wrythe's kingly voice was back in full by the time he finished.

The Devil's eyes squinted as he studied Wrythe. "I suppose I can give her a little time…" His voice trailed off. "But I'll decided how long." With those final words, he left in a puff of smoke.

I blew out my breath, glad he was gone, but worried about what he had in store for me next. He said it had already begun. Did Wrythe miss that? And while the physical trial hadn't been too hard, it had been tedious. Tucking my gun back in its holster, I went over to Wrythe. "Do you have your cell phone? I'll call for help."

He took it from his pocket. While he kept Peter upright, I called Heathcliff, the Dark Moths' doctor and after a brief conversation where I promised we would all make an appearance in the sick wing, he agreed to send help.

While we waited, we walked and eventually found the road we'd been traveling on and followed it back.

Wrythe kept glancing at me, his eyes darting over my face like I'd grown horns or had oozing sores on my body. "What's your problem?" I finally asked, frustrated.

He ground his teeth as though debating what to say.

"Just spit it out," I added, too tired and sore to be politically correct. "Whatever it is, I can take it."

He hefted Peter, adjusting his unconscious body into a better position. "I'm not sure what to think, Alice. You were amazing, but at the same time terrifying. And for the briefest moment, I would swear your skin changed."

I gaped at him, confused. I'd used my demon power and knew it was dark. When it left me, it could've affected the look of my skin. "Changed how?"

"You…" He cleared his throat. "Almost seemed to be glowing." He shook his head as though trying to grasp what he'd seen.

"What color?" I asked. It wasn't vanity. Since I could remember, we'd been taught that our marks revealed our sire, which revealed our power. Deep down, I still didn't want to believe the Devil was my father. I guess I still hoped he wasn't.

Wrythe didn't respond right away, but I could tell it was because he was thinking of a way to describe what he saw. I waited, my heart racing.

Finally, he stopped, and I followed suit. Then he straightened. "Like the way the moon blocks the sun during a solar eclipse. Shining black with bright rays of light surrounding you. And I could swear, I saw wings…" He let his voice trail off as he shook his head.

I raised my eyebrows. "That doesn't sound right." I turned away, hurrying down the road. My mind wandered over what he said. "Wings?" I asked, turning and walking backward.

He gave a brief nod like he was pondering too.

I went back to walking forward. You still have two more Trials, my mind whispered. And then your true self will be revealed. At least that was what the Trial of Three was supposed to do. I hoped it worked. But maybe, like Kade, it wouldn't work on me. What would I do then? I had to be more than just the Devil's daughter.

OceanofPDF.com

"HOLD STILL," Heathcliff said to Wrythe, clearly frustrated. "I can't stitch you up if you keep moving around."

I resisted the urge to laugh at the scene in front of me because the wrath rolling off my king was nearly stifling. Not to mention the irritation oozing from Heathcliff.

Since we Dark Moths healed more rapidly than humans, regular medications didn't help us. We basically had to suffer through the pain, knowing it would only last a few hours, instead of days or weeks.

Wrythe had his shirt off, the muscles flexing along his neck and shoulders. His jaw was set, and his eyes closed as though he wished he were anywhere else.

I glanced over at Peter. Heathcliff had given him an elixir to help heal his injuries faster. He lay on a bed off to the side. Doc had set his shoulder as well as the fractured bone in his arm. He writhed in agony, rocking back and forth as the bones healed quickly. I felt bad for him and all the discomfort he was in. Gratitude for his efforts washed over me. He and Wrythe had been there for me the last several days, and especially today when I needed them most. It meant a lot they'd been there to back me up.

My lip had healed and the other cuts were gone as well. My body restored faster than usual, even for a Dark Moth. I didn't want to believe it. Nor did I voice this development to Heathcliff, especially not in front of Wrythe and Peter.

"Just leave it," Wrythe growled, hopping off the table. "You're torturing me, Doc."

"But you'll scar," Heathcliff said in horror as the king put back on his shredded shirt.

I looked away as Wrythe tried to dress, focusing my attention on the jars littering the shelves along the edges of the room. Because we were so far below ground, the sick wing always stayed cool.

“A king needs scars so his people will know he battles on their behalf,” Wrythe said, towering above Heathcliff. The doc was tall, maybe six feet, but still no match for Wrythe. Next to the king, Heathcliff looked like a child.

Wrythe’s words surprised me. They were the first really kingly things I’d heard him utter in days.

“What?” he asked when he noticed me looking at him. His eyes flashed a mixture of anger and amusement.

“Nothing.” I crossed my arms, stepping backward. “Nothing at all.” Nervously, I picked up a jar. It slipped from my hands, shattering on the concrete floor. The liquid contents as well as whatever had been inside (it looked like a brain) slid across the floor, splashing my boots as well as Heathcliff’s and Wrythe’s. “Sorry,” I said, bending over to pick up the pieces.

“Leave it,” Heathcliff said, his voice resigned as he grabbed a broom and a dustpan.

“Sorry,” I said again.

“It’s fine,” he said, but obviously it wasn’t. “I’ll clean it up.” He paused, looking at me. “I forgot to check you.” He leaned the broom against the table and removed his gloves. “Tell me where you’re hurt,” he said.

I shrugged, trying desperately to feign nonchalance. “I feel fine. All this waiting around for Peter and Wrythe and I’m healed up.” I shrugged again.

Wrythe stepped around Heathcliff and took my chin in his hand.

I tried to pull away, but he held tight. “What are you looking at?” I blushed, wishing like hell he’d let me go. “I hardly had a scratch on me. You and Peter got the worst of it.”

Wrythe didn't look convinced, but he released me. "There was a deep cut on your arm," he said, touching the spot where it'd been. "I saw it."

At his caress, tingles ran the length of my arm. I stepped away, feeling awkward yet strangely euphoric. Yearning sprang to life in my belly. I was shocked by the sensation. Wrythe was King of the Moths, but more than that, he was old—well, a lot older than me anyway. I mean, gross, right? Unfortunately, my body didn't seem to think so.

Wrythe sucked in a breath and I glanced at him. He'd felt something as well. I went to move away from him, but he gently took hold of my arm. "I need to speak with you. Meet me in my rooms in an hour."

I bristled at his tone, but felt my face get hot as well. "Is that an order, sire?" I glanced up at him from beneath my lashes, feeling alive and nervous and embarrassed, yet excited at the prospect of meeting him later.

"Alice, you're good to go. But…" Heathcliff trailed off, waiting for me to focus my attention on him.

Wrythe huffed before leaving the room. "An hour," he growled, slamming the door behind him.

Crossing my arms against whatever was happening, I faced Heathcliff. "Yes?"

"Did you try the bullets?" he asked, completely unfazed by the king's temper.

"I did," I said, my mood changing to a different kind of excitement. "I shot the damn demon between the eyes and it knocked him out flat for a good twenty seconds. It was fantastic."

Heathcliff smiled, a rarity for the good doctor. "Excellent. My hypothesis was sound, but he was only down seconds? I'd hoped it would last longer."

"How much longer?" I thought twenty seconds was great. Usually a bullet did nothing but cause a royal demon a single moment of frustration.

“I really wanted it to be permanent,” he said, going over to his workstation and settling on a rolling stool.

I followed, standing beside him as Heathcliff rolled under his desk, which was littered with plastic totes containing dozens of bullets. There was also a microscope, several different bottles of solutions, a knife, and a few other items I couldn’t describe. Most surprising was a totally mundane spiral notebook lying open with a number two pencil on it.

Heathcliff took the pencil and began writing in the notebook, mumbling as he went. Suddenly, I felt invisible and unsure what to do. I watched him write a moment and then began reading on the page he’d already written. Words like infinite, eternity, and seven magics jumped from the page, but two words shocked me more than the others. I gasped.

Heathcliff stopped writing and looked up.

“What are the bullets dipped in?” I asked, trying to wrap my head around the words. They kept repeating themselves over and over in my brain.

Heathcliff shut the notebook, facing me. “An elixir of willow bark and celery root as well as hibiscus…” He trailed off as though he debated whether to continue. It didn’t take him long to make up his mind. “But the main component is angel essence.”

Those were the words I’d seen. The ones I hadn’t wanted to believe I’d read. “How?” From my schooling, I’d learned about all the different demons. I knew how they worked, what they liked (hearts), hated (liver, but didn’t we all), and yearned for (virgin blood). But never once had I read a single thing about angels. “Are angels real?” Not for the first time I felt like I lived a very sheltered life. Sure, I knew how to make demons suffer. I knew how to kill them and turn them to ash, but the rest of the world? I didn’t know much. It seemed I hardly knew anything.

He gave me a disgusted look. “Of course angels are real, Alice. There are several types of angels, just as there are different types of demons. Perhaps you’ve heard of chayots? From your studies?”

I shook my head. None of my classes discussed anything angelic. Not angels and definitely not chayots. “Not yet,” I said.

He snorted. “Figures.” He swiveled over to his microscope. “The Dark Moth council is aware of them. In their histories I’ve no doubt there is plenty of information. See, without angels, there couldn’t be demons. There must be a balance.” He picked up a bullet and placed it under a weird-looking microscope to the right of the one he’d been using a moment ago.

“They never told us about them.” Which was strange because they mentioned balance many times and what Heathcliff said about demons and angels made sense. “Chayots? Why not just call them angels? Why get fancy? Are angels good?” The last question seemed like the easiest to answer. Demons were bad. I mean they were named after the seven deadly sins. So, if there had to be balance then angels must be good

“Most of them,” he said, shaking his head. “But seriously, you should know this. I really need to speak with Wrythe about what’s being taught.” He glanced around the room as though looking for the king.

“So, angels? Chayots?” I said, bringing his attention back to me. “What are they?”

He studied me like I had a bug on my nose. “They are immortal beings created by God. Chayot specifically are warriors for the human race, but only when absolutely necessary. They’ve assisted during some of the greatest wars in the human histories, but for the most part they are to allow humans to make their own choices. They must observe and report, nothing more, unless ordered otherwise.” He made a face before turning his attention back to the bullet.

“Have you met a chayot?” I couldn’t believe it. All this time! I was half human. There were plenty of Moths in the world—all of them half human too. Where had the chayots been for them these many years? Why had it been necessary for the Dark Moths to be created? If there were angel warriors, they should've defended the Moths.

"I have. One of my brothers is half chayot."

"The angels have mutts as well?" I snorted, a sick sense of justice floating through my veins. "Do the angels hunt and kill them the way the demons do?"

Heathcliff scowled before looking away. "They are called Nephilim and as a matter of fact, they do. Or they did. Not anymore. My brother, Gabe, helped put a stop to that. Since his father was leader of the angels, he had some sway and made changes." He adjusted the microscope's lens, peered through it, and then looked at me.

"Wait." It occurred to me he said brother. "Are you half chayot too?"

"No," Heathcliff said. "Our father adopted each of us for one reason or another over the years. We were raised as brothers but we aren't related by blood. Still, I would do anything for him as well as the others."

"That's cool," I said, considering, not for the first time, what it would've been like to have a parent who wanted me. Loved me. Pain shot through my tender heart. I'd never known my mother. Didn't even have a picture of her.

"Yeah, my dad is vampire. Born in the time of Joan of Arc, turned by the Vampire Queen herself. He served her for many years until he finally broke free. But that's a story for another time," Heathcliff said.

I was in shock. Heathcliff really didn't talk much at all, let alone about his family. But vampires? "Excuse me? Did you say he's a vampire?" I really didn't know anything unless it had to do with demons. It was time to change that.

"Did you think our world so small that there were only humans and demons?" He gave me a look filled with disappointment.

I nodded, hating to admit that I'd been so naïve. "What else?" I asked, pulling another chair over so I could sit beside him. Even though I was deep below the earth, it felt as though my world was opening for the first time.

"Dragons. Gargoyles. Werewolves. Fairies." He looked at me. "Want me to go on?"

I pressed my hands against the sides of my head.

"Witches," he continued when I didn't say anything. "How do you think I create the elixirs?"

I shook my head. "I have to admit my mind is literally blown right now. I had no idea."

Heathcliff combined ingredients for a solution as I watched, my mind working to adjust to this world the Doc mentioned.

"You have no idea what those words mean, do you?"

"I do. A little," I admitted, but mostly from fiction. I did like to read. I mean I lived underground, but not under a rock.

"Well, there's more if you want to hear." It looked like he questioned whether he should go on or not.

"Tell me," I said, feeling less confident than I sounded.

"There are many different realms as well as dimensions, too." He grinned slyly as he watched my reaction.

"No way. You're lying," I said, scooting back on the chair.

"Nope." He shook his head, going back to his work. "Like I've said before, you trainees need more than just a demon education. So much more."

"I agree. But…" Peter told us they trained us for what we needed to know to survive. Once we made it past eighteen and defeated our sire, then we could have the world opened up to us. But it seemed to me if we learned more, it would help because it might create hope within us. I wanted to learn more, to know more. I didn't like that I was nearly an adult, but still felt like a child.

“Let me get your education beyond this compound and killing demons started.” Doc went over to a bookshelf, searching a few moments before selecting a volume and bringing it over. “Here,” he said, handing me the book.

I took it, and immediately saw it wasn’t a textbook but a journal. Across the front were the words: Supernatural Creatures by Heathcliff Henry.

“Some light reading,” he chuckled, sitting and turning back to his work.

“You wrote this?” I asked, running my fingers over the name on the front. I opened the journal, perusing the pages. The pages were filled with pictures of monsters and creatures as well as notes about them.

“I did. When I was in high school. It should help you learn more of what else is out there in the world.”

“High school?” Of course, he went to school, but it was weird to think of Doc as a teenager.

“Sure. I learned all about this stuff from my Dad at an early age. You should see my dad’s basement. It’s enormous and filled with life-sized creatures of all kinds as well as more in-depth information about the creatures.”

“I’d love to visit there sometime,” I said, though it would probably never happen. But his father sounded like a man I’d love to meet.

“Maybe someday,” he said, then glanced at the door. He was excusing me. Apparently, I was keeping him from his work. “Read through my journal and come back in a few days. I’ll answer any of your questions then.”

I closed the book, tucking it under my arm carefully. “I will, thank you.” When I reached the door, Heathcliff called after me.

“Alice?”

“Yes?”

“If I were you, I’d start on page thirty-two. You might find that entry particularity interesting.”

I wanted to read the journal from front to back, but decided if he wanted me to start there, I would. “Will do. Thanks again.”

“And Alice?”

“Huh?” I opened the door.

“Keep the journal to yourself. No sense worrying the other trainees, not to mention the teachers and council members.” He shook his head. “They might not appreciate my broadening your horizons.”

“It’ll be our secret. I promise.” I couldn’t wait to have a moment to myself to look it over.

“Night,” Heathcliff said.

“Goodnight.” I closed the door, making my way back to my room. “Angels?” I whispered. “Dragons? A vampire queen?” The Devil, demons, and the life I’d been living the last seventeen plus years seemed to fade into the background as I thought of all Heathcliff had told me. Was it really possible? I tried to imagine what life outside the compound would be like. Not that I would ever get the chance to know. A Dark Moth was born and raised to serve the Moths. But, what if…?

“What did you say?” Wendy asked.

I hadn’t seen her in the hallway. I’d been too preoccupied with my own thoughts, and she startled me. I dropped the book and rushed to pick it up. “Hey, Wendy.” The pages had fallen open revealing a creature with a mouth full of sharp teeth.

“What book is that?”

“Nothing important. Just some light reading Doc gave me.” I tucked it back under my arm. “How are you feeling?” She looked good, better. After Eric died, I worried. And then when she’d been taken by the Devil for my trial, I thought it might’ve broken her. But she’d shown her fire and her wrath came to life.

“Fine.” Her eyes fell to the book. “Light reading, huh? Can I read it when you’re finished?”

I decided if she still wanted to talk to me when all of this was over, I’d be more than happy to let her read it. “Sure.” I didn’t see what it would hurt. I’d killed her demon sire. She would become a Dark Moth. She might as well learn more about the world as well.

“Sweet. Thank you.” She looked like she wanted to say more.

“Did you need something else?” Had she asked me a question and I missed it?

Wendy reached out and hugged me. “Thank you, Alice.”

“I—” I knew she was talking about me slaying her demon sire. Because of what I’d done, her Dark Moth ceremony as well as the others’ was coming up soon. And then it occurred to me that my birthday was tomorrow. I would be eighteen. Not that it mattered any longer. The Devil had made sure I understood that.

Wendy gave me a look, waiting for me to finish my sentence.

“You’re welcome, Wendy,” I finally said.

She stepped back. “I don’t just mean for what you did in the trial, but also what you did for Eric.” Her bottom lip quivered. “Even though he didn’t make it, I know if he were here, he would be so proud of you and grateful you killed his sire.” She touched my arm. “We should’ve been nicer to you. I should’ve been nicer to you. I’m sorry I wasn’t.”

Her words meant a lot. “I appreciate you saying that.” I shuffled my feet, uncomfortable with her unexpected admiration and apology.

“I mean it.” She took one of my hands in hers and swung it lightly. “How are you doing? I mean the Devil’s daughter? You must be devastated. I know I would be.”

I let out a sigh, grateful she’d asked the question I knew everyone else wanted to know. If I told her, then she could tell everyone else and I wouldn’t have to. If I didn’t share, then it would only widen the separation between us and I didn't want that. "It's—I don't want to believe it's true," I said honestly.

"I get that," Wendy said. "But it is true, right? I mean it must be. It explains so much about you."

My heart sank because she wasn't wrong. I didn't want to admit it, or hear it, but I was grateful she still talked to me, even after what she knew. She continued, "Are you going to dinner? I believe the cook made hamburgers and fries."

"Um, yeah. Sounds good," I said, grateful she didn't say more about my father. "I'll be there in a bit. See you there?"

"I'll save you a seat." She smiled.

My heart expanded with warmth for Wendy. Maybe she and the others could accept me. As I watched her walk away, hope fluttered through me. "That would be wonderful."

OceanofPDF.com

INSIDE MY ROOM, I searched for a place to keep the journal and eventually decided on my sock drawer. Once I buried it under all of my black socks, I glanced at myself in the mirror above the dresser. The young woman staring back surprised me. I looked pale, which made my blue eyes stand out starkly against my black lashes. It was odd because I was so used to seeing the other trainees and Dark Moths with their gray eyes that once in a while I forgot mine were a different color. They made me think of my father and I quickly looked away. Then glanced at the edge of the journal peeking out from under my socks and changed my mind about keeping it there. Opening my closet, I put it on the shelf above my clothes. “I don’t know,” I whispered, taking it from the otherwise empty shelf and spinning in a circle. Under my bed? In my underwear drawer? Under my pillow? Finally, I decided to tuck it between my mattresses. Not near the edge, but closer to the middle. Satisfied, I made my way back to the cafeteria. Upon entering, I caught the scent of seasoned hamburger topped with cheddar cheese. My mouth watered as I made my way over to the counter, picking up a tray, silverware, and a napkin.

Cook was there, hovering over the grill, sautéing some onions. She was a large woman with a kind, round face. Seeing me, she came over. “Hello, Alice.”

“Cook. The food smells like heaven as usual,” I said, sincerely.

“Thank you.” She came closer, leaning over, beckoning for me to do the same. “I heard about your father,” she said, making a face like she had a nasty taste in her mouth. “The Devil. Such a shame because how do you kill the unkillable?” She straightened, taking a bun from the bag and sliding a hamburger with melted cheese on it. “Here you go.” She put the burger on a plate then added fries before handing it to me. “You didn’t hear this from me, but I’ve heard talk that some folks are worried about what your parentage means for the Dark Moths and if you should even be here." She clucked her tongue. "Not me, mind you. I like you, Alice, and I'm on your side, but I thought you should know."

"I appreciate that," I said. "And thanks for the food." My mind whirled. If I wasn't supposed to be here, where would I go?

She smiled, giving me a salute with the hand holding the spatula.

I waved and wandered over to the drink station.

Sure, I wasn't sired by one of the usual royal demons, but that didn't matter. Did it? The gap I'd subconsciously felt between myself and the rest of the trainees widened. I was different from them. Not just my eyes or the marks, but in every way. Except I still wanted what they did—the end of the stupid game demons chose to play with their offspring. And if possible, the end of all demons. Period. The prospect hadn't seemed possible a week ago, but as I thought about it, something inside me still stubbornly believed that anything was possible.

At the condiments station, I added catsup, mustard, lettuce, tomato, and pickles to my burger and then extra, extra catsup on the side for my fries before moving on.

When I had everything, I glanced over the sea of trainees and teachers eating, searching for Wendy, and located her sitting with some of the other trainees. True to her word, she'd saved me a spot beside her. My pulse quickened nervously, which I found amusing in a not so funny way. I could kill royal demons as easily as swatting a fly without feeling anything but excitement. But when it came to my peers and fellow trainees, I got twitchy.

Wendy noticed me and smiled. "Here," she mouthed, pointing to the empty seat beside her. I nodded a thank you and continued over. Someone stuck out a foot and I tripped, flying forward, but was somehow able to stay upright. I turned, glaring at the younger trainee. He seemed proud of himself. Anger flared, and I thought of dumping my plate of food, catsup on all, on his arrogant head.

But I was hungry, and he wasn't worth missing out on lunch. "Watch it," I said, the anger rolling off me like frothy waves.

He opened his mouth to return my retort, but suddenly changed his mind. His face went white and he turned away from me, but not before mumbling, "Sorry."

I snorted, glad for his change of heart as I continued to Wendy's table. All of the group minus Eric were there. Swallowing my apprehension, I put on a grim smile and made my way over. With each step, my confidence waned.

"Hi," Wendy said when I sat.

"Thanks for saving me a seat," I responded, sticking a straw in my water.

"Sure," she said before eating a fry.

Georgia sat across from Wendy, eyeing my food while she chewed her own. Even though she had plenty on her plate, she still wanted mine. It was the Greed demon part of her DNA, I knew. Before she could take some, I generously doused them in catsup before putting one in my mouth. She could get up and go get seconds if she was still hungry.

Pam sat on the other side of me and gently pushed her shoulder into mine. "Glad you're okay," she said.

"Thanks. You too." I took a bite of my burger and tried to relax. There didn't seem to be any awkwardness coming from them.

Pam sipped her drink, her eyes on me. "How did you do it, Alice? Slay all of those demons, especially with what you're dealing with?"

Before I had a chance to respond, Gilbert spoke up. "Big-time thanks, by the way. We're all going to be Dark Moth warriors because of you." He clucked his tongue, eyeing my burger gluttonously. "Not sure if I deserve it, but I'm glad to be alive and I'm glad you're such a kick-ass Dark Moth trainee." He held up his hand and I smacked it in a high five.

“It was really—”

“But is she?” Georgia gave me a sideways glance. “A Dark Moth, I mean.” She sipped her drink. “You weren’t sired by one of the seven deadly demons, which is the criteria for being a Dark Moth.”

“Duh. She was sired by the king of the demons,” Pam added, giving her a look that said she should shut up.

“She has the marks, Georgia. She is one of us,” Wendy added, picking at the bun on her burger.

I wanted to hug her. It was strange, but I greatly appreciated that she seemed to be on my side.

“So, does that make her a princess?” Gilbert asked. It was an innocent question, but I could sense everyone was thinking about what it meant that the Devil was my dad.

“I’m definitely not a princess. Like Wendy said, I’m the same as you,” I said, but Georgia was already shaking her head.

“But you aren’t. Not at all.” Georgia refused to let it go. “According to our books, the demons we’ve all been sired by answer to the Devil. Since you were sired by him, it would stand to reason that the Dark Moths should answer to you.” She covered her mouth. “Can you imagine how Wrythe must be feeling? I mean you basically outrank him.”

What she’d said made me sick to my stomach. “The Devil is still a demon. He sired me, and he will still be hunting me after my birthday tomorrow.” I dipped another fry in catsup and shoved it in my mouth. “I don’t outrank anyone, especially not Wrythe.” I wanted to be done talking about this and eat in peace.

“Can he die?” Pam asked, crossing her arms and leaning forward. I appreciated that she’d changed the subject even if it was just slightly. She’d pulled her dark hair, the same color as every other Moth’s, up into a bun, making her features appear extra angular.

Only Gilbert and I were still eating.

“He can die,” I said, picking at the cheese on my burger. I didn’t know that for sure, but I wanted to believe it. Had to believe it if I was going to stay alive.

No one spoke for a few moments and I used the opportunity to take a bite of my burger. It was delicious, just as I thought it would be. But my mind couldn’t focus on enjoying the food. Instead I thought about my father. He had to be able to die. Otherwise, my death was imminent, and I wasn’t ready to go yet. I’d only just discovered there were other kinds of supernatural creatures out there. Not just demons but vampires and angels and werewolves! That excited me, and I wanted to experience life outside the Demonland compound. I wanted more.

An image of Kade appeared in my mind. The way he looked when he pinned me in the corner just before we kissed. And then there was Wrythe. I didn’t know what was going on between him and me, but I felt something for him. All of these things were new and thrilling and I wanted to see where they led.

“I don’t know,” Gilbert said, interrupting my thoughts. He didn’t say more, just shoved a bite of his second burger into his mouth. The orange markings on his wrists came into view as he did.

“I guess we’ll see, won’t we,” Steve said, commenting for the first time.

Wendy patted my hand. “Princess or not… Whatever you are, you’re still our hero.” She made eye contact with the rest of the group.

“Absolutely,” Pam agreed. “Thank you.”

The others thanked me as well. They seemed sincere, but I felt completely self-conscious, and decided to change the subject back onto them.

“Where did the Devil take you?” I gulped as fear crept into Georgia’s eyes. “I mean did he hurt you?” I hoped not. Now that I had their attention, I didn’t know if I wanted to know the truth.

The tone of them immediately shifted from gratitude to pain and I regretted my question. But it was too late. And it was for the best I hear what they had to say.

Leif who kept quiet during our meal and conversation looked at me like he would say something, but Wendy spoke first.

“It wasn’t pleasant.” She cleared her throat. “It was probably easier for me than others though.”

A ghost of a shadow passed over Pam’s face. “I was alone in what looked like a cave. Light shone in from somewhere.” She shook her head. “I never figured out where. Not that it matters. At first, I thought the cave was made of rocks, but after a while the rocks moved. And when the light went out, that’s when I saw the eyes. Thousands of them all around me.” She picked up her napkin and started tearing it to shreds. “That and the smell were bad enough, but then they began to talk. Whispering things about me that no one knew.”

Wendy reached behind me and placed a comforting hand on Pam’s shoulder.

Pam went on. “Sometimes the tracker demons came into the room. They would poke at me with their claws, most of the time drawing blood. One time,” she paused and shuddered before continuing. “One of them licked my face with its long tongue and its slobber got into my mouth and eyes.” She made a face and I thought she might lose her dinner. But she swallowed several times. “It told me how delicious I tasted. Then he cut into my neck and licked my blood off the tip of his nail.” She stopped talking. A sharp perusal of the others revealed they’d been through something similar.

“I thought I would die in that hole,” Steve said. His face turned ashen. “They came in one after the other and would say things and do things…” He trailed off, grabbing at his marks. “They thought it especially fun to take their time torturing me, telling me that since my sire was a Sloth demon, it made sense for them to move more slowly so they could draw out the pain.

Gilbert made a noise. I glanced over and saw his eyes roll into the back of his head for a moment before he squeezed them eyes shut. “They would stuff… things, I don’t know what,” he paused. “But they put them in my mouth and forced me to chew them and swallow. When I retched onto the floor, they laughed and joked before picking it up and forcing it back into my mouth.” He crossed his arms, pulling them tight against his chest. “When the demons weren’t around, water dripped from the ceiling, a constant, painful thunk against my bare feet.”

“Right,” Pam said. “Because they kept us hung by the ankles upside down the whole time.” Pam shook her head as her eyes turned haunted. Then she sat up straight. “But we survived. And after the stories we read in class of all the ways the royal demons tortured their offspring, I think,” she stopped as though she had to force the next part from her lips, “we got off easy. Thanks to Alice.” She tried to smile, but her teeth chattered.

They’d all been traumatized. Because of me. And it was worse than I could’ve imagined. “I’m…” Saying how sorry I was didn’t feel like enough. Not by a long shot. “I know it might seem empty, but I am truly and sincerely sorry you had to go through that.” As I spoke, I met the eyes of each trainee—at least those that would. Steve and Gilbert kept their faces turned down toward their plates. And even Gilbert no longer seemed hungry.

“It wasn’t your fault, Alice,” Wendy said, patting my back. “We know that. The Society allowed you to be part of the Trial of Three and the Devil made you do this. If you hadn’t killed our demon sires, we would all be dead.”

“Right, I mean this way at least we were only tortured,” Georgia added, but I sensed the anger in her tone. Anger at me. “I wouldn’t have had to endure them peeling off pieces of my skin and eating it while I watched. Or seen them laugh as I writhed in pain, making bets on how long it would take me to heal before they could go again.

When I finally did heal, golden coins were exchanged right in front of me." She raised her hands as if trying to grasp those phantom coins, and the gold markings on her wrists seemed to grow brighter. "The places they hadn't skinned, they would slice open and insert the coins into my body. Doc had quite the time removing them," she added, her voice hoarse.

"Georgia…" I began. She glared. I stopped, straining to find the words that would express how awful I felt for all they had suffered.

"I know," she hissed. "You're sorry. So, so sorry." She looked away. "You should be."

"Georgia," Wendy said, her anger evident.

"I won't apologize to her. I can't help the way I feel."

"It's fine. Really. Georgia, you're welcome to your feelings and I appreciate your honesty." I felt so mature saying that to her, though part of me didn't appreciate her honesty, not in the slightest. But I needed to hear what happened to them. It fueled my anger toward the Devil and reinforced my knowledge that his death would be best for everyone.

Leif looked at me then. His eyes were haunted. Since his sire was Lust, I shuddered to think what they did to him. "Leif, did you want __"

"Alice!" Wrythe yelled my name from across the room, causing me to jump.

Beside me, Wendy jumped, too. Everyone in the cafeteria ceased talking and turned to look at me.

I stood, worry furrowing my brow. If he weren't King of the Dark Moths I would've lost my temper at the way he bellowed at me in front of the whole group. But I held my tongue.

He pointed at me and then indicated the hall. "My office. Now."

I'd forgotten we were supposed to meet. "Crap," I said when the doors closed behind him.

“And the fact that our king caters to her.” Gilbert pulled a pickle from one of his half a dozen remaining sandwiches and flung it on his tray. “It’s disgusting in my opinion.”

“I thought we all agreed Alice did nothing wrong,” Wendy said, her hands on her hips, an elbow jabbing into my side.

“Whatever,” Gilbert said, refusing to look at me.

Wendy turned to me and I got relief from her protruding elbow. “What was that all about?” Before I could answer, she faced Gilbert again. “The way Wrythe just shouted at her, it doesn’t seem like he’s “catering” at all.”

Gilbert made a face but didn’t argue further.

Wendy rolled her eyes and then looked at me. “Why is he upset?”

“I’m not sure,” I admitted, standing. No sense telling them that along with everything else, the king had seen something black and shiny surrounding me when I fought the Greed demon.

“Well, you’d better hurry up and find out,” Steve said. “If we keep you, Wrythe will probably blame us.” His words were laced with disdain. Even though they were grateful I’d saved them, it wouldn’t be easy to forget their tortured captivity. Not only that, but somehow, they blamed Wrythe for what had happened to them as well. It was incredible to me that they were showing the man who’d given them everything so little respect. The unfairness of it all made me angry, and I felt the stirrings of that power course through me. But I pulled it back. They had a right to their feelings. They’d been through a trauma I couldn’t understand, and all because of my trial.

“Whatever you did, don’t let him take it out on us,” Gilbert added, grabbing the uneaten fries off my plate. Apparently his momentary aversion to food had already vanished. He shoved my fries in his mouth and picked up one of the burgers on his plate, taking a bite of that as well.

I picked up my tray, trying to act like I wasn’t worried. “I won’t,” I promised.

“Thanks for sitting by me,” Wendy said, sorrow furrowing her features. Apparently, she’d hoped for a friendlier meeting.

“Anytime,” I responded, leaving the table. But before I got too far, I heard Georgia whisper something awful under her breath. It sounded like some of them were back to calling me the Queen of Hearts behind my back. My shoulders slumped in dejection a moment before I remembered all that was at stake. I didn’t have time to mope or feel bad for myself. Rolling back my shoulders, I took my tray to the conveyor belt, dumped things where they needed to go, and exited the cafeteria.

OceanofPDF.com

I KNEW I shouldn't be nervous about seeing Wrythe. I'd seen him plenty in the last week. We'd fought side by side. The king had my back on more than one occasion. But as I got closer to his office, my nerves were on edge and my pulse quickened. He wasn't Kade. With Kade, there was kissing and more kissing and wanting more. So much more. When he wasn't around, it hurt to breathe, a permanent weight. I didn't want to try to live without Kade. Even though I knew I should. His back and forth drove me mad.

Wrythe, on the other hand… My feelings for him were more difficult to explain. I found him attractive and was attracted to him. He was kind, courageous, caring. Any woman would be lucky to have him, but I couldn't see myself as that woman. A picture of the sultry Lily came to mind. She looked like the type of woman Wrythe would want. I was just a child by comparison. Naïve when it came to the carnal needs of a man. With Kade, my lustful desires overruled all other emotions and I forgot to care that I was inexperienced. With Wrythe, I was well aware of what I lacked.

Someone said my name, pulling me from my thoughts.

I glanced in the direction of two trainees. They walked close together, staring at me.

"Do I have something on my face?" I asked, sounding pithy.

"No, but I'm guessing you have something on your heart," one of them said.

"If she even has one," the other whispered. They both laughed, moving on.

My mouth hung open in shock before I caught myself and closed it. The other trainees had always treated me like I was odd, but they'd never been quite so rude before. Ignoring the pang that shot through my heart, I held my head high, making my way to Wrythe's office. As I went, I passed several more trainees. They looked away when I tried to make eye contact, whispering to each other. Some pointing. Others laughing. Like I had three heads shooting from my shoulders or a giant eye in the middle of my forehead. I had an idea about why they were whispering. Surely, it had to do with who my father was. I hadn't told anyone, but somehow everyone in the compound knew.

"Alice," Gage, the Greed Society councilmember said when he saw me. "Where are you off to?" His face was full of accusation, like I should be anywhere but in the hall I walked.

I edged closer to the opposite wall, not in the mood for another confrontation. "King Wrythe's office," I responded. "He asked to see me."

"Better hurry then." Gage passed me by without another word.

As I went, my ears popped, and my eyes began to water. I rubbed an ear, thinking my body was responding to the way the other Moths were treating me. After several minutes I knew that wasn't it, but something else. I glanced back the way I'd come, hoping to see other trainees or Gage, but the hallway was completely empty in every direction. It was only me. Alone.

Facing forward, I picked up speed, but the next corner didn't get any closer. It was as though I ran in place. "What's happening?"

In answer to my question, a white rabbit came around the corner and stopped, his big, shiny eyes holding mine. His pink nose wiggled, causing the whiskers on his face to dance erratically.

"Not again," I said, my shoulders slumping.

"Alice, where have you been?" He took his watch from his powder blue jacket pocket, checking the time. Seeing it, he jumped high into the air so that his long ears nearly touched the ceiling. "We're late. Late. Late. Late." He hopped toward me a few steps, waving his white paw, urging me forward." Let's go."

"Oh no. No way. I'm not following you again." I turned back, heading the way I'd come.

“Alice,” he hissed.

I kept walking away from him, holding up a hand. “Nope.” The last time I’d followed the rabbit, the Devil had taken my friends and made me kill their sires in exchange for their lives, claiming it was part of my Trial of Three. And then he’d told me he was my father, making my already frustrating life nearly unbearable.

Killing the demon sires had only been the first trial, the physical challenge. That meant my dear old dad intended to tell me what my second trial would be. The emotional trial. I already felt overwhelmed. I wasn’t ready to add an emotional trial into the mix. No way.

“You must come, Alice.” The rabbit’s voice was wary, and I turned around in time to see him pulling on his ears.

“Why?” I asked, drawing out the inevitable.

“If you don’t come on your own, there are those…” The rabbit paused at a high shrieking. It sounded like it came from everywhere all at once. The walls started to ripple, and hideous faces tried to force their way out. As if they were connected to a rubber band, the faces pressed against the chair-railed walls, receded momentarily before pushing back out again. The howling apparitions were everywhere, all at once, reaching out toward me. Several brushed against my arms and hands. The harder they pushed, the more of their bodies appeared.

The rabbit hopped back to the corner and paused, waiting. “Hurry. They won’t stay contained much longer.” His eyes darted around at all the faces and figures. He was more terrified than I was, but it seemed he couldn’t leave without me, even though it was obvious he wanted to.

Several faces and appendages had broken through the walls, their blistered fingers brushing against my bare skin. “Fine.” I began to run, pushing past the outstretched arms. The smell of burning flesh filled the room. When I reached the rabbit, he turned the corner and I followed. But we were no longer in a hall. We were no longer in the compound at all.

I tripped over a rock. “Where are we?” I asked the question but had my answer already. This was the same dirty, holey tunnel I’d climbed through during my first time following the rabbit. Frustrated, I scrabbled over roots and kicked through dirt. The rabbit stayed just ahead, his fluffy, white tail bouncing along. “Great. This is super.” The whole affair was frustrating, especially since this time I knew where I was being led.

“What is?” the rabbit asked seemingly unconcerned with my temper tantrum as he continued through the brambles and roots.

“We’re back in a hole. How quaint. How exciting. How—” A large, black scorpion dropped onto my arm. I screamed, brushing it off, its pincers clicking rapidly as it hit the dirt floor and scuttled away. “Freaking great,” I grumbled, picking up the pace.

“That’s more like it.” The rabbit jumped ahead, disappearing behind an enormous root.

“Wait!” I pushed on. What kind of a tree could be attached to such a thing?

The rabbit poked his head around and grumbled. “We’re late. Hurry.”

“I am,” I said, clawing my way forward. It was difficult though and by the time I reached the spot where the rabbit had been, I had bloodied fingers. Irritating rabbit!

Ahead, the tunnel ended abruptly at a black door with a golden knob. The door wasn’t more than four feet tall. Letting out a sigh of relief, I reached the rabbit just as he opened the door and went through. I followed, squatting and walking like a duck to get through.

My senses recognized the place. Across the room was a large throne, my father seated upon it. His chin rested on the palm of one hand, his forefinger pressed against his temple. He appeared to be deep in thought. Or bored.

“It took you long enough,” he snapped at the rabbit.

“She’s slow. Only half demon,” the rabbit responded, pulling his watch from his now dirtied waistcoat, glancing at it, and tucking it away. He made his way over to the Devil, climbing the steps before disappearing behind the throne.

“Very well,” my father said, before turning his attention to me. “It’s lovely to see you, Alice. Are you ready to begin your second trial?”

I wasn’t. Not at all. I breathed through my mouth, trying not to smell the putrefying flesh of the menial demons that were pressed like wallpaper against the walls. “Sure,” I said, forcing myself to shrug, unable to stop myself from looking at the menial rats once in a while.

“Excellent.” He rose, his long black jacket flowing out behind him like a cape. He wore black boots, black pants, and a black shirt as well. This time there was a golden crown sitting on his head. I wanted to say he looked ridiculous, but he didn’t. The man was handsome, and the crown suited him.

Each step he took toward me I copied, except I stepped away, until my back pressed against the door. A palpable force surrounded him, an oozing evil, and I didn’t want any part of it. In the back of my mind I noted that as his daughter I should’ve been able to tolerate the evil. At least to a small degree. But it took everything I had to keep my eyes trained on him.

He noticed what I was doing. “You seem uneasy, but you shouldn’t be. Not after the demons you’ve slayed.” When he was no more than two feet away, he stopped and shook his head as though disappointed in me. Not that I was surprised.

Crossing his arms, he rocked back on his heels. “The second trial is emotional and it’s a doozy,” he began without preamble. “You see, my dear Alice, you must make a sacrifice and choose who lives and who will die.”

“I don’t want anyone to die,” I said, working to get a handle on my racing heart. I'd already killed the sires so the trainees wouldn't have to fight them.

"Oh, but someone must. That's the nature of the trial. The choice you make will say a lot about you." He snapped his fingers.

Wrythe appeared at his right. He was shirtless, which surprised me seeing as I had just seen him a few minutes ago in the cafeteria and he'd been fully dressed. Regardless, his muscled torso glistened with what appeared to be sweat. His long, dark hair hung loosely around his face. Anger rippled across his features, but there was something tender in his eyes, a combination of relief and more, but I couldn't internally debate what that might be. Wrythe flexed, his muscles straining and that's when I noticed he was chained to the wall like a menial rat. "Alice," he said in obvious confusion. "Where am I?"

The Devil smiled, and a shiver ran down my spine. "You, Wrythe, are deep below Demonland. In my lair. I call it Underland, but you can call it Hell."

I took a step toward Wrythe. Surely, I should save him. He was my king.

"Stay where you are, daughter." The Devil held up a hand.

I stopped. "Wrythe?"

"You've been gone a week. I've been worried. Peter, the rest of the Society, and the other trainees have been searching for you. Heathcliff even had his… unspeakable otherworldly miscreants try to find you." He pursed his lips like he'd just tasted something terrible. "I had to speak with a… dragon. It was beyond unpleasant."

I shook my head at thoughts of a dragon, but I focused on time. "That can't be. I just left the compound a few moments ago."

He shook his head. "It's been seven days. We thought—" He glanced at the Devil and didn't go on.

"That can't be," I began, but the Devil interrupted me.

"Enough chit-chat!" He glared at Wrythe.

“Whatever your plan, this is not the way to accomplish it, Deckland,” Wrythe said through gritted teeth.

Irritation flashed through me. Why wouldn’t Wrythe call my father what he was, the Devil, instead of using his stupid human name.

“Actually, it’s the perfect plan, especially since I know your feelings for her,” the Devil said. He clucked his tongue. “Rest assured, she feels something for you as well, though I don’t believe those feelings are as strong as the ones she has for this one.” He snapped his fingers and Kade appeared on the other side of him.

Dread filled my stomach at the sight of him. Kade had on a white shirt, jeans, and black combat boots. His light hair looked wet and hung in his eyes. Unlike Wrythe, Kade didn’t seem surprised to be chained at the wrists.

“Kade. I’m so sorry.” I started toward him, but the Devil grabbed my arm.

“Don’t worry, Alice. Kade is well aware of what is going on. He understands the part he has to play.” Deckland spoke of Kade as though they were familiar. They’d been together at the restaurant. I remembered that, but I couldn’t comprehend it. How did the Devil and Kade fit together? Kade seemed so full of light while the Devil… definitely wasn’t.

“How do you two know each other?” I couldn’t help but ask the question.

“You know the saying, keep your friends close and your enemies closer?” The Devil asked.

Of course I’d heard of that saying. At least once, anyway.

“Well,” he went on before I had the chance to answer. “Kade and I are the dearest of enemies. We need each other the way a moth needs a flame, the way peanut butter needs jelly, macaroni needs cheese…” He chuckled at his own cleverness, walking back to his throne. He sat, crossing one leg over the other. Wrythe and Kade had been dragged along behind him, as though they were tethered to my father by an invisible string.

“What does that mean?” The more he explained, the more confused I became.

“It doesn’t matter,” he tsked. “Now, let’s discuss rules.” As he spoke, the menial demons gnashed their teeth, whispering their hatred for the rules.

“No rules.”

“Dash the rules.”

“Eat the rules.”

“Squash the rules.”

I fought to ignore them, determinedly approaching my father. “The rules be damned. I won’t choose between the two of them. I won’t! I don’t care what your rules are.” I crossed my arms and stomped my foot. I knew I was acting like a child, but I couldn’t help myself.

“Alice,” Kade whispered, shaking his head slowly.

Wrythe cursed under his breath.

“Pay attention,” the Devil snapped, eyeing me coldly. When I refocused on him, he smiled. “You won’t choose?”

“No.”

He steepled his fingers, studying me intently. “The rules are simple. One must live, and one must die. But, if you refuse to make a choice, then all of the Dark Moths, all the trainees, and the Moth children will die. And it will be your fault.” He shrugged as though he couldn’t care less one way or another. Death was all he was interested in. That and suffering. “But if that is your decision, I suppose I can accommodate it as well.” He stood, and a glittering black door appeared out of thin air. He went to it.

“Where are you going? What do you mean?” He was the Devil, I told myself. Surely he lied. No one possessed that kind of power. Not even him.

“I’ve explained myself, Alice.” His evil eyes tore into me and I saw the truth of his words. “You agreed to the Trial of Three. And with that agreement comes unbreakable conditions.”

I wanted to taunt him, to tell him I was shocked even the Devil had limits, but my better judgment told me not to. I looked at Wrythe, my eyes pleading. There had to be another way.

“He’s right. You must complete each trial. Otherwise all will be lost,” Wrythe said.

My heart lurched. That meant either he or Kade had to die. And I had to choose which of them it would be. I couldn’t make such a decision. It was beyond my ability to fathom.

The Devil was at the door, and he turned the knob. “I know you care for both of them. I can feel it within you. But that’s why this is an emotional trial. Your heart will tell you one thing while your head will demand another.” He glanced at Wrythe and then Kade. “Or maybe I have it wrong. Maybe you’ll come to your senses and realize neither of them deserve you.” He seemed to grow two feet taller as he spoke. “You are my daughter after all.”

When I didn’t respond, he rolled back his shoulders. “You have one week to decide who will die. Choose.” He pushed open the door, stepping through the doorframe, his glittering blue eyes never leaving mine. “Seven days and then I’ll come for you. You’ll either tell me who will die, or you’ll watch as every mutt goes up in flames.”

“Don’t do this. Wait. Please. This is too much. I can’t do this.” As I spoke, the menial demons chittered and squealed. The room rippled and shimmered like I was looking at a mirage in the desert.

“Wrythe.” I ran toward him just as he vanished. I turned to Kade, but he was already gone. “I can’t,” I said, closing my eyes.

When I opened them, I was back at the compound, standing in the same hall I’d been in before following the rabbit. The hall was empty, for which I was grateful as an overwhelming wave of devastation rushed through me. I fell to my knees, covering my face with my hands. Bitter, hot tears burned my cheeks and stung my eyes. How would I ever decide between them? The Devil had given me an impossible task.

I thought about running away, but a second later I knew I couldn't. That would only condemn the other Moths. Wrythe could help. I needed to see him. Not quite running, I traveled the length of the hall and turned the corner.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN I REACHED Wrythe's office, I raised my fist to knock but paused. What if Wrythe didn't know what'd happened in the Devil's throne room a few moments ago? Or what if he did and he was gone? Like the trainees in the first trial, what if the Devil had Kade and Wrythe imprisoned elsewhere?

I lowered my fist. How was I going to do it? One man was my king and the other… I didn't know what he was, but I couldn't imagine losing either of them. Sighing, I prepared to knock but paused again when I heard voices coming from the other side of the door. Wrythe was in there but he wasn't alone

Glancing both ways down the hall to make sure I was still alone; I carefully leaned my ear against the door.

"She's the Devil's daughter, Wrythe." It sounded like Gwen, the Gluttony councilmember.

"I know, but what would you have me do? She saved those trainees' lives. She slayed their sires like they were menial demons. She should be applauded as a hero," Wrythe returned, his voice low and gravelly.

"She saved them, yes. But at some point, she could turn around and use them as bait in her own game. Or worse. I mean, have you thought about the implications? I'm beginning to wonder if she should even be allowed in the compound." That sounded like Lily.

"What do you think, Peter? You've spent the most time with her. Do you believe she's a threat to the Dark Moth Society, or me?" That was Wrythe. He still sounded like he couldn't believe what they were discussing, and I was grateful.

"Well, sire…" Peter paused.

My heart raced like it would run out of my chest. Did Peter believe me dangerous? If I looked at it from their point of view, I could understand their point. The Devil had demanded the demise of either Wrythe or Kade. If I chose Wrythe, his death could send the Society into chaos. Who would lead us if not Wrythe? Obviously, the Devil knew that, which was why Wrythe was one of my choices. And Kade? Well, he'd claimed my heart and soul. I loved him in a way I'd never believed possible.

Love! Had I really just thought that? But it was true. In that same moment, I knew I loved Wrythe, too, though not in the same way as Kade. For some reason, that line of thinking brought up my mother. I'd never known her, didn't even know what she looked like, but I couldn't help wondering if she'd loved me.

"I like Alice," Peter continued, cutting through my tumbling thoughts. "But if what you've told us is true—if the Devil is going to make her choose—then I have to agree with Lily. Alice is a threat. And not just to you, but to the whole Society and our way of life. We can't have that."

"You see, sire, even Peter agrees the girl must be put down. Now. Before she makes a decision." Lily again. I was beginning to dislike the Lust councilwoman more and more every second.

"I didn't say we should kill her! For crying out loud, Lily," Peter said. "She's a person! And personally, I like her." He cleared his throat. "But the Devil has put us in a predicament. Something must be done. I saw the way she behaved around the boy, Kade. And if I'm right and Alice has feelings for him, then she might choose him over you."

"I don't believe that," Wrythe said. "We're family. But if you must lay blame for this predicament on anyone, then it should be on us. We're the ones who agreed to let her go through the Trial of Three. It's our fault we are in this mess."

"Maybe so," Peter said, "But I've watched strong kingdoms filled with loving families crumble and degrade over much less."

Peter had a point, but I didn't like it. This situation was impossible. I pressed my nails into the palms of my hands, drawing blood. The Devil had pitted me against the only family I'd ever known. And the Dark Moth Society would come after me. No doubt about it. They would be careless not to.

"That we allowed her to submit to the Trials was a mistake, without a doubt, but that doesn't mean we should make more errors by allowing her to continue to live. Doing so would be irresponsible," Skye, the Sloth councilmember said.

"I agree we shouldn't have allowed her to participate in the Trials. I didn't appreciate her for who and what she is," Wrythe began, but Gwen cut him off.

"We did what we thought was best for the Society as a whole. It was wrong and now we must correct the error and put her down, as Lily suggested. There is no other way."

"It's horrible to be thinking of killing someone we've trained and taught for so many years," Lily started, her voice like poisoned syrup. "She really is like our daughter, but we have to think of the Society as a whole, Wrythe, dear. She could destroy everything we've created or worse."

What could be worse than total destruction, I thought, torn between wanting to go in there and rip Lily's head off and curling up in the fetal position and rocking myself through the pain.

"Don't be so dramatic," Wrythe said and I cheered internally. At least one person in that room didn't want my demise.

"I'm not being dramatic. Everyone in the compound will agree when I say she is a nuisance, a stain on our way of life. She must be snuffed out." Lily shouted the last part and I flinched.

"And what about you, Ewan?" Wrythe asked the Envy council member. "You've been quiet throughout this conversation, but I need your vote."

"Well, sire, I'm with the majority. Alice must die," he said quietly.

“Thank you. I appreciate your opinions, all of them,” Wrythe said, his anger radiating through the door. “That is why we have this council, but as King, I have the final say, and I absolutely refuse to kill Alice. No more discussion!” I jumped at the sharp bite in his words. “Peter,” he continued, “Search the archives. There must be a way to reverse the Trials.”

“Yes, sire.”

“The rest of you hold tight and if you see Alice, you will treat her with the utmost respect.”

Mumbled responses filtered through the door.

“I will talk to Alice myself, get her thoughts on the whole business. Perhaps there is a way…” I didn’t catch the rest because he lowered his voice. I knew whatever they were saying, it wouldn’t bode well for me.

And that knowledge filled me with sadness. But I had another choice. I could let the sadness swallow me or get myself together and fight this second trial. Deciding on the second, I straightened. My path was clear. Because despite what Lily, the others, or even Peter wanted, I knew Wrythe wouldn’t allow them to kill me. Without a doubt I knew it. But that didn’t change the fact that I was royally screwed. And Wrythe might be outvoted or worse. Hopefully, Peter would find a way out of this mess, but I couldn’t sit back and let them do all the work. I needed to find a solution on my own.

“I have to!” The words burned in my mouth, determined. Without a doubt, I knew I wouldn’t find the answers in Demonland. Even if I could, I had a feeling the Society members wouldn’t let me. Every move, every breath I took would be scrutinized. Plus, I wouldn’t put it past Lily or the others to just end the whole situation and kill me in my sleep. I needed to escape and I needed to do it now.

Quietly I moved away from the door. By now it was clear the week had passed just as Wrythe said. I still had seven more days until I had to make a choice and I didn’t intend to waste them. A plan began to formulate in my mind. With that knowledge driving me, I ran to my room. On the shelf in my closet rested a black leather backpack. I took it and opened it. Then threw in some clothes as well as underclothes from my chest of drawers. From the top drawer of my dresser, I grabbed my wallet. I didn't have much money. We had no need of it in Demonland, but there was enough. At least I hoped so.

After tucking it in the front pocket of my pack, I went to the place between my mattresses where I'd hidden the journal Heathcliff gave me.

Answers lay within those pages or at least a way to find help. I could feel it in my bones.

Once I had everything, I cinched up my backpack and threw it over one shoulder. Peeking through the doorway, I checked the hallway, but before I left the confines of my room, I encountered my first problem. The only way out of the compound was the elevator. And the only way to ride the elevator up into Wonderland was with Peter's key. Taking several deep breaths, I started down the hall toward Peter's room, grateful most everyone was either training or in class. Hearing voices a ways off, I sped up. At the door leading to the teachers' quarters, I glanced in through the small window. Gage was coming, but he was distracted, talking on his phone. In a dash, I ran back down the hall toward the trainee rooms and around the corner. Curiously, I took a quick peek. He was still on his phone and headed in the opposite direction, toward the cafeteria. After several long seconds, I carefully walked back to the door, peeked in, and seeing the teachers' hallway empty, opened the door.

I hadn't ever been inside Peter's room, but I knew which one was his from the day I arrived at the compound many years ago. The door was unlocked and I carefully went in, feeling only the slightest bit of guilt before pushing it aside.

His room was cluttered. Books, scrolls, papers, clothes, and weapons lay everywhere. This didn't look like the room of a man whose sire was a Pride demon. I shrugged it off and started through the drawers at his desk. “I need that key,” I whisper-shouted, picking up a thick tome and shaking the pages. A folded piece of paper fell out. I stared at it a moment and without overthinking, put it in my pocket. Then I moved on to his closet and finally his sock drawer. As I went, I put everything back in its place exactly as I found it. Doing so would keep them from knowing of my search and give me extra time.

After picking through a pile of clothes on the floor in one corner, I stood, trying not to panic, but with little success. If I couldn’t escape through the elevator, there was nowhere I could hide in Demonland that they wouldn’t find me. I had to get out. I had to! My breathing came erratically as I spun in circles, searching for something that would shout out at me that the key was inside. A purple jacket hung on the back of his door. I studied it a moment. It looked like one he would wear to go above ground.

“Maybe,” I said, hoping against hope it was in there.

I checked one pocket and came up empty. Then the other. My fingers wrapped around cold steel. Desperate to believe, I slowly pulled it out.

“The key,” I said, tears of joy stinging my eyes. I tucked it in my pocket and was about to open the door when I heard voices.

“She wasn’t in the training room or the cafeteria. Did you check her room?”

It was Peter!

Frantic, I searched for a place to hide.

My mind was buzzing.

The closet? I ran to get in but changed my mind. I wouldn’t fit.

What about under his desk? There was an opening where the chair slid in, but it went all the way through and they’d see me there for sure.

Peter was at the door. The knob began to turn.

The bed! my mind screamed. And I dove under it just as Peter came in.

“What if she isn’t in her room?” he asked.

I watched as two sets of feet came in. One set belonged to Peter and the other belonged to Wrythe. I’d know those black combat boots with white skulls painted on the sides anywhere.

“I hope she isn’t.” As Wrythe spoke, he walked over to the bed.

“We need to keep tabs on her at all times, but first we need to know what she’s thinking.” Peter’s voice was arrogant and filled with pride.

“No, Peter, we need to let her complete her trial. Whatever the outcome. If we don’t then we all will be in grave danger. She either chooses one of us or every other Moth dies.” Wrythe sat on the bed. For a moment I thought he might know I was under there, but that was impossible.

“I can’t believe he would do that.” Peter sounded confident. “He simply isn’t strong enough. It’s nothing but a ploy to rack against her emotions. It’s a trial, it isn’t real.” He huffed several times, taking off his shoes and changing them. “I mean, where would be the fun in that if he killed us all? And isn’t that why the demons created us? For their fun. But if she chooses the boy—”

“Then it’ll be the right choice, Peter. Even if, as you say, Deckland’s only testing her. If that’s the case, I don’t think he’ll kill either Kade or myself.” Wrythe’s fingers appeared below the bedframe and directly in my line of vision as he casually tapped the bed. There was something in his hands.

He knew I was there!

I covered my mouth with a hand, desperate not to freak out or scream.

He tapped his hand against the frame again and I realized he wanted me to take whatever he held in his hand. I carefully scooted forward and reached out.

“We cannot take that chance, sire. The Dark Moths cannot survive without you,” Peter said, and I hesitated.

“Stop trying to blow smoke up my ass. Of course it can survive!” He tossed whatever was in his hand under the bed. It struck me in the cheek before hitting the ground. Then he stood. “Life always continues. Even if I’m not around, the Earth will keep spinning and the Dark Moth Society will continue training and saving regular Moths from their demon sires.” He opened the door. “We have more pressing matters to deal with. I know there is something disturbing going on between Lily and Gage. More than worrying about Alice, we need to discover their plans, and dole out whatever consequences are necessary.”

“You really believe they could be up to something traitorous?” Peter went to his desk and rummaged around.

“Absolutely. Now let’s go see what Cook’s got to eat. I’m hungry.”

“Again?” Peter sighed and then followed the king from the room.

“Always,” Wrythe said, shutting the door behind him.

Once they were gone, I held my breath, momentarily terrified Wrythe would tell Peter where I was hidden. After waiting several minutes, I exhaled and crawled out, taking the small, dark orb Wrythe had thrown and tucking it in my pocket. I would look at it more closely when I had the chance, but it felt like a smooth pebble.

Carefully, I opened the door and peered out. The hall was empty. Quickly, I ran toward the exit, through the door, and slid to a stop once I reached the elevator. Taking the key, I turned it in its slot. The hum of the elevator grated against my ears.

Someone will hear, I thought, wishing I had my katana. There wasn’t a single person in the compound (except maybe Lily) I wanted to kill, but I didn’t have a problem wounding them. I would fight Demonland’s residents until my last breath if it meant I could escape this place.

I had to.

The elevator door pinged open. I stepped in and turned just as Pam and Wendy rounded the corner.

“Alice,” Wendy called, raising her hand in greeting.

I returned the wave, trying to look casual. “Come on. Come on. Come on,” I muttered under my breath, pushing the button that would take me to the surface over and over again.

“She’s leaving without Peter or Wrythe,” Pam said. “I think she’s running away.”

“That isn’t like Alice.” But Wendy walked faster, then began to trot.

“Close already,” I said, willing the elevator door to shut.

“Alice,” Wendy said, stopping in front of the elevator just as the doors completely closed.

I heaved a sigh of relief, sensing freedom.

At the top, the doors pinged open again and I was in the parking garage in Wonderland, Arizona. The concrete structure immediately calmed me. Freedom. I breathed in, happier than ever before to be above ground. No one knew who I was up here.

Readjusting the pack on my back, I started toward the exit and the fading sunlight. “Where to begin?”

OceanofPDF.com

THEY WOULD COME AFTER ME, of that I was certain. Because of me, the Dark Moths' king might die. And we Dark Moths lived by a code. Sewn into that code and ingrained within our very bones was the need to keep our king alive. No matter the cost. From the talk I'd overheard between Wrythe and the other Society members and then Wrythe and Peter, something was going on that went deeper than just my trial. I had no doubt Lily would never not stop trying to kill me and it sounded like she wasn't the only one.

I needed to get somewhere safe, somewhere out of the way. But I had no idea where to begin.

Away, my mind screamed. In the distance a horn honked long and loud. Cars travelled the streets and several passed me as I moved through the garage. Occasionally I heard the loud thumping of music.

Beside me, a man with graying hair and wearing a tan button up shirt rolled down his car window. "Hey, need a ride?"

"No, thanks." I kept walking. The car followed, and I picked up the pace, climbing over a steel rail and lifting myself up to the next level. Jogging, I exited the garage, glancing back to make sure the man hadn't somehow made his way up to me unnoticed.

"Spare some change?" A man with no teeth was seated to the right of the exit. His clothes were filthy as were his face and hair.

"Sure." I unzipped the front pocket of my pack and pulled out some change. "Here you go," I said, holding out my hand.

He looked me up and down, eyeing me greedily. Moving faster than I would've believed possible, he stood from his cross-legged position on the ground and held a knife to my throat. "I'll take the whole pack," he said. His breath smelled of dead animal and something else. Antiseptic, maybe?

Wrath burned just beneath my skin as the blazing late afternoon sun burned the rest of me. Sweat beaded along my upper lip and along the edges of my bra. “You can’t have it,” I said, forcing myself to stay calm. There was no need for anger. This man was nothing compared to what I’d fought during the last week.

“And you think you can stop me from taking it?” He pressed the knife harder against my skin. Wetness trickled from beneath the blade. My wrath grew. I didn’t have time for this.

“Absolutely,” I growled, grabbing the hand holding the knife and bending it back at the wrist until bone snapped. He cried out in pain, dropping the knife. I picked it up, aiming the dirty tip at him. “Don’t ever do that again.”

“Why can’t the human race see how awful my life is and give me a break?” He held his wrist against his stomach, cradling it in his other hand. Giant tears streaked his face, making him look like a clown.

I wanted to be cruel and tell him I’d already given him a break in the form of his broken wrist and tell him what he actually needed was manners. Instead, I tucked his knife into my pack and started down the street.

“You should’ve killed me,” he sobbed. “I’ll be dead by the end of the day anyway.”

I stopped, heaving in the dry, hot Wonderland air. “Do you have a phone?” I asked, facing him.

He looked surprised. “No,” he said, but I could tell he lied.

“Look, if you have a phone, I can call you an ambulance. They can take you to a hospital.”

“Don’t bother. You’ve done enough already.” He turned his back on me and seated himself.

“Fine,” I said, suddenly tired. “Good luck.” I headed down the street, determined to get as far away from the parking garage as possible.

Each step took me further away from the Society threat in Demonland, but it also took me farther from my family. Depression slowly set in as I walked. A somberness followed by sadness. I was alone. No matter what I did, loneliness was my destiny. The knowledge sent me on a downward spiral. At that moment I would have given almost anything for a demon to fight. Battle always brought out the best in me. To keep my mind from the hurt, I went over how I'd slayed each of the demon sires, looking for things I could've done better. It worked and before I knew it, the sun was setting. I'd been walking aimlessly for hours.

Turning in a circle, I read the street signs. I was at the corner of Tweedledee and Tweedledum, but that gave me no more sense of direction. Across the street, a white van pulled up to a large warehouse. Familiarity caused me to search for the name of the building. It was the Mad Hatter, the club we'd gone to on Eric's birthday. My depression deepened, and I wondered if it would be better if the Society just killed me. Death would mean my fight was over. That didn't seem like such a bad thing at the moment.

A man climbed out of a large work truck wearing jeans and an old tee. He went around to the back and opened the double doors. After a few seconds, he pulled out a crate of bottles, causing them to jangle before setting them on the ground. He repeated the process several times. Watching him work made me think of Kade. Had he really held a regular job? He'd said he worked at The Caterpillar Place fixing cars, boats, and motorcycles. Was that true? I could try to find his work place and see if he still worked there. At the thought of seeing Kade, my heart raced.

But something told me the car shop was a lost cause. Still, it was better than nothing.

Unable to move, I imagined what it would be like to live in my own space. To get up each day and go to a job I loved. But it wasn't in my realm of understanding. I was born to slay demons and nothing more.

And I loved slaying demons, didn't I? It was all I'd ever known. I had a feeling that, given the chance, I might find something in the real world I could love too.

With a start, I noticed the man was staring at me, his hands raised in question. Embarrassed, I crossed the street, heading toward a fast food restaurant whose sign stood high above the building a little ways down.

Inside, cool air leeched the heat from my skin. There were only a few people eating and one at the counter, ordering. I got in line behind him. When it was my turn, I ordered a drink and fries.

The cashier rang me up. "Is that for here or to go?"

"Here." I grabbed my wallet, unzipping it, waiting for the total.

"That'll be two twenty-nine."

I counted out three ones and handed them over.

"Great," he said with a smile. "Just a moment."

I returned my wallet and waited off to the side while he scooped fries into a container and filled a cup with my drink before placing them both on a tray.

"Did you want sauce with that?"

"No, thanks." I took my tray to a seat near one of three visible exits and sat facing the windows. That way I could see everyone coming and going. Ignoring the food, I pulled the journal from my pack and opened it. The pages weren't numbered, so I began flipping through until I reached thirty-two. That had been where Heathcliff suggested I start.

The strange thing about his request was the page was blank. At least that's what I thought at first until I noticed several pages were stuck together. I carefully separated them, unable to help but look at the illustrations as I did. When I was done, I turned to page thirty-two. On it, a man was drawn in pen. He was the length of the page and looked normal enough, except for the wings protruding from his back.

Above him was a word I didn't know: C-H-A-Y-O-T. I sounded it out. Then I remembered Heathcliff's pronunciation of chayot. It sounded like coyote, but with a ch sound.

Next to the picture was a breakdown of what chayots were meant to do. In that moment, I decided to call them angels. It was easier. And their number one duty? Protect humans. Underneath the breakdown was a longer text with a quote from someone named Gabriel. "At all costs, the human race must come first." Beneath that was a list of the angels' powers:

Strength.

Agility.

Immortality.

It made sense they would be immortal. As I studied the page, a feeling of rightness came over me. Angels had to exist. They were the opposite demons. So why hadn't we been taught about them? Heathcliff said the Society knew about angels too, so why did they deliberately withhold information from us? Did they just not think we needed to know? Or more likely that we wouldn't live long enough to care.

I read over the page several times hoping to figure out why Heathcliff had suggested I start here first. What were his motives? I didn't know and since reading about the angels wasn't bringing me any closer to the answer I desperately needed, I continued through the pages until I reached the end.

On the final page was a name handwritten in pen: Professor Pops. Below the strange name was a phone number.

"That's something," I whispered. But how to get in touch with him? I didn't have a phone. I debated going back to the man near the parking garage and decided he would be my last resort.

All around me were people immersed in their phones. Surely someone would let me borrow one for a quick call. For several seconds I tried unsuccessfully to make eye contact. I wasn't a fan of human confrontation, but taking a deep breath, I cleared my throat, and tried again, willing someone to look up and meet my gaze.

Finally, the only person not on a phone looked up from his food, and noticing me, smiled. He was pasty and slightly overweight, and his light brown hair was combed to one side and thinning. “Hi,” he said, getting up from his table next to mine and sitting across from me. “Did you need some help?”

I figured it wouldn’t hurt to ask him. “Would you happen to have a phone I could borrow?”

“Oh,” he said, touching his chest, checking the non-existent pocket on his pink polo shirt and then moving to his khaki pants. “You can, but I must’ve left it out in my car. Want me to go get it? Or you could come with me? Either way.” He slid out of the seat.

“Thanks, I’ll come out to your car with you.” There was no point wasting time. The sooner I called this Professor Pops guy, the better. The Society could already have Dark Moths in Wonderland looking for me, and I hadn’t gotten very far.

“Great. But what about your food?” He indicated my uneaten fries.

“Not hungry.”

“Alrighty.” He picked up his tray and I did the same. He threw away his trash, stacked his tray and then waited for me to do the same. I followed him out of the restaurant and into the parking lot. It was dark and the lights from the surrounding businesses had their lights on.

Everything changed in the dark.

He’d parked in the farthest parking spot near the back. And his car wasn’t actually a car but a van. The unassuming man didn’t look like he belonged to the van. No other cars were on this side of the building, leaving us alone.

“It’s in the back,” he said indicating the back of the van.

All sorts of alarm bells started going off in my head and I almost laughed as I understood what he had planned for me. The man had no idea what he'd done. But if I let him take me then the Society wouldn't be able to follow, and I hoped wherever we went, the man would have a phone. So, I played along. "Well open it up and let's get this… I mean, let's get it."

He flinched at my tone and I looked away. "Sure. Okay," he said, opening one side. He was like a menial demon who'd zoned in on his prey and couldn't see anything but what he wanted, obviously ruled by greed and lust. "It's in here somewhere," he said. "Darn thing. I'm always losing it." He climbed in. "Found it."

"Great." I stayed put. No sense making my abduction easy on him. And I wanted room to maneuver if he pulled out a weapon.

"Did you want to climb in out of the heat? I'll turn on the van and get the air conditioning going." As he spoke, the car turned over, sending a large cloud of exhaust into the air beside me.

I rolled my eyes. If this guy was a serial killer or whatever, he was terrible at it. "How nice," I said, playing the part of a trusting teen, though I had a feeling there wasn't a single human teenager in all the world who would fall for his shenanigans. Either I was his first victim, or he was terribly off his game tonight.

As soon as I got inside, a needle pricked the side of my neck. Part of me wanted to head butt the man I'd dubbed Pasty and drop him off in front of the police station. Instead, I pretended that whatever he'd shot me up with had worked even though my demon metabolism wouldn't allow it to, and dropped onto the filthy, litter-strewn floor.

"Got her," he said, and I could swear he did a fist pump. "Now to take her back to my lair."

I forced myself not to laugh. No one had a lair, not even the Devil himself. I mean I guess it was a lair, but he didn't call it that. It took all of my self-control not to slap myself in the forehead in exasperation.

He clicked on his blinker before merging into traffic. I knew a normal human would be scared, but I felt only relief. In a way, this bumbling man had done me a favor by taking me because if I didn't know where I was going, the Dark Moths wouldn't either. I would remember that and perhaps not punish him quite as much as he deserved.

He drove for at least thirty minutes, singing along with music from the radio without a care in the world. When the van stopped, and he got out, I turned so I could see him open the door and know whether he had a weapon or not. He didn't.

"Come on, little girlie. It's time to play doctor." He yanked me by the arms and threw me over his shoulder. I gritted my teeth at the uncomfortable position and fought back the urge to beat the dumb out of him.

We were inside an oversized garage. He walked us up a few steps and opened the door. "Hello, Mom," he called. "I'll be with you in just a few minutes." He sounded out of breath and I grinned to myself. I wasn't a waif, but a half demon full of muscle.

"Thank you," came the soft reply, probably from his mother.

He opened another door and flipped on a light before walking down a set of stairs. Huffing and puffing, he reached the bottom. The basement windows had all been covered and the room was dark, but only for a moment until he flipped on the lights. Where the upstairs looked like a house that'd been around since the seventies and never been dusted, down here was pristine. The walls were painted white, the floor was concrete with a large drain in the center. Along the walls were torture machines of all kinds. Off to one side were two aluminum tables. One had something on it covered in a blue tarp. The room reminded me of a macabre version of Heathcliff's lab. I shuddered but pushed the feeling aside as I studied the tarp. What could be under there?

"Rest here, my pretty. I've got to take my stupid mother her pills and then I'll be back to play." He set me on one of the torture machines and handcuffed me to it.

I moaned, allowing my head to flop to one side like a dead fish.

He touched my face with one of his pudgy, sweaty hands. “I’ll be back, my love.”

Through my lashes I watched him climb the stairs, turn out the light, and lock the door.

OceanofPDF.com

I WAITED until Pasty closed the door at the top of the stairs before sitting up straight and opening my eyes. He'd only cuffed one wrist to the chair I sat in and I easily broke free. It was dark so I gave my eyes a moment to adjust.

There had to be a phone around here somewhere, but before I looked for one, I had to see what was under the tarp. With tentative steps, I went over. A rank smell wafted from it. I lifted one side and my stomach flip-flopped at the sight of the dead body beneath. She looked worse than I could've imagined. Her insides gone with a gaping hole where her torso had been, her hair matted with dried blood. But it didn't end there. One of her hands and feet was gone. I looked, but couldn't find them. One of her ears was missing as was both of her eyes. Her mouth had been sewn shut, the black thread visible.

The longer I observed her, the stronger the rage boiled through my veins. My demon power sprang to life and a red hue emanated from my skin. Shock at seeing such a thing momentarily tamped down my anger, but not enough to change my mind about all the things I would do to Pasty when I got the chance. First I needed to locate a phone.

At his workstation, there were dozens. I picked up one and opened it. "No charge." It took several seconds, but I finally found one with a charge and dialed the number on the last page of the journal. My backpack was still in the jerk's van, but I'd memorized the number as soon as I read it.

"Hello," a deep but kind voice answered.

"Um, hello. Hi," I said, but in a whisper. I didn't want the guy upstairs with his mother to hear me. "My name is Alice. Is this…" I was embarrassed calling him the name next to the number, but it was all I had. "Professor Pops?"

“This is. How can I help you, Alice?”

“Yes, well Heathcliff gave me one of his journals and your number was in the back of it.” I paused, unsure how to get to my big question.

“Heathcliff always was good at keeping journals, especially in high school,” the man said. “But I don’t think that’s why you called, my dear.”

“No,” I said, liking him already. “It’s just… do you know anything about a place called Demonland?” I began pacing, my anger momentarily forgotten.

The man didn’t respond right away, and I wondered if he would help. “Of course I do,” he said, and I sighed with relief. “Heathcliff spends a lot of his time there. Why?”

Right. Duh. “Well, that’s where I’m from. And I could really use your help.” I heard walking above me and lowered my voice. “Can we meet somewhere?”

“We can. Where are you?” He paused. “And why are you whispering? Are you in trouble?”

“I’m in Wonderland, Arizona and I’m whispering because… I’m in a predicament at the moment, but it’s nothing I can’t handle.” I thought of all the ways I would torture Pasty and make him suffer for what he’d done to that girl.

The man on the phone took a deep breath. “If you’re sure, I can be there in a few hours. Can I call this number when I arrive?”

The door to the basement unlocked. “Yes,” I said, and hung up, tucking the small flip-phone into the top of one of my black combat boots. Quickly, I ran over to the table, searching for something I could use to hold Pasty down. I found another set of metal handcuffs and tucked them into my front pocket. Then ran back to the chair the man had put me in and sat, closing my eyes. I slowed my breathing, forcing myself to appear asleep.

Pasty relocked the door, flipped on the lights, and came down the stairs.

With each step my heart picked up speed. Not with fear, but with excitement as I thought of all the ways I would hurt him. He wasn't much different than the demons I'd slaughtered the last week.

"There you are, my pretty," he said, but didn't come toward me. I opened one eye to see where he was. He was at his workstation, whistling as he selected the tools he wanted. I couldn't tell what he grabbed, but I hoped like hell it was something big and violent.

Anxious to get started with the guy, I stood. Per my training, I found my center and waited.

When he turned, he held a large butcher knife in one hand and something I hadn't seen before in the other. There'd been a smile on his face, but when he saw me awake and alert and standing, the happiness disappeared and was replaced by fear. He stared at me for a moment before rushing me, not with the knife, but with the other thing.

I debated whether to let him hit me with it, just so I could find out what it would do. I was half demon, so he couldn't kill me. Whatever the weapon was, it wouldn't be able to do any permanent damage.

The man saw his opening and took it, jabbing me in the cheek. Ten thousand volts of electricity shot through me, knocking me back a few steps. I recovered, standing upright. Pasty was shocked and annoyed. He glanced at the electric thing in his hand and shook it. "That's impossible," he said, trying to hit me with it again. But I wasn't going to let him zap me a second time. At the last second, I sidestepped him, slamming my elbow down on his arm, knocking the thing, whatever it was, from his hand. Then with great satisfaction, I backhanded him across the face.

He roared in frustration, slashing at me with the scary-looking knife in his other hand. But unlike me he wasn't skilled in the art of a fight. He was inadequate and clumsy. I blocked easily and grabbed his hand, twisting until the knife clanged to the floor and he fell to his knees. With my free hand, I took the cuffs and despite his struggling, dragged him over and flung him into the same chair he'd put me in. Then locked his wrist onto the armrest. "How do you like it?" I asked, my voice quiet. If he were a demon, I'd guess he belonged to lust.

"I'm sorry. Please. I'm so sorry," Pasty whined, looking at me with a mixture of astonishment and fury. Without question, he wasn't sorry. The eyes couldn't lie and there was death in his.

"You're anything but sorry," I said. "And although you're a fool and as evil as any demon I've slaughtered, you shouldn't feel too bad. In the last week I've killed six royal demons and you're not even the equivalent of a menial rat." As I spoke, the red glow on my skin flickered and intensified. "You picked the wrong woman to mess with tonight, little man."

"What are you?" he asked, his anger turning to awe. He pupils grew as he studied me, like I was a new toy and he had to have me. "I've never seen anything like you before." He clucked his tongue. "Incredible." He reached out with his free hand to touch me.

"You don't want to know," I said, batting his hand away before slamming him back into the seat.

At that point he turned his head away and began to cry. "No. No. No. Please. You have no idea what I've been through. My mother… the things she did to me. It's no wonder I am the way I am. Playing doctor with the pretty girls is my release, my way to survive in this cruel world." Snot ran down his face as he spoke.

"I might feel bad if I believed you, but I don't. And I know if I let you go, you won't stop. You'll go out and find another young woman to torture to death. And I won't have that on my conscious." The rage turned to a boiling calm as it raced through my veins.

He faced me, opening his eyes. The fury was back, the hazel in his eyes gone until they were almost completely black. He sat up, taking a swing at me with his uncuffed fist.

I caught it and squeezed until the man cried out and tried to pull away.

“How dare you,” he demanded. “How dare you decide who deserves to die and who doesn’t? You’re just as bad as I am.”

I twisted harder, feeling his bones crack in my palm. “Not so, Pasty. I’ve never killed a human.”

Between broken sobs, he tried to speak. “But you said you killed six in the last week. That’s worse than me.”

I ignored his comment, checking out the chair and all its buttons. There was a black one with the word ON above it. I pushed the switch and the machine whirred to life. It was a mechanical arm with a small, circular blade on the end.

“You’re a killer like me.” He tried to move away, pushing his feet up onto the seat. “Stop!” He screamed. The words echoed through the basement and I decided I should’ve taped his mouth shut. Letting him speak freely was a bad idea unless I wanted his mom to come down and check out the noise. But just as quickly, I knew the man wouldn’t have had such a basement in the first place if he worried his mother would come down. She must be bedridden or confined to a wheelchair. And besides, I’d heard him lock the door. But she might be able to call the police. That dampened the plans I had, but only slightly.

“I’m a killer, sure, but not of humans. I slay monsters,” I said, pulling Pasty back down in the seat.

“You aren’t human?” His terror turned to awe and that wicked smile widened his lips.

“Not completely,” I said. It didn’t matter that I looked human. As the Devil’s daughter and in possession of all seven of the deadly sins, my humanity barely existed.

“So, I’ll be your first human kill, then?”

“That’s right,” I admitted, speculating at the change in him.

“Then do your worst, whatever you are. I think I’ll enjoy dying by your hands.” His face and body went slack. He moaned and one hand went to his crotch.

Disgusted, I moved the spinning blade, bringing it down toward his groin. “Keep it up and that’ll be the first to go,” I said, slicing into the material of his pants.

He squealed, falling back into his seat and his mood changed to crying again. “Okay, I’m sorry. Please, just let me go. I won’t hurt another girl ever again.”

I cut into his thigh. “I don’t believe you,” I said, watching a red line of blood appear. The sight of it set something off in me and memories of the game the other trainees and I had played with the menial demons sprang to mind. “Rat,” I said, looking him square in the eyes. He still wasn’t sorry, I knew it. But he would be. “Why don’t you tell me how this feels?” I angled the blade on his biceps, slicing through his shirt and skin in a quick nip before pulling back.

He screamed. Blood formed a line along the pink sleeve of his shirt and then began to spread. He tried to push me away with his broken wrist, but it was useless. I cut lines all the way down his arm, enjoying the red blood beading along his skin. “This is fun,” I said, meeting his gaze. There was fear in his eyes now and that egged me on. “Is this how you started with the girls?”

“No,” he sobbed, tears covering his face.

“I think it is.” I made several more cuts. Two along his neck and a couple on each of his thighs. Blood was everywhere now, and my anger changed. I knew it because the red glow on my skin had been replaced with a golden hue.

Greed, I thought, watching it grow stronger.

Pasty continued to cry, but I barely heard him. All I could focus on was the blood—the color and the smell—and I wanted more. This time I moved the blade to his stomach, wanting to see what his insides looked like. The need swirled through me, dark. Darker than anything I’d ever felt before.

And then it was gone.

Replaced by something new, something warm and light and completely out of place with what I was used to experiencing. The hue on my skin changed as well. It became silvery white.

"You're glowing," the man said, his broken voice filled with pain but also awe.

A quick glance confirmed he was right. I was glowing. But my surprise was washed away by a tidal wave of guilt. An emotion I'd never experienced before. It caused my heart and body to physically hurt. "What is this?" Without wanting to, I tried to sit and stumbled over to another of Pasty's torture machines. Was the man's humanity rubbing off on me? That couldn't be it. He had none. Otherwise he wouldn't be torturing and murdering young women.

"I debated how far you would get."

I gasped as Kade appeared. "What are you doing here?" My guilt grew stronger and twisted to shame. "Go away," I said, turning so I could no longer see him as my cheeks blazed with heat.

Pasty's cries had become whimpers. "Help me. Please. She's crazy! I mean look at me, she's going to kill me!"

Kade ignored the man like he wasn't even there. "Listen, Alice," Kade said, resting a hand on my shoulder. "His mother has called the police. They are on their way. We need to go."

As disgraceful and guilty as I felt, I still didn't want to let Pasty live. "I get that, and I'll go, but first Pasty needs to die. He's as much of a demon as any I've killed and I can't let him hurt another human." I wasn't even sure why I felt such strong emotions for a dead girl I'd never met and the others I was sure he killed but I'd never seen.

"Yes, he does. But he's a human and must be punished according to human laws. They call it justice." He grimaced. Even he wasn't buying it.

"Human laws? Justice?" I shook my head at those words. How was it justice to let such a monster live? "I don't understand."

"It's…" He swallowed down whatever else he was going to say. "Come on. They're here. We need to leave." Kade took my arm, but I pulled away.

“Wait,” I said and walked over to Pasty. “He may get to live, but he will not get away with what he’s done.” I turned back on the machine and pressed the edge of the spinning blade into his cheek. “How many have you killed?”

He looked at me with burning wrath in his eyes. “Wouldn’t you like to know,” he spat.

“Alice,” Kade hissed, coming toward me.

I raised my hand to hold him back and heard a crash. A glance in his direction showed me that I’d somehow thrown Kade across the room. He landed with an audible grunt against a cabinet filled with different bottles and knives. I wanted to know how it’d happened, but first things first, I needed the police to know how many people Pasty had killed. So, I put aside my curiosity about what just happened and pressed the blade into his shoulder. “Tell me,” I yelled.

He screamed as the blade cut in.

Dark tendrils swirled through my belly, pushing away the silvery glow on my skin. The demon in me wanted more. It didn’t grow because this time I held it in check. I wouldn’t kill the man, but I would make sure he received human justice. I was half human after all.

“Five,” he said through clenched teeth.

I pulled the blade from him. I’d gone deep enough that I could see bone. The man panted with pain. “Five?” I verified.

“Yes. I slaughtered five sleazy, scheming sluts and loved every minute of it!” Spittle came from his mouth. “I promise, if I ever see you again, I’ll find a way to butcher you too.”

I smiled, reveling in his wrath, letting it wash over me. “You can try,” I said, slicing five, long ticks into his clean arm, deep enough that even when they healed there would still be scars.

The police were working to bust down the door leading into the basement.

Kade stood beside me, his hand outstretched, waiting. “You ready?”

“I suppose,” I nodded, taking his hand.

“Good,” he grunted, and we vanished from the room.

OceanofPDF.com

KADE and I were in a meadow blanketed with flowers. The petals were white, the centers yellowish orange. The flowers were hip high, and I ran my hands softly through them, enjoying the sweet scent and the feel of the petals against my fingers.

Kade watched me but didn't say anything. I guessed because he was disappointed by what I'd almost done. But I was feeling rather content. I could've killed that human. Had I been a human, I had no doubt the police would've justified my reasoning. Pasty had tried to kill me, and they would've seen his death as self-defense. But the scum wasn't dead. And according to Kade that was a very good thing.

I didn't understand why. Was killing a human worse than killing a demon, even if the human acted demonic? I guessed the answer was yes. But I felt the reason had less to do with the evil man and more to do with what would happen to me—my humanity—if I killed him. I didn't know and Kade wouldn't tell me. He was busy… thinking or whatever the hell he was doing.

So I ambled through the flowers, taking a moment to ponder what'd happened. I'd almost killed a man. Not a demon, though he acted like one, but a human being. And suddenly my pride over the matter turned to shame and I began to shake. Because there was still a part of me that craved more, that wanted to go back and finish what I'd started. It wouldn't be that hard to track him. If he'd been arrested, I could go into the police department and… what?

I ripped at a handful of flowers, tearing off the petals and wishing they were Pasty. A silvery warmth trickled down my spine and through my fingers. As before, something happened. The consuming darkness turned to light. I had no idea where it was coming from or why it was happening. As half a demon or more accurately, the spawn of the Devil himself, it made sense that I would side with the dark, with those things that went bump in the night. I'd believed myself in accordance with the demonic part of my heritage. I figured I had to be. But that didn't change the other—new—part of me. Light. It had emanated from me in Pasty's basement as it was now. There was so much more to what was happening though. Beyond the light was a feeling. One I hadn't experienced before, and while it wasn't bad, it was weird, and foreign, and difficult to comprehend.

The second trial, my mind said, trying to answer my own questions. And I thought that must be it. The second trial was supposed to be all about my emotions. I shook my head. Emotionally, I needed to come to terms with killing either my king or Kade and the Devil wanted me to suffer.

Thinking I had it right, I turned, my gaze locking in on Kade. He'd moved to the far edge of the forest and was facing the trees. Along the soft breeze came the sound of his voice. Was he talking to himself? It sounded like it, which made me smile. He isn't perfect, I thought, but I didn't believe it. Even when he'd been lying on Heathcliff's hospital bed after the demon attack, even writhing in pain, he'd still been beautiful.

The phone in my boot rang. I took it from its resting place, opened it, and answered. "Hello?"

"Alice? This is Professor Pops. I'm in Wonderland at a place called The Habit. It's a restaurant near the corner of Tweedledee and Tweedledumb." His voice was filled with mirth at the name. "Do you know where that is?"

I thought it might be the same restaurant I'd been in when I met Pasty. His calling from there couldn't be a coincidence, but how had he known? "I'm pretty sure I do."

"Okay. Good. If not, I can meet you elsewhere, just let me know."

I appreciated his willingness to be accommodating. "It's fine. I'll be there as soon as I can." Kade would help me find the place. I was sure of that.

“You’re all right? The last time we spoke, you were in a predicament and you ended our call rather abruptly.” His worry for me came through loud and clear.

“Yes, I’m fine. Thanks. Thank you. I’ll see you in a bit.” No sense oversharing with a complete stranger my abduction and subsequent desire to murder a human.

“I’ll be here.”

“See you soon,” I said and hung up, readjusting the pack hanging from my shoulders. Kade had gone back for it when I explained I needed the journal. He hadn’t been thrilled and had put up a fight because the police were everywhere, but he’d done it anyway.

Kade paced back and forth, his hands on his hips. I tilted my head, trying to listen to what he was saying, but couldn’t make it out. “Kade,” I shouted across the field. “I need to go.”

“Go where?” He practically glided over to me, his face gloriously handsome, but stern as well. He didn’t want to let me out of his sight.

I sighed, knowing I needed to tell him my plan but unable to fathom where to start. Wrapping my fingers around the straps of the pack for support, I cleared my throat, pushing down the lust burning in my belly, and tried. “Listen, I know we need to talk about the… situation with the Devil… and what happened with Pasty in that basement, but I need to meet someone.”

“No, you’re going to stay right here. I’m working on a way to get us out of this situation. The Devil didn’t have the right to do what he did. The Trials shouldn’t involve the lives of others, and definitely not the death of others. It’s wrong in every sense of the word. And my…” He paused, running a hand through his hair. “There are… those who are working to get this reversed and get you out of the Trials.”

Was it possible? I doubted it. Otherwise my father wouldn’t have allowed Kade to be one of my two choices. Unless he was just that arrogant, I thought.

I took a small step forward, closing the distance between us. “I appreciate your willingness to help, but I have to do this. It's important to me."

He threw his hands in the air. Frustration rolled off him in waves. "Is there anything I can do to change your mind?"

"No, so let me give you the quick version of my plan, and then you can come with me or find me later and let me know how things are going on your end." I wanted him to come with me, but I also knew no matter where I went, he would be able to find me. He always had in the past. I wondered if he was some sort of tracker.

"We definitely need to talk more about the Trials as well as what happened in the basement where you threw me across the room." He rolled his eyes, but I sensed there was more. "Or maybe we'll discuss how you almost killed a man for the fun of it."

My face turned red. "Yeah, I guess all of it. But you saw yourself I didn't kill him. I resisted."

Kade made a face. "Barely." He studied me, seeming to look right into my soul. "Tell me who you're going to see."

I told him about Professor Pops and explained my plan. He listened with interest but remained silent until I finished.

"So that's my plan," I said, looking away.

He didn't respond. I tried to be patient, hoping he'd say something. Feeling less than kick ass, I watched a ladybug land on a flower before flying away. When I couldn't stand the silence any longer, I looked up. "Can you take me to him?" I asked.

"You're determined to do this, aren't you?" He crossed his arms, studying me.

"I've got to do something," I said, curious about the time of day. It'd been night when I left with Pasty. "Tell me, has it been a whole day since the Devil introduced the second trial?" I leaned into him. Lust built, a wild hunger for the man in front of me.

"Yes," he said, his body responding to mine. Then he took a deep breath. “All right. I won’t stop you.” He tilted his chin up, looking down his nose at me. “But you need to be prepared for what’s going to happen in six days if none of us can find a way out of this.” He wrapped his arms around me. “I won’t hold it against you if you decide not to choose me. Wrythe is your king.” His voice was barely above a whisper and the look on his face caused my thighs to quiver. So close, his cinnamon scent left me feeling heady, like he was a drug. Just being near him got me high.

And while I appreciated his sweet declaration, it filled me with dread. I couldn’t choose between them! I didn’t want to and refused to consider either of them as a logical choice. Ignoring his comment, I changed the subject. “What happened to you the other night?” I shook my head, trying again, curious about why he’d been taken from me while we were kissing. “Why did you disappear the way you did?”

He looked away, staring at something I couldn’t see. “It was my superiors. They won’t allow what we almost did to happen. No matter what.”

My head buzzed. “Tell me who they are—who you are.”

“I will,” he promised.

“Now?” I asked, surprised by his sudden willingness to share.

He shook his head, a lopsided smile on his lips. I wanted to kiss him and have him kiss me until my lips were swollen, but I was also frustrated with his refusal to give me a straight answer.

“You’re beautiful,” he said, completely throwing me off balance and putting my questions about him from my mind.

My cheeks warmed, and I pulled my gaze from his lips to find his eyes. “Thank you. You’re not so bad yourself.” The look on his face caused my breath to hitch. He wanted me. I could see it. Feel it even. “Okay, actually you’re devastatingly handsome.”

Kade pulled me against him. “Devastatingly?” He trailed his thumb down my cheek before pushing some stray hair behind my ear.

Tingles covered my body. “Yes,” I breathed, watching him, praying his superiors didn't take him away from me again. Not yet. That first night we kissed flashed into my mind. But then he'd pushed me away, saying we couldn't be together. Yet here we were. Together. What had changed? Did he not care about the consequences? Was he lying? Or was it something else? I wanted to know the answers to those questions but not more than I wanted to kiss him. Tilting my head, I waited only a moment until his lips found mine, caressing eagerly. My body's response was immediate. He did something to me. No doubt about it. I ached for him.

Forgetting everything else, I moaned, running my nails down his back, pulling him closer. He responded by pushing my mouth open and deepening the kiss, his hands stroking my hair, my shoulders, and along my waist.

Like before, I felt our bodies fuse, become one. There was no telling where I ended and he began. Within, I saw or felt—it was hard to tell—but a silvery white light licked through my body, like a serpent, it slithered along my veins filling me with… what? Hunger? Greed? No. It wasn't one of the seven deadly sins. It was light and beauty and warmth and… happiness. I would be fine if I never ate, never slept, never did anything else but kiss Kade.

He became my breath and the beat of my heart. I thought if he pulled away from me, I would die. That knowledge should've scared me. But it didn't. It made me crave him all the more.

With great effort, his lips released mine. "As much as I'd love to stay and do this forever, Professor Pops is waiting," he said, kissing me lightly, his hands tangling in my hair.

"What?" I'd forgotten. His touch, his closeness had sent all logic from my mind. I shook my head, working to clear it. "Right," I said, trying not to show how affected I was by the loss of his mouth on mine.

He smirked, kissing my forehead. "Talk to Professor Pops. I'll come to you tonight. Maybe we can do more of this."

“Promise?” I asked. The idea of seeing him again tonight sent chills though my lower belly.

“Yes, Alice. I promise.” He took my hand, intertwining our fingers. There was a light pop and we were no longer in the meadow but beside a dumpster behind an alley. The scent of rotting trash tinged my nose while the Arizona heat stung my flesh.

Back to reality, I thought.

Kade touched my cheek. “He’s inside,” he said, his eyes lingering on my mouth.

I almost grabbed him and kissed him again, despite our location. It was definitely the same restaurant I’d been at when I met Pasty. “Okay,” I said, heaving a giant breath. “Will you come in with me?”

“It’s better if I don’t,” Kade said.

“Why? Do you know Professor Pops? Do you like him?” I hoped I liked him, but beyond that, I thought all supernatural creatures knew each other.

“I know of him. From all I’ve heard, he’s a good man. But I think it would be better that you meet him alone.”

“I guess.” I wasn’t convinced.

“Look, Alice, I know you’ve been through a lot lately, but you need to understand you’re about to step into a world that can be overwhelming.” His smile disarmed me. “It doesn’t matter that you’re the Devil’s daughter, you’re still innocent when it comes to all of this. You’ve been schooled and trained in how to slay demons, but there’s so much more to the supernatural world than what you’ve been taught. One step at a time, okay?”

A wave of nervousness washed through me. “I guess that makes sense. But how will I know who he is?”

“Listen in here,” he touched his forefinger to my temple. “And here,” he added, resting his palm against my chest where my heart thumped. “You’ll be able to sense him easily. And if you can’t, then one look and you'll be able to see he's different than everyone else in that restaurant." He paused, studying me. "It's true most of us only see what we want to see."

"If you say so." I turned to make my way to the door, but Kade took hold of my hand and pulled me back to him, kissing me soundly on the mouth.

"You'll be fine. Trust me, I wouldn't let you go in there if I believed otherwise." He caressed my cheek.

I relaxed, knowing he was right. "See you tonight," I said, catching his gaze and holding it.

"Yes, you will." He released my hand and vanished.

I felt empty when he was gone, but also resolute. I needed Professor Pops' help. I adjusted my clothes and combed through my hair with my fingers, hoping I looked presentable. At the entrance to the fast food joint, I pulled open the door and searched the cool interior of the restaurant for a man who was as kind as his voice and looked like a professor.

Kade had been right. Professor Pops was easy to spot. The man looked young and old at the same time, which I knew made no sense. His hair was graying at the temples and there were wrinkles at the corners of his eyes and near his mouth, but he held an air of youthfulness that drew people to him. A woman who'd just received her food noticed the professor and walked over, but before she got close, he raised his eyes. They tore into her with a ferociousness that I couldn't comprehend. The woman turned and bolted for a seat as far from him as possible.

That intrigued me. He wore a navy blue sweater even though it was over a hundred degrees outside. A newspaper lay open in front of him and he read it, with a black pair of reading glasses on the end of his nose. And even though all of those things screamed "old guy" there was something… young… no, immortal about the man. That was what I felt. Somehow this man was an immortal, but not a demon. He wasn't like the demon sires I'd slayed. They were immortal in the sense that they couldn't be killed unless it was by a Dark Moth like me. Many of them had been thousands of years old before I'd come along and ended them. Yet while I sensed danger in him, there wasn't an ounce of evil.

Timelessness, I thought. That was what I got from Professor Pops.

I hesitated a moment.

Professor Pops glanced over and seeing me, he smiled kindly. "Alice?" he mouthed.

I nodded.

He indicated I should come and sit down.

I slid into the booth seat, resting my backpack beside me. So close, his immortality weighed over me. "Are you Professor Pops?"

"I am," he said, folding the paper and tucking it on the far end of the table. "Should we get out of here? Or are you hungry?"

"Um," I hesitated. I didn't know this man and while Heathcliff trusted him, I still worried. "I'm not hungry, but where will we go?"

"I thought I'd take you to my home in Salem, Massachusetts."

"How?" I asked, completely baffled. I knew Arizona was across the country from Massachusetts.

"We'll fly, of course." His eyes twinkled at my question.

"We will?" I didn't know whether he could travel the same way as Kade or not? And then it dawned on me. If Kade were a Dark Moth like me, then that meant I had the power to pop in and out the way he did. If he weren't a Moth, which I doubted he was, then was Professor Pops like Kade? Could he pop in and out of places? My head hurt.

"We'll fly in an airplane," he said and smiled kindly.

"A plane?" I repeated. The idea of flying in a giant metal contraption didn't fill me with joy.

"Yes, I've reserved two tickets." He glanced at his watch. "And we should get going. The plane leaves in an hour."

“I… okay.” I studied him a moment, surprised.

He winked before giving me a large grin. “What, did you think we’d fly on the back of a dragon?”

My mouth fell open. “Is that even possible?”

“Anything is possible, Alice.” He touched the side of his nose. “Just you wait.” And without another word, he walked out of the restaurant.

I followed close behind as a flash of the last time I’d walked out of this restaurant came to mind. Pasty. I wondered if he was suffering in jail by now. I hoped so.

OceanofPDF.com

ON THE DRIVE and then the flight, I told Professor Pops about myself. All of it. Every last sordid detail, including the horrible fact that I was the Devil's daughter. I expected him to be shocked or disgusted by the news, but he only seemed interested. Never once did he give any indication he thought I was a horrible person. He asked questions occasionally, but mostly listened. When I finished telling him about myself, I told him about the Trials, and even a little about Kade.

Once we landed in Massachusetts, a car picked us up and drove us to his home in Salem. It was dark, but I was still able to see his place. My jaw dropped as we pulled into the drive. This was more than a home; it was like a small city. The mansion and surrounding yard sprawled across the expanse of several acres. It was beautiful, like something out of the fairytales I'd read as a child. I expected there to be a drawbridge, a moat, and a princess hanging out of the tallest window, begging to be rescued. Inside, he showed me to the kitchen, telling me I could help myself whenever I was hungry. Then he walked me upstairs and indicated the room I'd be staying in.

Decorated in deep reds and golds, it appeared to be freshly remodeled and included its own bathroom done in white and gold. "Why don't you get some rest and we can talk in the morning?" He took hold of the doorknob and stepped into the hall.

I liked the sound of that. It felt like I'd been up for days and technically I had. "Sounds amazing," I said, placing my backpack on the bed.

He started to leave, but I called after him. "Professor Pops?" Over the course of our trip, my embarrassment at calling him by such a name had lessened, but only slightly.

"Yes, Alice?" His kind eyes crinkled along the edges giving his elderly appearance more levity. But I still wasn't buying it. The way he moved made me believe he was around my age and I wondered at the disguise.

"You don't think Heathcliff will tell Wrythe or the others where I am, do you?" I opened my pack.

"Definitely not," he said. "I'll see you in the morning. Relax and know you are safe."

"Thank you," I said as he closed the door. Feeling numb, I changed, and fell into bed, asleep before my head fully hit the pillow.

THE NEXT MORNING, I woke with a start. Dreams of Kade and Wrythe made my sleep restless, but I felt better regardless. Getting out of bed, I went to the window. Pulling back the thick drapes, I checked out the backyard (if you could call it that). It went on as far as the eye could see. Green grass, a tennis court, a putting green, and who knew what else. "Who is this guy?" I wondered aloud.

I left the curtains open, allowing the morning light to shine in. It was nice to feel the warm rays on my skin after so many years without sunlight. Deep below Wonderland, there'd been no windows, but as half demons we didn't need sunshine to survive.

I lifted my hand, allowing the light to warm it and then it occurred to me that it was daytime. Which meant another day had passed, and the worry hit me hard. Only five more days, I thought, feeling panicky. "No!" I shoved the thought aside, focusing on Professor Pops. I knew Heathcliff trusted him, but it felt wrong to do the same until I knew more about him. Promising myself I'd stay sharp, I showered before changing into clean clothes. After a while, hunger pangs drove me from the room and down to the kitchen. Chocolate cupcakes covered in frosting and topped with a shiny, round chocolate sat in the middle of an island, begging to be eaten. But they looked too beautiful, resting on their own silver tray. It reminded me of a festive tree created for a party. Curiosity about what Professor Pops might be celebrating had me distracted.

At the fridge, I found an apple and bit into it. “Mmmm,” I said, heading over to the French doors off the kitchen. A gray cat sat on the back patio, facing the yard, its tail flicking back and forth. He turned and meandered over, raising a paw like he wanted to be let in.

A smile formed on my lips. I couldn’t help it. The cat was plain gray but adorably fluffy. I decided I could use some fluff in my life and opened the door. “Hi kitty-kitty.” I squatted to pet him.

The cat didn’t move, just continued to stare, his head tilted to one side as I scratched his ear.

Professor Pops walked in. He’d changed his clothes. His navy blue sweater was now tan, but he still wore slacks, a button up shirt, and his reading glasses were tucked in the sweater pocket. “The cat isn’t allowed in the house,” he said, his tone light.

“Sorry about that.” I shooed the cat back outside and closed the door. “Your cat is so cute.”

Professor Pops chuckled. “Gatsby is not my cat. If he’s anyone’s cat, he’s Snow White’s. But really he’s just a nuisance.”

I’d seen the name Snow White in Heathcliff’s journal. “I’ve heard of her. Do you know her?”

“Indeed. I know her well. She’s my daughter-in-law.” He walked around the kitchen island and went to the French doors, opening the same side I had a moment before. Leaving the door open, he walked past the cat and waved for me to join him. “Come and sit out on the patio with me a while and let’s talk,” he said, indicating one of the chairs.

“Thanks.” I followed him out after closing the door. “Have you found anything about getting me out of the Trials?” It had only been a few hours since we got to his home and I was probably overstepping and not having patience, but urgency drove me. I sat in the chair next to him. Gatsby jumped up on the chair across from us, turned in a circle a few times and then lay down, his eyes focused on me.

Professor Pops nodded. “Actually yes, I believe I did.”

Joy leapt into my heart. “That’s fantastic,” I said, watching him.

His strange eyes found mine and held my gaze. “Maybe,” he replied.

“What are you?” I asked, hoping that didn’t sound too forward.

“That is an intriguing question,” he answered and then chuckled. “My real name is Adam Henry. I was born in the Middle Ages and…”

I sat up, surprised I hadn’t put two and two together. “You’re Heathcliff’s dad! He told me about you. Well, at least that you fell in love and that…” I paused as understanding filled my breast. “You’re a vampire,” I breathed, leaning forward, thinking that had to be why he seemed so timeless.

He chuckled lightly. “That’s right.”

“You’ve been alive more than five hundred years.” That amount of time shocked and amazed me, even though I’d learned from the time I was a child that Moths could live for a very long time too. The problem was most didn’t. They were killed right after their eighteenth birthdays, slaughtered by their demon sire.

Dark Moths weren’t much better. If we didn’t die right away, we were sure to die a whole lot sooner than humans while fighting one of the demons. It was part of the job. Wrythe was the oldest living Dark Moth—at least as far as I knew.

“Yes, it’s been a while,” Professor Pops went on. “But my longevity has allowed me to study, research, and educate myself on all things supernatural, including demons, though I didn’t spend much time on them.” He sat back, crossing one leg over his knee. “Not because I didn’t find them interesting, but because I learned early on about the Dark Moths and their destiny to protect their own kind. They keep out of the limelight for the most part and don’t mix with others, including humans unless…” He let his voice trail off, uncomfortable.

For good reason too. No one liked to discuss why a Dark Moth might be around a human—specifically a female. But the reason was simple. Where the virginal human females were, there would be a demon close by, looking to bed her and impregnate her. Of course, these days, virgins were becoming harder and harder to find. At least according to Peter. The demons were branching out. “Lowering their standards,” he’d said darkly, his voice filled with sarcasm.

Professor Pops went on, “So, I haven’t had much of a chance to get to know any Dark Moths personally.” He tilted his head back. “Of course, Heathcliff shares a little, but not a lot.”

“But you’ve heard of the Trial of Three?” I asked, focusing my thoughts on the task in front of me.

“I have, and last night I took the opportunity to refresh my memory.” He shook his head. “The Trials aren’t often used and the few times they are, the participants wind up dead or deranged.” He crossed his arms, letting his words sink in. “I appreciate the Dark Moth Society and Wrythe wanted to discover who sired you, but I’m surprised they agreed to put you through the Trials. They had to know the serious consequences behind their decision.”

I shrugged because even though Wrythe was the king and he had final say, there were also six other council members. But it’d been more than that. “The reason he allowed me to enter the Trials was because I volunteered and wouldn’t take no for an answer.”

Professor Pops leaned back. “So, you’re the Devil’s daughter and you’re stubborn as well?” He leaned back, steepling his fingers.

“Pretty much,” I said, finishing off my apple. Professor Pops’ statistics weren’t encouraging. “At the time, I didn’t know I could end up dead either.” I got up and threw away the apple core in the trash before returning to my chair and sitting, crossing my legs. “But you found a way out for me?” That would be the best news. If I didn’t have to choose between Kade, Wrythe, or all of the Moths.

Professor Pops patted my arm. “I have.” He nodded intently. “If there’s one thing I’ve learned over my many years, it’s that nothing is unbreakable, not even the Trial of Three,” he said with a grim expression, though he kept his tone bright.

“Really, not even death?” I thought of my mother, whoever she was. Could she be brought back to life? Strange that my mind went to her.

“Correct, in some cases. There are times of course where death is better than the alternative, but it’s possible.” He leaned back in his chair, looking up.

The sky was blue as my eyes. Birds twittered happily, busily going about their day. For some reason their happy song irritated me. My fingers dug into the armrest and I took a deep breath. “What do I need to do?” I was beyond grateful for Professor Pops and Heathcliff. Without them, I would’ve been in a much more difficult position.

“As far as I can tell, you have to convince each of the seven on the Dark Moth council to rescind their decision to allow you to participate in the Trial of Three.” His voice was conversational, like that was possible.

I uncrossed my legs and tucked them under my butt. It sounded easy enough, but I knew better. It wouldn’t be. Not with the others and especially Lily working against me. That woman didn’t seem to want anything but my demise. Convincing her would be difficult. Wrythe would rescind as would Peter, I felt sure of them. But the others? They seemed to be on Lily’s side. “If I can convince them, then it’ll be over?” I was unsure.

“Mostly,” he said, lacing his fingers and laying his hands across his stomach. “But, there’s one more item.”

I let the last part of his sentence linger a moment, focusing on the good news. There was a chance, though it was slim. “What is it?” I asked, as all hope melted away.

“Well,” he scratched at his chin. “As far as I can tell, you’ll also have to convince the Devil to agree to release you from the Trial of Three, too.”

I leapt to my feet, throwing my hands up and pacing like a woman on fire. That was impossible. “Then there is no hope. He won’t do that. I mean why would he? The whole reason he created me was to torture me." My demon power sprang to life, a brilliant red that danced along my skin as a harsh laugh burst from my chest.

Professor Pops stood as well. "You okay?" He studied me without fear, as though mesmerized.

I glanced down at myself. "What, you've never seen a half demon's skin glow different colors based on how she's feeling? Red means I'm angry, in case you were wondering," I snapped and then bit down on the inside of my cheek, working to calm down. "Sorry," I said, feeling ashamed.

"No, I haven't." He considered me a moment longer before going to the door that led back into the house. "And no worries. You're truly extraordinary, Alice."

"Where are you going?" I worried I'd scared him off even though he didn't act like it.

"It's okay. I'll be right back." He went inside and I went back to my seat, falling into the chair with a huff.

"Sure," I said, watching Gatsby. He'd opened his eyes at my outburst and was studying me like I was a mouse. "What are you looking at?" I spoke through clenched teeth, the wrath I felt still too close to the surface.

The cat yawned, flashing all of his sharp, white teeth in a smile before lifting a paw and grooming himself.

"That's what I thought," I growled, causing the red shine to flicker brighter. Seeing myself like that only increased my anger.

Several minutes passed while I sat fretting, wringing my hands, until Professor Pops returned, an old book lying open in his hands.

"I think your parentage is the reason you're glowing red or glowing at all." He looked at me, fascinated. "Since the Devil is the king over all demons, it would make sense that he possesses all seven of the deadly sins' powers. And since you're his daughter, you possess them as well."

I knew that already.

He went on, “It says here that when the Power of Seven is used, its connecting color will manifest. Have you seen all of the colors?” He tapped the book when he finished speaking.

“Pretty much,” I said. “As well as another color. Silver, too.”

“Silver you say?” He turned the page in his book, then flipped another and another.

“A silvery white,” I added. “Almost like a light has turned on under my skin. What do you think that represents?”

“Fascinating,” he said, closing his book. “There is nothing about that color manifesting in the Devil. I have a theory, but I’m not sure. I’ll keep digging.”

That he didn’t know worried me. I took a deep breath, though my heart raced. “Okay,” I said. Another breath. “Thank you,” I said, my voice ragged.

Professor Pops looked over at me. “Don’t panic. It’ll all work out.”

I wanted to believe him. I did, but the dread rose along with the anger, which manifested red on my skin.

Professor Pops touched my arm, flinching a moment, but not letting go. “You’re safe, Alice. Breathe in and out. It’s going to be all right. We’ll figure things out together. I promise.”

OceanofPDF.com

I APPRECIATED Professor Pops and his words very much. “I… I just.” My head pounded loudly. All I could hear was the thudding beat of my heart as blood moved through my veins. I wondered if I might die —if something like that had ever happened to a Dark Moth trainee before.

“You can to this. Relax. Breathe.” Professor Pops’ words were in the background and meant to be comforting.

But the rage still blistered and bubbled in me until I thought it would consume me. I closed my eyes, ready to give in. At that moment, I felt the soothing balm I’d experienced twice before rush along my veins and sinews, extinguishing the rage. Slow and steady it leeched away the red glow, replacing it with the silvery white light I didn’t understand. With that light came hope and warmth. The prickling wrath became softness and peace.

Professor Pops shook his head. “That’s amazing. Quite lovely, too.” He opened his book again, but didn’t look at the pages. “It’s strange because the white light doesn’t represent any of the seven deadly sins. In fact, it almost looks…” His voice trailed off, but before I could demand he finish his sentence, he continued. “I might actually know where to begin searching for an answer. There’s got to be a reason for what’s happening to you. There always is.” He set the book on the table to the right of his chair.

“I’d appreciate knowing whatever you can find.” The swift change had left me feeling less than in control. What was happening to me?

“I was thinking, it might do you some good to get a quick win,” Professor Pops said. “The first step in rectifying your situation might be to call Wrythe, tell him what’s been discovered about the Trials. If he’s the first to rescind his agreement of your participation in the them, then perhaps he will speak to the others about doing the same.”

He gave me a wry smile. “It’s possible this whole thing might all be over in twenty-four hours.” He spoke the words, but I sensed it wouldn’t be that easy. It never was, though I really wanted it to be.

But if I could get all the Society members to withdraw their agreement in my participation, if I told them it was possible to end the Trials, it made sense they would want that. When I’d listened in on the conversation between Wrythe and the other Society members, they worried I would choose to have Wrythe die…

“When they all agree, then you can talk to your father,” Professor Pops continued, before pausing, his eyes drifting over to Gatsby.

He was right. I would focus on speaking with Wrythe and getting the council to rescind. That win would be nice and a step in the right direction. A quick check of my boot for my phone revealed I’d left it up on the bed, next to my backpack. “That’s a great idea. Mind if I use your phone?”

He pulled his cell from his pocket and handed it to me. “Not at all.”

I dialed Wrythe’s number.

He answered on the first ring. “Who is this? And why do you have my personal number?” he asked in a growl.

“Wrythe?” Relief flooded through me at hearing his voice. “It’s me. It’s Alice,” I said, just in case he didn’t know. He’d given me his number when I started battling the royal demons. He’d felt it prudent in case we were somehow separated or something else went wrong. I was grateful for his decision. It’d served its purpose now.

“Alice, are you all right?” His anger was replaced with relief and that encouraged me. “I’ve been worried about you.”

“I’m fine.” I stood and walked to the other end of the large patio, wanting privacy.

“Good to hear. You made it someplace safe, then?” His voice was quiet and I guessed he might be with others.

“Yes.” I debated telling him where I was, but the conversation I’d overheard between him and the other Society members came out instead. “I was there, Wrythe. I heard what you, Peter, Lily and the others were talking about in your office.”

“I figured,” Wrythe said, sighing heavily. “I’m so sorry you had to hear that. But you have to know I would never let them hurt you. That’s why I gave you the Demon Orb. You have it I presume?”

I’d forgotten all about the orb. In fact, I’d left it in the back pocket of my other pants. “I’ll be right back,” I mouthed to Professor Pops and quickly jogged through the kitchen, upstairs, and into the bedroom. Thankfully, my pants were still on the floor in the bathroom.

“Alice? Are you still there?” Wrythe asked.

“Yes. I—” I picked up my pants, checking the back pocket. The piece of folded paper I’d put in there fell out as I removed the orb. I studied it a moment before refocusing on Wrythe and our conversation. “It’s here,” I said, relieved. “I’ve got it.” I held it up to the light, giving it a quick glance. The orb was unassuming and appeared to be nothing more than a black pebble or a marble. “What does it do?”

“It will—” His words were cut short by a loud boom followed by muffled noises.

“Wrythe?” It sounded like he struggled with something until I heard him moan followed by more stifling blows combined with shouting and cursing. “Wrythe!” I shouted.

“Not anymore, Alice.”

I knew from those three words exactly who was on the other end of the line. Lily. But why?

She went on. “Wrythe is indisposed right now.” She laughed, her voice full and lusty, and my heart turned to ice. Something wasn’t right.

“Is Wrythe okay?” I asked as I went to the edge of the bed and sat, a sick feeling punching me in the guts.

“He’s fine. For now. We’re just going to keep him chained up for you until you choose for him to die in the second trial. That way, you’ll move on to your third trial, which will kill you, and the rest of the council can get on with their lives.”

So, Professor Pops had been right about the success rate of those who’d entered the Trials in the past.

Lily was still talking. “Apparently, if the second trial doesn’t kill you, the third one will for sure.”

I wanted to reach through the phone and rip her heart out. At my thoughts, the red glow of Wrath returned to my skin, but I didn’t mind. I embraced it like an old friend. “Lily, I swear, if you hurt him, I’ll…”

“You’ll what?” she laughed. “You’re a child, Alice. Do the Society a favor and pick Wrythe to die. We all know you like that boy. Kade isn’t it? Choose him and then never return to the compound. If you do that, and somehow make it through the Trials, I promise, we’ll let you live in peace.”

Unable to sit still, I went to the window, my gaze searching the orange sky. It looked like it was on fire. “I thought you and Wrythe were friends,” I began. Lily started to answer, but I hurried on. “Besides, I may have found a way to reverse the Trials so I can save both Wrythe and Kade.”

“There isn’t a way out, Alice. Choose Wrythe. It’ll save him a lot of agony. If you don’t, we’ll torture him until he’s revealed all we want to know about the Society and then we’ll kill him anyway.”

I couldn’t help but notice the similarities between the Dark Moth on the phone and the demon who’d sired her. This was the game the demons played, not us. We were supposed to be the good guys. Better than our sires. And better even than the Moths we protected. Our training and teachings were supposed to help us become warriors, champions for those who couldn’t stand up to evil themselves.

“Lily, please. Withdraw your decision that I do the Trials. Tell the others to do the same. Then it can all be over, and we can figure the rest out.” My pleading tone took me by surprise. I fell to my knees at the overwhelming shock of her betrayal. “I heard you say you wanted me killed so that Wrythe could live. You said the Dark Moths couldn’t survive without him. Why are you doing this?” My naiveite filled me up with confusion. She wasn’t making sense.

“I was lying stupid girl.” She sniffed. “I only said what he wanted to hear. Nothing more.”

“But I can fix this. All we have to do is get all seven of the council to reverse their decision to let me participate in the Trials…” I paused, deciding it wasn’t a good idea to mention the other, more difficult part. “Then everything can go back to normal. I won’t have to choose at all.” I’d said this already, but was desperate to believe she hadn’t heard me correctly the first time.

“Like I said, that isn’t going to work, Alice. I want him to die. Wrythe is too soft, too kind. His leadership reflects cowardice, not courage. He sealed his fate when he chose not to kill you after you told us you were the Devil’s daughter. You aren’t even a Dark Moth. You are evil incarnate and should be destroyed.” She heaved a deep breath. “But as the new queen of the Dark Moth Society, I will keep my promise to the Moths. Choose Wrythe as the one to die and stay away from us and I won’t kill you.”

I found her calling me evil ironic but didn’t mention that. My focus changed from desperate pleadings to resolute determination. “I won’t allow you to kill Wrythe.”

“If you don’t choose Wrythe, we will have no choice but to kill your trainee friends,” she snapped.

My stomach churned. Everything was a mess. Everybody wanted to kill everybody. What. The. Hell? “Lily. No. How can you do this?” My heart raged at the thought of the other trainees in danger again. The Society were supposed to be our protectors, the compound our safe haven.

“We won’t do it, not if you do your part. And be warned, the majority of the council supports this decision. Peter will join us or receive Wrythe’s fate as well.”

This couldn’t be happening. “I don’t understand,” I whispered, hot, angry tears welling against my closed lids.

“Why am I not surprised, Alice? You’re a simpering girl. But let me make it clear. I will be Queen of the Dark Moths. And my first order of business will be to kill you if you ever show your face in this compound again. Is that precise enough for you?”

This can’t be happening, I thought, desperate to make this all go away.

“Alice?” Professor Pops was outside my door, knocking lightly. He came in, his features etched with concern.

I barely acknowledged him before turning back to the window. With one hand, I wiped at the tears. Crying wouldn’t do me any good. “Don’t do this, Lily or I’ll make you wish you’d never been born,” I seethed, my anger flaring brightly. My reflection in the window revealed someone scary. But I didn’t care. I’d make Lily pay for everything she’d done.

Lily started to respond, but I hung up. Probably not my finest move. I’d let my wrath get the better of me.

“I heard everything,” Professor Pops said without preface, wrapping his arm around me and leading me to a chair near the fireplace. “I’m guessing Lily was sired by a Lust Demon?”

“Yep,” I said bitterly, setting the phone on the coffee table. “She wants me to continue with the Trials and choose Wrythe.” I shook my head, still not quite able to believe it.

Professor Pops took the couch. He crossed one leg over the other, resting his head on a hand while he looked at me intently. “That is one option to consider, isn’t it?”

“No,” I shouted, rising and pacing. Though he was right. It was an option.

The professor smiled. “I didn’t think so but wanted to make sure.” He clasped his hands together, resting his elbows on his thighs.

“It’s just, now I don’t know what to do. I mean, Lily obviously won’t rescind her vote. She wants me to continue because she’s hoping Wrythe will die and that the Trials will kill me, and she isn’t alone. According to her, of the seven, five council members agree with her asinine idea.” I spoke harshly, desperate to believe it was just a dream and that I would wake up in a world where at least those I fought beside were all good. “It’s impossible,” I said, falling onto the couch on my side, and curled up in the fetal position.

Professor Pops didn’t say anything, and I closed my eyes. The room went silent except for the ticking clock on the fireplace mantle. I tried to steady by breathing to match the clock. Then I breathed in, skipping three ticks and breathed out for three ticks. In. Out. Perhaps I can go to sleep and then when I wake, this will all have been just a dream.

OceanofPDF.com

“Do you want me to let you sleep or do you want me to help you find a way to fight back?” Professor Pops finally asked, his voice soft but determined.

I blinked my eyes open, knowing my desires were pointless. Sometimes reality sucked. “This is really happening, isn’t it?” I pushed myself into a sitting position when all I wanted to do was disappear.

“I’m afraid so.” He went to the door. “Let’s eat,” he said, heading out into the hall.

“Fine, then yes,” I said, answering his question. “I would love it if you helped me find a way to fight back,” I said, following him down the hall. My stomach was in knots but lying around doing nothing wasn’t the answer. At least if I ate, I was nourishing my body for what lay ahead.

At the end of the hall, we went down the stairs. To my right was another hallway leading to the other side of the expansive mansion. I momentarily wondered what I would find in that direction but just as quickly pushed those thoughts aside. It didn’t matter unless it would help me in my pursuit. And if that were the case, then Professor Pops would show it to me.

We turned left, going past the front door and toward the kitchen.

If there was one thing my Dark Moth training had taught me over the years, it was to focus on the necessities and leave everything else behind. It was infuriating considering the situation I was currently in, but I finally understood the Society’s decision to keep us in the dark about the rest of the world. That knowledge pulled focus from what was most important, which was killing our demon sire and then serving the Society.

Still, if I were in charge, I would’ve done things the same way as Wrythe… except maybe with a few more trips to the surface. A few stories about the other supernatural creatures in the world. I believed sharing those little bits of normality would provide a whole lot of hope. And hope had been missing in the compound for too long.

When we reached the kitchen, my eyes landed on those same cupcakes and my mouth watered. I wanted to shove two in my mouth but resisted. I wouldn't let greed or gluttony get the better of me. I'd just gotten my emotions in check once again, my skin finally back to its natural color.

"How do you feel about steak?" Professor Pops asked, opening the fridge.

"I love it," I admitted, though I'd never eaten it before dinnertime. Still, I'd happily eat whatever he felt like cooking. Pulling my gaze from the sweets, and ignoring the chocolate smell that had found its way into my nose, I looked at Professor Pops. "What can I do to help?" I didn't want him to feel like he was serving me.

"Relax. Have a seat." He indicated one of the barstools under the bright white island.

"If you're sure?" I sat as he nodded.

"I am. Steak is my specialty and I'm happy to make it for you."

Obviously, the man had been told by Heathcliff that we trainees didn't do any of the cooking. He probably figured I'd be a mess and do more harm than good if I tried to help. He wasn't wrong. "Thanks." I watched as he took a cast iron pan and placed it on one of the gas burners before turning it on. The blue flame licked the bottom of the pan. He added butter and twirled the pan, coating the bottom before placing two cold steaks on its hot surface. They sizzled, sending a mouthwatering aroma my direction.

For the next several minutes, I watched, and he cooked, and when the steaks had a good sear, he used a hot pad and put the entire pan into the oven.

"I'm thinking a strawberry and spinach salad to go with it?"

"Sounds amazing." I clasped my hands together, admiring his efforts.

From the freezer, he took some slivered almonds and laid some on a cutting board. “Want to slice up the strawberries?” he asked, eyeing me warily.

“Absolutely.” I handled knives every day, so this shouldn’t be too hard. I went to the sink and washed my hands. He took another cutting board and placed some strawberries in a colander from the fridge beside it.

“These are from my garden,” he said, handing me a knife.

“They look divine,” I admitted, getting to work.

While I sliced, he put together the salad, adding the spinach, some feta cheese, and then mixing up a dressing with olive oil and orange juice in it.

“Add the strawberries when you’re finished,” he said, taking the steaks from the oven and ladling clarified butter over them. Using tongs, he placed both on a plate.

I added the strawberries to the salad.

“They look great,” he said, checking my work.

“Thank you.” I knew what he was trying to do. My situation was urgent, but these basic tasks allowed my mind to relax so I could take a moment to consider all that needed to be done.

“Would you like something to drink?”

“Some water would be fantastic,” I said, taking the cutting board over to the sink.

Professor Pops went to the fridge. “Why don’t you go sit down?”

“I can get us some plates,” I said, perusing the many cupboards lining the main wall.

“Not necessary.” He slid a water bottle across the counter. I opened my hand to catch it at the last second. “So, you’ve had a moment to rest your mind. Have any ideas come to mind?” He took a single plate from a cupboard and put one of the steaks on it. Then, using tongs, he stuck some of the strawberry salad beside it. The white plate against the dark steak and the beautiful greens painted a very appetizing picture.

"Not really," I admitted, wishing that wasn't true. But every scenario I could think of involved killing those I didn't want to kill.

"Well, if you don't know, then it really doesn't matter what you do," he said, filling another plate with the other steak and the rest of the salad.

I gave him a disgruntled look as I cut into my meat. But I knew he was right. After chewing a bite, I stabbed a strawberry, feta, spinach combo, mopping it in the dressing before sticking the large bite in my mouth. "This is so good," I said after swallowing. "You could give Cook a run for her money," I added, momentarily distracted by how delicious everything tasted. Gluttony, I thought, and leaned back against the chair.

"Thank you, Alice. Heathcliff has bragged about Cook too." He rested his arms on the counter, watching me.

I took another bite, my thoughts on what Professor Pops had said before. I did need to come up with something. The easiest way to save the trainees as well as Peter was to tell the Devil that Wrythe had to die. But if I did that, then Lily would take over the Dark Moths. I couldn't let that happen.

It was bad enough there had to be such a thing as the Dark Moths in the first place, but to have a power-hungry queen ruling a group of highly trained half demon warriors? It wouldn't end well. But could I sacrifice the lives of the trainees as well as Kade in order to save the only family I'd ever known? Neither option felt right and I voiced those concerns to Professor Pops.

"There may be a third option," he said when I finished talking.

"Oh?" I was getting full and there was still half a steak left.

"We fight Lily and the traitorous council members and take them down." Professor Pops leaned on the island; his food untouched.

I liked that idea, but there was still the second trial. “And then what? I will still have to choose between Kade and Wrythe. That won’t change.”

“I’ve discovered throughout the decades that ultimatums tend to cause many people to change their minds. If we fight and capture the council members, we’ll have leverage. Then we make them an offer they can’t refuse in exchange for their rescinding vote.” He raised an eyebrow, waiting for me to respond.

“What’s the offer they won’t they be able to refuse?” I asked, curious what the professor had in mind.

“Their lives, of course.” He stood, crossing his arms, and the gleam in his eyes reminded me that beneath the cultured façade he was still a centuries-old vampire.

Brutal but effective, I thought. “But if they die, then they can’t rescind their vote,” I said, thinking through his plan.

“True, but then you’re no worse off than you were before. This way, you have a chance to save as many lives as possible.”

“The idea has merit,” I said cutting another piece of meat. While I chewed, I absently took the demon orb from my pocket and twirled it between my fingers. After I swallowed, I voiced my concern. “The only thing I worry about is if we go in fighting, then there could be casualties, the trainees as well as the other Dark Moths living in the compound..”

“Agreed. We don’t want that. I know a way we can get in without the need for any casualties.” He gave me a look that told me he had a secret.

“Tell me.” I leaned forward, pushing my plate away and placing the orb on the counter.

His eyes caught hold of the pebble and went wide with surprise. That lasted for a moment before he turned his gaze on me. “Have you ever wondered how Heathcliff gets in and out of Demonland?”

The question took me by surprise. I hadn’t, but had assumed he came and went the same as everyone else. “The elevator? That’s the only way exit or entrance as far as I know.” Of course Kade popped in and out, but I didn’t think just anyone could do that.

Professor Pops gave me a conspiratorial smile. “There’s another way.” His eyes fell back to the demon orb.

I picked it up, palming it, wishing I hadn’t brought it from my pocket in the first place. “There is?” I asked, hoping he’d forget about it.

“Yes,” he said, taking some plastic wrap from a drawer to his left.

It seemed like a great idea except then what? At some point I would have to fight my way to Wrythe and also secure the council members. There was no way I could capture them all, not without other Dark Moths discovering what I was up to. Another thought occurred to me. Our fighting meant there was the possibility of Professor Pops getting hurt.

And that’s when it really hit me just what he was. A vampire. A blood drinker. “First, and this is a total channel change, why did you cook two steaks?”

“It’s for one of my sons,” he said, but didn’t elaborate, taking it over and putting it in the fridge.

“Oh.” I hadn’t fathomed there was anyone else home, though the mansion was big enough there could be a dozen more people in the house and I wouldn’t know it.

“And second?” Professor Pops asked when he returned.

“I don’t know anything about vampires, I mean not really,” I began. “And I get you’ve been alive a long time, but can a vampire be killed?” I switched the orb between my hands, hoping to use up some of my nervous energy. “Dark Moths are vicious fighters and I don’t want you getting hurt or worse.” I cleared my throat. “Heathcliff would never forgive me, and I couldn’t forgive myself either. I already have several other lives on my conscious. I don’t need another.”

Professor Pops cleared his throat and I could see that he was trying not to smile. “I appreciate your concern, Alice. I really do. You’re obviously a very thoughtful person.” He reached over and patted my hand. “I can promise you that I don’t die easily not to mention I’ve been fighting against evil supernatural creatures almost as long as I’ve been alive. I have plenty of training.” He smiled grimly. “In fact, I might be able to teach you a thing or two, if you let me.”

A sense of relief washed over me. “Then let’s make a plan and I’ll look forward to learning from you, Professor… uh, Adam… I mean, what should I call you?”

“Professor Pops is fine. Or Adam. Or Mr. Henry. Or Pops. Whatever you’re comfortable with.” He took my plate over to the sink.

“Thank you,” I said, and suddenly wondered if he craved my blood? Could he hear it pumping in my veins? I couldn’t ask him those things even though I really wanted to.

“What?” He gave me a genial look.

“I’ll call you…” My brain froze, flustered at the thought of him drinking blood. How would my half demon blood taste to him?

“Alice?” he questioned me, his features scrunching in kindly concern.

“Sorry, I’ll have to think about what to call you,” I said, feeling awkward.

“You do that.” He wiped down the counter. “Before we start planning, tell me about that marble-looking thing in your hand. What is it? What does it do?” He held out his free hand.

“Wrythe called it a demon orb,” I said, handing it to him. “That’s all I know. Before Wrythe could tell me more, Lily took the phone. Whatever it is, I can feel its power.”

“Me too.” He pulled his reading glasses from his pocket, putting them on so he could look at it closely. “Tell me something, when you use your power, how does it work? I’ve read books and done research, but it’s not the same as speaking with a Dark Moth and you are the first I’ve met.”

“But you know Kade Everett?” I’d hoped he was a Dark Moth even though deep down I knew he wasn’t one.

“Yes, but he isn’t a Dark Moth,” Pops said, partially answering my question. Then he looked over at me. “Do you know what Kade is?”

“No,” I admitted, excitement bubbling in my belly. “Will you tell me?”

“Well now,” he said, glancing at me over the top of his reading glasses. “I don’t know either. I have an idea but nothing more.” He returned his gaze to the orb.

“Oh.” My face fell. For a moment I believed I was finally going to get a straight answer. “Anyway, with my power, it’s like something inside me ignites and rushes through me like water through a breaking dam.”

“Interesting. And the other trainees? They don’t have the glow when they use their power?”

“Their markings glow,” I said, feeling slightly better. “But not their whole bodies.”

“Very interesting.” He handed back the orb. “I have a few things to research and I’d also like to do some checking on the demon orb as well, if that’s okay?” He waited for me to answer.

“You don’t need it to do your research?” I asked, even though I was grateful he returned it. I stared at the orb, recognizing the pulsing and acknowledging its power before tucking it back into my pocket.

“Not now, anyway.” He took a tray from a cupboard under the island.

I stifled a yawn, even though it was probably just mid-day.

He caught my eyes just as I covered my mouth. “Sorry.” I felt my face heat with embarrassment.

“Don’t be. Why don’t you go upstairs and relax? I need to speak with my son and I’ll do some research. We can talk more later.”

Urgency beat against my chest, but I also knew I was exhausted.

“All right.” I stood. Then saw the delicious cupcakes again. “Did my being here interrupt an upcoming party?” I asked, indicating the tree stand.

“No, actually, these are for you. Today’s your birthday, Alice, and I wanted to celebrate though I know Moths don’t usually make a big deal of the day they were born, and I understand why.” Professor Pops pushed the tray toward me. “But I thought you deserved something to honor the day you were born.”

A shower of happiness rained down on me at his thoughtfulness. “Wow, thank you.” I hadn’t realized today was the fateful day I’d been dreading since I could remember. I was officially on the radar for me sire, though it didn’t matter at this point.

“These are chocolate with peanut butter buttercream topped with malted milk chocolate balls. Have as many as you’d like. Please.” He pushed the tray toward me.

“Thank you.” I took one, pulling off the purple wrapper and shoveling a bite in my mouth. “Yum,” I said around the food. “Did you make these?” I chewed a bit more and then swallowed.

He nodded, removing a single white plate from the cupboard. “An old family recipe,” he admitted with a smile. “Except the chocolate balls. Those are new, and I thought they would make the cakes extra special.”

I took another bite, enjoying the textures and flavors. “You did good. This tastes amazing.” I was curious how he knew about my birthday and then guessed it was probably Heathcliff who told him.

“I’m glad.” He set the plate in front of me before getting a glass from the cupboard. “Take a few and a glass of milk.” He poured me a tall one and set it beside the plate.

“I will.” I took two more cupcakes before taking the plate in one hand and the milk in the other. “See you later, Mr. Professor Pops.” I smirked, feeling embarrassed.

“I’ll be up in a while. You’re welcome to roam the house and the grounds. Please don't feel like you have to be cooped up in your room," he said kindly. "There are clothes of all sorts in the drawers and the closet. Something should fit if you want to change."

"Thank you. I really appreciate all you've done for a total stranger."

"You're not a stranger anymore. It's been lovely meeting you." He clasped his hands behind his back.

"And you, Professor Pops," I replied, deciding that was what I'd call him.

OceanofPDF.com

BACK IN MY ROOM, I set the cupcakes and milk on the table next to my bed. Then changed out of my clothes and into black shorts and a purple tank top. I found them in the large walk-in closet. On the way back to my cupcakes, my eyes caught hold of the folded paper that'd fallen from the book in Peters' room. It lay on the floor near the bathroom. I picked it up and went over to the bed, placing it and the orb on the blankets. Then I fluffed the pillows and sat, crossing my legs, turning my attention back to the cupcakes.

After removing part of the paper from one of the cupcakes, I took a bite. While I savored the chocolate and peanut butter deliciousness, I picked up the paper. It was old and wrinkled so I opened it carefully. A quick perusal was all it took to realize the entire entry was about me. The words were faded, and it took me an entire cupcake to get the gist of it.

The markings on Alice's wrists have remained black yet her power is there and it's strong. I feel it whenever she trains. But she isn't like the other trainees. It's as though she possesses all the powers of the seven deadly sins. There is wrath, pride, envy, greed, lust, gluttony, and even sloth power within her, as though she was born of all of them, which is impossible, unless… I can't even go there. It's unheard of and completely impossible.

What's even stranger is that she possesses the seven virtues as well. We rarely discuss those in class. There is no need. If a virtue is part of a Moth, we treat it as part of their human half and don't encourage it. We are, after all, trying to build them as warriors. With Alice, it's easy to see all of them in her: temperance, diligence, forgiveness, charity, kindness, chastity, humility.

If I didn't know her and interact with her personally, I wouldn't believe it. She is equal parts virtue as well as vice. A perfect balance. In many ways, I fear the combination makes her more powerful than us all. And if that were to get out, the Society might vote to expunge her before she has a chance to fully develop.

I reread the words several times. With each pass, my confusion grew. “Why did such a thing matter?” I whispered because if I spoke any louder I thought I might scream.

Kade appeared out of thin air, and then I did scream… a little. Not loud enough to worry Professor Pops, but enough that Kade smirked, crossing his arms over his chest and causing the muscles along his arms to flex. He obviously enjoyed scaring the crap out of me. I couldn’t even stay mad as I admired him. He really was the most devastatingly handsome… being.

“You need to stop doing that. Can’t you wear a bell or something to announce your arrival a few seconds beforehand? That way I can be prepared.” I glared, climbing off the bed and stomping into the bathroom to grab my hair tie. I needed to get my hair out of my face.

“That’s not a bad idea,” he said quietly. He’d tracked me with his eyes but hadn’t moved. “I missed you last night, but the way you were sleeping, I didn’t dare wake you for fear it would be like waking the dead.” His smirk grew bigger.

“You’re hilarious. But yeah, I was out.” I studied him. Something was different. His features were soft. Meek even. I’d never seen him wear such a look. Usually his face was a mask of control or filled with passion. But this was new. “What? Did you find out there isn’t anything we can do?” I went back over to him, searching his features for an answer.

“My… contacts are refusing,” he said between clenched teeth. “Did you talk to Professor Pops?”

“I did. There are issues, but he’s agreed to help me.” I watched him curiously. Why would his people refuse to help? Didn’t they understand his life was at stake?

“So he found something?” Hope returned to his voice, though he still hadn't moved.

"Yeah, but it may not matter," I said, looking away so he wouldn't see my deep disappointment with my family.

"It's more than I've got," he said, his hands touching mine.

I hadn't seen Kade this way before. So… mellow or disheartened. It threw me off. His body language told me there was something very wrong. "It's okay that your superiors won't help. We'll work something out," I said, softly, forcing a tentative smile.

"They can be very frustrating. Makes me wonder why I…" He paused and then growled, running his hands through his hair.

"Why you what?" The man wasn't making a whole lot of sense and his nearness had me distracted.

"I don't know why I follow their orders." He sighed, shrugging, and moved over to the window.

I stood beside him, staring out. Storm clouds had rolled in, making the sky like murky marshmallows. Tension rolled off him and onto me. "So don't," I finally said. "Stop listening to them and do what you believe to be right."

He barked out a harsh laugh. "If only it were that easy." He gave me a sideways glance. "Believe me, I want to ignore them and…" His voice trailed off.

I didn't acknowledge his comment, but continued to stare out at the sky. Because I actually understood about feeling obligated. Since I could remember, all I'd lived for was to train so that one day I could destroy my sire and then join the ranks of the Dark Moths. I would protect the other Moths, those without the marks, those who were born to die in a sucky game of cat and mouse. Since meeting Kade, I had begun to doubt that was still my calling. "Let it be that easy," I said, crossing my arms, trying to hold all my emotions inside. "It's your life."

He noticed my stance and lightly bumped his shoulder into mine. "Enough about me. How are you?" he asked, changing the subject.

Now it was my turn to laugh, and it was every bit as harsh as his had been. I squeezed my arms tighter around myself. “Other than the fact that Lily has done something with Wrythe because she wants to be Queen of the Dark Moths, I’m super.” I relaxed my arms and twisted my hair up in a bun.

Kade grimaced. “All right, that was a stupid question.” He faced me, caressing my bare arms and sending goosebumps all over my flesh. “I just wondered if Professor Pops told you what I was.”

I studied him, thinking if I looked hard enough, I’d be able to tell for myself. “He said he has an idea but that he wasn’t certain.”

Relief tempered his brow and he unclenched his teeth. The reaction piqued my interest even further. “Why don’t you tell me,” I said, cupping one side of his face in my hand. His skin was smooth, almost like porcelain. I hadn’t discerned that detail before and it occurred to me how little I knew about the man in front of me.

He closed his eyes a moment, leaning into my hand before twining our fingers and tilting his head toward the high ceiling where a large fan swirled softly, filling the room with the scent of him. “I will,” he began. “It’s just when I tell you…” He blew out a breath, his gaze leaving my face and searching the bed. “What is that?” He let go of me and went over to pick up the demon orb. “Is this what I think it is? I’ve heard of them, but never seen one up close.” He held it up to the light where it gleamed and sparkled. The longer I looked at the ball, the more I felt myself sucked into its depths. The orb itself was small, but within it seemed to go on forever. “These are extremely rare.”

I heard him but didn’t respond as I felt my mind somehow enter the sphere.

As I watched, like a fly on the wall, a battle raged where brilliantly stunning people in white fought valiantly against the equally horrendous demons. Some demons still wore their human form while others revealed their disturbing, pus-filled selves. I blinked several times, trying to make the images go away, but they only intensified, and I found myself desperate to help. The Devil came to the front line of the demons, a long, gleaming sword drawn. It pulsed with power, as well as permeated all around him.

Then he pushed his dark power out from him so it surrounded those in white on the front lines. At the leeching darkness, those who were touched dropped their weapons. Their faces slackened as though they'd been emptied of their souls. The Devil made quick work of them, cutting each down like withered weeds in a raging inferno.

"Alice?" Kade fisted the orb, cutting the bond.

I shook myself, desperate to be back in the fray, to find out what would happen, to make sure the Devil didn't win. "I-it's…" I sat on the edge of the bed, covering my face with my hands. "It's a demon orb," I finally said, in case he was unsure, though he didn't seem to be. "Do you know why Wrythe would give it to me?"

"It was Wrythe himself?" Kade sat beside me, resting a hand on my knee. The goosebumps returned as did a tingling warmth. "That's interesting," he continued.

"Why?" I laced his fingers with mine, the need for him returning. "What does it do?"

"What do you want it to do?" He held it out on his open palm.

I grunted, suddenly frustrated with him. The man needed to start providing me with straight answers. There was only so much patience I possessed, and it'd reached its limits with Kade. "I'm not sure," I said, grabbing the orb from his hand.

"I'm not trying to be obnoxious, Alice. I promise. Sure, I've heard of the orbs, but before now, I've never seen one. In all of creation, the orb has only been mentioned twice." He paused as though he wanted to make sure I understood how spectacular it was that I was in possession of one.

I had to admit that did seem rare, but still. "And what happened?" I asked.

"That's the thing. The first time, the orb was used by a young Moth woman. According to the ancient texts, she found it amongst her mother's things five days after she turned eighteen. As it happened, her demon sire came to kill her while she still held the orb in her hand.

"As she related in the story, her demon sire taunted and tortured her for several hours until she was nearly dead. The demon spoke to her about her mother and how he'd used her and then killed her. Angrier than she'd ever been, she squeezed her hands into tight fists and cried out, 'May you die a thousand deaths and I be there to watch them all.'" Kade shifted so my back was to his chest and wrapped his legs around my waist, pulling me toward him.

Lust licked through my belly. Every part of my body ached for him. But I wanted to hear the rest of the story. With a deep, calming breath, I climbed away from Kade, and went to lie on a pillow. "And?" I prodded, feeling less overwhelmed. "What happened to the woman?"

"With her last breath, the orb flared to life, consuming her and the demon and just as she'd said, she watched the demon die a thousand times, in various ways, all of them horrible and gruesome."

"That sounds like torture for her as well as the demon," I said, tucking the pillow so I could see him better.

He laid beside me so we were face to face. "Agreed. It was. The woman remained within the orb for days until the demon had died a thousand times."

"And then what happened?" I asked, anxious for her though it was a long time ago.

"The demon was gone. With his last death, he turned to ash." Kade held out his hand and like a moth drawn to his white-hot flame, I threaded my fingers with his. He went on, "It's said that while she was within the orb, watching the demon die, something happened to her. When the brutality was over, she came from the orb with markings on her wrists." His thumb stroked hers.

"She was the first Dark Moth?" It reminded me of the story Wrythe had shared about his markings and slaying his demon sire. Did Wrythe know this story too? I figured he must, even though his story had led me to believe he was the first Dark Moth. But he had said, “one of the first” not the first.

“Correct.” Kade tugged me against his taut chest. I relaxed against him, enjoying the feel and the smell of him.

At his closeness, my pulse quickened. “What about the other time a demon orb is talked about?” I asked, greedy for his lips on mine.

He seemed to recognize what I wanted because he touched his thumb to my lips, brushing against the fullness of the bottom one. “The Dark Moth went in search of an orb. During his travels he was told of a dragon who dwelled within a cave. After years of searching he located the dragon, called Abernathy. According to the Dark Moth’s recording, the dragon tried to eat him at first, but then promised him an orb in exchange for locating a spell book he’d lost. The Dark Moth agreed. He searched for years, coming across many supernatural creatures. Some he helped. Others he killed. Many befriended him, but there are those who became his enemies. When he found the book, he had to kill for it, and barely escaped with his life. Upon returning it to Abernathy, the dragon gave him the orb.”

My need for Kade was momentarily outweighed by the idea of an actual dragon. “Did he say what the dragon looked like?” Wrythe mentioned talking to a dragon. Could he have talked to this Abernathry?

Kade ginned, scooting so close that our arms and legs touched. “I believe there is reference to a golden dragon.”

I closed my eyes, trying to picture the creature. “What did the Moth do with the orb?”

“Well, I’d always believed he used it to become king, but I could be wrong,” he said, letting that sink in.

Was Kade talking about Wrythe? Had he used the orb to become king of the Dark Moths? As I debated what Kade meant, he stroked my arm causing the flame of need within me to grow. But I needed to verify what Kade meant.

“You think this Dark Moth was Wrythe?” I asked, trying to focus, but it was difficult, especially when his fingers trailed down my arm and along my side to the bare skin at my back.

“Not Wrythe. A different king during a different time.”

For some reason, that gave me relief. Still, I clutched the orb tight, my curiosity about what it did growing ever more intense. But Kade’s roaming hand was beyond distracting. I threw one leg over his hip and pulled him to me, the demon orb forgotten. Kade took off his shirt, tossing it onto the floor. I admired his chest, and the way his muscles moved, but only for a moment, before I remembered what happened last time. “Won’t they pull you away again if we…” I let the words die in my throat at the thought of what we could do to each other.

“Probably, but I say we go for it anyway,” he said, tracing his fingers along my forehead and down my cheek.

Before I lost all control and gave into the hunger in Kade’s eyes, I had to ask him one more time. “Please, tell me what you are?”

Like a dying light, I watched the passion in his eyes fizzle. I pushed him off me, turning my lust and greed for him to anger. “What’s the big deal?” I sat up, adjusting my tank.

He got off the bed and retrieved his shirt, pulling it on. “Because,” he said and sounded horribly dejected. “When I tell you, everything will change between us.”

“Why?” I stood as well, confused. “Just spit it out,” I said, eager to have what he was out in the open. “I’ve been trying to figure out the reason you’ve kept your heritage from me a secret and I can’t understand.” Frustrated, I adjusted my shorts and retied my hair in a bun. “It’s obvious we are physically attracted to each other. Is that a bad thing? At first, I thought you pushed me away because you thought you were too good for me, but if that were true, you wouldn’t keep coming back." I started to pace. "I mean I'm sure there are plenty of women willing to give themselves to you the way I have." Angry tears pressed against my lids and spilled onto my cheeks. I wiped at them, unable to make them stop.

"Alice, no. I don't think I'm better. It's just…" He paused again looking as though he wanted to comfort me, but wasn't sure he should.

The red glow returned and pulsed around me. "Just go. If you aren't going to tell me, then leave, and never come back. I don't want to see you again," I shouted, sick and tired of his resistance.

He growled, grabbing hold of my hips and crushing his lips against mine. I shoved my hands against his chest, but my heart wasn't in it, because damned if I didn't want him. As before, it felt as though we fused, and it felt like we were one. Our kisses were full of light and warmth and joy and happiness and… the words I'd read about chayot came into my mind. And I knew. Without a doubt, I knew. Pulling away, I held him at arm's length as I studied his face.

"You're an angel?" I whispered.

His shoulders sagged with liberation. "Yes," he said breathlessly.

"And that's why we can't be together. Because I'm the Devil's daughter, and you're…" I couldn't say it. "I'm sure there are rules about your kind and demons—even half demons—getting together."

"Big-time rules," he said, his voice laced with bitterness as his hands stroked up and down my back.

I rested my cheek against his chest, enjoying the way my body buzzed. "So why do we feel so good together?"

He shook his head, resting his chin against the top of my head. "I don't know."

OceanofPDF.com

"SO WHY DO you torture yourself and continue to come back to me?" I asked, grateful he was there. "I mean if we can't be together then why don't you stay away?" The words came out softly, each syllable heavy with pain.

"Great questions." He held me at arm's length, allowing me to see the hurt etched in his features. That helped a little. At least our pain was mutual. But that wasn't supposed to be how love went.

"So," I said, frantic to be back in his arms.

"I was assigned to you," he replied, stepping around me and toward the bed.

"Assigned?" I was trying to understand, but his absence physically hurt. More than that, I was emotionally flustered. "But we met the night Eric's sire came into the club to hunt him. That was a coincidence." Even as I said the words, I realized that wasn't true.

"No coincidence, Alice. I put myself in your path. After years of living the life of a normal human, I finally received my orders. They were to find you, and make sure you didn't…" He stopped, running his hands through his hair. "Then I met you and my world shifted." He was pacing, lost in his own thoughts. I watched him, bewildered, using those moments to let my own feelings adjust. "From the moment you climbed into that car to escape the menial demons, the time we spent together training, and up until you stood up for me to Wrythe and the others, my life has been changed. I kept trying to tell myself there was nothing between us, but I knew then just as I now know." He stopped and rubbed his eyes and then went to the window. "As soon as we entered the Trials, I went to my superiors, requesting to be removed from this assignment. I even went so far as to tell them the truth about my feelings for you. But instead of having empathy for my situation, they basically told me to suck it up and to go back and do what needed to be done." He threw his hands up. "They've put me in an impossible situation." Kade looked at me then, his rant seemingly over. "Because every time I'm near you, I feel what's true."

I held my breath, knocked over by the strength of feeling shining in his eyes. "What's that?" I whispered, unable to say more.

"I'm so in love with you I can barely contain myself," he said, and fell to his knees in front of me.

Seeing him so miserable, so desperate, and in pain, cut my heart into ribbons. I ran to him, kneeling in front of him and pulling him into my arms. "You love me?" I asked, my words shaking with emotion.

He wrapped his arms around me. "I know it's crazy. When we're together, it's mostly about being physical, and in case you couldn't tell, I love getting physical with you." He smiled sadly.

"I can tell," I said, matching his smile with one of my own.

"For me it's so much more than that, too. I don't know everything about you, but I want to, and I want you to know me too." He took my hand, intertwining our fingers.

I hugged him tight a moment and then pushed back, but kept our fingers looped. "Kade, I feel the same way about you, which as a half demon makes no sense." We had all the emotions humans did, but the half demon part of us curbed softer emotions like love and kindness so that they were only a very small part of us. But all the emotion I felt for him rushed through my body, forcing out every one of the seven deadly sins and my heart burned with love for him. As I thought about my feelings, my body began to shine.

When it happened, Kade jumped up, stepping back. "How are you doing that?" He'd seen this happen to me before, but it obviously still surprised him.

I leaned back, sitting on my feet. "I don't know," I admitted.

"It's almost as if…" The sadness in his eyes vanished and he tried again. "If I didn't know any better, I'd think you were…"

I followed his gaze, but he didn't seem to be looking at anything, except maybe my cupcakes. I tried to bring him back to me with talk. "Professor Pops made cupcakes for my birthday. Did you want one?"

"Today's your birthday," he said, his voice lightening as though he were relieved. Then he smacked himself in the forehead. "Of course it is." Releasing my hand, he went over to the cupcakes. "Mind if I have one?"

I shrugged, as the light emanating from me softened and nearly vanished. "Go for it."

Kade took one and removed the paper. Mesmerized, I watched him rip the bottom half of the cake off, place it on top of the icing portion, and smoosh it together. He winked before taking a huge bite. "Really delicious," he said, licking his lips to get some of the frosting off. His changing emotions had my head spinning. "I love cupcakes," he said after he swallowed.

"I thought it was tacos." I crossed my arms, trying to see the angel in him.

"Technically that's true. I do love tacos, but really I just love eating my food as though it was a taco." He stuck the other half of the cupcake in his mouth.

"Oh." When we'd hung out together in the compound, he'd put all the food he could into taco form. "That makes sense," I said, suddenly tired.

He brushed off his hands and took something from his pocket. "This is for you." He held up a black leather bracelet with a pair of wings laced into the center. "Happy birthday," he said and kissed me lightly.

I licked at the peanut butter buttercream. "You did know," I responded, pleasantly surprised and loving the wings. They would always remind me of him. Except, did he even have wings?

"How could I forget?" He took my hand and slid the bracelet over my wrist, pulling the leather chords tight to keep it secure.

“It’s beautiful,” I said, tears pricking my eyes. “Thank you.”

He kissed me again. “You’re welcome, but why are you crying?”

“It’s just…” I had no idea. Dark Moths didn’t cry.

“What?” he asked, tenderly.

“It’s like you gave me a part of yourself,” I said, my eyes never leaving the angel wings.

“I have, Alice Blackburn. In case you weren’t sure, you do have my heart and soul and always will.” He pulled me into a hug. “But I need to go.”

“No, don’t,” I cried, clinging to him.

He held me tighter. “There is something I need to find out. Now that I’ve seen what you can do, twice, I need to talk to someone about it.” He took my chin between his thumb and first finger, tilting my face up to meet his. “But I’ll be back. Promise.” His kiss was tender, so tender that I felt his love flow through him and into me. In that moment it was as though I was falling into a million daisy petals.

He vanished as we kissed.

When he was gone I felt empty, as though he’d taken my heart with him. Again. Except this time, I gave it freely, knowing he would bring it back. Trusting he would. And if that made me the Queen of Hearts, then so be it.

At his absence, the full extent of my exhaustion filled every crevice of my being. I stumbled to the bed, falling onto it. The demon orb was still in my hand. I lifted it into the light, trying to see what I’d seen before. This time there was only emptiness and I was falling, falling, falling.

Down.

Down.

Down.

Or perhaps it was sideways or upside down. After falling for what felt like hours, time became hard to decipher. I searched for something within the blackness to tell me where I was or what was happening. Finally, from a long ways off I saw two golden circles. They were coming toward me at a rapid rate. At first, I was excited, thinking whatever they were, they could explain what was happening.

But as they drew closer, I saw a shadow behind them and understood the yellow circles were eyes attached to a body. An enormous body.

With effort, I tried to get away, but nothing worked. In that moment, I believed the monster might eat me, but when the creature was directly in front of me, it came to an abrupt stop. Large golden wings beat at its back. Its snout sparkled with golden scales, and it had a long golden mane. “Abernathy,” I breathed, somehow knowing he was the dragon from the story. I didn’t know how I knew, but it was as though we’d always known each other.

“That’s right, child,” he said, and twin puffs of smoke left his nose.

“Is this real? Or am I dreaming?” I was still in emptiness. Nothing but an empty expanse around us.

A deep rumbling rose up from him. The dragon was laughing, sending tendrils of smoke out of his mouth. “Does it matter? The orb brought me to you.”

“Did you create the orbs?” I asked.

“It was a collaborative effort between myself and two other beings I’d rather not discuss,” he said.

“What am I supposed to do with it?” I crossed my arms, trying to hold myself together.

He turned his face so that one large, yellow eye studied me intently. “Alice Blackburn, I have every faith that you will know what to do with it when the time is right.”

“That isn’t really an answer,” I said, hoping for more.

“Well, that’s because there isn’t a definitive one. How would you learn? How would you grow, if your future was laid out before you and you knew how it all ended before it even began?"

"I'd be fine with that," I said, truthfully. "If it ends well, I can go forward in confidence."

"But what if it doesn't?" Abernathy gave me a pointed look, his great wings flapping silently at his sides.

"Will my life end badly?" I felt myself getting sick at the thought of losing.

"Tut-tut, Alice. I didn't say that. You have to fight, love, make choices, serve, and become your best self on the journey. You can't do that if you already know how it ends That wouldn't be prudent and prudence is an important virtue.

There'd been mention in one of our books about the seven virtues, plus Peter's note mentioned them as well. "You know about the seven virtues?"

"Most definitely. Do you?" A lick of smoke left his mouth when he asked.

"I think so," I said and told him about Peter's entry.

"He's right. I sense all of those things within you as well. But what you may not know is that the reason there are seven virtues and seven vices is that there must always be balance."

Now that I thought about it, that made sense. "That seems reasonable," I said.

He chuckled, flashing all of his large and sharp teeth. "I'm sure you can figure out which virtue cancels out the corresponding vice and vice versa."

I was about to tell him no, but as I thought about it, the answer came. "Forgiveness would overcome wrath. Humility could diffuse pride. Charity overcomes greed. Kindness would negate envy. Diligence and sloth. Lust and chastity, and temperance cancels out gluttony."

"Exactly, Alice. That's impressive."

“Thank you,” I said, feeling a moment of pride. In the same moment a flicker of humility cut through. I also noticed a palpable difference in the way I felt when my thoughts were focused on pride versus humility.

“You should know most Moths don’t feel much of the virtues, especially the one opposite their demon sire.”

I hadn’t thought about that, but it made sense.

“There are rare occasions when a Moth makes an effort to overcome their demoness, but you are even rarer than that, dearest Alice.” He closed his eyes a moment as though thinking.

Wendy came to mind. After Eric died, she’d been full of wrath, but in recent days that prevalent emotion had changed. I didn’t know if it was forgiveness, but maybe she was getting there. “How do you mean?” I’d been giving in to my greed and lust and wrath on a regular basis lately.

“You’ll know soon enough.” His giant wings started pounding faster and he backed up, flying away from me.

“Where are you going? Don’t leave.” I wasn’t done talking to him. We just started talking.

“Our time together is at an end—at least for now. I’ve shared all you need to know at this time.” Flapping his enormous, bat-like wings, he turned and flew away, ignoring my calls to come back. When he was no more than a blip in the dark, I felt myself falling again. When I woke, I found myself in bed.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER DRESSING THE FOLLOWING MORNING, I headed down to the kitchen, urged on by my nose. The smell of eggs, bacon, and buttered toast had filtered up to my room and by the time I sat at the counter island, my mouth was watering.

"Everything smells amazing," I said, watching Professor Pops cook.

He wore a black apron with the words Professors Do It Better across the front.

I smiled, thinking I'd just discovered another layer to the old vampire. He had a wicked wit.

"Thanks, Alice." He plated the food and slid it across the counter.

"Thank you," I replied, picking up my fork and shoveling a bite in my mouth.

"Would you like jam?" he asked.

I really did want jam, but sitting there while he served me made me feel slothful. "I can get it." I stood and went over to the fridge.

"I don't mind. I enjoy being in the kitchen," he said while I slathered some strawberry preserves on my toast.

At that comment, I wondered why he hadn't married. Surely there were other vampires—female vampires—in the world. I wanted to ask him about his love life, but it didn't seem appropriate.

So, while he tidied up the kitchen and I ate, I asked him about his family. He told me about his sons and daughters-in-law. It seemed his family was growing bigger every day and I saw his happiness as he spoke about them. At his words, I longed for a real family, even though I knew it was impossible. Such thoughts were not a good idea and I pushed them away. I had a lot of other things to worry about.

"Should we discuss the plan?" I asked, when I finished eating and as I took my empty plate to the sink.

“Absolutely. I spent most of last night going over ideas and I’ve come up with something I want to run past you.” As he spoke, Gatsby meowed. Professor Pops scowled, heading over to open the back door where the cat stood waiting. “I suppose you can come in,” he said dryly. “Though I can’t see why it’s necessary.”

Gatsby meowed loudly, jumping up on the chair beside me, rubbing his head against my arm. “Hello, kitty.” I scratched behind his ears and he purred loudly.

“Don’t get fresh,” Professor Pops said. I looked up, surprised to see he was speaking to the cat like he understood.

“He’s sweet,” I said, trying to console the professor.

“He’s irritating.”

I wasn’t going to argue. “What’s your idea?” I rested my elbows on the counter and zeroed in on Professor Pops.

He spent the better part of twenty minutes laying it out for me. I asked questions, listened, and gave input when necessary. I was grateful for the distraction from my thoughts about Kade. The man I loved wasn’t a man at all, but an angel! It was all so crazy. When we finished discussing the plan, I needed a moment to digest and changed the subject, asking him about Snow White. He was telling me how she’d become the Vampire Queen. The story of the klutzy young woman who’d believed she was nothing and how she’d become the Vampire Queen was fascinating. The Professor’s insights and stories really helped to expand my world view.

“What’s wrong?” Professor Pops asked after a lull in the conversation.

“Nothing,” I said, my face warming. “Sorry. Please go on.” I really enjoyed hearing about his family, even if it was in the context of how we were going to fix my problem. The Dark Moths, the compound, the Society as a whole and all that entailed had been my home for the better part of my life.

Professor Pops smiled before continuing. As he spoke, Gatsby jumped up on the counter and sat between Pops and me, his fluffy gray head swishing back and forth as we talked. If I didn't know any better, I would swear the cat was listening as intently as me. After a while, he lay down on the counter and closed his eyes, obviously bored by our talk.

"This is a great idea, Professor Pops. And it just might work," I said, thinking about Wrythe. A big part of the plan involved rescuing him. I hoped he was all right, but I didn't worry too much about him. If anyone could take care of himself, it was the king. "What about weapons?" I asked. There were plenty in the training room at the Dark Moth compound but reaching it without running into anyone would be impossible.

"I've got that covered," Professor Pops said. "Follow me."

I slid off the barstool, trailing him down the hall. He unlocked a door. "I want to prepare you for what you're about to see," he said.

"Okay?" A flutter of worry churned in my belly and an image of Pasty and what I'd done to him crossed my mind.

"Heathcliff told me they don't teach you much about the outside world while you're in school and I can understand why. You are training and learning all you can about the evil creatures hunting you for sport." He gave me a wry smile. "Down here you'll get an up-close look at many of the other supernatural creatures roaming the Earth. They aren't alive, so don't be afraid."

I appreciated his reassurance. "Thank you," I said, eager to see what he had down there. I still had Heathcliff's journal and the pages had revealed a lot, but seeing them for myself would be much better.

"Ready?"

"Yes," I nodded, tucking my hands in my pockets.

He started down, flipping a switch as he went. At the bottom of the stairs was another door, which he unlocked. Slowly, he pushed it opened and went inside.

I followed. Gatsby padded past me and Professor Pops and disappeared beyond. When I entered the room, I was immediately in awe. There were creatures everywhere. Each in its own glass case. Some were so small they could fit on my shoulder while others were huge, including what looked like a dragon. I was fascinated and went over for a closer look. “This is incredible.” I ran my fingers along the glass, stooping to check out its wings. The creature was fascinating. “Are there still dragons in the world?” I turned in slow circles trying to take everything in and ran into a wooden stand holding a book. Of course my mind went to Abernathy, but I wasn’t sure that was real or just a dream.

Professor Pops caught it with inhuman speed. “Yes,” he said simply. “Most live in the dragon realm, but a few dwell in the human one too.

“Sorry.” I righted myself and the stand. “And cool.” I didn’t mention my interaction with Abernathy.

“Not to worry,” Pops said. “You’d be surprised how many times that’s happened.” He set the book back where it belonged. “You’re welcome to look around if you like or we can continue into the weapons room.”

I really wanted to stay and look around, but doing so wasn’t a necessity. What was most important? Saving Wrythe and encouraging, forcefully, if necessary, the council to rescind their decision to let me go through the Trial of Three. “I’m thinking we collect our gear and go immediately. But I hope I can come back again someday.”

“Agreed,” Professor Pops said.

I followed him to the far side of the massive room.

He opened the door and held it for me.

I walked through the entrance and grinned. A long wooden set of drawers rested near the door and within were armor and other protective clothing. The wall on the left showcased an impressive collection of hammers, axes, bows and arrows while the wall on the right consisted of shields, whips, and throwing stars. There were quiver cases below the arrows as well as sheaths for the blades. After a quick perusal, my eyes went to the final wall, which was lined with all kinds of swords, including my favored katanas. “Do you mind?”

“Not at all,” he said, taking a large broadsword, a gun, and several smaller knives.

In addition to the katana, I helped myself to a handgun as well as several smaller throwing knives, tucking a few in my boots. It didn’t take long at all to get stocked up. “I’m ready,” I said, heading over to him.

Professor Pops sheathed his sword and nodded. “Me too.”

I exited the room first and noticed Gatsby sitting on the floor near the dragon, grooming himself. While Professor Pops locked the weapons’ room door, I watched Gatsby. He was an odd cat.

“I have a question,” I said, following Professor Pops back through the supernatural museum and up the stairs.

“What is it?” At the top, he waited for Gatsby and me to pass him and then shut and locked the door.

“How are we going to get there?” Flying seemed the most likely option, but with our arsenal of weapons, I knew they wouldn’t let us on a plane. We could drive, but that would take days. Technically, we had the time, but I was anxious to get going.

At my question, Professor Pops went past the kitchen and out onto the back terrace. Gatsby and I followed. “Wait here,” Professor Pops said.

“Uh, okay.” I wasn’t sure what was going on.

Professor Pops stood beside me while Gatsby padded to the far end of the concrete and then turned back to face us.

The professor cocked his head to one side. “You might as well tell her,” he said, looking at the cat.

Gatsby studied us a moment. “Fine,” he said.

Needless to say, I freaked out a little. “Did the cat just talk?” My head whipped between Professor Pops and Gatsby.

Professor Pops rolled his shoulders back. “He did.”

“How are you so calm?” I crossed one leg over the other and hugged my arms to myself thinking this was just another day in the life of me not knowing anything about the world.

He chuckled softly. “I’m a vampire. You’re half demon. And that cat… well, let’s just say he’s not just a cat.”

For some reason, his words calmed me. “True. Okay, so what is he?” I turned my gaze on the cat. “What are you?”

He stared back but didn’t respond. Part of me wondered if I’d really heard him speak. It could’ve just been the wind.

The cat proved I had heard him talk by doing it again. “Why are you rushing me, professor?” He stretched out on the concrete like he wanted a nap.

“Holy crap!”

Professor Pops gave an impatient huff. “Hurry up before she loses her mind.”

“When I change, she’ll probably pass out and then that’ll slow us down.” He licked one of his paws, grooming himself like he had all day.

My wrath flared at the way they were discussing me like I was a little girl without the power of all seven deadly sins. “Just tell me already,” I shouted. I was sick of all the secrets!

“As you wish, dear Alice,” Gatsby said. As he spoke, he began to transform. I’d seen that happen before when a demon shed his human shell to reveal what he looked like underneath. Most of the time, a full-fledged royal demon stood eight to ten feet tall. But Gatsby passed that size and continued to grow. The most surprising part of all? He transformed into a dragon! And not just any dragon, but the one I’d seen in my vision or whatever when I was staring at the demon orb.

“Holy… Wow! You’re Abernathy, right?” I gritted my teeth to keep from screaming.

“Exactly,” he said, and a puff of smoke left his mouth. He ruffled his wings and shook his head. He was golden in every sense of the word. From his shiny scales to his long, yellow mane. And he was glorious to behold.

I walked toward him, desperate to discover whether his scales were hot or cold. Reverently I touched one, which was bigger than my hand. It was warm.

“Abernathy can be quite conceited,” Professor Pops said, though I saw the admiration on his face. It occurred to me that the two of them had known each other a long time.

“No more so than you are, vampire,” Abernathy said.

“Very well.” The professor had a nasty look on his face as if he didn’t appreciate being reminded of his shortcomings. “Shall we be on our way?” He came to stand beside Abernathy and clasped his hands together to form a step. Then he nodded, indicating I should climb on.

“Wait. What?”

“You asked how we are getting to Wonderland and now you know. We are flying, but not in a jet or a plane. We are flying by dragon.”

OceanofPDF.com

THE WIND WHIPPED through my hair, knocking it from the tie that held it back. I clung to Abernathy's mane, determined to stay upright, though there was no chance of sliding off. The dragon was much bigger than I was. I could've laid down and my body still wouldn't have reached the width of him.

Professor Pops sat behind me, his hands resting on his thighs like riding a dragon was nothing unusual.

I didn't have his calm. In fact, my emotions were layered like a chocolate trifle. Fear at the base followed by anxiety, anger, and irritation. But spread over the top and coaxing all of the other emotions into submission was peace. A sense of rightness. It didn't make sense. I was born of a demon, brought up deep below the earth. Flying wasn't even part of my vocabulary. There hadn't been a need. But as the wind tangled my hair, a part of me I didn't recognize soared to life and fizzled with voracious happiness.

"A great way to travel, am I right?" Abernathy said, his voice deep and rumbly in the warm air.

"Sure," I said. And then thought better of my response. "I really appreciate it, but what about satellites and cellphones and just people in general? Won't they see you flying and send F-16's to shoot you down or something?"

He laughed, and as he did, his whole body went up and down. I held on tighter, until my knuckles turned white. "They might if they could see me, but we're cloaked in magic," he said. "So you can relax and enjoy yourself. It isn't everyone who gets to ride a dragon." Smoke blew from his nostrils. "Flying is more right for you than you know."

What was that supposed to mean? "I really don't think so, Abernathy," I said, because hello, I was half demon. But I couldn't deny flying felt right and amazing.

“Trust me when I say it’s true, Alice,” his deep voice added.

The dragon had lost his mind and I glanced back at Professor Pops for clarification.

He just shrugged, an unreadable look on his face. Was there something they knew that they weren’t telling me? I could ask, but I decided to only worry about the task at hand. “What about the other way in? Where is it?” I spoke loudly enough so Professor Pops and Abernathy could hear over the wind.

“You’ll find out soon enough.” Professor Pops pointed down.

“We’re here already?” Below us was the parking garage. The one we used whenever we wanted to exit Demonland.

“We are,” Abernathy said, diving down, down, down. He landed on the upper-most level of the garage, his large talons clicking against the concrete and it rumbled under his weight.

To say I was shocked we’d arrived already was putting it lightly. It felt like we just climbed on Abernathy’s back. But we were in fact here. “Unbelievable.”

“Believe it, Alice.” Abernathy shuddered, and his body changed from a dragon to the very unexciting gray cat called Gatsby.

“How do you do that?” I asked in wonder.

“The question shouldn’t be how, but why? And the answer is quite simple. As a dragon I wouldn’t fit in Demonland without destroying everything in my path.”

“Okay, that makes sense.”

Professor Pops hadn’t said much, but stood off to the side, mixing something together in his hands. “Are you ready?”

“For what?” I asked, watching.

“This.” He threw what he had in his hand up in the air. The particles sailed upward, twinkling like they possessed their own light. They were beautiful, like a million stars dancing. They began to fall, but when they reached waist level, they stopped, hovering a moment before they started to spin in a circle, creating a ring. The light became almost blinding before it shot down through the garage and disappeared. He shot me a playful grin. “Ready?” He took a step toward the gaping black hole.

“Wait!” I said, grabbing hold of his arm. It seemed reckless to just drop into Demonland, guns blazing. We didn’t know how prepared the Dark Moths were. “Do you know where this… hole will drop us?”

“Not to worry, Alice. It’ll take us directly into Heathcliff’s office.”

I released his arm. “Is Heathcliff there?”

“Yes,” he nodded. “He’s expecting us.”

“Okay.” Worry still fluttered in my belly. Or maybe I wasn’t as ready as I thought I was to fight all of Demonland. “What will you do down there?”

The cat seemed to smile, and I blinked in anticipation. I didn’t have to wait for long.

The cat transformed once again. This time into a man dressed from head to toe in black. He was the same height as me, his eyes dark as the night as was his hair, which was pulled back into a high ponytail.

Professor Pops stopped what he was doing and crossed his arms. “Well, this is a surprise.” He glared at the man that used to be a cat that also turned into a dragon. “And I suppose you want one of my weapons, Kenmei?”

“If it isn’t too much trouble,” the man said, smiling calmly.

My mouth hung open. I couldn’t believe what I was seeing.

Kenmei took the sword Professor Pops offered, then winked at me. “You keep your mouth hanging open like that for long and you’ll attract bats.”

That shook me out of it. I closed my mouth with a click. “So, I’m not supposed to be shocked that you’ve been a cat, a dragon, and a man all in the last few hours?”

Kenmei gave me a heartwarming smile and I knew we would get along famously. “You slay demons, what’s the big deal with seeing a cat-dragon-man?” He shrugged. “That’s nothing.”

“Your idea of nothing and mine are very different.” I checked my weapons to make sure they are all still there.

“Fine.” He glanced at Professor Pops. “What’s the plan?” he asked and looked at me.

I answered. “We find and round up the seven members of the Dark Moth council and hold them captive.”

“Right. We’ll bring them back to Heathcliff’s office. He’s got a room in the back where they won’t be able to use their powers.”

“Yes, and we’ll hold them until they agree to take back their approval of my doing the Trial or Three.”

“And if they don’t?” Kenmei asked, smiling as he waved his sword like a dangerous baton.

“We offer them an ultimatum,” I said, grinning wickedly, feeling a little smug. Pops’ plan was going to work.

Kenmei stopped swinging the sword and sheathed it. “What if they choose death?”

I hadn’t thought about that. “They won’t,” I said, but it was a possibility I hadn’t considered. “They have to take it back.” My smugness turned to wicked worry.

“Well, I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but they don’t have to do anything.” Kenmei gave me a look and I knew he was right.

“Professor Pops?” I needed his calm wisdom.

“It’s true, they don’t have to agree, but I feel confident we can encourage them to see things our way.” He went closer to the hole.

“Right, we will split up, then?” Kenmei asked, going to stand beside Professor Pops.

“Do you know what Dark Moth council members look like?” That seemed impossible. How would they know who to capture? The question caught hold all of the sudden.

Professor Pops and I had agreed to stay together—at least as much as we could, though he said his vampire abilities would give him the extra senses he needed to find them. “No, but I have plenty of abilities that’ll help me.” Kenmei opened his mouth to reveal his vampire fangs. “Easy.”

“And you’re a vampire?” The man in front of me had been a gray cat when I first met him followed by an enormous golden dragon and now, not only had he transformed into a man, but he was also a vampire? I felt very inadequate next to the two of them.

“Hai. It’s true. I am.” He bowed slightly. “Shall we go?”

I looked at Professor Pops. He lifted his eyebrows, asking with his eyes whether I was ready.

Was I? Without a doubt. “Let’s do this.”

“Excellent.” Kenmei jumped into the hole first.

Professor Pops followed.

I took in the bright sky for the briefest moment before following after them.

In less than a blink of an eye, I landed with a thud on my feet in Heathcliff’s office. Doc yelped at the sight of me. “You startled me,” he said, adjusting his glasses.

“Sorry,” I replied, glancing around. I knew how that felt. “Where’s Kenmei and Professor Pops?”

“They haven’t arrived yet.” He went back over to his desk. “I’m sure they’ll be along soon.”

Panic set in. “They went through before I did.”

He glanced at me, worried, then went to the door. “Stay here. I’ll go look around.” He left before I could respond.

“They won’t be coming,” Kade said, appearing out of thin air.

I clutched at my shirt over my heart. “What about that bell?” I asked, taking a calming breath.

“Yeah, sorry,” he said, though he didn’t look it.

“Why won’t they be coming?” What did he know? Had he done something to them?”

“They aren’t the right kind of creature for the compound to allow in. Only a select group of supernaturals can enter. Dragons and vampires aren’t on the list.” He tucked his hands into the pockets of his black camo pants that looked remarkably similar to mine.

“But you do?” He was an angel. Why would they be allowed into Demonland?

“Much to the council’s dismay, yes. They can’t keep me out, no matter how hard they try.”

“Why not?”

He gave me a lopsided smile before looking down. “I’m the yin to the Dark Moths’ yang. Balance, remember? Without us there could be no them.”

Angels and demons. That made sense, but I didn’t have time to think more on it, nor did I have the time to study his face and see what he’d figured out before he left. But I wanted to. “I need to find Wrythe and Peter.” I went to the door and turned the handle.

“Alice, wait.” He grabbed hold of my arm and pulled so I fell against his chest. Our nearness astonished him as much as it did me. “You need to be careful. Let me check first.”

That brought me back to reality. I pushed away and stood my ground. “Where did Professor Pops and Kenmei go?”

He crossed his bulky arms over his chest. I licked my lips before looking away. Why did he have to be so damn good looking? “They are safely back in the parking garage where they started. Nothing happened to them. They just can’t enter, no matter how hard they try.”

I couldn’t believe it. “We had a plan,” I began lamely. “I’m not sure…” My voice trailed off as Kade ran a finger down my arm. “Stop that!" I smacked his hand away. "I need to concentrate."

"Right." He went over to the table where Heathcliff had been standing before he left. On it were totes full of bullets. Kade picked one up, studying it. "These will do," he said, pulling a gun from the middle of his back (the same place I kept mine). He loaded his gun. "You'd better do the same."

I shook my head. "I've got plenty." We'd loaded up at Professor Pops' house.

"Yes, but are your bullets dipped in angel essence?"

"I—" I'd forgotten Heathcliff made those. "I don't want to kill anyone, just slow them down," I said, but picked up a bullet and studied it. They looked just like the regular ones.

"It's a nice thought, Alice, but you may not have a choice. If it's you or them, I'll choose you every time." His words took my breath away.

"Really?" I asked, but I knew he was right about fighting.

He kissed me lightly on the lips. "I've gone all in with you, Alice Blackburn."

My legs turned to mush as a queasy happiness filled my belly. "You have? What does that mean? Where did you go?"

He kissed me again, longer this time. "I'll tell you later. Promise." The cinnamon scent of him lingered in my nose, causing the back of my throat to ache with want. But now wasn't the time. "Follow me," he added.

"But do you know where you're—" I began.

He looked back at me, cutting me off before I could finish. "You'd better lead the way."

"Stay close." Even though I was worried about Professor Pops and Abernathy, I felt good. Better than good. Complete? Kade did that to me.

"Ready?" he asked, opening the door.

“Yep. Yes,” I added. Peering out, I looked both ways, before heading left. “Stay close,” I said, even though I didn’t need to. He was right behind me.

Every time I heard talking, I glanced back, but no one saw us until we reached the elevator. “No key,” I hissed. “Can you do something about this?”

He put a finger over my mouth. “Trust me.”

Trust was a tough one for me. I wanted to trust him though.

You can trust me. He spoke the words into my mind.

My eyes went wide. Why do I keep forgetting we can do this?

He shook his head, a wry grin on his face. “Be quiet a moment while I listen.” He winked.

I let out a breath, grinding my teeth, forcing myself not to say anything. And then a strange thing happened. I could hear someone speaking, but they sounded really far away. It sounded like Lily. But before I could understand what was being said, someone found us.

“They said you’d return, but I didn’t want to believe you’d be so stupid.”

“Not after what you’ve done.”

Kade and I spun around as one. It was Georgia and Gilbert, both heavily armed. Georgia with an axe and Gilbert pointing a large gun directly at me.

“Sorry,” Kade whispered. “I was too focused on what was being said elsewhere.

“Did you find him?” I whispered.

“Maybe. Keep them occupied.” He vanished.

Georgia yelped. “That was Kade, right? What was he doing here? How did he do that? Where did he go?” She spun in a circle, searching for him.

I held up my hands, scrambling for words that would end this situation peacefully. “He went to go find Wrythe,” I said, deciding to tell the truth as I took a careful step forward. “I haven’t done anything wrong, Georgia. I swear.”

“Don’t move,” Gilbert said. “We don’t want to hear another one of your lies.” Quicker than I thought possible, he fired his gun at me.

At the last second, I moved enough that it shot me in the shoulder instead of the neck. That would’ve been a lethal blow. “Gilbert!” I touched my shoulder, verifying that the bullet had gone straight through. If not, I’d have to dig it out later and I wasn’t a fan of pain.

At that moment, the elevator pinged open and Lily appeared, her expression confused then aggravated. “Don’t just stand there. Get her!” she shouted at Georgia and Gilbert, moving toward me.

As Lily grabbed my arm, she shoved a knife into my belly. I coughed and sputtered, surprised she’d gotten the upper hand so easily. “I told you what would happen if I ever saw you again,” she seethed, pushing the blade in deeper.

Blood dribbled from my mouth as I coughed, but I refused to be done already. Going on instinct, I grabbed the gun from the small of my back and fired it at Lily, into her shoulder at about the same place I’d been shot.

She screamed, falling to her knees. I wasn’t impressed by her theatrics. It was a non-lethal wound, especially for a Dark Moth. She would heal soon and probably wouldn’t even have a scar. Unless it wasn’t. The bullets were laced with angel essence.

Behind her Georgia threw an axe. I caught it and threw it back so that it struck the wall behind her, burying its sharp edge deep in the ugly wallpaper. “Stop it,” I shouted. “I don’t want to hurt you.” Pain radiated from my shoulder and my stomach as I pulled out the knife and let it drop to the floor.

Gilbert remained where he was, unsure what to do. The gun wavered in his hand.

“I’m going to fix this, Georgia, and you’ll see I’m innocent.” I jumped over Lily, ignoring the pain and the blood and got into the elevator, where I pushed a button so the door would close.

“Shoot her,” Georgia shouted at Gilbert, grabbing the axe out of the wall and hurling it at me.

Lily curled into a ball and let out a panicked howl. “What’s happening to me?” As the doors began to close between us, I saw that Lily’s bloodied hand had turned gray. “Help,” she moaned as the gray continued up her arm. I couldn’t see her face, but her long hair turned gray as her hand became ash. Though the bullet hadn’t hit any major arteries, the angel essence obviously was killing Lily. At the realization, my entire body shook. I’d killed her, but I hadn’t meant to.

“Plea—” Lily’s head collapsed and fell forward, changing to ash before hitting the ground. Within seconds, Lily was gone, her body nothing more than a pile of gray powder.

I made eye contact with Georgia. Greed power rolled off her like a thunderstorm, filling the corridor.

“You’ll pay for this,” Georgia spat, running for me.

Thankfully the elevator doors finally closed.

OceanofPDF.com

BILE ROSE in my throat as I watched Lily die in my mind over and over again. What had I done? With more questions than answers buzzing through my mind, I checked to see which button I'd randomly hit to get the elevator doors to close. D13. That meant I was heading even farther down than when Kade and I had gone for Trial of Three. Under D13 were two more buttons: D14 and D15. If D13 wasn't holding Wrythe, then I'd try D14, followed by the bottommost level before starting back up and checking the rest.

As I rode down, I breathed in slowly through my nose, lifting my shirt to see where Lily had stabbed me. The jagged cut was still open, but had stopped bleeding. The bullet wound wasn't bleeding anymore either.

I rolled my wounded shoulder and then tucked in my shirt. When the elevator doors pinged open, a rancid, rotten smell overwhelmed my senses, knocking away any lingering thoughts about my wounds or Lily. The stench was worse than the stinking menial rats. Dim lights flickered in the semi-circular entryway. The floor felt like rock and was a light tan color. Straight ahead, at positions ten, twelve, and two on a clock stood tall metal doors. Stepping out of the elevator, I debated which door to enter first.

I closed my eyes and listened. It was as quiet as a tomb. But after a moment, I heard something familiar. My eyes snapped open. Teeth gritted, I went to the door straight ahead and turned the handle. The room inside felt like Pasty's basement. Torture machines lined the two side walls while metal bars of prison cells ran along the back. Behind them were several menial demons, but they weren't gnashing at the cage bars the way they usually did when we were getting ready to battle them. These looked sick. But that wasn't what caught my attention. Arranged in a straight line from one end of the large room to the other were metal gurneys. Every one of them had something on it, covered in white sheets stained with demon blood.

My stomach roiled as I thought of the girl who'd been under the sheet in Pasty's basement. He'd said I was just like him—a murderer. And while we Dark Moths didn't kill humans, only demons, as my eyes scanned the gurneys, I couldn't help but wonder if Pasty was right. Was someone torturing menial rats? And for what purpose?

With trepidation, I went to the closest gurney and carefully lifted the sheet. Pieces of a menial lay there, its eyes frozen open, its tongue lolling to one side. I wondered why it hadn't turned to ash as all demons do when they died. And then the eyes slowly moved, catching and holding my gaze.

I gagged. Somehow, they were still alive. "How is this possible?" I moved to the next table and saw more of the same. The demons were all alive! I held no love for demons and I was as anxious to slay them as the next Dark Moth. But with each lift of the sheet, I saw new horrors, and had to believe that regardless of their species, this kind of torture was cruel and unnecessary.

Rage turned my body red. Taking the knife I kept in my boot, I quickly killed the demons on the gurneys. Then I went to the cell. The menials there were still whole, but they had been tortured as well. At my approach, they shied away from the entrance. I shook the handle, trying to open it, but it was locked. Frustrated, I vowed to return and put the rest of the rats out of their misery.

The other two doors held more tortured demons—the one on the left of center held tracker demons while the one on the right contained royal demons. After killing all of them, I felt gross and dirty, and more than ready to bring whoever was doing this to a swift justice. Death wouldn't be good enough for them.

What if this was Wrythe's doing? The question pummeled my mind, but I shook it away. Wrythe would never do such a thing.

Back in the elevator, I gingerly pushed the D14 button, dreading what I would find below this one. But that floor was empty. Just a vast cave of nothingness. So I pushed D15, steeling myself for whatever came next. Distracted by the horrors above, I'd momentarily forgotten my mission. But as the elevator opened, I remembered. I needed to find Wrythe.

A gust of hot wind struck my face and arms. A flicker of light came from somewhere in front of me, allowing me to see the layout of this floor. "Kade," I whispered. The man always seemed to know where I was. I hadn't called for him sooner because I was humiliated my people, Dark Moths, could be capable of such evil.

"I'm here," Kade said, appearing at my side.

Relief rushed over me. "I need to find Wrythe."

"I'm with you," he responded, studying my shirt like he could see in the dark. But he didn't say anything.

A moan sounded somewhere beyond what I could see. As the door closed, I removed the gun from my back, and made my way toward the noise. As I walked the hallway, I searched each stall for Wrythe, but came up empty. My heart sank. Maybe I was hearing things. Was there even a chance he or Peter could be down here? By the sixth stall, I doubted it, but something urged me on, so I kept going.

Another moan cut through the silence. "Wrythe," I whispered, picking up speed until I reached the end of the hall. The stall on the left was empty so I checked the final one on the right. Someone was in there, leaning against the wall in the corner. His face had been beaten so badly it was difficult to make out who it was. I peered in closer. "Wrythe," I said again, kneeling to get a better look at his injuries.

He let out another moan as he tried to open his eyes. "Alice." His voice was raspy, like he had glass in his throat.

"I'm going to get you out of here." I kept my voice soft though I didn't know why.

He tried to lift his head and I noticed one of his wrists hanging slightly above his head. It dangled at an odd angle. A wail of anger rose up in me, but I forced it back down. I needed to stay calm. Now wasn't the time to fall apart.

"Peter," he said, indicating the other side of the rectangular stall.

I glanced in that direction. Peter wasn't moving. "Okay, we'll help him too," I said, fighting back tears. The Pride instructor wasn't moving, and his body lay in a crumbled ball.

"Is he dead?" Wrythe asked.

Kade went over to him, placing his fingers at the artery on his neck. Then shook his head. "No, I'm sorry."

I didn't want to believe him, but had to know for myself. "Let me check." I went over, though I didn't want to. I was afraid of the answer. He was so still. "Peter," I whispered. "It's me. It's Alice. I'm here to help." I shook him slightly. Nothing. I checked for a pulse.

"Is he alive? Peter?" Wrythe's words came out choppy.

"I can't find a pulse, Wrythe." Tears blurred my eyes and my resolve to keep calm was shattering with each passing second.

Wrythe let out a haggard breath. "I didn't think so," he said. His resignation made my heart hurt even more.

I went back over to Wrythe and pulled on the chain holding his wrist against the wall. It wouldn't budge.

"Troll magic," he said simply. "I can't free myself, nor can I heal." He coughed, spitting up something dark. I guessed it was blood.

"It's fine. You're fine. I'm going to get you out of here and then Heathcliff can fix you up. Doc can fix anything." I yanked on the chain again, ignoring the stinging pain from my wounds at the effort. Then I stood and placed on foot against the wall, using it as leverage to yank the blasted thing out. "Damn it," I said after several long moments.

"It's okay, Alice," Wrythe said.

But it wasn't, and I could tell. He was dying.

"Help me," I shouted at Kade, but he stayed where he was, frozen. Rage boiled over and out of me and my skin glowed red, illuminating Wrythe's bloodied and swollen face an eerie glow. "Please," I moaned, confused by Kade's lack of action.

"Hang on, my king." I pulled again. The chain still wouldn't budge. "Come on. I planted both feet and pulled with all my might, including all of my red demon power. "Aaargh!" I yanked again until Wrythe moaned.

"You're hurting my wrist," he said barely above a whisper.

"Sorry. Dammit! Sorry, sire" I said, breathing heavily, beyond angry at Kade, the Society, and the situation. It felt as though I should be able to break the chains with one hand, but it wouldn't budge.

"Give me your hand, Alice. We need to get out of here." Kade grabbed hold of me.

I yanked my hand away. "No! I'm not leaving Wrythe. Get us both out of here."

"I can't," he said and looked broken. "But you can. You have the power to do it yourself, Alice." He touched my arm. "I know you can feel it."

I glared, my blood boiling beyond wrath that he would be using this moment as a teaching opportunity. "I don't give a damn what you think. Help me save him or I never want to see you again!" The threat was a lie, but I was desperate.

Wrythe said something. It sounded like, "Save yourself," but I ignored him. We'd already lost Peter. I'd be damned if we lost Wrythe, too.

Like the flip of a switch, my rage turned to desperation. "Please, Kade. If you care for me at all, you'll go against whatever is holding you back and help me save Wrythe."

He nodded, coming to stand beside me. "Very well," he said.

But before he could do anything, Skye, the Sloth Councilmember rounded the corner. "There's no escape, Alice." She gave me a slow smile, one meant to scare me, but it didn't work.

In that moment, I realized I didn't want to escape. And I wasn't afraid. I would stand my ground. I wanted to fight. "What makes you think I want to get away?"

She took a step back at my comment. "Don't you?" she asked, surprised.

Ewan, the Envy Councilmember, pushed his way around her and towered over me, his seven foot frame like a skyscraper. Kade stood by my side, letting me know he was there if I needed him. Help Wrythe, I said to him in my mind.

Wrythe just told me I needed to help you, and while he's incapacitated at the moment, I'm not going to argue with him.

I appreciated their support. At the thought, pain shot through me. I'd said that about Peter too not that many days ago and now he was dead.

"I know Lily said that if you stayed away she'd let you live, but we aren't going to go as easy on you," Ewan said.

"Choose to have the Devil kill Wrythe," Gage said, appearing abruptly and going to stand beside Ewan.

"I have a better idea," I said, the rage boiling so brightly on my skin, the whole area lit up with the reddish glow.

They took a step back. I matched their pace, coming at them. "You rescind your agreement that I complete the Trial of Three and I'll let you live." Rage seethed from my pores; greater than any anger I'd ever experienced. It seemed to swallow me, and I reveled in it.

Gwen the Gluttony demon pushed her way between them so she was in my face. "Do what we want, Alice, or your friends will die." Her anger lasted until she was close enough to feel the heat radiating off me. Then her bluster died in her throat. She tried to move out of my way, but it was too late.

I grabbed her by the collar of her shirt. "You won't kill them," I said. "Because if you do, then I'll kill you." I shoved her back, sending her to the ground with a thud.

Gage's eyes flashed in the light. "Bow to me, you filthy mutt!"

A single disgusted laugh left my throat. "I will do no such thing," I seethed.

The ground began to shake.

At first, I thought it was because of the depth and breadth of my anger. I would do as Professor Pops and I discussed. I would scare them into submission. They would rescind. These Trials would be over and Wrythe and the trainees would all be safe. I wanted to believe, but as the ground shook harder, something told me I was lying to myself.

"Earthquake," Ewan said, leaning against a wall for support.

"Not an earthquake," a voice said from behind me.

My heart sank. I knew that voice. It was my father's.

"You aren't allowed here," Gwen said, her voice shaking.

"That may be true, but what are you going to do about it?" As he spoke, the Devil clapped his hands together and Gwen turned to ash where she stood. The others scattered, pushing and sprinting around each other, trying to run away.

I faced my father. "Go away," I growled. "You aren't helping." In fact he was ruining everything.

His eyes held mine a moment before he glanced in the direction the other three council members had gone. Then he clapped his hands once more and the three of them turned to ash. There wasn't a scream or a yelp of pain. They were just gone. "Now that's finished, let's you and I talk."

"I still have time before my week is up and I have nothing to say to you." My heart sank. All of my carefully laid plans had been ruined with two claps of the Devil's hands. "Why?" I asked, defeat squashing out the fury I'd felt moments before. How could he treat their lives so callously? I didn't like them, but I hadn't wanted them to die like that either.

“My child. The moment you killed Lily, everything changed. I can’t believe you haven’t figured it out yet.” He came forward, glancing at Kade. “Nice to see you again.”

The rage returned. Roaring, I leapt onto the Devil and ignoring my injuries, I locked my arms around his neck and tried to force his head from his shoulders. A moment later, I was sailing through the air. My head hit the far wall with a dull thud and I slumped to the floor in a daze.

“How dare you? I am your father. I don’t care what you are, you will not disrespect me.” He adjusted his coat jacket and flipped his hair.

With a howl, I rose and charged him again, firing my gun as I went, hoping if I put enough rounds into him, the Devil would die. But he didn’t. The smoke cleared, and he was still standing. “Damn it!” I’d emptied the entire clip into him without effect. “Why won’t you die?” Upon closer inspection, I saw I’d at least drawn blood. I grabbed another clip from my belt and clicked it into place.

Without warning, the gun was ripped from my hand before dropping to the ground with a clatter. The Devil’s smile was pure evil when he spoke. “Trust me when I say you don’t want me to die.”

“Oh, but I do,” I said, pulling the demon orb from my pocket. It was my last hope.

Recognition flared in his eyes and he flinched, taking an involuntary step back. “You don’t want to do anything with that thing. Believe me.”

A smile splayed over my face. I really enjoyed watching the Devil squirm. “You don’t know a thing about me.”

He recovered quickly, and a smile not unlike my own grew on his too-handsome face. “Kade,” he said, looking at the angel. “Shall I tell her, or would you prefer to do the honors?”

My smile faded, and a hundred sick piranha nibbled at my stomach. With great effort, I tore my gaze away from my father, worry creasing my brow. There was a small flash of light and I glanced down at the bracelet Kade gave me for my birthday—the one with the angel wings. I touched it somberly. “Tell me what?” I whispered, bracing myself.

“Well,” Kade said. “It’s like this.” He ran his hands through his hair, his green eyes studying every spot in the room, refusing to look at me. Finally, his gaze fell to the floor before lifting to meet mine. “This is what I was trying to tell you. The reason for my original orders.” He cleared his throat. “See, if the Devil dies, then you will too.”

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE TAKES DEMONLAND

OceanofPDF.com

"DYING WILL BE WORTH IT, if it means you die too," I said, forcing myself not to look at Kade. He didn't agree with what I said, but the Devil needed to know I was serious. The time for games was over. As I stared into the evil blue eyes of my father, it was clear, my life had never been my own and it never would be. Especially if the Devil had anything to say about it.

We were deep below Demonland and the temperature was sweltering. Sweat beaded along my hairline and trickled down my back. I forced myself to ignore it and quickly glanced at Wrythe. He was still suffering from the troll magic the council members had used to torture him. They'd paid the ultimate price. My heart hurt over all the death, including Peter's, as well as the suffering of my king. But if I didn't deal with my father, none of us would live much longer.

The Devil raised his eyebrows. "Really? You're okay with ending your life before you have a chance to live it?" He sauntered forward, his hands tucked into his front pockets like he had all the time in the world. And before I realized what was happening, he flicked his head and flung me through the air. I crashed through one of the prison stalls, my head smacking against the back wall. I heard Kade yell my name as everything went dark.

But only for a moment.

Before I could force myself to my feet, I was in a place I didn't understand. All around me was stark white, without walls, a floor, or a ceiling. The white just went on and on without a beginning or an end. I gazed around in wonder, torn between the beauty and loneliness of the place, until from somewhere behind me came bright, colorful lights in oranges, greens, reds, purples, and blues. They flashed, buzzing around me like irritating gnats. When the lights droned past my ears, I heard voices. The lights could speak! Some were words of encouragement. Others, not so much.

What is she?

Where did she come from?

Do the archangels know about this abomination?

I rolled to my knees as one voice cut through the others. She is the answer. The one we've been waiting for!

Yes, the prophecy.

What the hell did that mean?

Almost as soon as they appeared, the lights vanished, and I was once again in the dark and dirty stall below the compound. Kade was beside me, his face contorted with worry.

"Can you stand?" he asked, his voice soft.

"I think so," I said, regarding him with renewed interest, not because he was so incredibly handsome, though that was true enough, but because he was backlit by a shining light. It was as though his body was struggling to contain all of the light within him. "You're glowing," I said as he pulled me into a hug.

He smirked. "You hit your head pretty hard, Alice. I'm sure there isn't a glow," he said, feigning innocence.

I couldn't deny that. My skull pounded. It's an angel thing, isn't it? I said into his mind. The glow? I waited for him to respond. When he didn't, I rolled my eyes. There had definitely been a light emanating off him.

"You two are so in love. It's sweet," the Devil said, jerking me out of my contemplations. "Really priceless." He chuckled.

I ground my teeth. My legs shook, but I forced myself to face him. "Shut up," I hissed.

The Devil ignored me. "Does she know what will happen if the two of you consummate your love?" He crossed his arms, gazing as us in question.

My face turned red with humiliation. Where did that come from?

“That’s none of your damned business,” I said, but some of my words came out slurred. Gross, I thought.

“You are my daughter; therefore, it is my business. It should be Kade’s too. Because sex with you will remove all angelic essence from him,” he said and paused. “That means he’ll no longer be an angel.” His head tilted to one side.

My face burned. I couldn’t believe my father had picked this moment to have “the sex talk” with me. But was he telling the truth? Would Kade no longer be an angel if we made love? Was that the case if he slept with any Dark Moth? Or was it specifically because I was the Devil’s daughter? That seemed more likely, but I didn’t want to believe. “You’re lying,” I said, my breath coming out in rasps. I felt sick, probably from the head injury, but also because I loved Kade and Kade loved me. What would happen if we weren’t able to take that love to the next level? I looked at Kade, hoping he would verify the Devil was doing what demons always do. Lie. “Is it true?” I asked, holding my hands out in front of me.

Kade’s features were anguished. “Yes,” he admitted. “That’s why the other night, when I disappeared…” He ran a hand through his hair, clearing his throat.

“Oh.” It was all I could say. So not only did his superiors not want the two of us together, but if we were together, Kade would no longer be an angel. “What would happen to you if you were no longer an angel?” I asked softly, glancing at Kade from under my lashes.

“I don’t know,” Kade admitted, his voice trailing off.

The Devil laughed. “He’ll die, obviously,” he said.

Kade seemed to want to interrupt, but the Devil spoke first. “If I can die, so can you,” he said, narrowing his eyes at the love of my life. “Immortality means long life, but the end will come for all of us someday. Maybe not in the way you imagine, but it’ll still be death, and I can’t wait to see that day come for you.” He flung the words at Kade and my heart sank. The Devil wasn’t lying. Crap!

I swallowed down the mourning howl building inside of me. “That can’t be,” I whispered, at a loss. Finding my demon sire and destroying him had been my only focus for as long as I could remember. Now, everything I knew about my life, everything I’d trained for, my reason for getting up in the morning, was no longer an option, unless I chose to end my life as well. Worse than that, I now knew that the man I loved more than anything could never be with me in the way I so desperately wanted to be with him.

My rage grew and grew, red light cocooning my skin like a burning embrace. And I realized the Devil really had told those upper level demons to go easy on me. They all had, except one. Had that demon cared that the Devil would die? Or did he want the Devil dead too?

I was breathing heavily as my fury increased.

Stay calm, Kade said into my mind.

I’m trying, I responded, the red flaring brighter.

Try harder, he said.

I took a deep breath, feeling the cooling balm of the silver-white light suddenly race along my veins and snuffing out the red fury. Fine.

“Now we’ve settled that,” the Devil went on, “how about we discuss the second trial? Have you decided who will live and who will die? As I said before, there’s no way out, especially now, dear Alice.” He grinned, acting as though I hadn’t just discovered that my entire reason for being was useless.

My shoulders slumped. All I’d done—all the plans, and Abernathy and Professor Pops’ help—it was all for nothing. Nothing! I gripped my hands into fists at my sides, squeezing the demon orb with all my might, begging the thing to spring to life and give me a way out of this mess. But it remained cool in my palm. Finally, I shrugged, exhausted. “Does it matter?”

“That seems a little morbid, even for my daughter,” he said, his words dripping with sarcasm. “How about I give you more time?”

I perked up, hating how good that sounded but wanting it just the same. “How much more?”

He shrugged. “It’ll be a surprise.”

I didn’t respond. The week wasn’t up. If he gave me more, that could only be a good thing. Maybe I could figure out a way to save both Wrythe and Kade. “Why would you do that?” I finally asked.

“I have my reasons,” the Devil said evasively. “All of them will benefit me most of all, but you might as well enjoy the extra time as well, daughter.”

“That’s not good enough,” I said, flinching at his use of the word that bound me to him in a familial way. “I need specifics.”

The Devil’s smirk grew into a full-blown smile. “You have at least five days.”

I glanced at Kade, his face unreadable. Why do you think he’s doing this? What’s his end game?

His designs are a mystery to me, but more time is good. Kade kept his face forward as he spoke into my mind, probably so the Devil wouldn’t guess what we were doing, but I had a feeling my father knew anyway.

“Are the new terms acceptable?” The Devil had his hands clasped behind his back.

“Yes,” I said, gritting my teeth, my body swaying.

“Excellent.” He let out a deliberate breath. “But let me give you some fatherly advice to ponder.”

“What?” I didn’t want to hear another thing from him, but I also didn’t want to be flung across the room again either. Though my bullet wound and stab wound were all but healed, I was still sore. Smacking my head against the wall didn’t help.

